With regard to the children going to the Coombe School it is the best proof that they were Catholics. For Catholics that school and others of a similar character were established; to deprive them of their faith is the sole object of these institutions. Every inducement is offered to these poor children, nay we have heard that violence is sometimes resorted to for the purpose of gaining possession of them.

Thus contradicted in her statement that statement is certified by all the Colvins, the value of such verification we leave the reader to estimate.

There is a certificate from Mistress Mills, saying that Mrs. Kirley had attended a Sunday school between 1837, and 1840. It is not material; the next, a letter from Mr. Kingston, we give in full:—

Ashfield, Harold's Cross,
December 3rd, 1857.

My Lord,

I trust the circumstances of the case will excuse the liberty I take in writing to you. Having seen in the "Freeman's Journal" of the 24th ult., extracts from a letter addressed by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin to your Lordship, in which mention is made of the Widow Kirley, she being a parishioner of mine, I was led to enquire from her the truth of the allegations of Archbishop Cullen respecting her. I send you a brief summary of the statement made to me by Mrs. Kirley in presence of her own mother, who certainly did not express dissent, rather appeared to concur in what was said by her daughter. The Widow Kirley said she is, and always has been, a Protestant, and never professed herself a Roman Catholic. She told me she was living in Dundalk when the news reached her of her husband's death. On being then asked by the gentleman who gave her the information, what she intended to do she replied, "God is good, and He will provide for me and my children: as long as He leaves me my health and my senses I have no fear, and I will bring up my children as I was brought up myself in the Protestant faith." With that determination she left Dundalk and came up to Dublin, in the suburbs of which she lived, and sent her children to Protestant schools. They were attending the Protestant Ragged School on the Coombe when she first manifested an aberration of intellect. She went to the school one day to bring home her children, and was proceeding with them home when she was taken up by a policeman who charged her as being under the influence of liquor. She and her children were committed to Grangegorman Penitentiary, and there entered, (as appears by the registry,) Roman Catholics. But of such entry she declares she knew nothing, nor by whose direction she was so entered. (Query—By whose authority was such entry made?) She also says that when taken to mass she recollects having knelt down in her seat with her back to the altar, and she heard an officer of the prison say, "that woman is a Protestant for no Catholic would do what she has now done." She was afraid to refuse going to mass, for she was told, (but by whom she does not recollect,) "that if she did not she would be fed on bread and water and would not be allowed to see her children." Be it observed it was not pecuniary distress which caused her to be committed to prison, for when taken up she had on her person £2 2s. 6d. besides some coppers. Her subsequent committals to Grangegorman Penitentiary were occasioned by manifestations of insanity, until at length she was placed in the lunatic department. When, in the providence of God, her senses were restored to her she had her children placed under Protestant care and instruction. She further told me that some weeks ago the Rev. Mr. Grimley, Roman Catholic priest, sent for her and required her to sign a paper, promising her if she would sign the paper he would take good care of her and her children. She refused and did not sign, nor did she know what was in the paper. On another occasion the Rev. Mr. Kenedy, Roman Catholic priest, importuned her to sign a paper, and made her a similar promise; but she absolutely refused. She also told me that during the lifetime of her husband one of her children, with the knowledge and concurrence of her husband, was baptized by a Protestant clergyman. It is, my Lord, quite apparent what a slender foundation Archbishop Cullen has had for his mighty fabric in connection with the Widow Kirley and her children. If your Lordship considers the facts I have herein stated of any value in the consideration of the case you are at perfect liberty to make what use you please of this letter.

I am, &c.

Thomas Kingston,
Vicar of St. James', Dublin.

To put a climax to the long series of misrepresentation, sneering, insolence and falsehood, which characterize the case of the Kirleys, it was hardly necessary to furnish a document in which all four attributes are combined. Notwithstanding, we find a document composed of such ingredients in the letter of Vicar Kingston. Whether this letter be the invention of a "mind diseased," or the production of a mind debased, we shall not pause to consider; enough for us that it is false in almost every particular, and foully false as to that portion of it in which it is sought to sully the good name of an upright, honourable, and useful official, by insinuating that in the discharge of his office, he would allow himself to be made the tool of any sect or of any party, (Query by whose authority?). Pie on you Mr. Kingston. These are your words. Had they been the expression of the poor lunatic, we would have passed them over, and even coming from you they are not worth much notice. They are referred to, to be contradicted. Had you the feelings of a gentleman, not to speak of those of a Christian, if these two characters can ever be separated, you would not think upon the ex parte statement of a person who had been in confinement as a "dangerous lunatic" of maligning the motives and aspersing the conduct of a gentleman who fills an important office and discharges its onerous duties with zeal and efficiency. We shall now consider the letter in detail, "she never professed herself a Roman Catholic," we proved false by Harris's letter. "The grandmother of the children informs me that Sergeant Kirley was a Roman Catholic, and Margaret Kirley brought up as a Protestant. But as it is contrary to custom to marry two persons of different religion, the latter changed for the purpose of the ceremony."—Extract from Harris's letter, 26th March, 1857. "She was taken up by a policeman who charged her as being under the influence of liquor. She and her children were committed to Grangegorm Penitentiary." There is no date given, so we cannot positively deny the statement. It is, however, highly improbable that her children would be committed along with the mother, she being charged as drunk. When the report appeared, persons were struck by Kingston's allegations and Dr. Grey, one of the Board of Superintendence of the Penitentiary, drew the attention of Mr. Synnott, the governor, to the "facts" therein stated. The following is Mr. Synnott's reply:—

" Grangegorman Prison, Dublin,
" 31st March, 1858.

" DEAR DR. GRAY,

" I beg to acknowledge the receipt of the letter which, in your official capacity, as a member of the Board of Superintendence of City of Dublin Prisons, you forwarded to me on last night, together with the Second Report of the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund; and as you directed, I have read over, with particular attention, the passages marked by you 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, in the Appendix 45, at page 62 in that document. Permit me here to thank you, as the governor of this institution, for giving the opportunity of contradicting the many, to say the least of it, gross misrepresentations made by Margaret Kirley, lately a prisoner in that establishment.

" The Appendix above referred to is a letter from the Rev. J. Kingston, Vicar of St. James's, addressed to the Right Hon. the Lord St. Leonards, in the first passage of which it is stated that, 'Mrs. Kirley and her children were committed to Grangegorman Prison, and there entered (as appears by the registry) Roman Catholics, but of such entry she declares she knew nothing, nor by whose directions she was so entered.'

" (Query.—By whose authority was such entry made.")

" Answer.—By the authority of Margaret Kirley to the Registrar, who, as you desire to know his name and character, is a Mr. Warren, a highly respectable and respected officer, who, for twenty-one years, has filled the office without the slightest stain or imputation being cast upon him in any respect, and I may further add, by religious profession an Episcopalian Protestant. The assistant clerk in the office, too, has a distinct recollection of this woman entering herself on the books of this prison as a Roman Catholic; and, if necessary, as you seem to think it may be hereafter, the statements of these officers can be verified on oath.

" Second.—She also says that when taken to Mass she recollects having knelt down in her seat with her back to the altar, and she heard an official of the prison say: 'That woman is a Protestant, for no Catholic would do what she has done.'

" Answer.—None of the officers have the slightest recollection of this circumstance occurring, nor do I believe a word of it, for the prisoners are regularly marched to their respective places of worship by the officers in charge of their class, and when they enter the church or chapel, they take their places next to each other, and it would, indeed, be an unseemly affair to see one of them sitting with her face to the prisoners and her back to the altar.

" Third.—She was afraid to refuse going to Mass, for she was told (but by whom she does not recollect) that if she did not, she would be fed on bread and water, and would not be allowed to see her children "

" Answer.—The officers of the prison have been assembled and interrogated upon this point, and all utterly deny their knowledge of such a matter. On the contrary, they all, both Protestants and Catholics, say that when the chapel bell rung, she went like the other prisoners to Mass. Her incarceration was generally fourteen days at a time; and she could, upon any of these occasions, have herself entered with respect to religion in any way she pleased. Her children, as she was committed for vagrancy, were always left with her, as are the children of all vagrants, both Protestants and Catholics.

" Fourth.—' Be it observed, it was not pecuniary distress which caused her to be committed to prison, for when taken up she had on her person £2 2s. 6d., besides some copper.'

" Answer.—The prison officers, whose duty it was to search this woman, know nothing of the affair, nor is there any record in the books: it is simply untrue.

" Fifth.—Her subsequent committals to Grangegorman prison were occasioned by manifestations of insanity, until at length she was placed in the lunatic department.

" Answer.—This statement is also untrue; she never was committed to this prison for anything but vagrancy, except on the last occasion (March, 1857,) when she was committed as a 'dangerous lunatic,' and, as I understood from Major Harris, at his request, he having waited upon Police Commissioner Colonel Browne for that purpose, her intemperate tendencies, as I also understood from that gentleman, being the occasion of her lunacy.

" In conclusion, allow me to state that I trust this letter will satisfy your mind that there has been no violation of duty on the part of the officers of this prison. If, however, on the other hand, you think otherwise, and deem an investigation necessary, I assure you the officers will not shrink from it, but rather court the most searching inquiry into their conduct, having no fear of the result.

" Should you require any further information on this unpleasant subject, it shall be most cheerfully afforded by,

" Dear Dr. Gray,

" Your's very truly,

" THOMAS L. SYNNOTT,

" Governor.

" Grangegorman Penitentiary,

" March 31, 1858.

" DEAR SIR,

" In reply to your favour of yesterday, I beg to acquaint you that I have this morning examined the deputy-matron, and every sub-matron of the prison, on the subject of the following extract from the Report of the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund: 'She was afraid to refuse going to Mass, for she was told (but by whom she does not recollect) that if she did not, she would be fed on bread and water, and would not be allowed to see her children.'

"I have read this extract to the matrons assembled together, and the decided reply of each was, that no such threat had ever been used by them to Mrs. Kirley nor to any other prisoner. I never heard of any such threat, or I should have felt it my duty to have brought it at once before the Board of Superintendence, and certainly I never myself used any language to a prisoner that could be so construed.

"I am, dear Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"MARIAN RAWLINS, Matron.

"To Dr. Gray, etc., etc."

The charge against the Rev. Messieurs Kennedy and Grimley is positively denied by both these gentlemen. As to the child being baptised by a Protestant clergyman we honestly confess we know nothing. If it be the child born at Leith it was not there baptised a Catholic, for there was no Catholic priest or chapel in the district.

We shall close Mrs. Kirley's case by inserting an extract from the Archbishop's second letter, in answer to the report, on the subject of the rights of Catholic soldiers. We do so in this place as it will serve as a comment on the case, we have just been considering, and an introduction to the one we are now about to enter upon.

"It is fresh in the minds of every one that for the past the rights of Catholic soldiers and sailors were not held sacred. Though fighting with undaunted courage for their country, it was penal for them to practise their religion during life, and they were left at the hour of death without any spiritual assistance. Hundreds of thousands of Irish Catholics have shed their blood for the glory of England in every quarter of the globe, but nothing was done in past times to provide for the salvation of their immortal souls. Things are now greatly improved, but many grounds of complaint still remain, and a great deal is to be done before the Catholic soldier can be said to be on a footing of equality with his Protestant companion. There are no regular Catholic chaplains; no Catholic chapels in the barracks; no military schools or orphanages, to which Catholic children can be safely sent; and Catholic sailors whilst engaged in fighting the battles of the empire, are still left without any religious provision whatsoever. Your Lordship will easily understand how afflicting this state of things must be to Catholics, who believe that there is but one true faith, and know that they are obliged to live up to the teaching of that faith, in order to secure the salvation of their immortal souls. Men not having any definite system of belief, and not attaching much importance to any creed, or to religious observances, may be indifferent as to the education of their children, and think it no grievance to be left without any religious worship. Of course their indifference in regard to the education of their children will be increased if they believe that they can be saved in the profession of any religion, or that one religion is as good for them as another. Such men may be considered as expressing no wish regarding the religion of their children: But the case is different with Catholics: their opinions are decided, and they must always feel the greatest anxiety, if their children be exposed to lose the true faith, or to be separated from that Church out of whose pale there is no salvation.

But returning to the present question, as her gracious Majesty declares that Catholic soldiers have sacred rights, we may ask what these rights are: I submit that one of the most sacred of them is that a Catholic soldier falling in battle should have it in his power to secure to his children the faith in which they were baptized, and in which he wished them to be brought up, and without which he believed they could not be saved. He should be enabled to die in the conviction that the country to which he has given his life will receive his children, and guard for them as jealously as he should have done, the only inheritance he has to leave them. If a Catholic soldier expiring on the field were to take by the hand an officer whose life he had saved at the cost of his own, and conjure him to see that his orphan children should be educated in the faith of their father, I think too highly of human nature to believe that the sternest Protestant living would not in such a case preserve those children from contact with any influence that might change or weaken their religion. Is the case different, when he bequeaths them, not to this or that officer, but to his country and his sovereign? But let us suppose our dying soldier unable to speak: if the captain, for whose life he has thus given his own, and whom we still assume to be a Protestant of no doubtful hue, well knows the humble hero to have been as loyal to the Catholic faith as he had been true to his colours, well knows him to have incurred cruel penalties for the sake of educating his children in that faith; what views, my Lord, may I be allowed to ask, would he take of the rights, the "sacred rights," of his dying soldier? Would he say: "My poor friend has given his life in my defence: his wish throughout life was to preserve his faith and hand it down to his children: death, incurred in my service, has stopped his utterance before he could give expression to his wish: and I am therefore at liberty to condemn and to defeat it?" Could he lay his hand upon his heart and say this, it would be an argument that the curse of Nabuchodonosor had fallen upon him—that in very deed the heart of a man had been taken from him; and that he had received the heart of a beast. Again, my Lord, substitute the country for the captain, and are the rights and duties different?

Without entering into further discussion, I may take it as admitted that the Commissioners representing the country are guardians of the "sacred rights" of Catholics who have fallen in battle; that one of the most sacred of those rights is the education of Catholic orphans according to the wishes of their parent; that the Commissioners, thus standing in the place of a parent, are bound to act in every particular towards the orphans as their natural father would have done; and that their duty so to act is the same, whether it arise from express direction or from necessary implication. And if the rights we treat of be so sacred, no oppressive rule of law, and above all, no arbitrary regulations of individuals, should turn aside the consolations of charity from the death-bed of the Catholic soldier and from the cradle of his orphan. The same justice, which makes his informal will as regular and powerful an instrument as any that your Lordship ever drew or certified should interfere to protect his sacred rights from confiscation by rules, minutes, or regulations. If the Catholic soldier say to you: I have married a thriftless and dissipated wife: her desire of indulging in spirituous liquors may induce her to sell to the highest bidder the faith of her children, for money to enable her to indulge her wicked propensities: her habits of intemperance may lead her to the workhouse, the prison, or the lunatic asylum. I got my children baptized in the Catholic church; while I could I gave them Catholic education: will my country continue to do so after my death in her service? it is my last wish—it is my sacred right. Shall my right be defeated in consequence of the lunacy or intemperance of my wife? shall my children be placed in the hands of a Protestant minister, to be educated in a religion contrary to my own? Or suppose he should say: I have married a wife; she is an ignorant, uneducated woman, and evinces great vacillation regarding the care of her children—(Second Report, par. 33;) will you see that the children I leave to my country shall be educated as Catholics—it is my wish—is it not my right?—

Will you answer: It is in truth your right, but the decision in Alicia Race's case stands in your way—and then there is a minute of the Commissioners that cannot be gotten over: in some way or another, which can be properly explained no doubt, when your widow comes to apply for relief, she will meet with a Protestant clergyman in the first instance (Appendix to Report No. 49, 52, etc. ;) her mind is weak by nature or weakened by poverty; he will acquire influence, ascendancy, dominion: she will transfer your children in due form to him, and that will bring them within the rule of the decision in the Queen's Bench. Your rights are undoubted, but all the chances are against you; the law indeed will be respected—nothing unfair will be done; but the rule in Alicia Race's case, and the minutes of the Commissioners—these are inflexible. Die in peace, but your children must be Protestants. If they be in India they will be consigned to a Protestant orphanage; if at home, they will be placed in the Duke of York's school, or the Hibernian school, where apostacy is of frequent occurrence, or sent to some other school in which, according to Captain Fishbourne, the "teaching is Protestant;" or the choice of a school for them will be left to a Protestant clergyman, who will hand them over to the sister of a Protestant schoolmaster, and keep them under his own immediate superintendence (Appendix to Report, No. 49.) My Lord, was it upon this understanding that we gave our money and our blood? We did not weigh the one in a hair balance, or measure the other in a graduated glass; and we did not expect that we should have reason to complain, or that in case such reason should exist, our complaints would be met with special pleading and the manipulation of evidence."

We shall now consider the case of Mrs. Norris. A Catholic herself, the widow of a Catholic soldier, her children were seized upon by a parson, placed at an asylum devoted to Protestant purposes, when rescued by the mother were retaken by the parson, committed to the care of a Protestant school-mistress under the control and supervision of this parson, every effort which the wretched mother made to regain her daughter, (happily the son is safe,) defeated by forms not used in cases of application by Catholics for admission to Protestant Schools until worn, out by anxiety of mind operating on a weakened frame, and that again re-acting on her mental faculties, she yielded her daughter to the staff-officer to be sent to Hampstead. The decision in the Court of Queen's Bench has nothing to do with this case, for all the iniquity we shall presently detail, was perpetrated before that decision was made. Looking at this case in an ordinary point of view, it seems to us not probable that a Catholic would select a Protestant School in preference to one of her own persuasion for the education of her children supposing no inducement to be held out to her to do so, and no impediments thrown in the way of her pursuing that course which appears to us the natural one for her to pursue. We say it is not probable that she would have acted as she is represented to have done supposing that she got fair play. Now the question before the public is, did she get fair play. We have no hesitation in saying she did not. It is not from extrinsic documents, nor from private information, that we have come to that opinion, but simply upon the facts set out in the Report and the appendix. From the meagre details furnished in the appendix, we glean the following facts, which we shall relate before entering into an examination of the documents which are published in the appendix as forming the correspondence upon this case. Incidentally we may mention that the first application of Mrs. Norris to the Commissioners for a recognition of her claim is not included, so that we are left completely in the dark as to the period at which she first applied to be put on the pension list of the Patriotic Fund. It is to be regretted that something more than extracts of those interesting letters from Mr. Hare have not been produced; information too full could not be given on matters of such grave importance, involving, as they do, questions of the deepest interest as well to the administrators as to the recipients of the nation's bounty. From these documents, however, we collect the following history. On the 12th July, 1856-7, Mr. Hare informs Captain Fishbourne that he placed the little daughter of Mrs. Norris at a certain orphanage. The mother took her home, but Mr. Hare afterwards placed her with a Miss Shepherd, and asked permission to place the little boy, who was about six years of age, with his sister. This permission Captain Fishbourne at once grants. On the 1st August, 1856, Mrs. Norris put her mark to a petition, certified by Canon Grimley, requesting to have her daughter sent to St. Clare's orphanage. That petition was forwarded to Mr. John Ball, a Member of Parliament, Under-secretary for the Colonies, and one of the Royal Commissioners. Mr. Ball being on the Continent, did not get this petition until his return in September. He at once sent it to Captain Fishbourne. This memorial was sent to Parson Hare. The letter accompanying that memorial is not published, and a blank seems to occur here, for there are two letters from Hare, the 19th and 25th September, and no letter from Fishbourne. Mr. Ball not receiving any reply to his note, and having been spoken to, when in Ireland, on the subject, wrote again on the 4th November, calling Fishbourne's attention to the fact that no answer had been received by Mrs. Norris. To that note Fishbourne replies, stating that the memorial had been sent to Mrs. Norris. The first reply that Mrs. Norris received directly from the office was a note dated "5th November," and signed "Mugford." On the 13th of that month, Mrs. Norris again petitioned to have her child sent to Harold's Cross, her letter being certified by Alderman Reynolds. To that petition came the reply that her petition should have been forwarded through the Staff-Officer of Pensioners. She does so, and the Staff-Officer writes that she wants to have her child sent to Baggot-street Convent. Presentation papers had been applied for by Captain Fishbourne, and when he got them, he would send two of them signed. Meantime whilst all these proceedings were going forward, Mrs. Norris had got married, but unfortunately the man of her choice had then living a prior claimant on his purse and his affections. In pursuance of one of the rules of the Committee, made in contemplation of a second marriage on the part of those in receipt of relief from the fund, she lost her pension. But on the production of the letter from Captain Mansfield, she is approved for half allowance. On the 10th January, she forwards a petition to some person, the name is not given, signed with her name, asking to have her child placed at the London Infant Home. This is communicated to Ormsby, who gets the woman to sign the form, appendix 14, and to the letter which he writes on the 30th January, Fishbourne sends an answer on the 2nd February, ordering the child and mother to be sent up to London and the expenses of both paid, and money given to the mother to pay her passage back. These things were done, the child is in Hampstead, the mother in the grave.

Such is the state of things presented by the appendix. Now let us see what the report says. The italics are our own, and we use them for the purpose of arresting the reader's attention to that particular point which, out of the appendix, we are able to contradict. The report says—"It there (in the appendix) appears that Mrs. Norris had placed her daughter in May, 1856, in charge of the managers of the General Orphan Home in Dublin, from which place she was removed by her mother at whose earnest request, to the Rev. William Hare, military chaplain, she, together with her brother, was then placed under the care of Miss Shepherd a Protestant." Now let us see how that is verified by the appendix. In the letter of Mr. Hare dated 12th July, we find the following:—

Dublin 12th July, 1856-7.

"I some time ago placed two orphan children of Crimean soldiers, Mary Ann Norris and Agnes Arnott, under the care of the guardians of the General Orphan Home Richmond Street, Portobello, by whom they were given in charge to a woman named Mrs. Collins, living in Bride-street, Dublin, there being no institution for the reception of female orphans. Mrs. Norris, thinking that her child was not properly taken care of, and especially that her education was neglected, took her away from Mrs. Collins without consulting any one, and on her own responsibility. I did not by any means approve of this summary method of proceeding, but on inquiry I found the poor woman had some ground of complaint, as, in point of fact, her child had never been sent to any day-school since she had been with Mrs. Collins, though at her request.

"I have found in my own neighbourhood a person named Miss Shepherd, who is disposed to take charge of these two children, and of any others who we may wish to entrust to her. Miss Shepherd is the sister of the schoolmaster of Harold's Cross. She is highly recommended to me by the clergyman of the parish; she lives within a few doors of the parish school, where the children under her care would have an opportunity of attending both during the week and on Sunday; the locality is healthy, being out of the town ; and the children would be under my own immediate superintendence. If you approve of the above arrangement being made, I will have it carried into effect immediately."

Apart from the palpable contradiction given by the letter to the statements in the report, it would strike a person as rather odd that a Catholic should seek out and earnestly request a Protestant minister to place her children at a Protestant school, their being numbers of priests in Dublin who have opportunities of placing children at schools. But the fact is patent from Hare's letter that he placed the children at this home, and he does not say when more precisely than by saying "sometime ago." The mother's name is not mentioned as assenting, her authority is not referred to, and the only act which we find that mother doing, is taking away the girl from the woman to whom she had been confided, of which Hare did not approve, but which showed clearly her disapproval of the steps that had been taken. As to her placing the children with Miss Shepherd, that is clearly false. Hare found out and recommended Miss Shepherd, and in his letter he does not say that the mother asked him or authorised him to place her children with Miss Shepherd. Why it is that this Hare should be so much interested about these children, so anxious that they should be brought within the influence of Miss Shepherd's pious ministration as to agree to make up the difference between the fund allowance and Miss Shepherd's demand by a private subscription, we are really at a loss to find out. Had a priest so acted with regard to Protestant children we should be inclined to suspect that he desired to make proselytes of them, but as Hare was acting for the Patriotic Fund, of which the moneys were always disbursed, "with even-handed justice and complete impartiality," we cannot attribute to him any such purpose. We shall leave it to our readers to form their own judgment. The next sentence in the report is as follows :—

"Early in September of the same year, a paper dated August 1st, signed by Mrs. Norris, Mark, requesting to have her girl placed in St. Clare's Orphan House Harold's Cross, was received at this office. This request was not then acted on, as Mrs. Norris had in the interim placed her child under the care above stated, and as she did not express any wish for her child's removal although informed of the request that had been made in her name."

We see plainly what Fishbourne is driving at, but we cannot undertake to explain letters which are not printed in the verifying appendix; by a reference to that letter of Hare, it will be perceived that the application to have the children placed with Miss Shepherd, is dated 12th July, 1856-7, the answer granting the application, is dated 15th July, 1856. How Fishbourne can say that these dates are "in the interim," as regards the 1st August, and the 5th November, we know not; the only way in which we can account for these errors is, that now as ever, truth will out, suppress it though we may. But let us ask why the petition of Mrs Norris was allowed to remain unanswered from the 8th September, to the 5th November? Mr. Hare's application is answered in due course of post, but the petition, certified by a Catholic priest, and forwarded to the office by one of the Commissioners, is quite unattended to for two months, then not noticed until the Commissioner writes again, and then his note is answered with a lie; this would seem to contradict the assertion with regard to the unvarying attention which the applications of Catholics have received, when we find a Commissioner, because he is a Catholic, snubbed by his servant. If a gentleman request a domestic servant to do something, which apart from such request he is bound to do, that servant neglects that request, and when again spoken to, says he has done, not what he was asked, but something else, and in so doing lies, he ought not to be retained in any service. Such is the case here. We wonder is lying consistent with the character of an "officer and a gentlemen." But Fishbourne knew he was quite safe from censure. There were not three Roman Catholics on the Commission. It is then clear that it is not the fact that "Mrs. Norris had, in the interim, placed her children, &c." With regard to her not expressing a wish to have her child removed, &c., we think it is pretty plain, that she did, and, notwithstanding the insinuation that is thrown out of improper interference on the part of Canon Grimley, the charge being, that he used her name without her sanction. Such an imputation is strictly in accordance with the doctrines of the I. C. M. R. C., who teach that lying, cheating, robbery, murder, &c., are the principal dogmas of the Catholic Church, and amongst the chief practices of its members. The imputation is wholly false, and could emanate only from a jaundiced mind, which tinges everything around, with the hue of its own distemper. There is no mention made of the part which Mr. Ball took in this matter, no mention of sending the memorial and the Commissioners' letter to Parson Hare, or of his "questioning" her, or of the falsehood which the parson writes when he says "not receiving any answer to this application she asked to have her little girl placed with Miss Shepherd." This Hare only knew of the memorial on the 10th of September, yet he has the face to make the above, statement when he knew the girl was at Miss Shepherd's in July. There were a great many forms to be gone through, when the child was to be sent to a Catholic school. She must apply to the staff officer. Hare got his request at once. We think we cannot do better than here to give the language of the Archbishop on the latter portion of this distressing case:—

"I now apply myself to the remainder of the case, every portion of which is affected by the suspicion attaching to its commencement. When Mr. Hare is the applicant, things run smoothly, and without reference to Commissioners, committees, clerk of committee, or staff officer. When Mrs. Norris is applicant, the rules of the service become stern and complicated in the inverse ratio of the intelligence and strength of the widow. The clerk of the committee, Mr. Mugford, directs her "if she wishes to remove her child," to apply to the staff officer, who will write to Captain Fishbourne, who will obtain the decision of the Committee. In her bewilderment, or perhaps from a reluctance to be "questioned" and "pressed," Mrs. Norris applies to Mr. Mugford himself, evidently interpreting his former letter as a refusal. Mr. Mugford, however, adheres to the inflexible rule, and directs her once more to communicate with the staff officer. She does so accordingly, and upon the occasion of this third application, her request is, that her children be sent to the Sisters of Mercy in Baggot-street. Lest any doubt should remain upon the matter, the poor woman is again subjected to the "question," and persists in her choice of the Baggot-street orphanage. Captain Fishbourne's letter (Ap. to report, No. 60) appears to have something mysterious in it, stating as it does, that the child Maryanne Norris was under seven years of age, whereas she was more than nine;* and speaking of a memorial of Mrs. Norris to have her child placed at Miss Shepherd's, of the existence of which memorial there is no evidence whatever.

Meanwhile, the Sisters of Mercy having failed through some mischance to forward the mysterious presentation forms, it becomes necessary to send a second letter to them before the memorial can be granted, and a second letter is dispatched in two days after the formal wishes of the applicant had been extracted by another application of the "question." The presentation forms at length arrive, and the presentation itself is actually made out, when Mrs. Norris, under what influences besides those of weariness and disappointment God

* Maryanne Norris was baptized on the 18th July, 1847, in Chester, by the Rev. Canon Carbery; so that she was nine years and five months old when Captain Fishbourne states that she was not seven!

alone can tell as yet, alters her request, and seeks admission for the orphan into the Hampstead school. It is remarkable that the report does not explain how this last request came into Captain Fishbourne's hands, to whom it was addressed, and by whom forwarded. Every other document received from her is attested with her mark; this alone is represented to have been signed by her. Why she speaks of the Hampstead school now for the first time, or who it was that suggested it to her, we have no means of discovering. I formerly inquired by what agency, or by what official, she was induced to change her mind, and my question remains to be answered still, though the Appendix throws great light on the matter. The Hampstead school did not occur to her by intuition, nor is her violent and decided change of purpose referable to vacillation or caprice: for it is one thing to waver between two Catholic schools in Dublin, and another thing to choose a Protestant school in England, of which she herself could have no knowledge.

Observe the sequel. It did not occur to Captain Fishbourne to forward the new memorial to Canon Grimley, who certified her first application, with a view to his "questioning" and "pressing" her, so as to discover whether the memorial which bore her signature had been previously read and explained to her. But perhaps it is allowed to stand over for a month or so? Far from it. At all events, we are bound to suppose that Mr. Mugford is desired to inform her that her application is irregular, that it should have been forwarded through the staff officer, and that the Committee are as decided not to relax their rule in this instance as they were in the instance of her first, second, and third application. By no means. "Facta est hæc lex omnibus non tibi." The rule was inflexible when the child was to be sent to a Catholic school, but it does not hold where the application refers to a Protestant school. Captain Fishbourne (Ap. No. 67) forwards the letter himself to Major Ormsby, stating that the presentation had been already obtained (why was it not already forwarded?) but that as the child was not as yet an inmate of the institution, the Committee would give her mother an opportunity of choosing a school for her. May we not doubt whether the Committee was ever consulted on the matter? At the same time he encloses a written engagement to be signed by Mrs. Norris, binding her to abide by this last engagement, on the distinct understanding that the teaching in the Hampstead school was purely Protestant. Captain Fishbourne and Major Ormsby claim great credit for having informed Mrs. Norris that the Hampstead institution was Protestant. Truly, a man does not need to be an abstract of official virtue, in order to explain to a woman who does not know how to read, a document she is required to sign; and this was in fact the only thing done in the case of Mrs. Norris. The Royal Commissioners have very unnecessarily identified themselves with these transactions, when, speaking of themselves, they say that, in this case at all events, "We" evinced no desire to proselytize. In my conscience I acquit them of participation at the time in every little overt or covert act of treason against human nature; but if they persist in adhering to the Report with all its iniquities upon its head, are they not accessories after the fact, if ever there were such?

The case is near its end. On the 30th January Major Ormsby (Ap. 68) forwards to London the last application with its irrevocable engagement; and on the 2nd February the request is carried into effect (Ap. 69). The memorial for presentation to a Catholic school is under consideration for five months; it is defeated by a breach of official duty almost without example, or by the stringency of rules that seem to exist only for the Catholic; whereas the application for admission to a Protestant school is granted after just three weeks of easy and unembarrassed routine from date of the application, but probably within a much shorter term from the day when it was received by Captain Fishbourne."

So ends Mrs. Norris. She is dead—and when that day comes, as assuredly it will, when Hare and Fishbourne shall stand before their God, the truth will then appear, for no report "verified by the appendix," will avail. Incidentally, the following cases are mentioned:—

"At great risk of wearying your Lordship, I am bound to notice some other cases which are incidentally mentioned in the Appendix to the Report. I allude to the cases of Bridget Ryan, Agnes Arnott, and Anne Kyle. I shall take them in their order. The only mention made of the first two occurs in the letter of the Rev. Mr. Hare, of the 25th September, 1856, Appendix 53 to Second Report, in which Mr. Hare states: "I have this day made application to Major Ormsby for payment for the first quarter for Bridget Ryan, Agnes Arnott, and Anne Kyle, under the care of Miss Shepherd, Harold's Cross, and for William Norris, in charge of Mrs. Magee in the same district." The names Bridget Ryan and Anne Kyle sufficiently indicate a Catholic parentage, and it remains to be explained who they are, and how they came into Mr. Hare's hands. As to Agnes Arnott thus casually mentioned, I find that her father, although a Protestant, wished to have his child baptized and brought up a Catholic, and in fact the child was baptised in the Catholic Church in Youghal (Doc. No. 22). It also appears that Arnott after his wife's death, continued in the determination to educate his child a Catholic, and that when leaving for the East, he confided his orphan to a Mrs. Gregory, also a Catholic now in Dublin, with strict injunctions to have her educated in the Catholic faith. I have been able to ascertain from Mrs. Gregory herself that, under the pressure of want and inability to support her charge, she was induced to relinquish her to Mr. Hare. Now Mrs. Gregory was neither the natural nor the testamentary guardian of the child, and she was recognized, whereas Canon Grimley was denied recognition on the ground that he was not such guardian. To proceed, however; Mrs. Gregory touched with remorse for her breach of faith with the deceased, and for her breach of higher obligations still with God, is anxious to repair the evil she has done, and Mrs. Minchin, the maternal aunt of the orphan, applies to have the child removed to a Catholic school, and her application is rejected. What becomes of the Queen's Bench decision? The Protestant father of the child wished to have her reared a Catholic; he and her Catholic mother got her baptized a Catholic; her mother's sister, a Catholic, demands her removal to a Catholic institution, and she is set at defiance. My informants are prepared to prove these facts before any competent tribunal ; and so far as the facts go, they enable me, perhaps, to rate at its proper value the boasted adherence of the Commissioners to the rule in Race's case and the five instances in which it has been applied favourably to Catholics.

This case is easily disposed of. It is that of the widow Catherine McDonald, of the 62nd regiment. Her name occurs in the Appendix 59 to the Report, from which it appears that she applied to have her child placed with the Sisters of Mercy, Baggot-street. Major Ormsby's letter, notifying the application to Captain Fishbourne, is dated December 16, 1856, and the application was acceded to, as I have learned, in about eleven months after the date of its presentation. The delay, I presume, will be explained ; and minutes, and resolutions, and presentation forms, and rules, and references back to proper, and perhaps to improper authorities, will account for it to the satisfaction of the Commissioners' officials upon trial before themselves ; but I may be permitted to doubt of the result when they come to trial before the country, especially when this delay is contrasted with the rapidity of the decisions of Captain Fishbourne, when the Kirleys and the Norrises were to be sent to Protestant schools. Major Harris brings the case of the Kirleys under the notice of the Captain on the 17th March, and the answer is dated the 18th. The Major writes again on the 23rd March, and the reply is dated the 24th. Mrs. Norris's case, when her child was to be sent to a Protestant school, was disposed of with equal haste. Major Ormsby informs Captain Fishbourne on the 30th January that Mrs. Norris wishes to place her child in Hampstead school ; and on the 2nd February the Captain orders the child to be sent to London, and all the expenses of the mother and the child to be defrayed. There was no delay there ; but when a poor Catholic widow applies to have her child placed in a Catholic school, she is compelled to wait eleven months for an answer."

Now as to the allocation of the surplus fund. We are told by the report that these several sums have been allallocated to institutions, either Protestant in their teaching, or in which the system of mixed education is followed. We would much prefer the former as being the more honest ; the latter is like that plant which tastes like honey but operates as a poison, or like that fruit which grows on the banks of the Dead Sea, which seems so pleasing to the eye, but turns to ashes on the lips. It is true Catholic children may come, but judging by the specimens we have of that style of arrangement in the Hibernian, the District schools in England, and in the military schools at home and abroad, we think it much safer to keep our children to ourselves. This is a matter which Protestants cannot understand, they thinking as the present Chancellor of Ireland is reported to have expressed himself that "indifference to all religion is a fearful state, but still it is better than Popery." When, however, the Archbishop objected to the allotment of so much money he was bound to give a reason, and what better reason could he give than that deducible from experience? The manner in which similar schools under similar patronage were conducted, the effect of their arrangements upon the religious faith of the Catholic portion of the scholars, the character of the class books in use, the tendency of the teaching therein contained, to elevate one party at the expense of the other—the neglect to appoint Catholic officers and superiors in proportion to the number of Catholic boys, these are the means by which he must form his judgment, these the grounds on which to base his objections. Now the only means of doing that was by examining the management of the military schools at present existing, and also that of the district schools in England, and by laying before the public the result of that examination, enable them to judge of the justifiableness of his Grace's opposition. Therefore when his Grace complains of the management of this or that school it is to enable us to form an opinion as to what will be, by what is. The Commissioners with great skill and considerable judgment have endeavoured to withdraw the attention of the public from these complaints, by asserting that they have nothing to do with the accusations preferred by him against the Commissioners. We think it has a great deal to do, and therefore we shall give some of his Grace's remarks on the Hibernian school:—

"You are aware that in the Phoenix Park, in the vicinity of this city, we have a large institution, called the Hibernian School, established for the education of the children of Irish soldiers. We learn from a published Parliamentary Report, that when it was visited by the Commissioners of the Endowed Schools, * there were in the house 230 Protestants of the Established Church, 127 Catholics, and 8 Presbyterians, thus closely observing a bye-rule of the managers, that only one-third of the boys should be Catholic.

This small proportion of Catholic to Protestant boys, in a Catholic country like this, is worthy of observation. It cannot be explained by the fewness of Catholics in the army, for it must be admitted that there are far more Irish Catholic than Irish Protestant soldiers in her Majesty's service; nor can it be alleged that the Catholic soldier has not as good a claim as his Protestant comrades to have his children provided for by the state, for no one will venture to assert that he is not as brave and faithful, and as ready as they are, to risk his life for his country.

Why, then, are there so few Catholic boys in the school? Why is a regulation enforced that they are not to exceed one-third of the entire number of pupils? What the answer of the authorities of the school may be, it is not for me to conjecture. But, considering things as they appear on the surface, it would seem that the policy of the place is to maintain Protestant ascendancy even among those who fight side by side against every enemy, and are ready to shed their blood with equal profusion for their country; and to proclaim, if not in words, at least in deed, that the children of a Catholic soldier who died or fought for his sovereign, have not the same rights as those of his brother in arms. Whatever the object of the regulation just referred to may be, it is a snare and a temptation for poor Catholic widows, who, in their anxiety to provide for their children, are tempted to enter them as Protestants in the school, when they are told that the few places allotted to Catholics are occupied, but that many places for Protestants are vacant.

But there are other and stronger grounds for complaint. Whilst about one-third of the boys is Catholic, justice and equity would induce us to expect that a similar proportion should be preserved in the appointment of superiors and masters. Now, what is the case? The board of government, the commandant, the major, in fine, all the officers, about twenty in number, are Protestant, with the single exception of one serjeant. The professors or masters, and the Chelsea monitors, fourteen in number, are all Protestant. The books, too, used in the school have been compiled in great part by a Protestant parson. Thus, Catholics are excluded from the slightest interference in the management of the institution; and the only privilege that is conferred on them in regard to it, is the honour of contributing their portion of £8,000 per annum, paid to the school out of the public taxes of the country.* Catholics pay their share of the annual grant; Catholics send their sons and brothers and relatives to fight for their Queen and country; Catholic blood was shed in torrents at Alma and Delhi; Catholic soldiers were among the first and the bravest in every battle where the English flag was unfurled; but they seem to be considered unfit to take any part in the direction of an institution supported by themselves and the public for the education of their children."

His Grace then proceeds to relate the effect of the influence exercised by these masters over the Catholic children. It has been said these conversions are the result of conviction; would they were, but we can hardly attribute to a child of eight years old, a power of forming an opinion on points of doctrine, yet such an one has renounced the errors of Popery, and such was the scandal thereby created that a rule was made that no one should be allowed to be converted until arrived at the age of fourteen. The result of this regulation is detailed in the following extract:—

* See Report of said Commission, vol. iii., p. 22.

"Passing all such unhappy and deplorable cases over in silence, I shall merely refer to a fact which occurred last month. It is a fact which can be stated in very few words, though it is of great importance, as it illustrates the working of the mixed system of education and the condition of poor Catholic children in the Hibernian School. The case is simply this, that as many as five Catholic boys, by name, John Molloy, John Guckins, Thomas Dowling, Charles Cunningham, and Patrick McCoy, publicly declared their determination to renounce the faith of their fathers, and to embrace some form or other of the innumerable denominations of Protestantism: which of them I have not been able to learn, and very probably the poor children themselves do not know. The three first boys, being over fourteen years of age, were allowed by the authorities to carry out their intentions immediately. The two last, being a few months younger, were told that they could not change their religion until they should have reached fourteen, when, they were informed, Protestantism of some form or another would be ready to receive them. However, as the Catholic chaplain very properly refused to allow them to remain among his little flock after their public declaration that they wished to cut themselves off from the Catholic Church, probably they too have already accomplished their wishes."

With regard to the Union Schools, we shall give the testimony of the Rev. Mr. Bagshaw:—

"The Oratory, Brompton, London, S. W., December 18, 1857.

MY DEAR LORD,

As I am told that your Grace wishes for particulars as to the practical working of the District Schools, established under the act 7 and 8 Victoria, with respect to the education of Catholic children, I take the liberty of sending you the following short account of the state of things at the North Surrey District School at Annerley, so far as it has come under my observation.

I went there to visit several children of Catholic parents from the workhouse of Chelsea, which I attend. I presented letters from the parents to the superintendent, requesting him to prevent their children from attending any prayers, services, or instructions, other than those of the Roman Catholic religion, and to allow me to visit them as often as possible for the purpose of religious instruction. An answer was brought me by the chaplain, who informed me that I might see the children; but upon my further requesting that they might not be allowed to attend any of the Protestant prayers or instructions, he said that he considered he was put there for all, and that as the children formed one community, he had a right to speak to all without distinction, and that he considered any such separation of the children very injurious, as tending to make the other children have doubts about religion, seeing the difference of teaching.

I pointed out to him the act, whereby it is provided "that no rules, orders, or regulations of the said Commissioners, nor any regulations made by such District Board, shall oblige any inmate of any such school or asylum to attend any religious service which may be celebrated in a mode contrary to the religious principles of such inmate, nor shall authorize the education of any child in any religious creed other than that professed by the parents or surviving parent of such child, or to which such parents or surviving parent may object, or, in the case of an orphan or deserted child, to which his next of kin may object"—7 and 8 Vict., cap. 101, §. 43.

In reading it he laid a marked stress on the word "oblige," and concluded by stating that he was acting under the authority of the District School Board, and could make no change without their orders. The superintendent also said that no exception could be made until it had been referred to the board, but promised to lay the case before them at their next meeting. The following week he gave me their decision, which was, that he was not to force any child to go who objected. I asked if any notice would be taken of the objection made by the parents to their receiving Protestant education. He said that the board had given him no further instructions; that it was extremely difficult and inconvenient to be constantly separating the children from their classes; that he had no one appointed him to mind them at such times, and that he could not do so himself.

This is as far as the negociation upon this point has as yet proceeded, the result being that they are still daily attending Protestant worship, receiving Protestant instruction, and having Protestant principles and prejudices instilled into them; and this is in spite of protests to the contrary, which it has cost much time and trouble to make with all the necessary formalities. It is evident, therefore, what will be the fate of those children whose parents have no one to show them how to protect them and to assist them in doing so.

The result was evident when I came to see the children. One who had been at school five years, who had formerly gone to a Catholic school, and whose father believed him still a Catholic, had been changed into a bitter Protestant. Another, whom I had received into the Church with his mother, before going into the workhouse, and who, according to her account, was most anxious to be a Catholic, turned his back upon me and would not speak to me. Some of the others also, who the first time were civil enough, when I went again, would hardly speak to me or answer my questions.

So far as regards protecting the children from Protestant teaching: now for the facilities afforded for Catholic instruction.

The decision of the board upon this point was also given me by the superintendent. It was, that I might see the children from half-past two to four o'clock on Saturdays, and only then. It was in vain that I represented that I could not go at that time, and that another priest, who succeeded me, also objected to the hour as most inconvenient. The board have refused to alter it. It must be observed that Saturday is the half-holiday, and the children, I was told, are accustomed often to walk out on this day. One lesson a-week, and that rendered obnoxious by being taken out of their playtime, and fixed for an hour when the priest might often be prevented from coming, is what the board consider a sufficient allowance of Catholic instruction for Catholic children, and is all the opportunity we as yet have of counteracting the overwhelming influence of Protestantism by which they are surrounded. Whether catechisms and books will be allowed the children, I cannot say.

This, my dear Lord, is all that we have as yet been able to obtain under the existing law, and even this little has been obtained after various vain attempts for years past, and with much troublesome negotiation.

I remain, my dear Lord,

Yours most faithfully and respectfully.

EDWARD G. BAGSHAWE,
Of the Oratory.

The Most Rev. Dr. Cullen, etc., etc.

P.S.—It is to be added, that I have learned regarding the same schools, that some of the elder children, besides being insolent and unruly themselves, have begun to disturb the instructions which the Priest who succeeded me gives to one child who remains docile and obedient, and to dissuade her in every way from paying attention to them. This shows still more what sort of chance poor Catholic children have in such institutions.

E. G. B."

Surely such will not be the school which is meant to be "a visible and permanent memorial of the national generosity which has provided the means for its foundation," exclaims some benighted Protestant unversed in the tactics of those who prefer to see the rising generation indifferent to all religion, than adhering to Popery. We regret to say such is the model upon which these new schools are to be founded. Those appointed to report upon this subject, examined many persons, Protestant clergymen, &c., but did not think it judicious to ask the opinion of any Catholic priest or layman. Therefore it is, that we read the following, as the result of the deliberations of the Sub-Committee :—

"Your Committee also feel confident, that if the regulations upon the subject of religious teaching which have been enacted in 7 & 8 Vic. cap. 101, for district or Union schools, be adopted as a precedent and principle for the schools now contemplated by the Royal Commissioners, no real difficulty can arise from those differences of religious belief which the Commissioners, will, no doubt, feel, ought on every account to be scrupulously respected.

Your Committee therefore, recommend that the proposal of the Executive Committee, to found one school for 300 daughters, and one for 100 sons of soldiers, sailors, and marines, be adopted by the Commissioners."

Assuming for the present, that the management of these schools was perfectly impartial ; that teachers, inspectors, monitors, &c., were appointed in proportion to the respective numbers of the two religions ; that safeguards against any undue influence being exercised by the professors of one religion, on those of the other, were provided ; and that everything was done which could be done, to obviate any difficulties which might arise from differences of religious belief ; yet we do say, that the allocation of so large a sum to these institutions, is not in accordance with that "even-handed justice," to administer which the Commissioners were associated, and for the administration of which the Commissioners now claim our grateful applause ; for the proportion which Fishbourne asserts to be the true one, but which is not so, is that which will guide the Commissioners in the apportionment of places. That will give to Catholics in the girls' school fifty places, and in the boys' school eighteen, making together sixty-eight places, which, supposing none but Irish Catholics were to apply, would leave a large number unprovided for in an educational point of view. There are 668 children of Irish soldiers ; of that number at least one half, or 334, are Catholics ; deducting then the 68 from 334, and there will remain 266. This will show the injustice of the arrangement, even taking the most favourable view of it.

But when we find that in those schools, in accordance with the regulations of which the new schools are to be governed, Proselytism of the grossest and most nefarious character, is openly and avowedly perpetrated ; when we see the rules laid down by Parliament, with the intention of obviating interference with religious opinions, perverted to the attainment of that very purpose they were framed to prevent ; when we observe the representations of the Catholic clergyman treated with such official nonchalance, and despite his remonstrances, the day appointed for him to instruct the members of his creed, that particular one in the seven, which is most inconvenient to him and most distasteful, for the reason furnished in Bagshawe's letter to his pupils ; when we find these things done by persons who have no wish to proselytize, no inducement to do so, and who decide those matters in pure ignorance of what they are doing, and on the supposition that any and every suggestion made by a Catholic priest, is only a new phase of the papal aggression, some new plots of the Jesuits against the Queen's crown and dignity, which they as loyal men are bound to protect ; when such a course is pursued by such persons, and when it results as Mr. Bagshawe has related, with what apprehension must we not regard the adoption of a principle and of rules, which when conducted even by men such as we have above referred to, have been productive of such disadvantage to the Catholics, by a body, many of whose members are enlisted in the glorious cause of Popish annihilation, whose subordinate officials have shewn such an antagonism to Catholics, and whose secretary is so deeply interested in the developement of Scriptural religion in these countries. Even were we perfectly assured that the principle of the Union Schools would be carried out in its purity, yet would we object, and justly, to that system being adopted in any scheme of education in the benefits of which Catholics were allowed to participate.

The voluntary system, the maintenance of which, with regard to religious duties, is so highly commended, by Protestant divines, but the introduction of which, in the pecuniary arrangements of the Protestant Church, is so severely reprobated, is in our mind most destructive. Could such a system be carried on in literature, could any improvement be expected unless certain hours of the day were appointed for certain exercises, and how can it be expected that boys will be good and faithful Christians unless they be brought to practise the duties of Christians while still young. Train up a child in the way in which he should go, and when he is old he will not depart therefrom. Is it possible to conceive that great trouble and pains will be taken with the bodily health, great care taken with the cultivation of the mind, whilst the soul, that better part of man, that undying principle of our being, that will be allowed to be an unweeded garden, growing no seed, and things rank and gross in nature shall possess it merely. Can these things be possible? We had hoped not, but fear it is so; for in a rigmarole which presumed to be an answer to the Archbishop's letter on the Hibernian School, and which bore convincing testimony that the ligneous properties of all the "trees in the parade," one of which the writer assumed to be, had concentrated in the respondent's head, to the exclusion of every other quality, the whole work of the day is mapped out, from the rising in the morning to the retiring to rest at night, yet not one minute of the day is devoted to God, to acknowledge His supreme dominion and our total dependence; to thank Him for past favours and beg for future aid and protection. This is the military school to refer to which was considered irrelevant. It is quite true that the management of the Hibernian School is not attributable to the Patriotic Commissioners, but when we learn that they have resolved to establish schools of a certain character, and founded on a certain model, it becomes our duty to see how schools of a similar character, at present existing, work with regard to the Catholics. Now these were to be military schools—military schools fashioned after the district schools. It is to be presumed then that they will be hybrids—something having some of the qualities of the Hibernian School and of the District Schools. Was it not fair, right and proper, and nothing but what was the bounden duty of the Archbishop, to expose the evils which have arisen, as a warning to Catholic parents not to trust their children within their walls? The result of establishing these new schools on the basis announced, will be, that unscrupulous Catholic parents will sacrifice their children, and really conscientious parents will be precluded from all the advantages to which nevertheless they are fully entitled. The Report says that there is a sum of money reserved for those who do not wish to send their children to either of the new schools. Now there are many Orphanages in this country, but we would particularly refer to the St. Vincent's Orphanage, for boys, which has gained a little notoriety from the fact that it harbours the poor little boy, Norris. As the Commissioners have been all through, and are still, but for Fishbourne's interference, most anxious to act in the most impartial manner, we would really recommend them to purchase in that St. Vincent's Orphanage—we will be satisfied with very little—say twenty-five places, and let them allocate £25,000 for that purpose, as they have in the case of the Wellington College, and they will secure for the children the blessings of a religious and moral training, and will thereby make some reparation for all the injuries and insults which have been heaped upon the Catholics of the Empire, by the intolerant prejudice of their subordinates.

Having now proved that in every material point, the "appendix" supports "Dr. Cullen's" statements, and contradicts the report, and having shown what is to be expected from schools founded under such auspices, from the manner in which schools similar to those about being erected are conducted, we shall ask this question, and then conclude with the closing remarks of the Archbishop.

This question is particularly addressed to Lord St. Leonards. Suppose a person convey by deed a large sum of money, say £1,000,000, to trustees in trust to distribute the amount amongst those described in the deed, "in the most impartial manner." A bill is filed to declare the trusts of the deed, and "an order of reference" made thereon. The master "reports" allotting to some of the claimants a perpetuity in the larger portion of the sum, and to the others, only a life interest in the remaining smaller portion. Would any Lord Chancellor that ever sat on the woolsack, dare to confirm that report? If he did, he should not hold his office for one hour. Yet this the Commissioners have done in the allocation, and this Lord St. Leonards has confirmed by signing their report.

We shall now furnish the conclusion of the Archbishop's pamphlet, and in leaving this subject shall merely say that a more able document than his Grace's second letter, we have rarely, if ever, read.

"Probably the many defects and contradictions in the statements for which your Lordship has made yourself responsible, will not be a matter of surprise, when you shall have been made acquainted with the religious tendencies of some of the gentlemen on whose authority you have been led to rely.

From many statements in the Appendix to the Second Report, it is easy to infer that a close connexion exists between some of the officials of the Commissioners and the agents of proselytism in Ireland. Major Harris corresponds with M. A. Holden, of the proselytizing school at the Coombe, in this city, who, replying, writes to him as his "Dear Sir" (Appendix No. 35), and does not think it necessary to abstain from insulting language against Catholics, even in an official communication. Captain Fishbourne sufficiently indicates a bias in the same direction, by the selection he makes of schools for the children of a Catholic soldier, and by his connexion with the Reverend gentleman to whom their education is confided. Besides, in the Report of the Society for Irish Church Missions, of May 1, 1857, at page 4, we find the name of Captain Fishbourne among the subscribers. Now what is the object and character of this society, thus sanctioned by the name of the honorary secretary of the Commissioners? It is constituted for the purpose of what are called "Missions to the Roman Catholics." It has its staff of missionaries, lay and clerical; it holds controversial classes, and establishes controversial schools for the exclusive benefit of Catholics. The principal points of the teaching appear to be that the Pope is Antichrist—that the Pope is the man of sin—that Catholics are idolaters—that Catholics are taught to lie—that Catholics are taught to steal—that Catholics are taught to break faith. The grossness of its language in speaking of the Blessed Sacrament, and of Her whom all generations shall call blessed, is such, that I cannot do more than allude to it without defilement. Handbills containing these doctrines are thrust into our hands, or slipped under our doors; our churches are not safe from the agents of the Society, who consider it an exploit to leave a tract in the prayer books of the worshippers; our own houses do not always afford us sanctuary from the missionaries. Captain Fishbourne is responsible for every sentiment to which he lends the sanction of his name, and if he do not believe all this of Catholics, his responsibility is heavier yet as a bearer of false testimony. Yes, my Lord, the Catholic community does hold him responsible for every one of the disgraceful placards that flare upon the walls in the name of his society; for its handbills that are fluttered in our faces, and its advertisements that figure in the newspapers, exhausting the varieties of indecency to create new varieties of insult. We must hold him responsible for them. Yet, in the whole range of Protestant officials, civil and military, one could not be found outside of this society to fill a position of such exceeding trust and honour as that now occupied by Captain Fishbourne.

Could we conceive a Catholic society at all resembling the society of which your secretary is a member; could we represent it to ourselves teaching the Protestant people of England to believe that her gracious Majesty as head of the Established Church, is the realization of types of abomination in the prophet Daniel and the Apocalypse; did it teach that Protestants esteem it no sin to lie, to steal, to worship idols; did it, in handbills and placards, apply to your religion and to its cherished and peculiar doctrines the foulest epithets the language can supply; did it speak from the platform or the pulpit in a similar strain; did the emissaries of this Catholic society dog your heels, ambush in your path, thrust papers into your hand, follow the Archbishop of Canterbury into his house, nay pursue him to the cathedral and insult his episcopal chair, as Captain Fishbourne's society has repeatedly done in Catholic churches in Ireland; I ask you, my Lord, would a member of that society be considered a proper secretary for a Commission such as yours, would the Protestant people of England put faith in its administration by him, and would they suffer the scandal to endure for an hour?

I have now done with the report. I have impeached it in its statements and its arguments. I have given a probable explanation of the cause of its defects and contradictions. If the Commissioners allow things to remain as they now are, if they refuse all endowments to Catholic institutions, if they refuse to give full and accurate returns of the children under their care, such as were required by the Duke of Norfolk, it must be admitted that they have not acted with the utmost impartiality, as they were required to do by her Majesty, and the doubts regarding their proceedings will be confirmed, and public suspicion increased. It concerns the honour of this great empire, and above all, it concerns the interest of the military service, that the fullest light should be thrown upon this controversy, and that proofs of the most perfect impartiality should be given. The Irish love the military service, and very much of its glory is due to them; but they love their religion more, as centuries of persecution testify. The Catholic soldier will not fail to inquire: "Is our's the service of a gracious Queen and of a grateful country? or is it a kind of Moloch to which we must sacrifice the souls of our children? Must the very bounty of my country," will he say, "become my torment and my loss? Shall it be, that almost before my remains are cool, the minister of a hostile religion will be allowed to buy up my children from their mother, and teach them that their father was a perjurer, a thief, and a liar by profession? Must the weakness, the poverty, the vice, or the ignorance of my widow be watched and turned to account? Will her eagerness, perhaps, to contract new obligations, and relieve herself from the charge of my orphans, be improved to the advantage of the soul-merchant? and should my children escape the dangers that beset their infancy, is the spirit of our military schools to be maintained so adverse to Catholic faith that their ultimate safety is hardly possible?" Trust me, my Lord, it will not do to meet all this with the case in the Queen's Bench.

ART. XI.—A LETTER TO THE EDITOR ON THE DERBY LEGAL APPOINTMENTS IN IRELAND.

Four Courts' Library, June 24th, 1858.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

You and I have often talked over that faculty of the poetic mind, which very frequently makes the poet appear the prophet. Of modern poets, Goethe, perhaps, develops most clearly this faculty. How the soul of the reader reels, as it were, before the flashes of that intellect, which, long years ago, in his quiet home at Weimar, could thus word-paint the Derby appointments in Ireland—

“ Das Unbeschreibliche
Hier ist gethan ! ”

Could anything be more perfect? at Last the Indescribable is Realized, or, has Realized Itself.

From the day on which Lord Eglinton quitted the jetty of Kingstown, at the close of his former viceroyalty, to that which again brought him to our shore, the people of Ireland had read little in the Conservative and Orange newspapers, but dispraise of those in office, and emphatic descriptions of all the wonderful things to be accomplished as soon as that conglomeration of genius, ability, learning, eloquence, and Orange Protestantism, a Tory administration, should have once again obtained its proper position—office, and ascendancy.

Then we should behold learning on the Bench ; then we should be overwhelmed and astonished by eloquence at the Bar ; then we should be dazzled by the splendour of a vice-regal court, rivalling, if not surpassing, that of St. James's—gorgeous dresses, family jewels, which it would be sacrilege to show at Carlisle's Drawing Rooms, lovely women, the ladies, pur sang, coming up from their country places, where they had vegetated during the usurpation of the Whigs ! And thus we dreamed of a life of joy, and thought of the bright days in store for Ireland, and extatic stuff gownsmen who read Tennyson in place of Pitt Taylor, were heard to mutter, as they fondly gazed at the Castle—

“ We drank the Lybian Sun to sleep, and lit
Lamps which outburn'd Canopus. Oh ! my life
In Egypt ! O ! the dalliance and the wit,
The flattery and the strife.”

But there were graver matters than these latter. Papas had long looked for the time when once again they could eat the vice-regal dinner free from the company of a Whig, and secure from the contagion of Popery, to which they were exposed in dining with Lord Carlisle's guests. The Poor-houses wanted looking after; nuns were actually admitted to attend Catholic paupers; the elected guardians were becoming troublesome, and were nominating Catholic officers; the elective franchise, founded on poor law valuations, was going to destruction,—more ex-officios could alone make matters secure. This was an awful state of things; down with the Whigs! out with them! a nest of brainless destroyers, minions of the Pope, and satellites of Paul Cullen, out with them, Toryism for ever, down with Ultramontanism, civil and religious liberty all over the world, founded on sound Protestant principles!

Well, the wished for moment arrived. "Me and the Queen," said Mr. Smith, the lessee of the Drury-lane Theatre, to the electors of Bridport, "had a difference, and I wouldn't give in to her;" so it was with Lord Palmerston, he and the House had a difference, he would not give in, and therefore he went out. Loud was the joy; The Evening Mail was in ecstasies, The Warder was in pious convulsions, in a state, like Judy M' Cann, of "Wind and devotion;" The Saunders went as near writing something original as possible; several quires of drafting paper were sold by the Librarian of the Courts, and in snug quiet corners of this library might be seen, writing with a more than Alexander Dumas power of speed, the herd of briefless, brainless waiters upon Providence and Faction, those, as Macaulay describes the species, "venal and licentious scribblers, with just sufficient ability to clothe the thoughts of a pander in the style of a bell-man," who toady Napier, and flatter Whiteside, in that burlesque of The London Standard, The Daily Express.

And what did it all come to at last? Where was the administrative talent? Naas for the chief secretary! The "Fat Boy" of the Carleton sent to regulate the affairs of Ireland! "What," writes the correspondent of The Liverpool Albion, "is the use of a chief secretary? It is astonishing how the question can be asked with Naas to the fore. What can be the functions a capacity like his is adequate to the efficient discharge of? He looks like the winner of a first-class medal in Barnum's prize Baby show, a Titanic infant, rubbed, scrubbed, combed polished, and spread out on the hearth-rug to play with the cat and a lollypop, for the admiration of surrounding maternities and nursery maids. And he is in every respect worthy of his looks. Yet is he deemed a rising statesman. Happy state that shall have him when he is fully risen ! When that blessed hour comes there will be no need to trouble ourselves about the millennium,"—and I add, unhappy the country which has him, and his herd of hungry, grasping followers quartered upon it.

But who was to be Attorney General, who Solicitor General? Something resplendent was expected in their appointments. There was that grand galaxy of learning and eloquence, of which Ireland had heard so much, to be selected from ; and after delays without number, after disappointments and false reports, distracting to all, the whole difficulty of selection was solved—Oh ! shade of Curran, of Plunket, of Bushe, of O'Connell, of Sheil !—in the ignorance, the factiousness, "the wrath and cabbage" bluster of Whiteside ; in the sound sense and respectable Northern stolidity of Hayes !

But there must be a Chancellor. Who shall be Chancellor? Who can tell? Is there not all the resplendent Tory bar open for selection? So it was open, all open, with its brilliant intellects, its towering reputations, its perfection of all qualities mental and physical, and yet the Court of Chancery was turned into an auxiliary ward of the Hospital for Incurables, by the appointment to the Chancellorship of the godly but afflicted, the pious but fanatic, the moderately learned, but incurably and notoriously deaf, Joseph Napier. I object to this appointment on public and on private grounds. On public grounds, because it places in the Court of Chancery a man who was never an equity lawyer of any standing. I object to it on private grounds because, my voice being naturally weak, I cannot make the Chancellor hear me, even with the assistance of that reputed acoustic chair ; and I object further to the appointment as the principles of acoustics are not laid down as part of the Chancery rules or orders ; perhaps, however, Mr. Blackham may print them from Lardner in his forthcoming Chancery Practice.

Have you ever, my dear friend, fancied what glorious scenes of fun we shall have in the Courts as soon as, his relative and register being provided for through the Consolidated Nisi Prius court, the chief justice shall be induced to retire? Fancy the Right Hon. James bellowing, as is his style, in the Queens' Bench, as chief justice at the bar; and Francis Fitzgerald, and Mr. Brewster roaring, as they will be forced to do, in the Court of Chancery, at the Right Hon. Joseph on the bench. Fancy Macdonough, and Armstrong, and O'Hagan, and John Thomas Ball, and David Lynch, and Sullivan, taking their LAW from James Whiteside. It will be the most laughable thing in the world, and will recall the gay days when Dan and Chief Baron O'Grady used to make the Exchequer better value than Hawkins-street: or when, later, Doherty kept his court (no his audience) in roars at his mixture of wit concealing his want of law, and with a drollery sufficient to make the fortunes of half-a-dozen comedians. Thus between the man who has some law, could he hear the facts to which it is to be applied, and the man who has no law to apply to the cases which he can hear, the Queen's Bench and Court of Chancery in Ireland will present, in due time, objects of the most intense interest to a genuine Pantagrueist, as they will remind him continually of that famous third book treating of the sayings and doings of the good Pantagruel, and of those immortal lawyers and judges, Goatsnose who was deaf, and that voluble Bridle-goose, who was ignorant and insolent: and when justice Bridle-goose, we beg pardon, Chief Justice, that is to be, Whiteside, shall be set before us as having often carried Judges with him when at the bar by the aid of his juniors; and when he shall as judge, have decided cases with the help of his puisnès, what can we say but that Rabelais was right when, referring to the decisions of Bridle-goose he makes Pantagruel say, "In good sooth, such a perpetuity of good luck is to be wondered at. To have hit right twice or thrice in a judgment so given by hap-hazard might have fallen out well enough, especially in controversies that were ambiguous, intricate, abstruse, perplexed, and obscure."

But it will be said, Whiteside is a legislator, a great reformer of our law as administered in Ireland. This, my dear friend, I deny. I know that with the help of English acts of Parliament, and through the aid of Mr. William Dwyer Ferguson, Mr. Whiteside has introduced some legal alterations; but if I called a monkey Romilly, or if I nicknamed an ape Brougham, would these names make either monkey or ape a Samuel Romilly or a Harry Brougham, even though I should be able to make them Attorney Generals or Chief Justices, or Chancellors.

There was a time when a judgeship, or any other high legal office, was the right of a great lawyer; of one who had worked through the hard, stern, iron realities of his profession. In those old days men felt the full force of that grand truth proclaimed by Terrasson in his eulogy on D'Aguesseau,—“ Quand la vertu sort victorieuse de tels combats, elle n'a besoin d'autres épreuves; il ne lui faut que des couronnes. Celle qui est due à tant de travaux, ne s'est pas fait attendre long-temps.” Now the great legal posts are the rewards of faction, the marks of gratitude for unscrupulous support; and I am firmly convinced that if any man were now living, who combined in himself all the learning of Coke, all the ability of Blackstone, all the scholarship of Mansfield, all the practical knowledge of Chitty, and all the powers of advocacy of Erskine, of Brougham, of Scarlett, of Thesiger and of O'Connell, JAMES WHITESIDE would be secure of any legal position before such man, even though he were of the faction, but out of Parliament!

Having secured the services of Napier, Whiteside, Hayes and Co., it became necessary to inflict silk gowns on the bar, and accordingly various names were set floating about the Courts. At last it was evident that “a fell,” a very “fell swoop” upon the value of the silk gown, was about to be made by the man of all others who should uphold its worth and dignity, by the Chancellor, by that high-minded, exemplary, most pious and most God-fearing man, Joseph Napier.

Having, like Geoffrey Wildgoose, in The Spiritual Quixote, “wrestled with the Lord in prayer,” he resolved to call no less than twelve of the outer to the inner bar; and these following were the names given to the public:—Charles Andrews, Edward Burroughs, Hedges Eyre Chatterton, William C. Dobbs, M. P., Thomas Rice Henn, William C. Henderson, Charles Kelly, Alexander Norman, Henry Ormsby, Edward Pennefather, Edward Sullivan, and Robert R. Warren. Admitting that every one of these gentlemen was fully entitled to a silk gown, but in fact Sullivan, Chatterton and Norman, were the only men of the number entitled to it, and they were fully entitled to it, from business, does it not strike any Irish lawyer as disgraceful to Chancellor Napier that he should of himself, or through the instigation of others, call eleven men, all of one religion, and pretty much of one political creed, in one day to the inner bar.

To be sure Mr. Charles Kelly, a Catholic, was called, and made up the dozen. Mr. Charles Kelly is a very respectable gentleman, a man who does not depend for support upon his profession, a member of the Kildare-street club, and therefore will never degrade his gown, and will always keep his wig as white, and his silk as glossy as they look this moment, whilst he sits before us shining, glistening, and rustling, fresh from the hands of his Four Courts' dressing room; but I believe there is not a Catholic in Ireland who will regard Mr. Kelly's call as an acknowledgement of any principle of selection, or as shewing any desire in the Chancellor to recognize the Liberal Bar.

But, it has been said, and I hear, by Chancellor Napier,—“Brady promoted every man upon the Liberal side who should have been promoted, and a good many who should not have received the silk gown were called to the Inner Bar.” As this topic has been very frequently pressed by the newspapers believed to be under the inspiration, or dictation of the Chancellor, and of the Attorney-General, it is right that it should be noticed at some length; and the following article from The Dublin Evening Post of Thursday, May 27th, supplies an answer to the most important portion of the objections:—

“QUEEN'S COUNSEL—‘PERSONAL AND FAMILY NEPOTISM.’

The Daily Express—the organ of Messrs. NAPIER and WHITESIDE—availing itself of the convenient testimony of what it designates ‘a paper of ultra-Liberal politics’—a species of evidence ready on all occasions for the sustenance of the intolerant party now in office—lauds the present Lord Chancellor as a model judge, and thus concludes, referring to the new batch of Queen's Counsel:—

We agree with our contemporary, that ‘the rule of legal promotion amongst us has hitherto notoriously been that of political partisanship or personal and family nepotism,’ and it is impossible that the Lord Chancellor can speedily make full reparation for the injurious operation of such a rule, extending over a period of six or seven years; but in the list of names which we have published the Chancellor

As regards the lists we have given, the results may thus be stated :—

Mr. Brady nominated twenty-nine Queen's Counsel in seven and a-half years.

Mr. Blackburne nominated sixteen in ten months.

Mr. Napier nominated twelve in less than three months, and two others refused to accept the proffered honor! His Lordship sent it a-begging amongst the Tory Bar.

Of the twenty-nine nominated by Mr. Brady there were—

Conservatives	16

The Daily Express has also forced upon us the necessity of particularising religion. Of Mr. Brady's appointments there were—members of the Established Church and Dissenters, 20; Roman Catholics, 9.

In Mr. Napier's list all but one, or two at most, are Conservatives. One Roman Catholic—a man of high professional position, Mr. Charles Kelly, has been put in, for two reasons—first, to counteract the manifest 'family nepotism and political partisanship' in some names, to which we have referred; and secondly, by the admission of a single Catholic, to delude the Catholic public into the notion that the policy of rigid exclusion is not extended to honorary distinctions at the Bar as well as to all official appointments in the public departments."

That Chancellor Brady appointed his sons and relatives to certain offices in his patronage no one will deny; but he acted in this case as all Chancellors in England and Ireland of whom I have ever heard. And surely the men appointed by Chancellor Brady were as competent, at least as competent, to discharge the duties of their offices faithfully and honestly to the crown and to the suitor as the Praise God Barebones members of the Oratorical Society, and other serious, but Orange flavored, individuals with whom Chancellor Napier has, with such indecent precipitation, crammed his court.

But what can be thought of this man who has been so constant a talker about the dignity of the Bar, and the nobleness of the profession. He knows that the silk gown is the legitimate ambition of every lawyer; he knows that from the hour when, with weary feet and longing heart, the junior begins to wear out the flags in the Hall of the Four Courts, to that hour when he has worked his way to a lead amongst the Outer Bar, the obtaining the silk gown, by merit, honest merit, is the dearest wish of every man worthy of the name of Barrister. No man knows this better than Chancellor Napier, and yet the first act of his Chancellorship is a call to the Inner Bar of a mob. Surely the fact that two or three men of ability or standing were amongst this "ruck" cannot save Joseph Napier from the imputation of having done, for faction and party, more to degrade the Bar, to lessen the value of the honor that used to belong to the rank of Queen's Counsel, than any man who ever held the Seals in Ireland. Truly the public may now exclaim with Samuel Lover,—

"Of modern Queen's Counsel this truth may be said, They have silk on the back, but stuff in the head."

It was not thus that Plunket acted. He had resolved to call two gentlemen of undoubted ability to the Inner Bar; it was pressed upon him, urged with force from powerful quarters, that he should call others of whom he did not approve, whose learning and standing at the Bar he did not consider sufficient to entitle them to the call; and Plunket who had in other times defied the minister in defending Irish independence, refused to lessen the dignity of that last remaining monument of her glory, the Bar. He would, he said, if the Castle insisted on this mobbish call, refuse to call any. He would have "la noblesse de la robe" or nothing; he would have the Bar, being Chancellor, as it was when he was Barrister,—when men were proud of their profession; when it was, as Sir William Jones wrote, "the only road to the highest stations in the country," when the gown of the lawyer was as honorable as the ribbon of the peer, when the profession of the Irish Barrister was, as D'Augesseau said of that of the Advocate in France—"nobility without title, rank without birth, and riches without an estate."

But Joseph Napier is not Plunket; he is beset by greedy partizans; he is said to be but the puppet of his blustering relative, the Attorney-General, who cares as little for the dignity of the Bar, as he cares for common sense or reason, when, in his wind-bag speeches on Ireland, he murders facts and mangles truth. These are the men whose literary Swiss slander the official character of Chancellor Brady, every year of whose public and private life was marked by deeds that gained for him the esteem and regard of his fellow citizens ; who knew nothing of factions, who considered not what might be the religion or the politics of the man to be appointed, but only, and merely his fitness ; who never endeavoured to mobilize the Inner Bar, and who will be remembered as a good lawyer, as an able judge, as an honest Irishman, long after Joseph Napier and James Whiteside shall have passed from pensioned oblivion to the oblivion of the grave. Or should their memories live in the traditions of the Courts, lawyers who are now young, can tell in after years, how James Whiteside and Joseph Napier, who, when out of office, were always prating of political virtue, who then soared above all others in talk, yet when in office, sunk below all others in deed : who out of office, floated away, cloudward, upon the wings of declamation, and sunk down grovelling, when in office, battenning upon the very corruption of a decaying faction.

Whilst writing, in the former part of this letter, of the indecent nepotism displayed in the shameless appointments made by the Chancellor and the Attorney-General, I had not before me the following paragraph from a London correspondent, which shows the appointments to be still more glaring in all those particulars calculated to excite disgust and contempt. He writes :—“ According to the statements of the Irish place-hunters (who are now as plenty as blackberries in the lobbies of the House of Commons and about public offices here), two other Judges are likely to avail themselves of their great age, and right of superannuation, to retire, causing vacancies in the Queen’s Bench and Exchequer. Mr. Whiteside, it is said, has made up his mind not to accept a puisne judgeship, as his ambition is directed to the chief seat in the Queen’s Bench. These expected vacancies would cause several changes and promotions, in which both the present Attorney-General and the Solicitor, Mr. Hayes, would be benched. A grand object with the Napier-Whiteside division is to force up Mr. James Robinson, the present law adviser, into the Attorney-Generalship. There are at least a dozen claimants in the field, all considering themselves far better qualified to become Law Officers of the Crown ; and some of them have considerable interest amongst the Parliamentary supporters of Government; but Mr. George, late member for Wexford county, and Mr. Miller, member for Armagh, seem to hold the best position in the running—that is to say if the Napier-Whiteside party fail in getting up Mr. Robinson into the Attorney-Generalship. If what is designated the ‘Family Party’ succeed, either Mr. Miller or Mr. George would have a fair chance of the Solicitor-Generalship.

“But other arrangements, connected with the wholesale and reckless jobbing said to be in preparation, are bruited here. It is said that Mr. Long and Mr. Yelverton O’Keeffe, Registers in the Irish Court of Chancery, are to retire—that Mr. Robinson, brother of the Law Adviser, and a cousin of the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General, who had been a solicitor of some eminence before he became proprietor of the Daily Express government organ, is to obtain one of those Registerships, with £1,200 a-year; but there are other candidates, some of whom, including an Irish Queen’s Counsel, are pressing their claims here with remarkable energy and apparent success.”

I see one friend of the family connected with the Daily Express is not mentioned here. What is to become of Mr. Porter of that office; his ability as a cash-keeper was fully proved in the employment of the “Trustees for Bettering the Condition of the Irish Poor,” why not prevail on Starkey to retire, and put Porter in for the Accountant-Generalship of the Court of Chancery.

Mr. Robinson, attorney and newspaper proprietor, or as some will have it, the partner of his relatives, the Chancellor and Attorney-General, is provided for; William Dwyer Ferguson, who was act-of-parliament grinder for “the Brammagem,” as Cobbet would call him, law reformer, the Attorney-General, is secure, and Mr. James Robinson, being Castle Adviser, is, should all be made safe by the shelving of Baron Pennefather, and the peerage of the Chief Justice, certain of a good thing.

But what claims has Mr. James Robinson, extra the fact that he is the Attorney-General’s relative, and brother of Daily Express Robinson? I know of none. He was in fair business, on Circuit, and was chiefly known in Dublin as having evinced the grasping, grabbing spirit of the whole family, by throwing up his prosecutors, because Justice Keogh, when Attorney-General, required him to attend to crown cases alone, and for which he was very well paid.

Thus the whole family are provided for, or soon will be comfortably quartered upon the revenues of the country. With a generosity, and a family affection which would be quite touching, were they not exercised at the cost of the public, and in a manner reminding us of that patriot who "built this bridge at the expense of the county," the Chancellor and the Attorney-General have proved how true was that thought expressed in the old Roman proverb, "Ex alieno tergo lata secantur."

To be sure there was one appointment out of the family, that of Mr. Brereton, to the Assistant Barristership of the County Kerry; and if the appointment is to be considered as one representing the learning, the ability, and the polished elegance of the great Conservative Bar of Ireland, I certainly shall not object to it, not being a member of that body; and I presume anything was considered good enough for the county of lakes and mountains. Besides, this appointment winds up fitly that list of nominations, evincing nothing but "political partizanship, or personal and family nepotism;" and which does not include, in any case, "real merit, irrespective of party or politics."

Surely it is a fit ending to a roll of appointments, proving that what was once the great Conservative party in Ireland has dwindled into a talentless, place-grasping, wretched rump of the old Orange faction. Knowing how uncertain, even in its briefness, must be their possession of office, seeing that the Cabinet exists but on sufferance, and through the temporary disorganization of the Liberal party, and seeing that higher adventures in England are throwing off all reserve in taking, or making appointments, the lesser adventurers here in Ireland are becoming equally bold, equally shameless, and equally greedy in making, taking, and accepting place. Fitness, merit, propriety of selection are all forgotten, and we live in the epoch of the Dunciad of the Irish Bar, in an age of "brazen, brainless" nepotism, the era of Napier and Whiteside.—Alas poor Conservative Bar! what has it come to? To a Zenith in Whiteside—a Nadir in Brereton!

Were it not for the peril to the Bar, I should be glad that these men have come into office. We shall now hear no more of the grand Conservative Bar of Ireland, and we shall hear no more of Whig corruption. Compare the Whig appointments with those of Blackburne and Napier, and who can deny that bigotry and faction were, in these instances, much more frequently than fitness, the sources of the call to the Inner Bar. All men now know that in genius, in learning, and in powers of advocacy, the Liberal Bar is richer than the Conservative, and its members having, in most cases, neither relatives nor friends upon the Bench, obtain the honors of the profession by work, by proved ability, and by stern self-reliance; not by nepotism, or through a brazen, dishonest, factious partizanship.

When I look back now, upon the events of the past six months, it astounds me to remember how absurdly people used to talk about the Conservative Bar. How its reputation has dwindled away to nothing—to James Whiteside and Joseph Napier!

Oh! Dogberry, Oh! Verges, Oh! Bridlegoose, Oh! Goatsnose, Oh! Midas, (of Kane O'Hara), Oh! Justice Shallow, Oh! all ye spirits of Judges, who have "set the table in a roar," ye gather around me as I write, and lo! ye fade away, resolving yourselves into the embodiment of Joseph Napier and James Whiteside—and as the Chancellor stands before me,— as the Attorney-General sways, and rocks, and mouths and shouts, as is his custom, I cry, in terror and admiration of Goethe's "prophetic soul,"

"——Mr. Napier,

With his hand on his ear;"

"DAS UNBESCHREIBLICHE
HIER IST GETHAN!"

At last the INDESCRIBABLE is realized.

Yours, my dear friend, most truly,

AN APPRENTICE OF THE LAW.

ODD AND SINGULAR TASTES.—Several illustrious men have evinced a marked predilection for certain days in the year. We know that Napoleon felt such a disposition for the 20th of March.

“Charles V.,” said Brantôme, “was particularly fond of the festival of St. Matthias (24th of February), and sanctified it beyond all other days, because on that day he was elected Emperor, on that day crowned, and on that day also he took King Francis prisoner, not himself but through his lieutenants.”

Brantôme adds, also, that the Emperor was born on the feast of St. Matthias (24th February, 1500), that on the same day, in 1527, his brother Ferdinand was elected King of Bohemia, and that, on the 24th of February, 1556, he abdicated the empire.

The 1st of January was to Francis I. what the 24th of February was to Charles V. Born on the 1st of January, it was on the 1st of January that this prince lost his father, that he became king, on which his daughter was married, and that on which Charles V. made his entry into Paris.

Sixtus V., born on a Wednesday (13th of December, 1521), made his profession as a Franciscan friar on a Wednesday, was promised a Cardinalship on a Wednesday, was elected Pope on a Wednesday, and exalted to the dignity the following Wednesday.

Louis XIII., some hours before his death (Thursday 14th of May, 1643), called his physicians and asked them if they thought he could live until the next day, saying that Friday had always been to him a fortunate day, that he had on that day engaged in enterprises which were uniformly successful, that he had ever gained battles on that day, that having always considered it his happiest day, he wished he might die on it.

"Augustus," according to Suetonius, "had a senseless fear of thunder and lightning, and it is believed protected himself from this danger by always carrying about him the skin of a sea-calf. When a storm approached he ran to conceal himself in a subterranean vault or cavern. This fear was occasioned by an incident, during a nocturnal march, in his expedition against the Cantabri, when the lightning having struck his litter, killed the slave who walked before bearing the flambeau."

A Roman Emperor at the age of fifty-nine, was seized with an insurmountable terror at the sight of the sea. Returning from an expedition into Syria, he sojourned in the palace of a king, on the confines of Asia; "The chief of Constantinople," says Nicephorus, (ch. vii.) "commanded the Prefect to build a bridge of boats over the Bosphorus, and to adorn it at each side with planks and branches of trees, in order that he might pass without beholding the sea. This work having been finished very promptly, the Emperor crossed on horseback, as if he had been on dry land."

One of the Spanish kings could not endure any one in his presence who had taken tobacco. He had, besides, the mania of feeling incensed at any man's demanding the age of a woman, unless he had intentions of marriage.

Louis XIV detested les chapeaux gris, almost as much as he did the Jansenists.*

* It is related by Saint-Simon, "the king wished to know in what manner of people were followers of the Duke of Orleans (1709) the Duke mentioned amongst others Fontenay. At the king assumed an austere air, "How is that, my nephew king, Fontenay the son of this Jansenist, of this fool who is running everywhere after Arnaud? I cannot see of what this man can be to you," "Sire," replied the Duke "I do not know what his mother may have been, but the son, he has no desire to be a Jansenist, I can vouch for that he does not believe even in the existence of a God."—"Impossible, my nephew?" replied the king, becoming assuaged, "I am more certain, Sire," replied the Duke, "I assure you, if that be so, you can manage him, I see no harm in the scene, for I call it by no other name, occurred in the night after dinner the same day, the Duke related to me while seated with laughter all I have written, word for word."

Nothing could exceed the timidity, or, we might rather say, the poltroonery, of the celebrated moralist Nicole ; he dreaded travelling, excursions on the water, and to the end of his life he never went into the streets without trembling in incessant fear, lest a tile should fall on his head. He dwelt for a long time in the Faubourg Saint-Marcel, "because," as he said, "the enemies who threatened Paris would enter by the Porte Saint-Martin, and would be obliged consequently, to traverse the whole city before they could arrive at his house." In a word, he could say, as the actor who bungled Racine,

"Je crains tout, cher Abner, et n'ai pas d'autre crainte."

Henry III., who had so decided a passion for little dogs, could not remain in the same room with a cat. The Duke d'Epemon fainted at the sight of a leveret.

Marshal de Brézé (who died in 1650) swooned at the sight of a rabbit, as related by Tallemant.

Marshal d'Albret got ill at a repast where either a sucking pig or a wild boar was served. Erasmus could not even smell fish without getting feverish. Scaliger trembled all over at seeing water cresses. Tycho-Brahe felt his limbs failing when he encountered a hare or a fox. Bacon fell into a fainting fit during an eclipse of the moon. Bayle got convulsions when he heard the sound of water issuing from a spout. Lamothe le Vayer could not endure the sound of any instrument. Favoriti, an Italian poet, who died in 1682, could not bear the odour of the rose.

Many celebrated personages are distinguished by their affection for certain animals. Thus, Alexander cherished Bucephalus; Augustus, a parrot; Commodius, an ape; Heliogabalus, a starling, &c., &c.

Honorius, Emperor of the West, had a profound tenderness for a hen, which, probably, was not reciprocated. Being at Ravenna, and having had the precaution of placing between himself and the Goths the channel of the Adriatic Sea, when after the capture of Rome by Alaric, in 410, the slave having the charge of the imperial aviary came to announce to him that the capital of Italy and of the West was lost. "How is that?" cried the Emperor, dismayed, "How! Rome lost! It was but a moment since she was eating from my hand." Thus it was towards his favorite hen, whom he called Rome, that the thoughts and anxieties of the monarch reverted, and he felt much relieved when assured that it was not his beloved bird but the capital of his empire that was lost. "Ah!" rejoined he, "I thought it was my hen." So great, adds the Greek historian, Procopius, to whom we are indebted for this anecdote, so great was his stupidity and brutishness.

The celebrated French financier, Samuel Bernard, (who died in 1739), thought his existence was bound up with that of a black hen, who, thanks to this circumstance, experienced much care and tenderness, for God knows how long. They both died about the same time, Bernard having attained his eighty-eighth year.

Passeroni, the Italian poet, (who died in 1802,) had a strong affection for a cock, and alluded to it in all his poems.

Saint Evremond and Crébillon were always surrounded by cats and dogs.

Lipsius liked only dogs, and had amongst others, a dog he called Saphir, in whom he surmounted the natural repugnance of animals of this species for wine. Thus, said he, "I have in some manner assimilated Saphir to man, as he is fond of wine, and subject to the gout."

Godefroy Mind, a Bernais painter, (who died in 1814,) had been surnamed le Raphaël des chats, in consequence of having excelled in painting those animals, towards whom he entertained an ardent affection; he had at all times many of them about him. "During his work," writes M. Depping, "his favourite cat was invariably beside him, with whom he kept up a kind of conversation; sometimes she occupied his knees, two or three little cats were perched on his shoulders, and he remained in this attitude for hours together, without stirring, lest he should discompose the companions of his solitude."

It was not alone for one or two species of the animal kingdom, that Denis Rolle, an English member of Parliament, in the eighteenth century, manifested his sympathies, but for all animals without distinction, and he was under the impression that they both knew of, and appreciated his kind intentions.

"I have," wrote he in a pamphlet he composed on the abolition of bull-fights and cock-fights, "I have proved the recognition of wild bears, who, after absence, allowed themselves to be taken by me and led by the snout. I cannot better exemplify the truth of my axiom than by stating that I have frequently thrust my hand down the throat of a bull-dog, and without any particular skill on my part, have been enabled to render horses, wild in the fields, docile at my approach ; the most venomous serpents have not inspired me with the least fear. During some years I have traversed dense forests, without ever being attacked ; I have reposed in morasses filled with reptiles and venomous insects : serpents have been in my ears without stinging me. I could also tell of a crane, who ran always after me, following me through the fields ; and of a strange dog, who, every time I crossed Waltham, hastened to defend me, and expressed, by his lamentations, the grief he felt in quitting me. I remember also a little cat of Florida, who rushed at some dogs who were barking at me, fearing they were about to attack me. I cannot better explain these proofs of attachment than by supposing that Providence thus wished to reward my feelings of benevolence and humanity towards animals."

"They relate that Demosthenes," writes Gellius, " was exceedingly spruce in his dress, and that he carried this care of his person to the most delicate and fastidious refinement. This called forth all the railleries of his rivals and adversaries on his coquettish mantle, on his effeminate tunic. Thence also sprung those injurious and obscene discourses, representing him as effeminate, and accusing him of the most infamous crimes. The same account has been given of Hortensius, the most celebrated orator of his time, (after Cicero,) a gentleman always studiously elaborate, whose dress was arranged with art, whose frequent gestures, and studied and theatrical action, drew on him a crowd of sarcastic and outrageous apostrophes."

The English poet, Gray, made himself remarkable by the foppishness of his manners and dress ; a foppishness which he carried almost to folly.

Cavendish, the English philosopher, who left in dying, the largest fortune ever known to be possessed by a Savant, (£1,500,000) was always dressed in grey cloth, and had his clothes made precisely as of the same date. He collected a magnificent library, which was at the command of all the learned, but that it should not be put out of order, he had it placed twelve miles from his dwelling. Whenever he wanted a book he sent a written order for it, and returned it again with the greatest punctuality.

Another philosopher, Desmarests, (who died in 1815,) never changed the form of his dress, and up to the end of his life, his wig and dress would recal one to the modes in use under Cardinal Fleury.

The great English chemist, Davy, clothed himself entirely in green, to go fish, and in red to hunt; he pretended that, dressed in this manner, he frightened the fish and game less.

Towards the end of the last century some individuals adopted the kind of nourishment recommended by Pythagoras. We will mention amongst others, Ritson whose only food was legumes, and who published, in 1803, an essay on total abstinence from all animal food.

Another English author, Wakefield, (who died in 1801,) abstained from wine, as well as from animal food. He only followed the example of the philanthropist, Anthony Benezet, (who died in 1784.)

In the seventeenth century, the German enthusiast, Hoyer, (who died in 1656,) never ate anything but fish which had died naturally.

Spinosa spent between five and six sous a day for his food. Buttner, a German naturalist and philologist, of the eighteenth century, made but one single repast in the day, which cost him but three sous.

Everybody knows that the astronomer, Lalande, affected to eat with delight spiders and caterpillars, of which he carried a stock in his bonbonnière.

C. Gracchus, said Gellius, "made use of a flute to modulate the intonations of his voice, when in the tribune. It is not true, as several suppose, that a musician playing the flute was placed behind the back of Gracchus whilst he spoke, and by his various notes moderated and excited by turns the movements and action of the orator. What absurdity to fancy that a flute could mark for Gracchus, haranguing in public, the measure, the rhythm and the different cadences according to the same rule as you would arrange the pace of a buffoon on the stage! The authors better instructed on this fact relate only that a man was concealed near at hand who was engaged to moderate the intonations of the voice, when becoming too vociferous, by drawing a slow and solemn note on a flute. That was all. Nor do I believe that the naturally impassioned genius of Gracchus required external excitement whilst in the tribune. However, Cicero thought he employed this flute player for a double purpose, and that according as his notes were lively or calm, he enlivened his tone of voice if too slow, and moderated its impetuosity if too boisterous." This is the passage from

Cicero: "Thus as Licinius, a well informed man, formerly his secretary and now his client, has told Catullus, that this same Gracchus had in his service an intelligent man, who concealed himself near the tribune with an ivory flute, giving rapidity to the sound which was necessary to excite when his action was too slow, and softening the notes to a calm when he was too rapid."

"Æschylus," relates Athnæus, "was always a little excited by wine whilst composing his tragedies. We know that Alcman, the lyric poet and Aristophanes the comic, wrote their poems in a state of inebriety"

Madame dela Suze, the humanist Lefèvre in the seventeenth century, and Buffon in the eighteenth, could not work without being dressed with the greatest elegance; nothing, not even a sword, was wanting in the toilet of the latter.

Bacon, Milton, Warburton, Alfieri, required music to enable them to work; and it is related that Bourdaloue always executed an air on the violin before preparing himself to write a sermon.

Thomson, author of The Seasons, passed entire days in his bed, and when asked why he did not rise, he replied, "I see no motive for my rising."

Thomas remained every day until twelve o'clock in bed, the curtains closely drawn. There it was he composed the works which he afterwards wrote "off hand," when he arose. It was thus that during all his life he only aspired to the production of what Voltaire called du galithomas.

Casti, the lively author of the Animaux Parlants, composed his pretty verses whilst playing cards all alone on his bed.

Corneille, Malebranch and Hobbes composed most frequently in the dark, whilst Mézeray on the contrary never worked but with candle-light both by night and day, and never failed even at mid-day to reconduct, light in hand, into the middle of the street those who visited him.

Goethe composed whilst walking; Descartes on the contrary practised like Leibnitz the méditation horizontale.

Gluck caused his harpsichord to be transported into the middle of a meadow; a vast space, the open sky, the heat of the sun and some bottles of champagne, gave him inspiration to compose two divine songs, Iphigénie and D'Orphée. On the contrary, Sarti could not work but in a spacious room, with an arch roof and obscurely dim. The silence of night, the sombre glimmer of a lamp suspended from the ceiling, were indispensably requisite to create the solemn ideas which formed the character of his style. Cimarosa wished to hear around him the clamour of an animated conversation; it was whilst laughing and prating with his friends that he composed les Horaces and le Mariage secret, two inimitable chefs d'œuvre, the style of each being distinctly opposed; the air Pria che spunti in ciel l'aurora he improvised in the midst of a pleasure party in the environs of Prague.

Carpani speaking of one Marcantonio Anfossi, brother of the celebrated Anfossi, and who probably would himself have attained a high musical renown, were it not that he died very young. This Marcantonio was a monk, and his method of stimulating the creative faculty was passing strange; he did not place himself before a harpsichord in order to compose, but before a table on which he had placed seven or eight dishes overladen with roasted capons, sucking pigs nicely browned, and smoking sausages. In the midst of this agreeable exhalation the sweetest inspirations were produced without effort.

Hayden, demure and regular as Newton, shut up in his study, had also his little stratagem: he shaved, powdered, put on clean linen, dressed himself from head to foot as if going to present his respectful homage to Prince Esterhazy, his patron, or even to the Emperor of Germany; then seating himself before a desk on which he had paper carefully lined and pens well made, he put on his finger the ring presented to him by his revered sovereign; after these preliminaries he commenced writing; five or six hours glided by, without his experiencing the least fatigue ; not an erasure appeared to disfigure the extreme neatness of his notes, at other times scarcely readable, so that he himself used to call them his pothooks, they were so cramped and illegible.

It is worthy of remark that singularity of taste, for particular colors and numbers, occasionally exhibits itself even in the making of wills. In the Reports of the Commissioners for Enquiring into Charities in England and Wales, we find the following bequests recorded :—

Whimsical Partiality for Nine.—

Samuel Rabank, at Danby, Yorkshire, by indenture of bargain and sale, enrolled, dated 24th February, 1631, conveyed to Thomas Reeve and Samuel Pruddom, and the heirs of Pruddom, certain premises, upon trust that they and the heirs and assigns of the said Samuel Pruddom, out of the rents and profits of such premises, upon the 9th day of June, or the 9th day of December, from the day of his death, and upon every 9th day of every month for ever thereafter, cause to be paid to nine poor people, to be nominated and elected as thereafter mentioned, 9*d.* a week, or 3*s.* a month ; and should also, upon every 9th day of December, pay the sum of 10*s.* to some godly and able preacher, who should on that day yearly preach the Word of God in the parish Church of Danby ; and that the said Samuel Pruddom, his heirs and assigns, should, after the sermon, give and deliver one peck of rye to every such of the said nine poor people, as well to those who were present during the service, as also to such others as should be absent by reason of sickness or otherwise ; and as to the choice of the poor persons, he directed that, on the 9th December, the curates, churchwardens, and overseers of the poor of Danby, should nominate eighteen poor persons, men or women, of Danby, six by the curate, six by the churchwardens, and six by the overseers, of whom nine should be immediately elected by Pruddom, or his heirs or assigns, but, if they were absent, then such nine persons should be chosen on the next Sabbath day, by the curate and overseers, or any three of them, whereof the curate should be one ; and that, if there were not so many poor persons of the poorest sort and best report in the parish of Danby, the number should be supplied out of Glaisdale ; so, however, as such number should not exceed three.

The sum of £18 10*s.* a year is paid on account of this charity, out of lands called Howe Farm, Castleton and Bottom or Dale Head, in this parish. £17 11*s.* of the money is distributed in monthly payments of 3*s.* each month, to nine poor persons of Danby, 10*s.* are paid to the minister for a sermon which is preached on the 20th December, the day on which the rent-charge is paid ; and, in lieu of a peck of rye, it has been customary, for many years past, to give a shilling to each of the poor persons, which makes up the present amount of the payment.

Whimsical Predilection for Colours.

Henry Green, at Melbourne, Derbyshire, by will, dated 22nd December, 1679, gave to his sister Catharine Green, during her life, all his lands in Melbourne and Newton, and after her decease to others, in trust upon condition that the said Catharine Green, should should give four green waistcoats to four poor women every year, such four green waistcoats to be lined with green galloon lace, and to be delivered to the said poor women on or before the 21st December yearly, that they might be worn on Christmas day.

Thomas Gray, by his will, bearing date the 25th April, 1691, directed his executrix, Mary Gray, and others to lay out £200 in the purchase of lands ; and out of the profits of such land to lay out six nobles yearly to buy six waistcoats of grey cloth, edged with blue galloon lace, and 40s. to buy three coats of grey cloth, to be faced with baize ; and that four of the said waistcoats should be given yearly to four poor widows or other poor women living in Castle Donnington, who were to be of good behaviour and endeavour to live honestly ; and the other two waistcoats to two poor widows or women of like behaviour, of the parish of Melbourne : and two of the coats to be given yearly to two poor men of Castle Donnington, and the other to a poor man of Melbourne. And he also directed that copies of his will should be entered in the Town books of Castle Donnington and Melbourne, and also hung up in the respective churches, and that the same should be read yearly on St. Thomas's day, or the following Sunday, after prayers, for the performance of which he directed that ministers of the said parish should have five shillings a piece ; and he further directed that fifteen dozen of bread should be given to the poor of Castle Donnington, and ten dozen to the poor of Melbourne, yearly, on St. Andrew's day ; and if any residue of rents and profits of the said land should arise, the same should be laid out for the benefit of the poor children of Castle Donnington and Melbourne, in the proportion of two thirds for the former, and one-third for the latter place, towards putting them out as apprentices.—

SINGULAR DEATHS OF CELEBRATED PERSONAGES.

The Emperor Adrian, immediately before death, composed some Latin lines, which Ælius Spartianus has recorded ; they are very defective, and exhibit but little taste. They are as follows :—

Animula, vagula, bladula,
Hospes, comesque corporis,
Quæ nunc abibis in loca
Pallidula, rigida, nudula ;
Nec ut soles, dabis jocos.

Fontenelle gives the following version of them :—

Ma petite âme, ma mignonne,
 Tu t'en vas donc, ma fille ? Et Dieu sache où tu vas.
 Tu pars seulette et tremblante, hélas !
 Que deviendra ton honneur, folichonne ?
 Que deviendront tant de jolis ébats ?*

The Count de Maugiron, lieutenant-general, who died in April, 1767, wrote, an hour before his death, the following lines :—

Tout meurt, je m'en aperçois bien !
 Tronchin, tant fêté dans le monde,
 Ne saurait prolonger mes jours d'une seconde,
 Ni Dumont en retrancher rien.
 Voici donc mon heure dernière :
 Venez, bergères et bergers,
 Venez me fermer la paupière ;
 Qu'au murmure de vos baisers
 Tout doucement mon âme soit éteinte.
 Finir ainsi dans les bras de l'amour,
 C'est du trépas ne point sentir l'atteinte,
 C'est s'endormir sur la fin d'un beau jour.

"M. de Maugiron was residing at the house of the Bishop of Valencia ; the clergy hastened to afford him spiritual assistance, when he, turning to his physician, said : ' I have outwitted them : they imagined they had me ; I am, however, going from them.' He died after repeating the last word."†

"Vespasian, in his last illness," according to Suetonius, (ch. 24) "observed all the forms of state, with the same punctilio as, if in perfect health ; he received deputations even in bed. Finding himself sinking : ' an Emperor,' exclaimed he, ' should die erect' ; and whilst attempting to rise he expired in the arms of those who supported him."

DEATHS OF CELEBRATED PERSONAGES CAUSED BY SINGULAR ACCIDENTS.

Traditions reports the deaths of three great tragic poets of antiquity as having occurred by very singular accidents.

"Æschylus, according to Valerius Maximus, was going one day from the town where he resided in Sicily, when an eagle who was carrying a tortoise chanced to pass over him, and deceived by the smoothness of his head, which was entirely bald, and taking it for a stone, he let the tortoise fall for the purpose of breaking it to eat the flesh. Under this stroke fell the originator and father of the highest and most vigorous tragedy."*

We have our doubts of the truth of this statement, which would give rise to innumerable questions. First, do eagles eat tortoises? That is possible—yet it is a fact of which we are ignorant. Secondly, to whom did the eagle relate that he had taken a bald head for a portion of a rock? This supposition has been gratuitously formed, and does small honor to the piercing glance of the king of birds; though we must admire the correctness of his aim, when from a height, probably very considerable, he with a precision worthy of all praise lets fall his prey on the very point he wishes.

This is but one of the innumerable fooleries which have been bequeathed to us from antiquity, and which have been taken by the moderns for genuine coin.

"Euripides," relates the same author, "after having supped one evening at the residence of the King Archelaüs at Macedonia, was torn to pieces by dogs whilst regaining the house of his landlord."

We have already seen, that according to Valerius Maximus, Sophocles died of joy. An anthologic epigram assumes that the poet was choked by the kernel of an unripe grape.

This latter species of death terminated also the career of Anacreon. "Whilst sucking the juice of a sun grape," wrote Valerius Maximus, "to sustain his sinking strength, a green pipin stuck obstinately in his throat and deprived him of life."

A favorite slave of the Caliph Yezid died in the same way;

* L. 9, ch. 12—La Fontaine has thus translated this chapter.

“ Quelque devin le Menaça, dit-on,
De la chute d'une maison.
Aussitôt il quitta la ville,
Mit son lit en plein champ, loin des toits, sous les cieux.
Un aigle, qui portait en l'air une tortue,
Passa par là, vit l'homme, et sur sa tête nue,
Qui parut un morceau de rocher à ses yeux,
Etant de cheveux dépourvue, him in the thigh, in the same spot where it had formerly struck Apis, the God of the Egyptians. Shortly after the bone decayed, and the gangrene quickly spreading through the whole thigh, Cambyes died."

The comedian, Baron, wounded himself in the foot with a sword at the theatre, and died of the wound in consequence of not permitting amputation.

"The King of Castile, Henry 1st, whilst at play in the Court of the Bishop's Palace at Palence with some young noblemen of his own age, (he was about thirteen), was killed, according to Mariana, by a most melancholy accident. A tile having fallen on the head of the young prince, wounded him so severely that he died eleven days after, on Thursday the 6th of June, in the year 1217."

The deaths of several princes were occasioned by falls from their horses; we shall merely mention the following:—

"At this period, (13th October, 1151)," according to Suger, "an accident of the strangest and most unheard of nature occurred in the kingdom of France. The eldest son of Louis VI., Philip, a youth in the flower of his age, and of great sweetness, the hope of the good, and the terror of the wicked, was riding one day in a faubourg of the city of Paris; a detestable boar rushed before his charger, and threw him rudely, the noble boy falling beneath the horse's weight, and that of a rock under which he had been thrown, and was crushed almost to death. The bystanders, overcome with grief and horror, ran to his assistance and bore him into a neighbouring house; but sad to relate, he resigned his pure spirit into the hands of his Maker before the night had come to a close."* This young prince of great promise had only attained his seventeenth year.

his horse, put his collar bone out of joint, and refusing to take the rest which his situation required after such an accident, died, from the effects of this accident, on the 16th of March, 1702, being then fifty-two years old.

A great number of princes have perished in the chase, by various accidents. Thus, William Rufus was killed by an arrow aimed at a stag by one of his knights, Walter Tyrrell; Henry the First, King of Jerusalem, and Count of Champagne, perished in a manner even more singular.

"One day (in 1197) before going to a repast, Henry asked for some water to wash himself; it being brought to him, he went near to an open window at the top of the tower where he was lodged. As he washed his hands he leaned too far forward, and, falling from the window, was killed on the spot. The valet who held the napkin threw himself after him, lest it should be said he had pushed him out. He was not killed, however, but had his thigh broken; having fallen between two walls he crept on till he came near a postern. Hearing some people passing outside, he commenced to cry out; on hearing him, they immediately came, and demanded what it was he required; he begged them for God's sake to send some of the gentlemen of the court to the Count, who was lying dead. The valets and attendants of the Count came instantly on being summoned, and found the tale too true. He was borne to a neighbouring monastery, where he was interred. He had ordered several times a lattice to this window, to guard against children being hurt; he had, it would appear, a presentiment of evil occurring through its means. There was great mourning for the Count's death."*

Leo IV., Emperor of the East, was passionately fond of precious stones. The Byzantine historians relate that this prince, assisting on the eighth of September, 780, at the Divine Office, in the church of Saint Sophia, was so struck by the brilliancy of the precious stones that enriched a crown, which the Emperor Maurice had caused to be hung above the altar, that he caused it to be instantly detached, had it placed on his head, and bore it away to his palace. But the enormous weight of this gem wounded him in the forehead, which instantly mortified, causing his death the same day. This sudden demise was regarded as a signal punishment from Heaven.†

excess at table, are very numerous. Priscus, the historian, after having the custom of his nation, espoused a sister of his in marriage, almost at the same time to a young girl named Ildico, endowed with the festivities attendant on this marriage to great joy, and overpowered lay down on his back; as the blood, which issued from his nostrils, could not, in its ebullition it took a fatal course, and, collecting in his mouth. Thus, drunkenness led to a glorious end in his battles. The next day had already expired when the king, suspecting something wrong, broke open the door, and found Attila dead, with a fatal hemorrhage; the young spouse, with a paled face, was bathed in tears. Then, each of their nation, each cut off part of his own flesh, and laid deep wounds on their hideous countenances, as if this illustrious warrior might receive as much grief, not alone the tears and sighs of women, but the blood of men of true the lungs in the medical theory of the servant of the Malade Imaginaire. It sufficed to have proved that a personage in the course of his career has met some violent opposition, or experienced some great sorrow, to behold in this opposition or grief the evident cause of death irrespective of sex or age. In order not to be accused of exaggeration, we shall take a cursory glance over a few volumes of the excellent Biographie Universelle of Michaud in order to assure our readers of the truth of what we advance. Amongst other examples taken from this work we shall cite one. It is recorded of Nicholas Abilgaard, a Danish painter: "that the destruction of the pictures at the chateau at Copenhagen when that edifice was consumed by fire in 1794, and which he considered his chefs-d-œuvre, had such an effect on Abilgaard that it conducted him slowly to the tomb." Abilgaard died in 1806, that is to say twelve years after the burning of these paintings. Who could say on this occasion, Time goes for naught here?

Be that as it may, we have a number of deaths caused by grief, recorded in Michaud's Biographie, for the truth of which he is responsible.

The number of learned men who died of grief in consequence of various accidents is very considerable. Tribolo, a Florentine engineer of the sixteenth century, died of grief (and of illness, adds the Biographie) for having caused the inundations in the territory of Florence. Viglius, a German lawyer, died in 1577, at the age of seventy, in consequence of the ingratitude of the Prince whom he served.

An English writer, died, 1557, at the age of forty-three, for having been forcibly converted; the famous heretic of the twelfth century, Amaury, died from the same cause, having been forced to deny his belief. The Benedictine Lami ended his days at seventy-five because a young man whom he had converted from heresy, relapsed again into its fatal errors.

Sibouyah, an Arabic grammarian of the eighth century, died, it is said, of grief, because, the Kaliph Haroun-àl-Raschyd decided in favor of another savant on a grammatical point on which they differed. The Spanish theologian Valentia betrayed equal susceptibility; he died in 1598, aged fifty-two, because the Pope had reproached him with falsifying a passage of Saint Augustin. The historian Avrigny, born at Caen, in 1675, died of grief at sixty-six, in consequence of some alterations made by Lallement in his works.

Schidone died ive years of age, after having Breughel, at fifty-eight, in con- ighter's dowry. Terence died having lost in a shipwreck one eces which he had composed. d the Italian Pindar, repairing Clement XI. the fine copy with lies of the Pontiff, which he had transposed into verse, discovered, on the way, an error in the printing, which overwhelmed him with such grief, "ing at Frescati, he was seized with apoplexy, and a few hours, on the 12th of June, 1712."*

We may add to these the names of Ximénès, eighty-eight, from the sorrow he experienced at the death of the poet Sarrasin, who, at fifty-one, died; Prince de Conti had struck him with a tongue; de Vauban, who, because he could not present himself to the Bourbons, in 1814, died of chagrin, at the age of eighty. We could form a much longer list of celebrated persons who died away, more or less slowly, by household griefs. I know of very few individuals, who, (according to the romance,) died of grief for having lost their wives. In the deaths caused by love, we are limited to the case of Giorgione, who died at thirty-four, from the grief he experienced on discovering the infidelity of his mistress, whose pupils had taken away.

It appears, however, not quite so easy as people think, to die of love, if we may judge by the attestation of Grimm, who became enamoured of an opera girl. The following has been told by J. J. Rousseau, in a strange matter:—

"He fell quite suddenly," wrote he, "into a malady, which I, or perhaps any other person, ever saw. He passed days and nights in an uninterrupted sleep, his eyes open, the pulse going, but without speaking, eating, appearing sometimes to hear, but never replying to a sign, and apparently without agitation, pain, or appearance of fever; he remained there as if dead. Baynal divided the labor of watching with me, I was stronger and more robust than I, cared him through the night, whilst I passed the days without leaving him; never together, as one left when the other came. The Friere (at whose house he resided,) becoming a Senac brought to him, who, after having examined him, made no remark, and ordered him nothing. My anxious friend caused me to examine the physician's conduct closely, and I observed him smile when going out, but the invalid remained several more days

ROYAL PERSONAGES WHO HAVE DISTINGUISHED THEMSELVES AS AUTHORS, MUSICIANS, PAINTERS.

A paragraph has lately been going the round in the newspapers, in which it is stated, that a custom prevails in France, which makes it necessary that male members of the nobility should be each acquainted with some trade or profession. We learn from the paragraph in question that the Prince lately married to the Princess Royal is a virtuoso. As this paragraph appears to have excited a considerable number of readers, we present before our readers a few facts regarding royal personages who were authors, musicians, painters, or locksmiths.

"Augustus, according to Suetonius, composed epigrams in various styles, which were recited to him amongst a circle of friends who acted the part of censors as regarded censorship. Such as Cato's vindictive epigrams, the greater portion of which he read himself, the remainder, however, was read by his friends. He also composed the philosophic discourses, and the life, in thirteen books which reached to the war with the Carthaginians. He also essayed poetry, and left a small history of Sicily, and a little collection of epigrams composed generally in his bath. He commenced a tragedy of Ajax; but not being of dramatic style, he destroyed it, and his friends having one day 'what had become of Ajax'—'Ajax,' replied, 'guished itself on a sponge.'"

“ Finally, he wrote in this language twenty books of the history of the Tyrrhenians, and eight of the Carthagenians. It was in consequence of these works that to the ancient Museum of Alexandria another was added, bearing the name of the Emperor, and it was also decreed that on certain days every year that there should be given in turn by the members of these two Museums, two public lectures, in one the history of the Carthagenians, and in the other the history of the Tyrrhenians.”

“ Charlemagne, according to Eginhard, devoted under the direction of Alcuin, much time and labour to the study of rhetoric, logic, and above all to astronomy, tracing the progress of the stars, and following their course with the most scrupulous attention, and marvellous sagacity ; he essayed even to write on the subject, and had tablets constantly under the head of his bed, that he might employ every leisure moment in writing ; but he failed this in study commenced too late, and at an age unsuited to such avocations. None of the nations subject to him had up to that period written laws ; he decreed that their constitutions should henceforward be in writing, and deposited at the registers ; he had also ancient and rude poems composed, in which were recorded the warlike deeds and heroic actions of the ancient kings, by which means they were transmitted to posterity. A grammar of the national language was also commenced through his assiduity.”*

“ Robert II., relates the monk, author of the History of Saint Bertin, was very pious, prudent, literary, and sufficiently philosophical, but he excelled as a musician, He composed the hymn of the Holy Ghost, which commenced with these words :—Adisit nobis gratia, the rhythems, Judæa et Hierusalem, concede nobis, quæsumus, and Cornelius Centurio, which he offered at Rome on the altar of St. Peter, with a melody suitable to the words ; he composed many other fine pieces. His wife Constance seeing him always occupied with these pursuits, asked him jestingly to compose something in memory of her. He then wrote the lines Constantia Martyrum, which the queen, in consequence of the name Constantia, conceived to have been written for her. This king was frequently in the habit of repairing to the church of Saint Denis in his royal robes, and with his crown on his head, and there directing the choir at matins, vespers, and at Mass, and uniting his voice with the monks in chaunting the sacred service. As he was besieging a certain castle on the feast of Saint Hippolytus, for whom he entertained a particular devotion, he quitted the siege in order to visit the church of St. Denis, and lead the choir during Mass, whilst he was devoutly singing with the monks Agnus Dei, dona nobis pacem, the walls of the castle suddenly fell, and the king's army took immediate possession; a happy incident which Robert always attributed to the intercession of Saint Hippolytus."

From the reign of this prince up to the end of the fifteenth century, we cannot discover a single King of France, who signalized himself in any particular way either in literature, science, or the arts.

We know that during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, princes and noble lords made use of the pens of scribes to correspond with their most intimate friends, and even their mistresses, who replied to them in the same manner. We have here some curious details which have been transmitted by Arnauld D'Andilly, on the way in which Louis XIII. wrote to his mother Marie de Médécis, at the period when she retired to England, to negotiate with her son.

"M. de Bèrulle, wrote he, was the person employed by his majesty to effect a negotiation with the queen mother; and one day the king being still at Saint Germain he was about to depart for England on that mission, when M. Drageant requested me to compose a suitable letter for his majesty to copy, and send to his mother. I complied, and M. de Bèrulle entertaining for me a particular regard, and reposing complete confidence in me, spoke to me during his sojourn at Tours of the negotiation which was still pending, and told me, that on presenting the queen mother with the last letter written by the king from Saint Germain, she wept on reading it, that he, feeling surprised at this strong ebullition of feeling, expressed to her majesty his regret at being the bearer of a letter that caused her such pain, to which she replied: 'You are quite astray in your supposition, as joy, not grief, causes my tears. I have received several letters, since our separation, from the king, but this is the only one I have received from my son.' As I had not forgotten the purport or diction of the latter, I asked M.

de Bèrulle if it did not commence with the word Ainsi. He appeared all astonishment, and immediately replied 'yes;' But how did you know that?—I had good reason to know all about it,' I answered, 'since it was my own composition.' On hearing which he embraced me tenderly."*

Returning to singular words referred to at page 680 of the second paper of this series we note the following words.

There exists in an old collection of inscriptions a distich which bears some analogy to the Venetian placard. It is thus conceived :

Defunctis patribus, successit prava juvenus,
Cujus consilio quæ valuère ruunt.

This distich is preceeded by another which has been represented as engraven on the doors of the cathedral of Breslau; here it is—

Quas sacras ædes pietas construxit avorum,
Has nunc hæredes invadunt more luporum.

It appears that the authors of these bitter jests were anxious to attack the youth of their time, which was in the sixteenth century; and as there is nothing new under the sun, we recognize at the present day some waspish people who, with the smile of irony on their lips, take it into their heads to speak as slightingly of our youth, as was done in former times. We are very glad to take this occasion of denouncing to our readers a pitiable article inserted some time since in the Bibliothèque de Genève, under the following title: DES ADOLESCENS de notre époque, comme gros d'avenir. We limit ourselves to a short extract, for in quoting nonsense the shorter it is the better: "In the happy age in which we live," writes this satirical jester, "there are men of fifteen. We have no longer youths, they pass at once from infancy to mature age, from the top to the gazette, from the rudiments of science to its acme. Before they get their beard, the mind is perfectly formed, they hesitate no longer, they have fixed ideas on things, men, principles, systems, the heart is cold, blasé; those feelings are exhibited to all, but especially to their father, whom they consider old. Behold the consequence of this new order of things, sound principles, just and invariable from which they never swerve; here they are as adopted.

Experience is a useless thing."

"Intercourse with men and observation teach nothing.

"In this age of enlightenment youth alone possesses ability.

"The age in which the passions are in all their effervescence, is naturally that in which reason predominates. The culminating point of judgment is necessarily to be met with between twenty and twenty-five and rarely beyond that. After this age, society is no longer composed of useful men; this fact is fully proved by the following category:—at twenty he becomes a man;—at five and twenty his maturity of judgment is complete,—at thirty false hair,—at forty a wig;—at fifty stupid; at sixty a mummy;—at seventy a fossil, childish, extinct."

In 1835 a poet expressed the same ideas, and gave them under the same denomination in a piece of poetry entitled Le Septuagénaire, ou le chant du Cygne! We will not say where the tirade on these designations is to be found.

When the Orestes of Voltaire appeared for the first time, February 12th 1750, the concourse was great at the representation, and they placed as a check or countermark on the pit tickets the following letters.

which signifies this line of Horace:—

"Omne Tulit Punctum Qui Miscuit Utile Dulci."

A sorry jester interpreted these sigles in the following manner:—

"Oreste, Tragédie Pitoyable, Que Monsieur Voltaire Donne."

Whilst discussing the subject of Voltaire's tragedies, we must not omit the mention of another by the same author:—Zaire, of which they have abridged four lines, and which have been discovered in a manuscript deposited in the bureaux of the police at Paris. These four lines form part of the third scene of the second act, towards the middle, the part where old Lusignan calls on God, after having recognised his daughter:—

Ne m'abandonnez pas, Dieu qui voyez mes larmes!

"Et toi, cher instrument du salut des mortels,

"Gage auguste du Dieu, vivant sur nos autels,

"Bois rougi de son sang, relique incorruptible,

"Croix sur qui s'accomplit ce mystère terrible,

Dieu mort sur cette croix et qui revis pour nous,

Parle, achève, ô mon Dieu, ce sont là de tes coups.

The four lines preceded by inverted commas, are those which have been abridged.

THE FIVE LATIN WORDS OF LOUIS XI.

They say that this prince, so amiable, so frank, so humane, gloried in his own ignorance; and it was for this reason that he wished to banish from his court, and from the education of his son (Charles VIII), the Latin language, preserving, however, five words, which he reserved as a special favor, having found them so useful that he made them through life his rule of conduct. "Not," said he, "that Latin is useless to a king, or at least a little of it; it will suffice, however, for my son to know the five following words, QUI NESCIIT DISSIMULARE, NESCIIT REGNARE; here lies the entire art of governing." Thus, he laid down as a principle in his Rosier des Guerres, this maxim:—"No counsel is better than that your adversary should be ignorant of your intentions." That is to say: dissimulate all your resolves, in order that your adversaries may not be aware of them until after their execution. The following is a maxim taken from the same work:—

"De tant que fust vault mieulx que escorce, Autant vault mieux soustilleté que force."

Which signifies:—

Know, that as far as the wood excels the bark, So does subtlety exceed strength.

MAXIMS DRAWN FROM THE BREVIARY OF POLITICS.

These maxims are of the species we are about to treat, but being from another source, they are a little more extended. It is affirmed that they were handed down by Mazarin to Louis XIV., as the most secure rule of conduct in the administration of public and private affairs; the following will show the tone and scope:—

SIMULA, DISSIMULA; NULLICREDE; OMNIA LAUDA;

NOSCE TE IPSUM; NOSCE ALIOS.

As these principles are extracts from a furious dietribe, published against Mazarin, it is very natural to suppose that the conscience of the minister is not charged with this machievelian delinquency. The book from which this noble maxim has been extracted is entitled Breviarum politicorum secundum rubricas Mazarinicas. Colon. Agrip., Joan Selliba, 1684, pet. in duodecimo. La Bibliothèque historique de France, N. 32, 564, in announcing an edition Parisiis, J. Le Petit, 1695, in 24, added that "this book is very curious, and is not a bad specimen of devilry. We know another edition, Vesaliæ, et Amstelodami, Joh. Wolters, 1700, pet. in duodecimo ; this work must not be confounded with Le grand Bréviaire de Mazarin in-quarto, a jocular piece on the manners of Cardinal Mazarin, and the manner in which he passed his days.

FEMALE WARRIORS.

If we may credit Dalémile, a Bohemian poet of the fourteenth century, there existed in Bohemia, up to the eighth century, a corps of Amazons, under the rule of the Duke Prémislas. We here append a resumé of the traditions with which he has furnished us.

Libussa, or, Libossa, wife of Prémislas, who died in 735, formed a guard of young girls, dressed in military costume. After the death of this princess, Vlasta, the Amazon, by whom they were commanded, assembled them on the Mount Widoulé (not far from Prague,) and erected there a fort, which she destined as the centre of her new empire. Prémislas, on hearing this, sent one of the lords of his court to treat with them ; they, however, mutilated the unfortunate envoy in the most brutal manner, by cutting off his nose and ears.

The number of her adherents increasing, Vlasta had a second fortress erected opposite Wissegrad, which she designated Diewin, or, the Young Girl's Fort. Thence they ravaged the neighbouring countries, and all who did not belong to their sex, were cruelly mutilated or murdered. After a victory gained over the troops of Prémislas, Vlasta published a code, the three last articles of which decreed that men were to be prohibited from carrying arms, under the penalty of death ; that they should never go on horseback but with their legs joined and hanging on the left side of the horse, that those who dared to mount otherwise should undergo the like punishment ; and that the men, no matter to what class they belonged, should conduct the plough, and do all the laborious work, whilst the women did battle for them ; that the young girls were at liberty to make choice of their husbands, and whoever refused to submit to this decree should undergo the penalty of death.

After several ineffectual attempts at conciliation, Prémislas attacked the fort of Widoulé, and murdered all the women he found there. Vlasta having been apprised of this disaster, decreed that they should offer at Diewin a sacrifice to the gods ; and on the altar they murdered twenty-four prisoners, whose blood they gathered in charmed cups ; they then retired from Diewin, and perished arms in hand.

Such is the Poet's tale, and it amazed us to perceive that it was taken up so seriously by the author of the article dedicated to Vlasta in the Biographie de Michaud, an article from which we have in part borrowed the details just given.

Dalémile had certainly done no more than collect some old traditions, which he, perhaps, embellished, if this task had not been already accomplished. This legend, however, was popular in Bohemia ; as there is mention of these Amazons in a chronicle of the eleventh century, that of Cosmus of Prague. We here subjoin a relation very different from that of Dalémile. The original is in Latin prose, diversified and filled with poetical illusions. It might be said on reading it, that it was a fragment of some poem, written in barbarous Latin.

“ At this period (under Prémislas) the young girls spread over the land, free from all species of restraint. Like Amazons they bore military arms, and, under self-government, fought like young soldiers, and gave themselves up with ardour to the chase. It was not the men who at that time enjoyed the privilege of selecting their spouses, it was the young girls who chose them for their husbands. There was no perceptible difference between the dress of men and women ; their audacity increased to such a degree that they constructed a fortress on a rock not far from Prague, possessing merely natural defences ; to this fort they gave the virginal name of Diewin. The young men, on their part, indignant at such womanly boldness, assembled in much larger numbers on an adjacent rock, and built in the middle of the wood a town, which the moderns have called Wissegrad, but which, at that time, derived its name, Nurasten, from the trees with which it was surrounded. Sometimes peace, at other times war, reigned between the two parties : the young girls were more cunning, the young men more brave. On one occasion, peace having been concluded between them, they determined on celebrating the truce by a series of festivities, which were to continue during three days ; they, consequently, abandoned their arms, and relinquished themselves to all manner of riot and dissipation ; at the termination of these orgies, the young men set fire to the fortress, and thus Diewin was consumed. From that period, the women were content to dwell in peace under the sway of the men.*

During the middle ages, female warriors were not uncommon. We here furnish a few examples, the greater number of which are of French origin.

At the battle gained by Robert Guiscard over the Greek Emperor Alexis Comnenus near Dyrrachium, Gaëte, wife of the Norman Prince, "who according to Anne Comnenus followed to the war and fought like a Pallas," she rallied spear in hand, and led to combat the troops of her husband who had been dispersed by the Greeks.†

Orderic Vital, in book 8th, spoke thus of Isabel, daughter of Simon de Montford and wife of Raoul de Conches. "She was," wrote he, "generous, enterprising, gay, amiable, and courteous to all who approached her. During the war she mounted on horseback, armed as a knight amongst the other knights, and like to the young Camille, the pride of Italy in the troops of Turnus, she yielded in intrepidity neither to knights covered in mail, nor to soldiers armed with javelins." After the death of her husband she retired into the convent of Haute-Bruyère.

In the 12th book of the same chronicler, we find the history of Juliana wife of Eustatius of Breteuil and illegitimate daughter of Henry I. King of England. Having been sent with the troops by her husband to defend the castle of Breteuil, she was there besieged by her father, whom the inhabitants had admitted into the city. Seeing the impossibility of a long resistance she demanded an interview with her father.

"The king, who never dreamed of treachery in a woman, and one so nearly allied to him, granted the interview, during which his unfortunate daughter sought his life. She bent a balista and hurled a shaft at her father, whom, by God's protection, it failed to strike. Henry on perceiving her unnatural design, ordered the draw-bridge leading to the castle to be destroyed, in order to intercept all communication with the exterior. Juliana, seeing herself thus encompassed on all sides, and without hope of succour, surrendered the castle to Henry, but could not obtain from him her liberty. After his prohibition she was obliged to let herself slide from the top of the highest wall of the castle, and without the assistance of a bridge, or indeed of almost any support, creep ignominiously to the bottom of the ditch and expose her naked person to the army. This incident occurred at the commencement of Lent, in the third week of February, when the water in the dyke being frozen pierced the delicate flesh of the princess as she was plunged into it on her fall. This unfortunate warrior retreated thus ignobly, and hastened with speed to rejoin her husband at Paci (sur Eure.)*

Amongst the number of women who contributed to the defence of castles and towns we must not omit to mention Jane Hachette, the sister of Duguesclin, and another heroine less known, Jane Maillotte, who distinguished herself at Lisle, during the revolt of the Hurlus. We refer to Froissart for an account of the adventures of the two Countesses of Montfort and de Blois, who, during the captivity of their husbands, kept up a bloody war against each other, the termination of which was the possession of the Duchy of Brittany. We must not omit the mention of an attempt at a crusade made by the Genoese ladies in 1301—or the defence of the castle of Benegon by Marie de Barbançon in 1569.

As to Joan of Arc, and other adventurers who, after her death, aspired to play the same part as she had done, their history is too well known to need recital here.

The celebrated female poet, Louise Labé,* had scarcely attained the age of sixteen, when having accompanied her father to the siege of Perpignan, in 1542, she was seized with an ardent desire of becoming a warrior, and so distinguished herself by her bravery as to earn for herself the surname of le Capitaine Loys. Her exploits have been celebrated by an anonymous author in a very long and laudatory piece. We here transcribe a sample of these very indifferent lines.

Louize ainsi furieuse,
En laissant les habits mols
Des femmes, et envieuse
Du bruit, par les Espagnols
Souvent courut, en grand'noise,
Et maint assaut leur donna.

* Orderic Vital, t. xii. collection Guizot, t. xxviii. p. 289.

† She was born at Lyons in 1526, and died in 1566.

Quand la jeunesse françoise
 Perpignan environna,
 Là sa force elle déploie,
 Là de sa lance elle ploye
 Le plus hardi assaillant ;
 Et brave dessus la selle,
 Ne montrait rien en elle
 Que d'un chevalier vaillant.

After raising the siege she returned and married at Lyons, from which time she resigned herself unrestrainedly to her taste for literature, and her passion, which was not less lively, for the beaux-esprits of her time ; she entered on a life nearly similar to that pursued by Ninon d'Enclos in the following century. In forming her society the bourgeois or traders were not admitted, no matter what wealth they were possessed of. She admired men of learning above all, patronising them by her marked favour, and holding them in far more esteem than the highest nobles, preferring to admit them free to her coteries, than the others for a large premium.

Much about the same period a Spanish religious, named Catherine d'Erauso, escaped from her convent, and assuming the dress of a man, served as cabin-boy on the ships trading to America ; then deserted, and after various adventures by sea, entered the army, where she signalized herself in the engagements against the Indians. She attained the rank of officer, and quitted the service in consequence of a wound received in a duel, by which her sex was discovered ; she then returned to Europe, where she received a pension from Philip III. Such, at least, are the facts which have been recorded in the memoirs written it is said by the heroine herself, and published for the first time at Paris, with some justificatory articles, in 1829, in octavo, under the title of Historia de la Monja-alferez (the History of the Religious Officer.)"*

"It was about the year 1638, if I do not deceive myself," wrote the Abbé Arnauld, "that I had the honor of becoming acquainted with the Amazon of our day, Madame the Countess of Saint Balmont,† whose life has been a real prodigy of valour and virtue, having united in her person all the courage of a determined soldier, and all the modesty of a truly Christian woman. Part of this testimony was given in my presence, by some Spanish soldiers whom she had taken in the war, and whom she had dispatched to M. De Feuquières at Verdun : he having asked jokingly of them, if they had in their country women equally brave, one of them replied with the greatest seriousness, that he never could have supposed she was a woman, having seen her perform feats which would be daring for a reckless soldier. To those who wish to read these memoirs, it may not be uninteresting to learn further particulars of so extraordinary a woman. She was descended from a very high family at Lorraine, and born with ideas worthy of her birth. The beauty of her countenance corresponded with that of her mind, but her height did not correspond with her beauty, she was small and rather fat. God who designed for her a more laborious life than ordinary women, rendered her thus robust, in order that she might be better enabled to endure bodily fatigue ; he also bestowed on her a supreme contempt for beauty, so that having had the small pox she rejoiced as much at being marked as others felt sorry at a like misfortune, saying that it gave her more the appearance of a man. She married the Count de Saint Balmont, who yielded nothing to her either in birth or merit. They lived together in perfect unity ; but the commotions which broke out at Lorraine obliged them to separate.

“ Madame de Saint Balmont dwelt on her estate in order to preserve it. Up to that period she had never indulged her warlike tendencies but for the chase, which is, after all a kind of mimic war, but the occasion soon presented itself of exercising it in reality ; it was this. A cavalry officer having come to reside on her estate, lived in a very disorderly manner. Madame de Saint Balmont with much courtesy expressed her disapproval of his conduct, which he received very ungraciously ; this piqued her, and she resolved to bring him to reason herself, and without any consultation, but the promptings of her own heart, she wrote him a note to which she affixed the signature of the Chevalier de Saint Balmont. In this billet, she pointed out to him that the bad treatment experienced at his hands by the Chevalier's sister-in-law demanded some expiation, and that he desired to meet him sword in hand. The captain accepted the challenge, and repaired to the appointed place Here Madame de Saint Balmont awaited him dressed in male attire. They fought, she conquered him, and after disarming him said with peculiar grace; 'You were under the impression, Monsieur, that you fought against the Chevalier de Saint Balmont; but it is Madame de Saint Balmont who returns you your sword, and who requests that in future you will have more consideration for a lady's behest.' She departed, after these words, and history records, that he, full of shame and confusion, retired, and was never again heard of. As to her, this occurrence only served to inflame her valour; she did not content herself with preserving her own property, in repelling force by force; but gave protection to several neighbouring gentlemen who took refuge upon her estate, and ranged themselves under her banners when she went to war, from whence she always returned victorious, accomplishing her undertaking with equal prudence and valour. I met her several times at the house of Madame Feuquères, at Verdun; and it was amusing to see her embarrassment at being dressed like a woman, and with what ease and spirit she mounted her horse on getting outside the city, and acted as escort to the ladies who accompanied her, and whom she permitted to remain in her coach. Notwithstanding this strange life, at variance with nearly all the feelings of womanhood, and which might in another lead to freedom of manner, or it might be libertinism, yet for her it possessed but the one attraction, namely, the power of doing good by redressing grievances, and repelling injustice. When in her own quiet home, each day was employed in offices of piety, in prayers, in holy reading, in visiting the sick of her parish, whom she assisted with a most praise-worthy charity, which gained for her the esteem and admiration of all who knew her, and caused her to be regarded with the respect and homage paid only to a queen."*

Madame de Saint Balmont, after the peace of Westphalia, occupied herself with literature, and published in the year 1650 les Jumeaux Martyrs, a tragedy in-quarto; it was republished in 1651 in duo-decimo. She died amongst the religions of Saint Clare, at Bar-le-Duc the 22nd of May, 1660. Pere de Vernon has written her life, and entitled it l'Amazone Chretienne, Paris, 1678, in duo-decimo.

* Memoirs de L'Abbe Arnauld, from Michaud Ponjolat's collection, p. 494. See also a chapter of Tallement, t. viii. p. 217.

We do not know the name of the heroine, whose biography James de Joigny, printer at Rheims, has given under the title of Les Merveilles de la vie des combats et victoires d'Ermine, citoyenne de Reims, Rheims, 1648, in octavo. We are also in doubt about another heroine in the earlier part of the seventeenth century.—L'Histoire de Louis XIII., by Dupleix, p. 225.

Towards the end of the seventeenth century an English-woman named Maria Read concealed her sex, and passed her life on the American seas, in the midst of pirates whose dangers and profits she shared. The vessel on which she was having been taken by the English, she, with her companions, was condemned to death at Jamaica the 16th of November. She declared herself enceinte, and thus obtained a respite, but falling ill, she died in prison, being at the time about forty years of age.

In the latter part of the same century, an amazon of another species, Mademoiselle Maupin, an actress at the opera, filled France with the noise of her sanguinary and scandalous adventures. Skilled in fencing, and wearing usually the dress of a man (a costume by means of which she could more readily abandon herself to her infamous pursuits) she one day insulted a woman who was accompanied by three men; they, ignorant of her sex, challenged her to a duel, in which she killed successively the three. She obtained pardon by quitting Paris, to which place she however returned, and re-appeared at the opera. She finished her career by renouncing the world, and died in 1707.

The mother of Wyermann, a Dutch painter, who died in 1747, was vulgarly called Lys Saint Mourel. She had served in the armies, and retired with the rank of serjeant, the dress and staff of which she continued to wear during the remainder of her life.

We shall conclude our sketch with the following fact.

The first woman who made a tour of the world was a young Briton, named Barry. She was dressed in man's attire, and accompanied as a servant, the French botanist Commerson in his travels (1767 to 1770.) Her sex was discovered at Taiti by the islanders.

ART. II.—DELPINE GAY.

The lady with whom we wish to make our readers better acquainted, having devoted twelve years to the chronicling of such small beer as fashions, and the topics of the passing hour in Paris, an introductory word or two on these subjects will not be out of place.

We seem to feel ourselves as on a sand-bank drifting we know not where. Our poor planet has not a moment's rest from New Year's day to St. Sylvester's, nor can its inhabitants stop to realize their condition for the nonce, to reckon up their joys and sorrows, or adjust the balance. But in time, mother earth finds herself starting from the same point again, and at the renewal of some cycle—if we could live to witness it—it is probable that every phase in the world's economy would find itself repeated. The drop of water that with its countless fellows, rushes westward past the Cape of Good Hope, in obedience to the moon's pleasure, will in the lapse of years glide again by the same headland; but what variety of climate, and what myriads of kindred drops, will it not have encountered in the interim. Mme. de Girardin in one of her pieces, contrasts the diary of a fine lady in 1812, as preserved in the "Chaussée d'Antin," with one of the year 1840, and finds no members of the same families presiding over the popular emporiums of the two eras, except in the instance of a fashionable mercer, and the proprietor of a flower magazine; hence she jumps too hastily at a conclusion, and says that nothing here below remains the same, but fashions and flowers.

If being slaves to the same absurd style of dress at this day, to which our great grandmothers of a century since were victims, proved anything, our poetess would be in the right; but let all the varieties of style, more or less at variance with good natural taste, which ruled during their fitful hour in the interim, be also taken in to account. And while we are on the subject of fashions, a subject on which the celebrated Jeames of the Morning Post is much better informed, let us reflect for a moment on the waste of God's time, the abuse of money, and the misapplication of talents, for which those rulers of the fashionable world must account one day, when the result of their labours is the adoption of expensive, immodest and unserviceable clothing by the myriads of foolish women, who have not the moral courage to refuse to bow down and worship the cruel idol, dress themselves according to the impulses of a natural good taste, and the ascertained principles of gracefulness and beauty in form. Would that the August Lady, who nominally governs the men and women of these islands, was absolute mistress in the article of female fashions, and then would we for a certainty be relieved of the sight of painful-looking foreheads from which the natural ornament of the hair is so tightly pulled away, from dustmen's fantails on the beautiful heads which they disfigure, and from those garments of which a hay-cock is the ungraceful type.

The women of London, Dublin, and Edinburgh, probably fancy that their "Great Diana of the Ephesians," resides in Paris; but people who are supposed to be better skilled in the mystic rites of that money-lavishing goddess, assert that she has her shrine on the banks of the "dark rolling Danube." And after all, what a flimsy and fragile rod of power she holds, if her slaves had even a shadow of moral courage or common sense! Were our Queen and a few influential ladies of her court, to return to a natural and graceful style of dress, and steadily persist in wearing it, for a reasonable time, the mode would by degrees shew its colours beyond the Manche, take Paris by assault, occupy the cities that behold their faces in the "winding Rhine," get possession of Munich, and drifting down the Danube, seize the trembling tyrant on her throne, and boldly free the fair mistress of Vienna and her equally fair court ladies from the iron hoops and other harness of her ponderous though fantastic car.

This may be said to be begging the question; but let us see what Englishmen have already done; and if Englishwomen will take a lesson from the books of their natural vassals for once, they will live to bless the happy inspiration.

Did John Bull in the matter of training his horses to execute steeple chases, races, and fox hunts, cross the water to learn how his Gallic neighbours went, or went not about these things?

Not a yard. He moulded his canine and equine amusements and pursuits after a model constructed in his own hard head, till they acquired a systematic and stable form (no pun intended) till they became in fact a national institution ; and now see the consequence. Your Parisian lion who must do violence to his own tastes and instincts, when he rides a race, risks his neck in a steeple-chase, pursues a reynard, or practises le bore, caricatures these exercises as well as he can, and works himself into a factitious enthusiasm about them, merely because he sees our islanders practise them with genuine eagerness and enjoyment.

A Parisian is associated in the minds of most of us with ideas of fickleness, frivolity, love of change in dress and customs, and every thing allied to unsteadiness. Let us examine with what reason. From the days of Racine and Corneille to the first appearance of Hernani, who were they that uniformly sat out, and seemed to enjoy the long-winded tirades, the no-action, and the unsuitable costume of the Classic drama ? The Parisian play-goers. Who for about a century and a half were satisfied to bury themselves, and their cares and their interest in passing events, in the tremendous romances (each 10 volumes folio) of the 17th century ? The French reading public. And in the matter of dancing, a recreation so intimately associated with a Parisian's enjoyment, the same stereotyped forms, are repeated from year to year. The ballet may be called the Highland Sylph or the Apples of Atalanta, but the same mode of flying on to the foot lights, the same nonsensical and ungraceful postures, the same twirls, and the same unintelligible language of arms and hands, will be strictly repeated still. Performers from the Bog of Allen, the coast of Bohemia, the country of the Cossacks, Andalusia, the Carse of Gowrie, or the Sands of Sahara, may come and obtain some cold applauses by the performance of their national dances ; but they vanish in time, and Mons. Silvain, who sometimes happens to be Jemmy Sullivan from Dingle, and who has been waiting round the side-wing, bounds forward, supports Mlle. Frelebras with the tip of one finger, as she winds her arms like the sails of a mill, twirls her empty head, and holds out one leg parallel to the earth's surface ; the claqueurs bring their horny palms together, and the stereotyped manœuvres and pedœuvres then witnessed for the thousandth time, put to flight all remembrance of Irish jigs, Scotch reels, Spanish boleros, and all the lively and joyous emotions connected with them.

A pleasing feature in the Fauborg St. Germain portion of Parisian society, one most worthy of imitation by ourselves, is the assembling of talented, titled and agreeable individuals for the purpose of social and intellectual entertainment among themselves at little expence, and with no obligation of lavish expenditure in entertainment or decorations. When invitations are distributed on this side of the water, thousands are expended on costly meats and wines, profusion of plate is ostentatiously paraded, apartments are transformed into leafy thickets, and lights innumerable are reflected from diamonds and pearls. Guests get a nod or bow from their negligent though anxious entertainers ; they are stewed in the high-born mob at a temperature of 85° ; they are crushed to a pan-cake in the progress to the supper room ; ices hiss on their parched tongues ; the bare necks and shoulders of ladies meet deadly chilling draughts as they rush forth in desperation ; and galloping consumptions shortly overtake them in the race of dissipation. They can only get comfort by railing at their entertainers ; and this is the recompense to these hapless heads of families, for heavy expense, for worry and anxiety, and for the temporary upsetting of all domestic comfort.

We may naturally look for a greater demand on the mental resources of a Parisian lady hostess from her select evening society, in the absence of such agremens as wait on the social reunion just described. Herself and her guests feel it a matter combining duty with pleasure to bring out all their stores of wit, fancy, and anecdote to entertain each other, and make the evening pass pleasantly ; and from this good intention and the natural sprightliness of their character, an electrical current of animation and satisfaction is diffused through the party. It is not unnatural to suppose that if the English and French matrons took pen in hand next morning, there might be seen in the comparison of their productions, an instance of the balance of gifts bestowed on the human kind. The one exhausted by the evening's efforts and excitement, producing only a cold lifeless sketch of what she has so much enjoyed ; the other having been a mere stewardess, and noter of what was going on, producing from her stores of comparison and observation, a living image of what is so vividly present to her own perception.

Thus, comparatively few actors have produced good works of fiction or acting plays, however intimately they may have felt and represented the various moving passions ; or few great statesmen have written standard histories ; or great generals have left us enduring pictures of their campaigns. It is one thing to be interested in an animated, witty, or humorous conversation, and bear your part therein to the delight and admiration of the company, and another to present afterwards a lively counterpart of what took place ; so materially do the relations of the parties to each other, the temporary circumstances of place and time, and the characters and talents of the individuals present, contribute to the effect produced. In like manner, the grand or striking result of some chemical experiment depends on the presence, the proportion, the mode of combination, and the peculiar properties of many differing ingredients. Hence the great disproportion in number between those continental ladies who have been, or now are, perfect presiding goddesses of salons, and of those who may be cited among the standard writers of their age. The disproportion is also evident on our side the channels, but in an inverse ratio.

The lady cited at the head of our article, a close observer, and a most vivid delineator of the follies, fashions and manners of her day, a paragon of beauty and accomplishments, a perfect mistress in presiding over, and delighting a select reunion of talent, wit, and agreeability, and the author of successful dramas and novels, is no more. George Sand, like her German sister, the Countess Hahn Hahn, has resigned her perilous trade, and devoted the remains of her life to the service of her Creator ;* and of the really inspired women of genius living, we can quote few besides Mme. Charles Reybaud, Mme. Léonie D'Aunet, and Mlle. or Madame Marie Aycard, if the writer who bears the name is indeed of the gentler sex. Now omitting the female writers who have been called away in our own days, Miss Edgworth, Miss Ferrier, Mrs. Opie, Mrs. Inchbald, Miss Baillie, Miss Austen, Lady Blessington, Miss Brontë and sisters, L. E. L., the Misses Lee, the Misses Porter, Miss Mitford, Miss Pickering, and others for whom space should be found, there are still living and delighting our generation with their writings, Mrs. Burbury, Mme. Blaze de Bury, Miss Bunbury, Mrs. Crowe, Lady Dacre, Mrs. Ellis, Lady Fullarton, Mrs. Gore, Mrs. Gascoigne, Mrs. Grey, Mrs. Gaskill, Mrs. Hall, Mrs. Howitt, Miss Jewsbury, Miss Kavanagh, Lady Morgan, Mrs. Marsh, Miss Mulock, Mrs. Norton, Mrs. Oliphant, Lady Emily Ponsonby, Miss Pardoe, Lady Scott, Miss Sewell, Mrs. Smedley, Mrs. Stewart of Cork, Mrs. E. M. Stewart, the

* Such a report has prevailed here for some time at all events.

Baroness Tautphoeus, Mrs. Trollope, Miss Wallace, Miss Yonge, the authoresses of Mount St. Laurence, The Flirt, Whitefriars, The School for Fathers, Kathie Brand, The Wreckers, Lady Granard's Nieces, The Henpecked Husband, The Lady of Glynne, The Old Chelsea Bun House, Tender and True, and many others whose bead roll would be too long for the reader's patience.

As a large proportion of French works of fiction make their first appearance in the Feuilleton form, of the generally evil character of which no reader of the Irish Quarterly Review need be reminded, it may well be supposed that a French Miss Mulock, a French Mrs. Hall, or a French Miss Edgeworth, would feel loth to commit the pure offspring of their minds to the companionship of such vile associates as the Arthurs and the Antonys of Sue, Dumas, and Co. Even if they were inclined to run the risk, it is not likely that they would be welcomed by a public accustomed to the ranting, the indecency, and the convenient moral philosophy of the reckless or diverting vagabonds, to whom they have become habituated.

In the comparative scarcity of harmless works for the Gallic novel-reading public, it is pleasant to know that there is a variety of cheap, entertaining and useful books got out for the behoof of youthful readers in Paris, Tours, Cambrai, and other provincial cities, under the patronage of the Archbishops.

In our last two articles on French literature, Mirecourt's determined enmity to Emile de Girardin was slightly handled, and mention made of Mme. Girardin, and the esteem in which she was held by our critic. Since his biography was published, Parisian society and Parisian literature have been deprived of one of their fairest ornaments by death. Her biographer and admirer thus enters on his pleasing task.

"Do you recollect the wondrous tales of our infancy, where the fairies seated round a cradle, endowed the newly born princess with the rarest qualities of head and heart, and gave her in addition, fortune, worth, grace, and beauty?"

"Madame de Girardin had for godmothers every one of these beneficent fairies; she was born on the——"

"Ah, too curious reader! now we have you with mouth open, and ears cocked. Do you know what you resemble in thus ferreting out every one's age? you are the exact image of a Lord Mayor's valet or a president of the chamber. I am quite tired of your inquisitiveness.

"You are the sole cause of all the annoyances that beset us. Mlle. Dejazet will never forgive us, for blabbing her birth-day; Mme. George Sand has found our conduct so inexcusable that she has added a year to her age to convict us of falsehood. Paul de Kock belches out fire and flames. He swears he is only thirty years old, and will furnish the proofs. Théophile Gautier enters his protest, and declares that he wrote Mademoiselle de Maupin, on his nurse's knees.

"Once for all we renounce the registry, and refuse to listen to its treacherous revelations. The age of a woman is written on her countenance, in her eyes, in her smile; and the smile, the eyes, and the countenance of Mme. de Girardin are just twenty-five years old.

"Before uniting her destiny to that of the too celebrated journalist whose biography has caused us such woes, our heroine was known by fame to the whole kingdom of France. The pure and delicious poems of Mlle. Delphine Gay fell from Parnassus in streams of sweetest honey. Daughter of a poetess, she was hushed to sleep with rhythm, and learned, while yet an infant, to make the lyre-chords vibrate in unison."

Delphine Gay, daughter of Sophie Gay, was born at Aix la Chapelle, and baptized (it is said) on the very tomb of Charlemagne. Her mother, who was a wit, a poetess, and a novelist into the bargain, and moreover, wife of the receiver-general of the district, indulged in some witticisms at the expense of the prefect one evening; the good things were repeated to the subject of them next morning; and it being a clear day, the telegraph brought the dismissal of her husband in the course of two hours. Women of talent are sometimes dear of purchase; the bon mots of Mme. Sophie Gay cost her family five thousand pounds yearly income.

The family all came to Paris, and their house was the centre of a galaxy of wits, actors, poets, and painters.

"They chatted, they laughed, they danced, they played; for the mother of our tenth muse was a Cordon Bleu in the science of colored pasteboard.

"Now and then when the cards were unpropitious, she dealt them in such haste to her friends, that they occasionally got a slap on the face from the Queen of Spades, or the King of Diamonds.

"The game being over they recited verses; and here our heroine obtained her first triumphs. She was applauded by all the celebrities of the day. Her early developed talents and unaffected grace rendered her the idol of her mother's circle. At fourteen years of age she was of the most radiant beauty. Her large mild eyes full of charm, her fair hair magnificent in its profusion, her large alabaster forehead, her little mouth, precious casket with its rows of pearls, her skin of milky whiteness, all combined to render her a prodigy of fascination."

In 1822 she sent her first essays in verse to the academy; and a pension of five hundred crowns was settled on her by Charles X. She went under her mother's guardianship into Italy, was conducted in triumph to the capitol like another

Corinne, and recited verses to an admiring and enthusiastic crowd. She refused a very advantageous match in order to be at liberty to return to Paris ; and was rewarded in part, by the applause and greeting of all that the city could muster of talent and high birth on the occasion of her recitation of some verses in the Panthéon, then just after being enriched by the frescoes of Baron Gros. "She might fancy herself for the moment queen of France."

"This epoch of her life was one long scene of delight, a poetic feast for each day and every hour of the day.

"At the commencement of 1830, the conquering charms of Delphine had harnessed to her chariot, more suitors than had beset poor Penelope in the days of old. This flight of turtle doves afflicted with its presence every saloon where the tenth muse made her appearance ; and when Summer came, the more adventurous took flight to the leafy shades of Villiers-sur-Orge, where Mme. Gay possessed a little country house. Almost all the poetical pieces of Delphine before her marriage, are dated from this retreat. She always loved the solitude and quiet of the country."

She became the wife of M. de Girardin in 1831 ; and according to this gentleman's implacable foe, Eugène de Mirecourt, her talent, which erewhile was signed with a stamp of naïve sensibility and seraphic candor, seemed at once to lose its distinctive characteristic, as if the dark influence of the journalist had fallen like a mantle over the muse, and the spotless dove had contracted some of the qualities of the vulture. About 1834 or 1835 she wrote Le Lorgnon and La Canne de M. Balzac. Her husband found fault with this mode of employing her time ; but the praise and the Louis-d'ors won by her labors, overpowered her conjugal fears ; and in a spirit of contradiction she published Le Marquis de Pontanges and Marguerite. Her present biographer insinuates that Emile, by virtue of his privileges as head of the family, insisted on the honest publisher paying into his (Emile's) own hand the price of these works, wishing thus to disgust her with her occupation, for she had not the pleasure of purchasing even a pincushion with the produce of her labours. The moral he draws from this circumstance is, that a man may be a successful speculator, cover the dead walls of Paris with advertisements in letters a yard long, turn every thing to profit, and still have a very middling knowledge of human nature.

"If it sometimes happens to Mde. de Girardin to shew herself slightly paradoxical, she makes up for the defect by a profound and intuitive study of the character of her sex. How admirably she traces the likenesses of those coquettish, elegant, delicate, ethereal creatures, full of heart, of devotedness, of caresses, of affection! It would seem as if she looked into the depths of her own nature, to find woman in her most adorable expression, in her most perfect image.

"On the day when her husband was brought home wounded from Vincennes,* Mme. de Girardin, who had no previous suspicion of the rencontre, showed herself a brave woman. She forgot to faint, gave the necessary orders, had a surgeon at once on the spot, got straw laid down in the street, and never quitted the bed-side of her husband till the wound showed favourable symptoms."

Mons. de Girardin looked with a very unfriendly eye on the feuilleton commenced by his lady in his own paper Le Presse in 1836. Mirecourt attributes this to the over-weening value which he set on his own political lucubrations and his dislike of rivalry. He spoke out to her on the subject pretty plainly. She flung away her pen in consequence, but it was picked up by Dujarrier, his colleague, as often as it was thrown down, and put back between the fingers of the charming writer; and the Lettres Parisiennes of Vicomte Launay, continued to interest and delight the public from 1836 to 1848.

Mme. de Girardin began to write for the theatre in 1839. Her first piece L'Ecole des Journalistes was not allowed to be represented under the liberal rule of Louis Philippe. Judith, a tragedy in verse from the old Testament, was performed April 24, 1843; Cléopâtre in 1847. Her other pieces are c'est la faute du Mari, Lady Tartuffe, La Joie fait Peur, Le chapeau de l'Horloger and Une Femme qui deteste son Mari.

"At the Gymnase, le Chapeau de l'Horloger, a delicious burst of merriment in one act, proves that she possesses the gift of exciting laughter, as well as of drawing tears. Exquisite sensibility, comic power, wonderful delicacy of touch, perfect taste, these are the qualities sure to succeed at the theatre, and these Mme. Girardin possesses in perfection.

"One day her husband entered the room where she was sitting, holding by the hand a little boy just learning to walk. She looked at the infant, looked at Girardin, and comprehended the whole thing in a moment. 'I thank you for this mark of confidence,' said she; 'I will be a second mother to your son.'

"This promise she has religiously kept. Delphine herself directs the studies of this child of her adoption. He has never been from under her guardianship. She provides for him at home the necessary tutors. He is now fourteen years old, and as he has a taste for the riding school, she has purchased a horse for him from the proceeds of the 'Clockmaker's Hat.'

"Their country house is at Chaillot, It is open every evening to her friends, and every evening it is filled with Parisian celebrities.

"She writes to a protracted hour in the night, and rises late. She is not fond of excursions. She keeps possession of her salon during the cold season, and in summer takes refuge in an Algerion tent, set up in the middle of the garden. There she composes her beautiful verses, there she receives her court, like an Eastern Queen, whose voice is listened to with religious respect, whose every desire is an order, and before whom the incense of loving homage is continually burning. * * She never appears sensible of her superiority to those around her ; and it would seem as if she had never made greater efforts to acquire her poetical or inventive powers, her wit, or her style, than she had to acquire her beauty.

"Like her mother, she occasionally gives way to some sharp jest ; but when she perceives the chagrin she has caused, there is in her excuses such an affectionate charm, and she is so anxious to pour balm into the wounds, that the victims are even grateful for the attack. * * * She neglects no one, she takes pains to be agreeable to all ; to children, to old men, even to women.

"She is determined that she shall be loved. She desires to be considered charming, and nothing is more easy than to obey her on this point, for she is certainly one of the most spirituelle and loveable women of her time.

"In fact we can discover in her only one small fault, and that is—her husband."

Théophile Gautier, in his biographical preface to the work under review, gives the dates of the birth, marriage, and death of Mme. de Girardin, thus achieving the adventure which so dismayed Mirecourt, according to his own confession.

Delphine Gay was born 6th Pluviose, An. xii (26th January 1804), was married 1st June, 1801, and died 29th June, 1855.

Gautier is still more enthusiastic in his praises of Mme. Girardin than Mirecourt. He was one of her circle of literary intimates, and his sketches a series of efforts, each to surpass the one before it in finding out stronger terms of praise and reverence for the memory of his lost patroness. According to him, she was seldom severe in language or roused to resentment, except when obliged to defend one of the literary pillars of her little court. We subjoin a characteristic trait.

"Despite her manly spirit, Mme. de Girardin was woman all over. She would have mounted the scaffold without paleness on her cheek, but she was afraid of the motion of a coach, and had not courage enough to cross the Boulevard on foot. We have seen her harangue with perfect coolness, and admirable eloquence, the rioters who came to shout under her windows in 1849; yet she had like to swoon at the sight of a bat, which had entered by the open window, and was shuffling along the ceiling."

It may well be supposed that the newspaper quarrels of her husband, into which she was unwillingly drawn, had an evil influence on her health and spirits. They could not have been otherwise than irksome and injurious to one who seemed only adapted to live in the regions of poetry and the imagination. So the beautiful and gifted poetess quitted this too prosaic world, and Mons. Girardin seems to us to have made haste enough in filling her place with a rich Englishwoman.

The Chevalier de Launay saw his first feuilleton in print, 28th September, 1836: it begins characteristically:

"There has been nothing very extraordinary this week; merely a revolution in Portugal, the apparition of a republic in Spain, a nomination of ministers in Paris, a fall in the funds, a new ballet at the opera, and two capotes in white satin at the Tuilleries.

"The Portuguese affair had been foreseen, the spectral republic had been long settled, the ministry had been selected, the fall in the funds was a job, the new ballet had been announced any time for three weeks. So after all, the only novelty was the capotes in white satin; and even they would be no novelty only for being premature. And really the weather did not deserve the affront. Make a fire in a cold September if you please, that is but reasonable; but to wear satin before winter sets in is a crime against nature.

"They pretend that Paris is tiresome; we consider it most agreeable at this moment. You see no one of your acquaintance; the city is occupied by strangers. You feel at your ease, as on a journey. You see so many people admiring everything that you begin to admire them yourself. You have a population of gaping loungers whom it is a pleasure to behold; loungers from beyond the sea, from beyond the mountains, from beyond the Rhine: very probably there are in the crowd some even of Chateaubriand's loungers from beyond the tomb.

"Paris is renewed for a time; the worn-out are gone; the ennuyés have deserted; the air seems fresher, space freer. An ennuyé takes up so much room; his presence renders the atmosphere so heavy; he absorbs so much vital air when he sighs and when he yawns. Now the ennuyé is absent; he goes to the chace with the ennuyeur, who bores him with the recital of his hunting exploits; and both console themselves with abuse of Paris, which their absence has rendered endurable; and both remain in the country, thank goodness! the ennuyé and the ennuyeur."

“ The theatres have grown young, the public have grown young. It is not the hostile public, the tyrannous public to those he pays to amuse him, the public so easily vexed and so difficult to rouse ; it is not the old bellwether of the pit, who dares not smile for fear of having his absent teeth remarked, nor the aged coquette of the upper boxes, who dares not weep for fear of furrowing her rouge. It is a public, frank, joyous, and ready to be amused, critic and companion at once, who frankly helps you in your efforts to make it laugh, or cry ; a good sort of public, which is little fastidious provided it be amused ; in fact a public which believes in the existence of enjoyment. ”

“ Among our visitors are many Englishwomen, with their bonnets garnished with three rows of tulle, tulle faded and limp, tulle that has travelled and remembered its mischances, that still retains some of the Thames fog, that has been begrimed by the coal fires of London ; ungraceful ornament that forms a grizzled and dismal border to the face. These are Englishwomen of the third order, whom a cheap steamboat has flung on the continent in shoals. It is not yet the season for the Englishwomen with rosy cheeks and flowing ringlets, who come to teach our elegant women to be fresh looking and handsome ; and to change the Rue de la Paix into an avenue of Hyde Park. O beautiful daughters of the north ! in one small month you will be here, will you not ? to replace your unworthy forerunners and efface their images from our memories.

“ The English admire the statues in the Tuilleries ; but like ourselves they wonder at the little care taken of them. They say that the king who lays out so much on mutilating the orangery, might spare half of it to clean up his heathen gods. Phæusa (sister of Phaeton) is already so black that you cannot tell whether she has been changed into a negress or a poplar tree. Venus may have washed her feet within these thirty or forty years, but we have no certainty of the fact. As to Themistocles the Conqueror at Salamis, and Scipio Africanus, we will report them to the colonel of the National Guard ; their buff coats and belts are in the worst possible state. As to other matters, there are always white swans and gold fish in the basins ; children and childrens' hoops in the walks, the clock of the chateau is always up to time, and the flag is still the tri-color. All this is mere detail, but we wish to be truthful in matters of moment.

(19 Oct., 1836).—* * * A Parisian audience is the most despotic of tyrants in exacting flattery ; and the most favored painter will always be the man that draws the worst likeness of it. A French audience detests the true. What gives it delight are monstrosities of every description, monstrosities of virtue, monstrosities of crime. It will not do to depict human beings as they are, versatile and inconsequent. No, no : we must have beings perfect in goodness, or diabolically bad ; a notary who holds out as an angel during five acts, a duke who is the devil himself during the same space. And when, in the fifth act, the notary resumes the good work he has been doing during the four previous ones, the whole pit is agog with admiration. ‘ That’s he all over,’ it exclaims—‘ he is the same man still—he has done that just now—he said so a little while since—his goodness is all of a piece. Virtuous notary! I recognise you there: perfect notary! you are the man for my money: bravo!” With the pit, dramatic truth is a false assumption enunciated in the first act, and supported to the end of the fifth.

“So it is with the Marie of Mme. Ancelot. Not that her character is a falsehood. We have known more than one woman whose life has been a long and pure sacrifice; but then this is still not an absolute verity. It is an exceptional verity, an immoral verity, seeing that it is deceptive; a fatal verity, as it disgusts you with the commonplace one; a sterile verity, as it delivers the soul to powerless reveries, to useless researches; a culpable verity, as it renders us unjust to the quasi virtuous people, among whom we live, and whom we despise when put in comparison with the perfect beings whom it paints; a verity servile, and flattering, and therefore the only verity admissible at the theatre, and the sole verity which the public will acknowledge.

“Oh, poor old public! you must either have your Neros or your Agrippinas, not fearing comparison with these monsters; or your heroic notaries and magnanimous spouses, as you can appropriate their virtues to your own proper account.

“We have attacked the convenient TRUTH of the theatres; a word or two now on the truthfulness of the journals. Some days since, one of the most outspoken of our journalists, as witty as unsparing, met M. Vatout at the house of a young deputy, a friend of his. He did not know him personally though he had made him for a long time the butt of his sarcasms. The conversation was interesting, the questions important; and owing to a community of ideas, each felt impelled to give a frank utterance to his sentiments, so frank as to surprise himself. It was an interchange of thoughts and feelings in which men judge each other, not only by what they say, but even by what they do not care to speak on. After some time M. Vatout quitted the party. The door had hardly closed, when our editor exclaimed; ‘there is a man after my own heart; our very thoughts are identical; he is really a man of sound understanding, what’s his name?’ ‘That is Mons. Vatout.’ ‘M. Vatout on whom I have cracked so many jests !' And then bursting out a-laughing, he naively remarked, 'well, well ; I could not have thought of it : he is not a bit like the portrait I have been so long making of him.' "

From the extract which follows Jules Janin was evidently good for something more than criticizing plays, he had not seen performed, and selling bushels of chaff with only a few grains of sense in each. Our authoress quotes him thus in her Feuilleton of Nov. 30th, 1836.

"M. Janin reproaches M. de Balzac for originating, 1st, the Comedy of Madame Ancelot, 2nd, the Drama of M. Ancelot, 3rd, the loves of all women of a certain age. This is hard enough. According to him, we owe to M. de Balzac the discovery of la femme de quarante ans. He calls him the Christopher Columbus of that too sensitive lady. 'The woman from thirty to forty years,' he says, 'was formerly an undiscovered land with regard to passion, that is, as far as the romance and the drama were concerned. But in our days, thanks to these fortunate discoveries, the woman of forty reigns supreme queen in romance and drama. This time the New World has suppressed the Ancient ; two score has triumphed over sixteen. 'Who knocks ?' growls out the Drama in his rough tones : 'Who is there ?' asks the Romance with squeaking voice. 'It is I,' answers trembling 'sixteen' with pearly teeth, snowy bosom, graceful form, innocent smile, and sweet countenance. 'It is I. I am of the same age with the Junia of Racine, the Desdemona of Shakespeare, the Agnes of Molière, the Zara of Voltaire, the Virginia of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre. I enjoy the enchanted and fleeting age of all the young virgins of Ariosto, of Lesage, of Lord Byron, and of Walter Scott. I am hopeful and innocent youth ; I cast into the future a glance as pure and beautiful as the heaven itself. I possess the age of Cymodoce and of Atala, the age of Eucharis and Climena, the age of chaste attachments, of noble instincts, the age of modesty and of innocence : let me in Monsieur.' Thus speaks sweet sixteen to the romance writers and dramaturgists ; And those romancers and dramaturgists answer : 'We are now occupied with your mamma, my child : look in on us in about twenty years, and we'll see what we can do for you.'

"But what can M. Balzac do ? Is it his fault, if thirty happens to be the age of love in the present day ? M. Balzac is obliged to paint the passion where he finds it, and for a certainty you will discover no girl of sixteen a victim to her sensibility in these latter times. Formerly a young girl eloped with a mousquetaire, or she escaped over the walls of a convent with the aid of a rope ladder ; and so the romances of the day were filled with mousquetaires, convents, rope ladders, and elopements. Julia loved Saint-Preux at eighteen ; at twenty-two she espoused M. Volmar in obedience to orders. It was the spirit of the age. At sixteen the heart began to speak ; but now it takes a much longer time to soften. If Julia were now alive, she would espouse M. Volmar at eighteen through ambition, and at twenty-five, awaking from her illusion, she would elope with Saint-

Preux. Talk of the old writers! they painted their epoch; let M. Balzac paint ours. ‘Racine’s Junia’ you say! In 1835 she would marry Nero without scruple to become empress; Virginia would desert Paul to wed M. Lasourdonnaie; Atala herself would prefer the Pere Aubry to the handsome Chactas, only the good old father had made a vow of poverty. The women who now-a-days set the world talking of them, commence by an advantageous match; they must be countesses, marchionesses, and duchesses. It is only after finding out the vanities of vanity that they decide on love. Even some return to the past, and at twenty-eight or thirty, devote themselves to the youth whom they had rejected at seventeen. M. Balzac is then quite right in painting the passion where he finds it, though it be born out of time: M. Janin is equally right in saying that all this is very tiresome. But if it is wearying to romance readers, how dismal is it for young men who dream of love, and find themselves reduced to exclaim, ‘oh how I love her! how beautiful she must have been!’

The following may seem too highly charged; but as we paint the French character in tints where the frivolous is too prevalent, they on the other side may give us a more earnest and decided character than we strictly deserve.

(Dec. 15, 1836)—“In general the most trifling actions of an English woman are the result of a fixed determination. They know nothing of the impulses, the nonchalance, or the vivacity of a French woman. They never do one thing rather than another through indifference; everything is the result of a decision, even their manner of walking, conversing, loving, or praying. They do not desire a thing, they will it. They don’t walk; they march, because they have fixed on marching; they go straight—to nothing; they set out to proceed, no where in particular. No matter: they have decided; they will arrive at some place or other, and their very mode of walking seems to say, I will certainly go no place else. They possess interior laws which rule their conduct; they have an interior judge which promptly decides everything without appeal. With them everything is pre-determined; everything is the natural consequence of a previous arrangement, an effort, a preparation as it were for a journey; they embark for every object. This is perhaps the consequence of their occupying an isle out of which they cannot stray by chance or inattention; which they cannot quit without a certain degree of resolution. This resolute spirit, which is so devoid of grace when applied to the light and indifferent concerns of life, is of great efficacy when directed to matters of importance.

These observations are made apropos to a certain managing Mme. de Flahault, with whom we were made acquainted for the first time.

(Jan. 6, 1838)—“Among the number of fetes, we must not forget a very fine and original one given some days since to all the female models of Paris in the atelier of one of our most celebrated painters. The women invited were all beautiful, but their general style of dress was not such as might naturally be looked for. All (with very few exceptions) wore gowns fitting close to the neck, and very long in the sleeve. Did this arise from calculation or modesty? or were they unwilling to give a gratuitous sitting, and fare off like the benevolent giant who amused us so much a few years ago? We went one day to visit a cabinet of curiosities. The Savant who owned it, lived on the first floor, right hand, but we mistook and rang the bell on the left. A man of formidable size opened the door. 'Are these, Mr. So-and-so's rooms?' we enquired. 'He lives opposite,' said he; 'this is the exhibition room of the 'Giant of the North.' 'Beg your pardon, sir,' said a wag of our party; 'are you not the Giant of the North yourself?' 'Yes, Monsieur, I am the person; and if you please to enter, you may see for two francs'—'I will see the giant, whom I have the pleasure of seeing here for nothing. I am much obliged, sir; but listen to the counsel of a friend. If you wish that curious people should pay two francs for a sight, it is scarcely prudent on your part to open the door in person.' 'You are quite right, sir, I am sure,' said the giant: 'it certainly might do me an injury. I never thought of it before.'"

After a paper in which praise was unsparingly administered to several individuals, Delphine utters her peculiar theory on the subject of praise and blame: it may be easily seen that the paradox had great attraction for her.

"Here is a feuilleton which will make many enemies for us; much more than the last, which was somewhat satirical. An epigram annoys no one but the person at whom it is launched. It diverts his friends who know better than any one, his defects and whims, and it gives joy to all his enemies. An eulogium on the contrary, has fewer chances; it sometimes offends the eulogised party, it displeases his envious friends, and irritates his enemies. Praise well merited and administered is never forgiven. We have never forgotten the saying of an old courtier—'I am now seventy-eight; and have arrived at that advanced age without ever having made a single enemy.' 'You have never been successful then.' 'On the contrary I have been very successful.' 'Probably no one has loved you?' 'I have been sincerely loved.' 'Well then what is your receipt?' 'I have never pronounced an eulogium on any one.'"

Mme. de Girardin has forgotten to take into account the active measures occasionally taken by the subject of the epigram for the injury of his assailant, and what small benefit he receives from the enjoyers of the ill-natured joke.

In sparing some space for the following passage on Wilhem's mode of teaching music, we beg to confess that we would rather listen to the cawing of rooks, the rumbling of carts along the streets, or the voluntaries performed by cats on the roofs of back houses on summer nights, than be obliged to lend ear to the established pieces which used before now to be ground out by the orchestra, T. R. D., when there happened to be a "delay of the House," and when, instead of killing time as directed, the wearied performers mistook the victim, and flayed the ears of the audience instead.

March 3, 1839,)—"Strange country! this of ours, where the evil principle is all-powerful, and the good languishes unvalued; where venomous plants come to perfection in a day, and where salutary ones take years before they flower; where the lie is provided with wings, and the truth crawls on in silence; where calumny blows its breath through twenty trumpets, and deserved praise finds no echo. * * Strange country! where if an absurd melo-drama is represented at the Gaité, the Ambigu-Comique, or the Porte Saint Martin, twenty feuilletons vie in giving a critical account of its performance; but let an instructive work, the fruit of long studies, be issued by a publisher, who is not at the same time a charlatan, and not a journal will speak of it. Let a too confiding Englishman have his pocket picked of his handkerchief or his watch, coming out of the theatre; all the journals in Paris will resound with the signal event next day, and the remarkable fact will be repeated in all the provincial gazettes. But let a useful institution be founded, and a really interesting meeting be held, all will preserve the most perfect silence. Ourselves, ever on the look out for the developement of noble designs, have had little idea of one of the most admirable institutions of our epoch. * * We speak of the popular concerts given by Wilhem at the Sorbonne. We wonder much that our great composers have not availed themselves of these new treasures of harmony—A chorus of four hundred artificers and labourers of all ages from six to fifty. Endeavour to comprehend the effect of these combined voices, infantine, adolescent, brilliant, and young, of voices strong and grave, rival voices, which, by a miracle of combination, form one only voice. Four hundred persons in fine who sung in unison, and with a precision, an intelligence, and a musical taste which you will not find in the chorus of any theatre. We have heard more than once the beautiful prayer in the Muette de Portici at the opera, where no doubt it is very well executed; but it is nothing in comparison with a similar prayer, chaunted by our four hundred working people. We have heard in Germany the much be-praised choruses, and at Rome, the Miserere of the Sistine Chapel; and we declare that the vivid and profound impression made on us by these solemnities has been surpassed by the powerful emotion excited at the last concert of the Sorbonne by the chaunt of these poor working people. These new accords, these harmonious prayers, wafted us far away from this prosaic world; we seemed to hear celestial symphonies, the fraternal choirs of angels and cherubim. But the angels after all were only cabinet makers, journeymen printers, and working jewellers; and among the cherubim we discovered an odd Negro with puffed-out cheeks, beating the measure with his ebony fingers. The seraphic vision vanished, but admiration of real philanthropy remained with us entire; and frivolous observer though we be, we made the following reflections. While the 'Vir-tuous friends of the people preach revolt, sloth, and pride, in the name of liberty, the 'infamous oppressors of the people' render it a moral people by religion and the arts, and confer on it the only real independence of the honest man, that which he acquires by labor. While the 'friends of the people' summon it to the public assemblies, or seduce it into taverns to entertain it about its sovereignty, its 'infamous oppressors' open for it, churches, hospitals, workshops, and schools, to teach it the greatness and goodness of God, and the wonders of civilization. Its friends teach it to vote and to govern, its oppressors first of all, teach it to read and write. Ah, may this double system of instruction soon teach it to hold at their real value the ambitious tenderness of its pretended friends, the paternal authority of its pretended oppressors."^{*}

The following simple account of a robbery may not seem worth relating; but as it is rather out of the regular line of the doings of housebreakers, it may present something novel to the admirers of Oliver Twist, Jack Sheppard, and Robert Macaire in England.†

(Dec. 29. 1836) * * * "This young gentleman left home at half-past four to pay a visit or two. Simple was his dress; it was Sunday, and your man of fashion dreads above all, to appear on that day as if he had got on his Sunday clothes. Besides, our young fashionable was to dine with a relative, and no one beautifies himself when he expects to meet only his cousins. Before presenting himself at his aunt's, Rue-du-Fauborg St. Honoré, he looked in on the Duchess* and there learned to his great dismay, that the dinner was to be superb, nearly diplomatic, followed by a grand concert. The aunt had neglected to apprise her nephew. 'Oh my hard fortune!' cried the Elegant, looking at his boots. He shortened his visit, and betook himself back in all haste. But he is on foot; his horses have been in the morning in the Bois de Boulogne, and his coachman and valet have got leave to spend the evening abroad. Oh horror! the valet has the key, and every thing is locked up. He hurries, he arrives at home, he breathes again. All the doors are open, but the presses are open also: they are as empty as they can be. He looks round, he rushes into the salon, he sees on the table a parcel badly tied, and recognises his favorite waistcoat, the very one he was going to put on. He hastily enters his bed chamber. Oh, death and fury! a robber is forcing his desk. 'Infamous thief,' cries he, and flings himself on the villain, seizes him by the throat, and is on the point of strangling him. But the thief immediately—guess—'seizes a poignard, and plunges it into the heart of his adversary!' 'No.' 'He flings him on the floor and takes to flight!" "No." "Well what does he at all?" He faints away in the arms of his victim, who finds himself obliged to bestow the most tender cares on him. The same victim carries the malefactor to a sofa, and searches for his smelling bottle to bring him to himself again. But the victim cannot find his smelling bottle, beautiful little utensil, as beautiful as crystal and refined gold can render it. Happily it came into his head to look for it in the pocket of his despoiler, and there indeed it was. The victim aids the malefactor to recover his senses; but scarcely has the ruffian opened his eyes than he beholds his crime in all its horror. He falls into the most frightful despair. His victim comforts and consoles him. "Ah Monsieur," says he, sobbing, "it is the first thing of the kind I have attempted. What a frightful thing is theft! Catch me at it again." He was a young locksmith whom vicious company had nearly corrupted. So our gentleman could not think of giving him up to justice. But the swoon had held an hour, and it was too late to dress for dinner. So he came and joined us at the Café de Paris, and related this adventure, in which, as in most romances of the day, the chief interest is centered in the rascal."

Our fair writer had a sneaking kindness for les Anglais et les Anglaises, but that never prevented her from Joe-Millering them at times. In the feuilleton of 5th January, 1837, which she devoted to new year's gifts and anecdotes, she tells a sad story of a brave young Scotch girl, Suzanna by name, who was insensible to frights or terrors. So on the eve of her intended marriage, her foolish bridesmaids determined they would try her nerves. They borrowed a skeleton from a medical student, and laid it, carefully enveloped in a night-shirt, in poor Suzanna's bed, wishing her, "Good night, Suzanna: good night, my dear; good night." It is not to the taste of our nerves to tell a horrible story in detail, but they find the poor bride a maniac next morning. May the mere mention of this, which is probably a real fact, extinguish a taste for practical jokes in some stray reader or another.

"The English excel in the art of simplifying things. While we lose our time and words saying to every one 'Bonjour: Je vous Souhaite une bonne année, an English friend of ours made a wonder of brevity and neatness out of the formula. He went about saying to every one he met, 'Bon jour de l'an,' an abbreviation as happy as Dick and Bill for Richard and William.

This Englishman recalls to our minds another of his countrymen not less ingenious. He attended a representation of le Comte Ory, and by a happy chance previously unknown in the fasti of his country, he succeeded in retaining the supper air, 'C'est Charmant, C'est divin.' Yes: he caught it in his Britannic ears, and retained it, and, into the bargain, hummed it very agreeably between his Britannic teeth. Delighted with his musical acquisition, he was a little mistrustful of his memory, and prudently made a knot on his handkerchief. 'Why this knot?' enquired a friend. 'Tis for fear I should forget this charming little air, which I have acquired with so much trouble' We are thoroughly confident of this man's being a good husband and a good father."

Mme. de Girardin, as may be supposed, did not dance, galop, we should have said, at Musard's wild assemblies; so she invested her double-ganger in male attire, bade him answer to the name of De Launy, and sent him to inspect the doings of that hall of frenzy.

(Jan. 11, 1857,.)—"As to the quarter of central Paris, it neither vales nor dances, it neither leaps nor falls: it turns, it rolls, it tumbles, it rushes, it throws itself forward, it plunges headlong, it twirls round, it charges like a serried file of soldiers, it envelopes you as a whirlwind, it drags you down with it like an avalanche, it sweeps you away like the simoon. Hell is unchained, the devils are out on leave, it is Charenton (the French bedlam) enjoying a holiday, it is the Wandering Jew driven on his everlasting tour, it is Mazeppa launched on his wild horse, it is Leonora carried off by her church-yard lover through forests, rocks, and deserts, and not stopping till she comes to the door of death. It is a phantasm, it is a fever-fit, it is the nightmare, it is the sabat; finally it is the terrible pleasure which is called the galop of Musard. The masked balls of the Rue Saint Honoré are conducted as on last year. Our mourning has prevented us from seeing them, but we may repeat what is told us. The quadrille of the Huguenots has a wonderful effect; nothing can be more fantastic. The lights of the hall become dim, and a ruddy glow succeeds, to give the idea of a conflagration: and then what a strange spectacle is presented by these joyous faces, these disguises of all colors and every degree of gaiety, seen by the baleful death-fires! All these uproarious phantoms, demons of joy and folly, separate in columns, rush forward in torrents; and the masses turn, roll, advance, press and push each other, knock against each other, recoil, return, pass, repass, still, still, still, and never cease; and the tocsin sounds, the drum beats, and the orchestra is relentless. It quickens the measure, gives no time for breathing, and the firing and slaying in the streets is perfectly imitated. They hear the cries, the laments, the laughter; it is civil war without mistake; it is an undoubted massacre; the illusion is complete. You see that we always strain after amusement in Paris. Some amuse themselves sadly, others pompously, others without affectation, every one after a fashion; but everyone is amused, except those who are tired of striving to amuse themselves."

Looking back on our youth we strive to recal once more the impulses, and taste for amusement peculiar to that period of life, and to fancy what would be our sensations looking on such a spectacle. But we cannot imagine any other effect it could have, than giving a lively idea of Hell. The performers listening to cries of agony, and pursuing the mad measure at the same time, remind us of one of the quaint apologues in The Difference between Temporal and Eternal. A man pursued by a fiery dragon through an Arabian desert, takes refuge in a tree; but as he is beginning to rejoice in his escape, he looks down, and beholds a black and white rat* gnawing at the roots, which are already half out away. He next beholds the pursuer taking his seat in the shadow of the tree, and practising the muscles of his jaws to open freely, when the victim is about to tumble. He is very much dismayed as may be supposed, and is calculating the length of time the rats will require to finish their awful task, when he chances to espy some drops of honey glistening on the leaves within his reach. He forgets rats, time, dragon, and all, and begins to taste and enjoy his short-lived pleasure with the greatest relish.

(Jan. 26, 1837,)—"Except the cholic recently imported from London there is no news worth relating: but as the absence of news is no excuse for a failure in conversation, when none come to hand, we invent. A false report in Paris can count on eight days of existence; not indeed a satisfactory or general one, for it is already dead in the quarter where it first saw life, while it is flourishing in the one appointed for its death. But it is never thoroughly extinguished till the eighth day, and there is no manner of risk in giving birth to a report that is sure of eight days of life. This year we are able to invent nothing but deaths, even the death of poor Musard whom they have killed, as a last resource to keep conversation at par. A proof of the immensity of our city is, the tremendous exertions you must make to persuade your acquaintance that you did not die at all. Some are so obstinate that they prefer your having come to life again after a fair and regular departure into the land of shadows.

"Oh! Paris is a great city for fertile imaginations. They are very badly off in the provinces in this respect; they are obliged to order their news from the city, along with their caps, ribbons, and fowling pieces. You may say Mr. 'Such a One' is dead; in five minutes he will be seen promenading in the market place, and all the salt is taken out of the joke. * * * You do not sing when you have no voice; why then need you talk when you have got nothing to say? Ah! it is because in France we must keep up conversation at any price. A causerie that languishes is a punishment, a disgrace to the lady of the house ; she must rouse it at any hazard ; in such a crisis everything is lawful. She will even betray her own secrets ; and if she has none, she will closely question you as to yours. She will invent falsehoods about the lady who was leaving the salon when you entered ; but then, only think of the imminent danger of the talk coming to an end ! I knew a lady who not content with her domestic success, felt it her duty to keep up at scandal heat, the conversation through the city. Her daughter, lately a bride, gave her but little assistance, for she was both truthful and modest. One day after a visit in which she had not opened her mouth, she was scolded by her mamma for her silence. ‘But mamma, I have nothing to say.’ ‘No matter ; invent something. Say that your voiture was locked by an omnibus ; or that you saw some one arrested in the street ; that two men were fighting, that a superb funeral had just passed, that your shawl was stolen, in fact anything you please ; but talk at all events, or I will not bring you out with me again.’ A bride of sixteen who is not in love with her husband, and is scolded by her mother, is easily made cry ; so she cried plentifully. The next visit they paid, the young lady was in trouble, for no one had passed out as they entered, and it was a fine sunshiny day. ‘How pale you are ! my dear Valentine,’ said the Baroness. ‘Are you ill ?’ Mamma cast a furious look on the unhappy young lady, as much as to say, ‘why don’t you speak, you helpless creature ?’ The poor child began to recall the late lesson, and stammered out, ‘no, madam ; but I was very much frightened just now : we were jammed in by an omnibus.’ The mother triumphed ; her daughter would do after a few lessons. ‘It fastened on us, just as we were crossing the Pont des Artes.’ ‘The Pont des Artes ?’ said the Baroness. ‘She means the Pont Louis XIV.,’ cried mamma ; and she detailed with supreme presence of mind all the circumstances of the incident.

“The Baroness was appeased, and the conversation continued. ‘You have a very fine shawl, my dear Valentine.’ She was silent, but at a terrible side glance of her teacher, she received inspiration. ‘Oh ! I lately had a much finer one, but they stole it from me.’ ‘Stole it !’ cried the Baroness : ‘that can’t be allowed ; we must recover it. The Prefect of police is my friend ; I will write to him on the instant.’ ‘Oh ! pray madam, do not take the trouble : it is of no consequence.’ ‘No consequence, a shawl of that value !’ ‘Oh, she means that her husband has already taken all the steps necessary ;’ the conversation took another turn, and Valentine fell into one of her reveries. ‘Truly,’ said the mother, ‘these clubs have unsettled society altogether : no witty or pleasant conversation now at all. The gentlemen spend their mornings, playing and smoking, and their evenings, drinking : I pity the young wives of the present day, their lives must be very unhappy.’ ‘Ah !’ said the Baroness, ‘I do not think Valentine is of your opinion : she, at all events has no complaints to make against the clubs.’ Valentine made no answer ; she had not heard a word. ‘Why do you not speak ?’ said her mother. ‘Perhaps she does not know what a club is.’ Feeling herself obliged to speak, she answered, ‘oh, yes, madam ; I have often heard of the jockey’s club.’

There is a report of a quarrel that took place there yesterday, that will probably have a disagreeable termination.' 'A quarrel arising from play?' asked the Baroness in great anxiety. 'Yes Madam.' 'Have they mentioned the names of the players?' 'M. de H—— I believe.' A furious look from the mamma, but misinterpreted by the poor novice. 'Oh! yes indeed, Madam; M. de H—— was one of the gentlemen.' 'Oh heavens!' cried the Baroness, 'is it so?' and rushing towards the fire-place to seize the bell cord, she fainted outright.

"Valentine understood nothing of this. She had named M. de H—— knowing him to be the hero of the club, not suspecting him to be the Baroness's hero also. She had not heard from him for two days, but attributed his absence to a lover's quarrel that had taken place. She was now in a pitiable state, and the visitors soon withdrew.

"'Truly,' said the mother to the culprit, 'you are a downright fool, to go name M. de H—— to the Baroness.' 'But, mamma, how could I have guessed?' 'Don't speak; people in the world should know everything, and to say that you did not care about the loss of the shawl.' 'She said she was going to write to the prefect.' 'You little stupid, it was only a piece of politeness. And then the Pont des Artes where voitures never pass; it is absurd.' 'You see, mamma,' said the poor child, 'that it is better for me not to say anything.' 'That's the very thing I wish you to do.'

"And that's the very advice we wish to give to all spreaders of false reports, and to those who kill their friends, calumniate their enemies, and disturb their loves, to keep conversation alive. To these we say, 'better hold your tongues.' The English, the genuine English, at all events, visit each other for the pleasure of being together. They do not consider themselves under the necessity of blabbing for an hour to convince you of their presence. The Spaniards smoke, and are silent. The Germans meet in order to indulge in reverie. The Orientals find their chief happiness in uninterrupted silence. They do not open their mouths even to give an order. However, we find we are talking of nothings, because we have nothing else very particular to talk about. So let our ideas benefit our readers even though it be at our own expense."

Theodore Hook, tells in one of his 'Sayings and Doings,' of English ladies who scarcely ate anything in company, but indemnified themselves in the privacy of their own apartments; N. P. Willis tells tales on a sentimental young German lady, of most refined and ethereal (literary) taste, how when safe from observation she fell on chops, beer, saurcraut, and other rough comestibles like any bricklayer; Mme. de Girardin gives us to understand that fine Parisian belles are either too hungry or too sincere to practise such deception. Her paper on the subject appeared 8th March, 1837, and we learn from it that Parisian fashionables were not much devoted even at that Lenten time to excessive mortification of the flesh. We are not much surprised, for even in this city of ours, a few philosophical Catholics (for health's sake of course) are obliged to eat meat on Fridays; and if the full truth was known, envy their Protestant fellow citizens their peculiar privileges in the matters of fast and abstinence.

"The lent is particularly brilliant; it rivals the carnival, frightful to say. They dance with the ardor they should devote to their prayers, and they certainly do not fast. If you were to behold our elegant young nymphs at ball suppers, you would have little faith in their pious privations. Neither could you comprehend how meagre our young ladies contrive to be. Really when you have assisted at one of these suppers, and seen these sylph-like beauties at work, when your eye has weighed and measured all they have swallowed in ham, pies, fowl, wild and tame, and cakes of all denominations, you have full right to insist on their arms being plumper, and their scapulæ less developed. Poor sylphs! they must have much bitter grief to devour at home, to counteract the good results of these rich repasts. A man of wit has said, 'that women are not aware of the injury they do themselves by eating;' and he was right. Nothing can be more disenchanting, than to see a beautiful and richly dressed woman seriously employed at table. Appetite is not allowable to a lady, except on a journey. At entertainments they may take an ice, a fruit, or a bit of tempting confectionary; but feminine beauty should have association with nothing more earthly than perfumes, fruits, and flowers.

"April 12, 1837. The ball given for the relief of the indigent English has been thoroughly successful. Oh! how we love a costume ball! Beautiful women are there still more beautiful under a new aspect, and the ugly, whom a brilliant imagination has enticed thither, have their value as foils. The English ladies are wonderfully original in their style of dress. If we admire the British beauties with bitterness and envy, we hail with delight the fantastically attired beauties of another sort, which it pleases Perfidæ Albion to send us; and we say to her double glory, that if the modern Venus, that is, Beauty herself, has arisen from the clear British Channel, the other goddess, whom it is not ours to name, has scrambled up from a muddy pool of the Thames. In fact, we recognise in our neighbours beyond sea, the double supremacy of furnishing us, women the most beautiful, and women the most remarkable for the opposite quality. The English never do things by halves; they are handsome to perfection, or they push ugliness to deformity, and then they cease to be women. They are fossil beings unknown at the creation, whose species infinitely varied, admit of no classification. One resembles an aged fowl, another a superannuated steed, this a young donkey, many resemble dromedaries, and some the hirsute bison. Quietly seated in a salon, and appropriately dressed, they are honestly ill-favored, and no one thinks more about it; but in a costume ball when these strange figures are dressed, and bedizened, in brisk spirits, highly rouged, with shapes and motions in high relief, and their peculiar graces striking so strongly on the senses, they produce a tremendous effect. If you had seen the other evening, these fantastic personages wandering about in the Salle Ventadour with seven or eight feathers on each head, blue, red, and black, peacocks' feathers, cocks' feathers, feathers of every kind—if you had witnessed the pride and self-confidence of those phantoms, and the self-satisfied looks thrown on the mirrors as they passed, and the hand adjusting some enchanting neglect in the dress, and the ringlet carefully drawn over the nose, which it obstinately refused to protect, and the yellow or copper-colored slipper bordered with red or blue, advanced or retired with so much grace, and the thousand little ornaments, all surprised at their unexpected meeting, you would say 'a bal costumé is very amusing indeed.' Ah! if ever any one asks you to visit such an assemblage for a louis, hand it out at once; you could not turn your money to better account."

The Princess Helena (Duchess of Orleans) arrived in Paris early in June, 1837. Contrast the animation and excitement of her reception with after events—the violent death of her husband, the reverses of 1848, and the subsequent exile of herself and her adopted family. Ponder the subject well, and it will be equivalent to the careful reading of a chapter in "Think well on't."

June 7, 1837. "The garden of the Tuilleries was splendidly beautiful last Sunday: it was beautified by the sky, the king, by the people, and by the season. What a spectacle at once smiling and majestic! O people of the province, who have not seen the picture, go hang yourselves at once, you will not see it again, the canvas is destroyed. Figure to yourselves what no Parisian ever saw before on the same day—the sky, blue—the trees, verdant—the people, clean, a crowd joyous and well dressed, enjoying the perfume of the lilacs in flower. Have you ever seen all these together? In Paris when the sky is blue, the trees are ash-colored—devoured by the dust. The trees are never green but after rain, and then the people are wet and splashed with mud.

"See how beautiful the prospect is from this spot!—The great avenue of the garden, on the right three ranks of the National Guards, on the left the same number of the troops of the line, behind them the crowd, a crowd elegant and resplendent in all the hues of the rainbow, and before us a pond with its jet d'eau glittering in the sun. Behind this you see the obelisk, and beyond that again, the triumphal arch: then for a frame to the picture, the two terraces covered with people, and the large trees meeting the eye in every direction. Look down and admire these parterres, these countless tufts of lilac all in flower the same day. What perfume! what a lovely day! But hist! here's a courier—the cortege is coming. A postillion gallops on, covered with dust; shortly after, a poodle at full gallop—laughter and lengthened hilarity. At a short interval hies on a pug dog in extreme trouble : he has strayed, or is perhaps for ever lost ;—prolonged amusement. These avant-couriers infused patience into the crowd. A needle-woman in mob cap gave a push to an elegantly dressed old lady. ‘Let me see the princess ; you will have opportunity enough to see her at court, you ladies.’ The lady looked down distainfully on the woman, and said to her daughter, ‘little the good woman knows that she is more likely to go to court than we.’ ‘Without doubt,’ said the young heiress, ‘let her marry a grocer and she is certain of becoming a great lady.’ We guessed by this dialogue that some legitimists had come to see the procession.

“At length this princess, about whom we have talked so much for two months, is with us. * * Her arrival in France has been the very reverse of an illusion. At a distance an error looks well, but as we approach the charm vanishes ; here it was different. While the princess was at home, every one said, ‘she is frightful, she is thin, she is without grace, she has nasty red hair, a big German foot, a bony hand ; her eyes are small, her mouth large, she is as ugly as Mme This or Mlle. That ; and they mentioned two of the most disagreeable women in Paris. The princess set out, and after a day or two, they commenced to speak more favorably, ‘Her hair was not exactly red, it was fair with a tinge of that color through it. She was ugly, but it was ugliness not destitute of distinction.’ She arrived at the frontier ; ‘there was not the slightest approach to foxiness in her hair now, it was a clear chestnut hue ; her foot was small, for a German foot to wit,—‘she was not ugly.’ She got as far as Metz : ‘her physiognomy is more gracious ; her appearance is really noble.’ At Melun, ‘she would make a delightful picture ; she has a charming foot, a lovely hand.’ At Fontainebleau, ‘on my word she is a most agreeable looking lady.’ Finally at Paris ‘she is a beautiful woman ;’ and if the journey held for two leagues more, she would be the most beautiful woman in the world. See how we have been deceived. The princess is not a decidedly beautiful woman, but she is a pretty Parisienne in all the rigor of the expression, a woman such as we readily love, we who look for beauty in a gracious expression of the face, and in a shape defined by graceful lines.

“Welcome, Madam, to our country, to our hospitable land ! For two months our knights have proclaimed with loud voice, that you were a prodigy of ugliness : pardon them we pray ; it was a lie. Our deputies have chattered about your income as if they were hiring a cook :—this is the result of liberal ideas. Our journals have abused you in epigrams without salt or point :—it is party spirit, it is French spirit ; pardon them also.

“You saw that evening, your new family filled with joy ; and indeed not without reason. Your father-in-law, the king, passed through a crowd that day, the first time for two years, without hearing a shot. It was wonderful, himself was astonished. Not a cloud in the sky, not an assassin on the earth ! All this was owing to your fair presence ; but how sad the life of which such as these are the happy days ! You are a courageous woman, for you come to find in France the disenchantment of all your ideas. A daughter of Germany, you believe in royalty; and with us, royalty is no more. Romantic girl, you trust in the respect inspired by woman's dignity; woman here has lost her prestige, her weakness is no longer a thing to be respected; she is insulted as if she could avenge herself. You, the pupil of the Teutonic Homer, nourished by him on the ambrosia of poetic fiction, you believe in poetry, and we have none. Ask the echos of the palace, they will tell you that French words do not rhyme. Ask your august parents what has become of our great poets: speak of Chateaubriand, they will tell you he is a legitimist, their most redoubtable enemy. Mention Lamartine, they will tell you he is a deputy who sometimes votes for them; introduce Victor Hugo, they don't know him at all. To do justice to our modern royalty, it is worthy of the poesy of the land; it is prose with a crown. The reign of the 'three colors' admits none of the arts except painting; and Racine, if now living, would be obliged to daub some emblem, and smuggle in his verses in the disguise of a motto, in order to get them laid at the foot of the throne of July. Poor young bride! bid adieu to your dreams of grandeur and poetry. There are no poets here: you will neither be flattered nor sung. You will be in our court no more a great lady, than the most humble woman of the land. Like her, however, you will enjoy a happiness unknown to princesses sacrificed to ambition; you will love and be loved. Be consoled; with love you will recover poesie and royalty."

When we hear splenetic grumblers exclaim against the climate in London, Dublin, and Edinburgh, and make odious comparisons with reference to Paris, or when the want of gallantry and chivalric spirit among our young gentry is bewailed, we will refer them to the foregoing extract.

Franklin speaks feelingly of the miseries of a washing day: the day on which they take up the carpets, and wax the floors is an equal horror to those Parisians not actively employed in the operation.

(June 29, 1857.)—"Happy the man who on this day can go to the country, or at least, dine and pass the evening with a friend; but miserable the wretch whom imperious necessity keeps at home, while they are upsetting and removing. Not a room is habitable: one is without a single article of furniture; in another all the moveables are piled one on another: the chairs are on the tables; the sofa cushions are on the chairs; the presses are condemned by all the things piled up against them. The poor victim asks for his breakfast. 'Ah, sir! the glasses and knives are in the press;' and the victim breakfasts without a knife. A shop keeper presents his little bill for sixty francs. It is nothing: he will not give the man the trouble of calling again. He steps into his bed chamber; finds not his secretaire; walks into the drawing room; no furniture but plenty of *frottoyers at work; finds his way through many impediments to the dining room ; and descries the article required at the lower end of the apartment behind the piano. He displaces a mountain of chairs, he removes a heavy sofa, he manœuvres with much address, and at last attains his object. He applies the key, the bolt shoots back, but the piano prevents the lid from opening beyond an inch or so. There is a sofa before the piano, and a huge divan before the sofa, and the bill-bearer goes without settlement : no one breakfasts, nor pays his bills the day the carpets are taken up.

* Provided with a kind of sweeping brush charged with bees' wax, your frottoyer applies his foot thereto as a digger to his spade, and

“Just at this moment our unfortunate receives a note from the charming widow to whom he is paying his addresses, containing an invitation to dinner. Quick, quick ! a loving, grateful reply must be dispatched forthwith. He rushes to a table : alas ! it is only a card table. ‘François, where is my writing desk ?’ ‘There, sir, behind the armoire.’ But the press is of Buhl, and heavy into the bargain, and it would not be wise to risk injuring it : besides it is masked by a commode. ‘Give me my writing case at least.’ ‘Sir, I am just after cleaning out the ink-stand, it was so clogged.’ ‘Oh, patience ! what shall I do ? I must return a verbal answer. Say that I shall have the honor—that I ask a thousand pardons of Mme. R. for not returning a written answer ; but they are lifting the carpets, and I have not even a table to write at.’ François, not comprehending the beginning of the message, gives a free translation to Mme. R.’s servant, ‘Monsieur asks a thousand pardons from Madame ; if he has not sent a note, it is because we are taking up our carpets ;’ adding from himself, ‘I have not seen such dust for three years that I’ve been with Monsieur.’ ‘Well !’ said Mme. R. to her servant eagerly. ‘M.* * * presents his excuses to Madame : he can’t have the honor, for he is taking up his carpets.’ ‘Did you receive this message from himself ?’ ‘No, Madame, it was from François ; he said he was very sorry that he could not write as they were taking up the carpets.’ Mme. R., in high resentment, pays an unexpected visit to her sister in the country. At 6 o’clock everything is got into its place at our young friend’s, and he dresses himself with the greatest care, all the while anticipating the happy evening he is to spend in the society of the lady of his choice. He dismisses his tilbury at the porte-cochère of Mme. R.’s hotel, traverses the court, and without listening to the porter, he runs up the stairs. He meets the Maitre d’Hotel on the landing place, his hat on his head—very odd. ‘Mme. R. ?’ asks the unfortunate wooer with troubled voice. ‘Madame has just gone to the country to visit her sister.’ The hapless youth rushes down stairs, and across the court to catch his tilbury, but it has had a five minutes start of him ; and he is obliged to content himself with an indifferent dinner at an ordinary eating-house. He feels that the two ingenious servants had skilfully caused the mistake, though ignorant of the exact process of the mismanagement. So he laid up these maxims in his mind : no chance of a good breakfast, of settling an account, or accepting a welcome invitation the day you lift your carpets.”

with a jerking motion he pushes on, and soon has his floor as shining and slippery as a mahogany table.

Mme. de Girardin looked with little complacency on competition in literature or commerce. Apropos to seeing the excellent actors and actresses dispersed among the various theatres great and small, she would prefer to see a galaxy of them at one or two theatres, a state of things which our literary and dramatic solons here, have upset with a world of trouble, and which we would not wish to see restored at any price. Our fair authoress looked only to the disagreeable features of the new order of things. She thus vents her displeasure.

"Is it not a pity to see all the good actors scattered among the little theatres, while the large ones are absolutely in want of subjects! What a miserable thing is competition! Instead of bringing any branch of business to perfection, its struggles only lead to a deterioration. The eloquent apostle of communism, the excellent Fourier, was unhappily too much in the right, when he thus depicted the organization of existing societies.

"'Everywhere,' said he, 'you see every class interested in wishing the evil of others; and private advantage in direct opposition to the advantage of the masses. The man of law is anxious that discord should prevail among the rich, and induce good law-suits; the physician limits his aspirations for the common weal to their enjoyment of good fevers and good catarrhs; the soldier desires a good war to kill off half of his comrades, in order to secure his own promotion. The purveyor longs for a good famine which will double or treble the price of food; the wine merchant has no objection to a good hail storm on the vine-yards, or a good frost on the buds. So on in all the social conditions; every one feels a rivalry or jealousy with others, and cannot thrive except at the expense of his fellows.'

"For two days of this week we have been zealous Fourierists, but for two days only. We were reading the work of Mme. Gatti de Gamond, which explains the system of Fourier; and we were thrown into a transport of admiration. The frightful history of social selfishness so eloquently written, filled us with indignation. The Unitary Government of the Phalanges appeared as a great problem resolved. To give to the poor without taking from the rich, that was a superb idea; to establish equality by education was wonderful; the invention of attractive or passionnelle industry* was truly sublime. A note carelessly introduced towards the end of the book promising 144 years as the average term of man's life infused some suspicion, and when we came to the chapters on the cosmogony and the immortality of the soul we became schismatics and deserted the Phalange.

"Fourrier was undoubtedly a man of genius; and he has experienced the fate of every one who, after long meditations has discovered a sublime idea. He became the victim of this idea, and a martyr in many forms. There is not on earth a punishment greater than that inflicted on the inspired, convinced, and enthusiastic possessor of a discovery capable of changing the whole face of things, but who is not able to convince the world of the importance of his discovery. His enthusiasm restrained becomes folly; his unemployed energy turns to monomania. No one entertains a great idea with impunity. Fourrier was many years the victim of the great idea he had stumbled on. He had long hoped to see it realized; but there came obstacles, nay impossibilities. * * Occupied with elaborating his idea, he changed its nature and destroyed it, by striving to reduce it to a system. For, after all, what is a system but a little circle into which you wish to compress the world! it is a little spot from which you wish to inspect the whole universe. System is the malady of great minds, preyed on by the fever of inaction; what can you do with a great idea, misunderstood and unvalued, but convert it into a system? his vast projects were absorbed in impossible reveries; his scientific combinations, lost in extravagant conjectures. Discouraged and fatigued in such a terrible strife, in his despair he found faults with the most innocent creatures. He accused the stars with injustice; he found faults with the earth in a moral sense: he treated her as a young ill-reared planet who is too eager to be married; he attacked the moon without any just cause; and as he wished to remodel the world, he was not satisfied with its Creator. This is easily explained. His system was to produce universal happiness; it felt no need of a religion such as ours, which preaches resignation and glorifies suffering. Poor fool! he suppressed consolation and patience, and reserved for his universe nothing but genius, love and death.

"All this is to say, that if they had aided Fourrier in working out his first idea, he would have employed in realizing it, all the zeal and understanding which has been thrown away on developing and explaining it. Face to face with the difficulties of execution, he would not have had time to write pamphlets, to disparage the moon, and reform Christianity. He would not have turned an admirable discovery to a burlesque system. Instead of composing incomprehensible books, he would have founded useful establishments; and we who now laugh at the exaggeration of his principles would know nothing of his ideas but what they possessed of ingenious, wise, profound, and generous.

"Oh, how culpable are the ignorant powers of our days, who can neither appreciate the real worth of men, nor the value of their discoveries! who can neither foresee nor examine; who possess no more of experience than of instinct, and who pine in misery surrounded by priceless treasures; who are feeble, and permit those who compose their strength to expend their energies for behoof of others; who let their writers labour for mere support, their artists die of chagrin, and allow their geniuses, who might perhaps save them, to become fools."

forerunners were slightly handled, along with the wonderful perfection to which men, beasts, and planets would arrive in time. Whales would be drilled to draw whole fleets through the sea, and sharks to catch fish for man's use. As the planets are sentient, and capable of conveying their ideas to each other, we might turn the knowledge thus to account. Our correspondent in Calcutta would make a telegram to Mercury when passing his meridian, and the mercurial officer, who by the bye is provided with a tail six feet long, and a serviceable eye at the end of it, coming to the meridian of London in six hours, would telegraph to Greenwich hospital, where they are keeping a sharp look out for him through a telescope forty times the power of Lord Rosse's.

The wild speculations of one age are exceeded by the realities of another. It might be said of Fourier, what some fop of Queen Anne's day said of Achilles, that 'he was a pretty fellow for his time:' but beside the convenience of the electric wire, how clumsy was our prophet's mode of conveying the price current. Still some of his dreams are not likely to be equalled nor surpassed. The planets, according to him, will be able to communicate their peculiar virtues to each other, thus improving the flavor of meats, and the culinary and medicinal qualities of herbs. And after some long lapse of ages, when the last day of a planet has come, it unites itself to the next convenient wandering body it meets, incorporates itself therewith, just as the Beer-jug Gazette is bleuded with the Coal-Hole Herald, communicates to its new partner an additional vigour and fertility, and a new cycle commences.

But the name and influence of our brave communist has not affected French heads only. Looking at Mrs. Trollope's frontispiece, as adorning the volume of Jessie Phillips, you would say that she might be safely permitted to read Fourier's mad visions, without finding her nice sense of morality tainted in the slightest degree, nor her sound Church-of-England principles weakened; yet see the unhappy result. Once like a good old Christian and Tory, she poised her orthodox lance, and prostrated the hypocrite of Wrexhill; and in foreign lands she mixed with old fashioned Christians, and "very much applauded" what she saw and heard. But see the dire effects of bad reading, producing an unhealthy state of the interior, and breaking out on the surface of her later novels, which the indulgent reader may please to consider as the envelope (vulgo the skin) of her internal life. A young lady disturbed by the prevalency of existing evils, and perplexed as to the best means of comforting and doing good to her poor brothers and sisters, ill-favored by fortune, invites her sage friends to a conference, and they take refuge in an out-of-the-way grotto; and there uninfluenced by the brawling of the outer world, she gravely proposes the study of Fourier's system of amelioration; for they must acknowledge that "it's a very bad world they live in;" that it can't be much worse; that Fourier's system promises well at all events, that it deserves a trial, and that, even if it fail, they will not find themselves below their point of departure.* She introduces at a later period of her experience, a very respectable Catholic priest, respectable that is, in the eyes of Mrs. Matthews and the other estimable folk of the novel, and of course in those of the authoress herself; and this conscientious clerk commends himself to our respect by revealing secrets heard in the confessional from a quasi penitent, who confessed them with the assured hope that he (the confessor) would blab them in a certain quarter. And a woman of information and undoubted talent bids us believe such absurdity, and respect that man who would in real life be considered a sacrilegious hypocrite; for he acknowledges elsewhere that his faith in the doctrines of his church is of a very slender, nice, and eclectic character. We are afterwards introduced to a high-born, well-bred rector, as selfish, self-indulgent, and worthless as he can well be, who is made to appear almost conscientious and estimable, by contrast with a high-church clergyman, an inveterate self-worshipper, and unamiable character.† The young heroine cannot be expected to be firm in the religious dogmas recommended by either of these gentlemen. So being confined to her own apartments for the interests of the story, she lays her mind down earnestly to the study of the Nemesis of Faith.

* For particulars the inquisitive reader is referred to the Lottery of Marriage, Mrs. Matthews, and Uncle Walter.

† Some years since, a very low-church publisher in our city, in order to disparage the practice of auricular confession, published a little scrubby pamphlet appropriately illustrated, and thoroughly inadmissible into any Christian family blessed with young people. It is probable that there is no more than one bookseller in Dublin, who would exhibit this precious pamphlet in his window at the present day. We consider that the odious sketches in Uncle Walter are about as praiseworthy in design (not so bad in effect however) as the attempts of the Dublin worthy, who wrote, illustrated, and issued the brochure, so valued by our unique Holywell-street dealer.

Now as our younger readers see the bad effects of studying these visionary Utopian schemes of Bona, Campanilla, Nicholas, Fourier, Proudhon and others on the judgment of a staid old lady, who ought to have known better, we request them not to take such lucubrations for hand-books of morality or religion in their studious moments; but having a wholesome dread of the waywardness of youth, we would scarcely give the advice only for knowing that the works in question are scarcely attainable.

We proceed to quote from an amusing medley dated 12 July, 1837. She takes notice of the unamusable condition of those who have yearly tickets for the opera; and her remarks strongly remind us of nearly forgotten nights some twenty years since, when we did see an occasional play. It enhanced our enjoyment during an interesting or comic scene, to cast an eye towards a stage box, and let it rest a moment on a most melancholy duo or trio of young ladies who occupied it. There was neither muscle of face nor of body moved at the most harrowing or the most laughable incidents; but when the interest became rather too intense, they languidly looked towards the stage. There was not even the variety described in the acting of poor old Williams:—

He points his toe and slaps his breast;
But when a prey to deepest woe,
He slaps his breast and points his toe.”*

Only for the locality we would have said that they were dreeing some dismal weird, or performing penance, as we can recollect no visit of ours in which they were not present.

Mme. de Girardin takes notice that the occasional visitors finding a stupid opera on the boards simply lament the loss of the tickets' price and that of the evening, and all is over; but the yearly occupants find themselves, —“incapable of such a pitch of philosophy: for them a bad opera is a winter lost. An absurd ballet is a year's failure; for them one stupid evening is multiplied by twenty stupid evenings. Hence we hear in our days actors, and airs, and steps hissed, a thing unknown in the Paris of former days.

* Familiar epistles to Frederic Jones, quoted from memory.

“ There has been a great outcry against the ministry for giving the cross to Simon the dancer ; yet the ministry is in the right. If a dancer under peculiar circumstances, merits the cross, he should get it. To give the Cross to a dancer is no crime, but to remain a dancer when one is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, rather shocks our notions of the fitness of things. The grimaces and gambols of the savage, much less the bounds and pirouettes of the civilized man, take very much from the dignity of the man decorated with the Cross. The weight of a dancer's honors will impede the airiness of his entrechats. Glory lives by privations ; it requires heavy sacrifices. There are honors incompatible with certain conditions, and ruinous triumphs ; but we must take things with their accompaniments. A case in point is presented by the bell-hanger of Chateauroux, who was ruined by taking dinner with the King of the French. This honest tradesman used to go from chateau to chateau, adjusting damaged locks, and putting bell wires in order. He was kept at each chateau for two or three days, in fact till all his little jobs were completed, taking his meals in the kitchen, and then he departed, content with his treatment and pay. But when his patrons understood that his rank in the National Guard had brought him to Paris to compliment Louis Philippe, and that he had dined with the Queen and the Princesses, the Ministers and the Ambassadors, they could not think of entertaining him at the same table with chamber maids and footmen. A locksmith not so highly honored was employed in his place, and he lost all his customers. He was a proud man, so he submitted to his fate ; solicited the office of Garde Champêtre ;* and now with sword on side, he consoles himself for loss of place and profit, by saying with becoming spirit that he had had the honor of dining one evening at the king's table. Glory has its rigors which must be endured. * . . .

The Vicomte proceeds to relate the difficulty of finding entertainment or enjoyment in Paris at this season. At Tortoni's you get ices without sugar, and breathe an atmosphere infested with tobacco. If you return home you feel lonely, and think of your friends gone to the country, who if they feel ennui, feel it at least in good health and surrounded by good air. That is something : and then they walk about, while that exercise is out of the question in the city. In the gardens of the Tuilleries, the children and their hoops beset you ; and on the Boulevard, mock Turks poison you with their perfumes, under pretext of burning the pure pastilles of the Serail under your nose.

“ What has become of that being, beloved of the gods, cherished by poets, that great unknown whom every one wishes to entice ; that being indifferent to your interests but still carrying hope along with him ; that undefined personage whom we call the visitor, amiable individual, who without compromising his dignity, furnishes entertainment to every one. People sitting before their doors, keep their looks on him as he listlessly walks on, and he furnishes a piquant expression or two to their lazy discourse. The smiling young girl in the balcony follows him with her eyes ; the gouty old gentleman beholds him with envy from his window, enjoying his walk ; the crying child dries his eyes to get a better view of him. He furnishes a new idea to his beholders ; he imparts, unknown to himself, a sentiment to every looker-on : he is distraction personified ; and a distraction is always a benefit both to the sad and the joyous. The visitor, hope of the shopkeeper, future of the poor, exists no more for Paris. Perhaps he still perambulates some distant quiet streets ; but in our fashionable ones he dares not venture. In these, a walk becomes a strife, the flags the field of battle ; to walk is to wage war. A thousand obstacles oppose you, a thousand snares are laid for you, those you meet are your foes, every step you advance is an enemy overcome. The streets are no longer free passages,—public ways ; they are bazaars where every one displays his wares, ateliers where each exercises his craft in the open air. The sideways, narrow enough as they are, are converted into a permanent exhibition. You leave home in a reverie : an important business, an affair of the heart, or perhaps a literary project, occupies you ; and trusting to the prefect of the police, you push on, fearing nothing but horses, vehicles, or ill-reared donkeys. These are quite enough, but for their avoidance you trust to instinct. At the corner of your own street a dozen casks are arranged before a wine shop in symmetrical order ; but preoccupied as you are, you knock up against the one next you, and get a disagreeable bump. You express your feelings in language more or less energetic according to temperament and birthplace, and continue your route. Your ruling idea besets you again, and a bucket full of water is flung between your legs. Never mind ! a porter is solicitous for freshness before his post. It will be nice and dry in half-an-hour, but for the moment you must quit the flags. You next experience a great heat, and looking up in a fright you are almost stifled with smoke. An *emballeur is merely closing his boxes surrounding them with canvas, and exercising all the disagreeables of his profession on the pavement which is completely impeded by those big chests. Irritated by these delays, you hurry on, and knock yourself against a straw chair at the corner of the street, still on the flags. Why is that chair in that inconvenient place, and why has that lady established her domicile on a straw chair at the corner of a street ? She is a tooth-pick seller and in deep mourning. She is so for five years, and the entire quarter is weary of her griefs. We advise her to remove her chair to some street where her woes will possess some novelty. Still you respect affliction, and quit the pavé. After a while you resume it again, and behold a working glazier approaching with wings of light, to wit, the sun beams playing in the large squares of glass he carries in his frame. As these wings are frightfully broad, you get close to the wall to avoid them, but you feel yourself repulsed by two cold feet of a slaughtered ox just hung up in front of a stall. You push on disgusted. You get forward some perches without molestation, but the wind rises, and the street disappears before your eyes. The soft-goods' shop has unfurled its sails; muslins at twenty sous the yard swell out on all sides like balloons; handkerchiefs at twenty sous, stream like conquering banners; calicoes float upwards; pocket-handkerchiefs flutter; transparent gauzes caress you; azure scarfs enwrap you; you are enveloped in a dance of sylphs, a ballet of bayaderes. A pitying shopman unrols you, and you proceed on your way laughing. Well, you think you have seen the last of your annoyances, and you begin to dream: but you knock your head against some immoveable object that seems withal to have life, for it snorts and coughs; it is partly before and partly behind the wall. It is the beginning of a horse, the rest of him being with a cabriolet under a penthouse. He is there a living advertisement requesting you to employ his unseen portion! You take the hint, and are conveyed home out of danger. And these are the obstacles that have driven afar the visitors, the birds of passage, the beings beloved of poets, for otherwise why would they so often say, 'the passers-by will see engraven on my tomb,' &c., &c., &c. No body is now a loungee, a passer-by, a visitor: he takes an omnibus and calls himself a traveller.

"The fact is, that the trottoir now-a-days belongs to every one except the lawful owner, whom I take to be the foot passenger. The fruit sellers encumber it with their baskets; china dealers use it adroitly for the disposal of their wares. You cannot pass without breaking a flask, a cup, or a glass; and you pay for the article smashed: the buyer in spite of himself, is the discovery of our age. The commissionnaire uses an ingenious device to get employment. He stretches himself out on the pavement to sleep (?), and if you wish to avoid demolishing his nose or breaking his arm you are splashed in the kennel. Of course the sleeping fox runs for a cabriolet as you are not fit to be seen, and his readiness cannot be left unrequited. But these are not the only dangers. From nine till twelve o'clock falls the carpet showers, and you enjoy the dust of the houses from every window. A friend of ours lately received on a bonnet of the finest Leghorn, a pair of beautiful scissors of English make, shaken from the fringes of a carpet; its mistress is probably looking for it at this very hour in every corner of the house.

"And why do you persecute our foot passengers? why sow his rout with the relics of your feast? why cover his inoffensive head with your crumbs? why will you oblige him to walk on your melon peels, your oyster shells, or your rejected salad? Give him room; it is all he demands. The street is his kingdom; let him reign at liberty. The street is a thoroughfare, not an asylum: it belongs to the passers through, not to the inhabitants."

Under the date, July 19, 1837, we find a paper, parts of which we cannot help extracting though the subject is touched on in our introductory matter : the reader will scarcely regret the picture of which the outline only has been presented.

“ Who is that keen flatterer, that first dared to say that the French are a light people ? We, light indeed ! There exists not on the earth a more grave, more routinish, more manical people than ourselves, and nothing is more enduring than a mania. A passion may be overcome, a mania never. And why do they call us light ? Is it because we occupy ourselves about frivolous things ? But if we are occupied about them seriously, it is not lightness nor frivolity any longer. A frivolous character attaches importance to nothing, we on the contrary attach great importance to a——NOTHING. In order to express French unsteadiness, we would not say a butterfly on a flower, a fly on a feather, a child in a swing, a swallow on a weathercock, a slight weight on a slender twig. No : we would say a heavy fat man in a tilbury, a heavy weight in a slight machine, an exorbitant price set on a valueless object, a serious application to a piece of foolery, gravity in nonsense, a great zeal for matters of no worth. * * * Our understanding, our spirit may be light and airy ; our character is the reverse, and has been so from earliest times. Love of change constitutes a mutable character, but with us nothing changes, we are always the same.

“ We vary our kings a little, that is all ; we never vary our pleasures ; our tastes are everlasting, our fashions of a frightful solidity. You might, in order to express the stability of a thing, say that it will last as long as a fashion. For thirty years, our men believe themselves delighted with their ugly dress ; for fifteen years, our women are encumbered with their leg o’ mutton sleeves ; and for forty years, thick muslin cravats imprison the necks of our fashionables. We will be happy under a reign that endures the length of a fashion ; to attain the period of a fashion is to live to a good old age.

“ And now consider the Gallic performance. What pedantry ! what pretension ! a dance of actors who wish to be admired, a piece of vanity in performers who are only anxious to know what is thought of them. And it is not only at fashionable balls that the contre-danse is so serious; the same things are not a whit more animated in the villages. The balls of Musard are simply grosser in their character, but have no more genuine hilarity than the others. Then look to our theatre. For sixty years there is no change in our pirouettes: the sky-blue shepherds are replaced by white and red peasants; but their steps are the same, and their admiration for their shepherdesses has not changed. For sixty years they have admired with the same postures; they have joined their hands the same way in their enthusiasm, and they caress their chins with the same naïveté, merely to express their sense of her beauty. The shepherd springs forward, he assumes a pose, he is satisfied with himself but he dissembles; he bends his body backwards, he stretches his arms, he takes a spring and then he whirls. He whirls for a time, then stands firm on both soles with much pride, and seems to say, 'here I am.' This time he is thoroughly satisfied with himself, and makes no secret of it.

"He now slowly raises one leg in the air, keeps it suspended for some time, and then he turns on the other, the original limb still pointing to the horizon like the pasteboard appendage of Mr. Punch kept suspended by a wire. When he considers that he has whirled enough, he restores liberty to the stiffened limb, and it rejoins its comrade of its own accord. He then strikes the boards with both, in the style of a conqueror, and gives himself up to all sorts of contortions, but with the gravest air, till in order to give himself rest, he sets himself to admire his partner. And these proceedings are re-commenced with the next pas; and every evening your dancer will conduct himself in the same manner, and all for your amusement." Ah, you may say that we are giddy, but look at our fashions, our entertainments, and our arts, and you will acknowledge that we are the most constant people on the face of the earth. The Turks have quitted the turban, but we will never lay aside the round hat. In Spain, the bull-fights have ceased for some time, but in France, pirouettes will never cease. Call not a people changeable, whose dances are lugubrious, whose fantasies are invincible, whose fashions are eternal."

Forgetting her testimony to the endurance of usages, our fair authoress mentions a change in the fashion of names, in a paper alluding to the custom of sending bouquets on the day of the ASSUMPTION of the BLESSED VIRGIN, to all that are called Mary.

August 19, 1837. "The week has passed in the celebration of family festivals. We do not exaggerate in saying that more than twenty thousand bouquets were distributed in Paris the day of the ASSUMPTION. All the myrtle flowers we have seen! and so carefully enveloped in their white paper envelopes! Where were they going? to a mother, to an aunt, to a sister, to a cousin. Who has not a Mary to offer homage to, among his cousins or his friends? You must be an orphan, a widow abandoned by earth and heaven, if you have not a bouquet to send on the Assumption to some woman. In Paris, all women young and old are called Mary; all the little girls are Marys. This charming name, which perhaps no one ought to presume to bear, is not only a religious observance; it is a pretension. Formerly they gave children the most extraordinary names taken from the now extinct folio romances. They called them Coralie, Pamela, Palmyra, Clarissa, Zenobia, Clara, Clorinda, Aglaure, Aglaë, Amanda, Malvina. They looked out for a name not borne by every one: they would not have a young lady of birth having the same appellation as her waiting maid. This fashion has passed away: indeed we do not regret it; but we attack the opposite exaggeration; the great pretension to simplicity, which induces every mother to give the same name to her daughter has its ridiculous side. This last winter at a children's ball, we counted twenty-two Marys, you could hear nothing but Marie, 'Marie, come here, Marie, Marie;' and every time, twenty-two little ladies all ran where they heard the call. The abuse of the best things is so unpleasant, that we have begun to dislike this name so sweet in itself. Yes, at this moment we would welcome Calphurnia, Fatima, Ismenia, or Fredegonde. It would be at least less pretentious than the dear name Mary which perforce of becoming fashionable, has lost its distinctive charm.

"To the family festivals have succeeded those of the colleges. The distribution of prizes has been one of the most interesting solemnities of the year. It is a joyful day for the parents, even though they be kings and queens. A mother has said, on learning that her son had obtained the prize for history, 'In his position it is the prize I would particularly wish for him.' This mother is the Queen of the French. M. the Duke D'Aumale has reason to be proud of his success, for according to general opinion, he deserved it. They say that M. the Duke de Montpensier was fly-fishing at Neuilly, when the news came of his acquiring the prize of Natural History. His joy was so great, that he dropped his rod; and the fish on the point of being pulled up, made his escape. This event proves that the glory of the great is occasionally favorable to the little—fishes in this instance.

"It was a good idea, that of the king's to give to his children an opportunity of sharing one of the most delightful enjoyments of boyhood, and himself to come down from the anxieties of his royal seat, to see his children crowned just as an honest citizen would do. The only distinction the young dukes enjoyed was that of being able to bring more than one of their family to witness their triumph, each private pupil having the enjoyment of one ticket only.

"Mothers commonly shed tears in abundance on these occasions. It is a physical effect useless to resist; the better scholar the child is, the more abundant the tears. If you see a woman bathed in tears and in a state bordering on despair, you may be certain that she is the mother of the youth who has been crowned three times. The emotions are respectively in proportion to the importance of the prizes. The prize for French declamation being given, she wipes her eyes. At the prize for Latin translation, she covers her face with her handkerchief; Greek translation, she bursts into tears;—Cosmography, she sobs. Happily they pass to another class; she comes to herself, and the tears resume their empire with another woman. Tears like these are sweet. Such is woman's life: the tears which they are not ashamed to shed before the eyes of others are the recompense of those they must shed in secret."

Among the successful students are named O'Donnells and MacDonnells (A sister of Delphine's was married to an O'Donnell). In the evening the pupils were treated to the entertainments of the Tournament and the Indian races at Tivoli. What amused our fair looker-on better than these, was the address handed to the spectators by one whose position should have weaned him from such worldly speculations.

TOPPIN,

THE TIVOLI HERMIT.

N.B.—*His spouse washes and mangles, Rue de Bussy, No. 6, opposite the Rue des Mauvais Garçons.

"It is pretty evident that it is a badly conducted household. How can a hermit and a washerwoman live together in comfort? If the wife has plenty of customers, adieu to solitude, our hermit will not have a moment to himself. On the other hand, if the hermit lives in absolute retirement, his wife will see no customers, and then adieu to business. The idea of this household has caused us considerable anxiety; but why should a mangle woman think of marrying a hermit at all!

"This hermit recalls to our minds a practical piece of pleasantry of which he was the accomplice. Some years since, a humorous and clever person being at Tivoli in grand company, borrowed the hermit's gown, wig, and long beard; and being thoroughly concealed by his disguise, he waited patiently to be consulted. A confederate seduced all the handsome women of their acquaintance who were at Tivoli, to come and visit him; and the false hermit amused himself by roguishly prophesying for every fair visitor, whatever he knew she was most anxious to obtain."

In the Feuilleton of 21st October, 1837, Mme. de Girardin examines the different systems of those who divide their fellow creatures into classes. The article is longer than our lessening space can accommodate, but we give some extracts, though at the risk of spoiling the general effect.

• • • “Some philosophers have made a division of the human race according to nations, calling them Egyptian, Greek, Slavonic, &c. According to the characters they recognise in these people, they class every one of their acquaintance. A savant of this persuasion would never marry a wife having the visible marks of such and such a race ;—would not on any consideration take a servant of the Greek species. All the Greeks according to him are intelligent, but they are gluttons and thieves. By Greeks he did not absolutely mean natives of the Peloponnesus, but persons having a certain shape of head, foot, jaw, &c. ‘Thief and glutton,’ said he, ‘the Greek would eat up all my sugar.’ He selected an attendant of a race less intelligent, but honest and devoted ; and the chosen one being an oaf, let all the plate be stolen. See the ends to which we are conducted by science.

“The physicians have another system of classification, viz.—physical constitution ; and they arrange your place at first view. ‘You are not Mons. So and So, you are not man or woman, you are a Bilious, a Sanguine, a Nervous, or a Lymphatic.’ We have heard a friend of ours thus express himself—‘Ah ! that person has wit and understanding—that Bilious who was here yesterday.’ ‘That is M. —.’ ‘Ah ! I was formerly acquainted with his mother, a very amiable Sanguine.’ If you scold the chamber-maid for her laziness or neglect before him, he mutters, ‘Lymphatic.’ If a fine child comes in his way he will embrace it with much tenderness, exclaiming, ‘beautiful organization,—Nervo-Sanguine.’ However, this does not prevent him from treating all his patients, bilious, nervous, and lymphatic in the same manner, and killing all with the most conscientious impartiality.

“The philosophers have invented moral classifications : their system having more particular reference to the state of society. Their two great divisions are the Meneurs and the Menées, (leaders and led), these, the masters everywhere, those, waiting for the direction of the others before they move ;—objects and their reflections, shepherds and sheep, Orestes and Pylades. The art of good government, they say, entirely consists in the proper application of this discovery, the Meneurs acting the governors to the great advantage of the state, the Menées filling subordinate offices, and carrying out the others’ instructions. Let the Meneurs create, organise, put the great engines in movement ; then the Menées come in to keep the machine going, and the wheels in the appointed grooves. The first have genius, courage, and energy, the others, patience, and order, qualities as serviceable as any. The grand secret is to select the right man for the right place. The cause of all the disorders in France, is the selection of the Menées for the proper office of the Meneurs ; for working under the influence of these latter without being aware of it, they act for the private advantage of the Meneurs, not for the general weal. Probably the number of the Menees is rather small with us ; and it may be well supposed that it is a difficult task to conduct a whole population of Meneurs.

“A woman of understanding thus accounts in her peculiar sense for all the revolutions that have taken place amongst us ;—‘ There are in the world two classes that wage incessant war on each other, who hate and despise, and will hate and despise each other for ever ; and these are the people who wash, and the people who do not wash their hands. You will never succeed in reconciling these parties : they will never live together in peace, for there is one thing that cannot be overcome—disgust ; another thing that can’t be endured—humiliation ; and in this quarrel, disgust clings to one side, humiliation falls to the other. You can never induce a dandy to lodge with a rag-picker, no more than you can induce an ugly woman to surround herself with beautiful ones. Neither will you ever persuade people who wash their hands to live on good terms with those who do not wash their hands.’

“Now for the latest classification. ‘ We resemble the irrational animals, or they resemble us, more or less. You sir, perhaps resemble the eagle—Monsieur, the jackall—Madame, the marten—Mademoiselle, the squirrel.’ A friend of ours has laid down the law in this matter, thus :—‘ Human kind consists of two great races, namely, dogs and cats.’ He does not mean to say that we lead a cat and dog life ; on the contrary we agree well enough together ; we are different but we are not unfriendly. The individual of the canine race has all the good qualities of that animal, good-nature, courage, fidelity, and frankness, but he is also encumbered with his defects, credulity, improvidence, and *bonhomie—woe the day ! for though it be a virtue of the heart, it is a defect in the character. The canine man (properly so called) is full of good, solid qualities, but he wants address. He is very rarely a seducer : he is destined to serious employments where courage, probity, and frankness are required. He makes a good soldier, a good husband, a sincere friend, the best of servants :—he is a good comrade, a sublime dupe. The dog—men furnish heroes, poets, philanthropists, faithful notaries, model grocers, commissionnaires, water-carriers, cashiers, bank-clerks, and letter-carriers : in fine, they always select such offices as leave them free to remain honest men.

“But the brave Dog, though adapted to feel love, seldom has his affection returned. He married some one who has seduced him :—He lends money to young play-wrights, who notwithstanding will not send him a pit ticket :—His wife whom he adores, is a coquet, and he is ruined by his children. Socrates, Regulus, Epaminondas, and Washington belong to this devoted class.

The Cat man on the contrary has none of the good qualities of the Dog man, but he reaps all their attendant advantages. He is egotistical, avaricious, ambitious and envious, jealous and perfidious ; but he is prudent, adroit, agreeable, gracious, persuasive, gifted with intelligence, management, and seduction. He possesses an infused experience; he makes a shrewd guess when knowledge fails; he finds out what they wish to conceal from him; he absorbs with impunity everything calculated to injure him. The Cat man never cultivates useless virtues, but he easily acquires all profitable ones. This race furnishes great diplomatists, prime ministers, K——s but we will not give offence. It supplies seducers, and generally all those whom women call perfidious. Ulysses and Hannibal, Pericles and the Maréchal de Richelieu, belong to the Feline race. We are indebted to it for most of our fashionable beaux and many statesmen, for instance M. de—— but we will not be guilty of flattery.

* This quality including good-nature united to weakness of character, not having an exact equivalent in English, we retain the original.

“ But the finest specimen of all is the Cat reared up among the noble race of Dogs,—for instance in Brittany. He becomes the irresistible being, the superior man. He preserves his address and profound intelligence, his infallible instinct, his finesse, his grace; and he acquires all the good properties of his patrons. He even exhibits among his Dog friends an extra amount of goodness, for it is difficult to preserve a just medium in circumstances not of habit, nor natural. A converted Cat is much more generous than a Dog. He is determined to surpass every one. * * Buonaparte was a Cat brought up among the Dogs. He was a Corsican whose dreams were of glory not of revenge.

27th October, 1837. “ The other day we were guilty of a great imprudence, though the dog and cat division was well enough received. It was a pleasure to see the Cats coming forward and humbly avow themselves to belong to the canine division, while a great Newfoundland cunningly confessed in a low voice, ‘ I was frightened by the article, for I had some doubts about being considered a cat.’ The Meneurs and Menées came off very fairly too: it was a serious idea (not one of ours), and offended no one, as who may not reckon himself among the Meneurs! Weakness of character is full of self-deceit, and uses all sorts of misnomers to disguise itself. Obstinacy, which is a weakness of the first order, gives its name to those with whom it abides as ‘ strength of opinion;’ indecision calls itself ‘ prudence;’ stupidity is ‘ constancy of opinion;’ and laziness, ‘ force of inertia.’ Thus the feeble-minded not recognising themselves among the Menées, have made no complaint; but how could the unwashed be deceived or propitiated! People may believe themselves good when they are evil, intelligent when they are silly, or charming when they are ugly; but no one can suppose that his hands are clean unless they have been washed. The water is there to give the lie.

Error is impossible ; a flatterer could not persuade the greatest fool in this matter. A crowd of courtiers would lose their labour flattering a prince on the grace with which he had just washed his hands, if the ablution had not taken place. Behold the imprudence we have been guilty of in launching a shaft which had sped so unerringly to the centre of the butt, and the number of enemies we have made among the dirty-fingered : it is really frightful."

However often M. de Girardin thought it expedient to change his political creed, we have not been able to discover through the four volumes of his lady's passing observations, any views not consistent with rational liberty and good government, as we understand them on this side of the "sea sleeve." Her equanimity was frequently disturbed by the little street insurrections so pleasantly described by De Bernard in L'Homme Sérieux.* In the paper of March 6th, 1839, she thus speaks :—

"The Émeute has not come to the gathering point ; it has not proceeded yet to blows, it scolds. It abuses the people who pass in voitures. If it perceive a lady inside a coach, it cries, 'oh ! you are at your ease ; you will take no trouble you can avoid : can't you go on foot as we do ?' And not a harness or coach maker has protested against this outcry. It is evident that the boot and shoe makers are in the majority. 'No more hackney coaches !' you say. Be it so. Let us go on foot for the benefit of the commonweal ; but let the reform be adopted in its full rigor. Go on then, coachmen, grooms, footmen, hostlers, huntsmen, and prickers. We are the friends of the people—we will not indulge in a luxury which offends its delicate nostrils. Go on good people : make out your living some other way : we don't want you : quit the stables, and become good citizens.

"And now that we must go on foot, what shall we do with these useless ornaments ? What good, for instance, in a gown of white satin or sky-blue velvet to walk the streets ? a woollen stuff will do quite well. Go to then, brave weavers of our old city of Lyons, quit your looms, you are free : we have no further need of your services. No more drudgery—be happy, and turn out good citizens.

"But if our ladies are no more to don these proud dresses, why should they use expensive lace ? Down with all laces then, black and white, laces in relief, blonde laces, point de Paris, point de Alençon. Down we say with these humiliating ornaments ! the women of the people will not have them. As a friend of the people we will not have the woman more bedizened than the man. No more the floating veil ! ridiculous net, so often torn, so often replaced. Lace merchants, close your shops ; give a holiday to your poor women : their eyes are injured by the delicate nature of their work. We are more generous than you, and will give them rest.

* See IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, No.

"We have suppressed horses, coaches, satin, silk, lace: why should we spare jewels, the insulting jewels worn for no purpose by the rich, but to excite the envy of those who cannot afford them? What is the use of diamonds for instance, but to tempt the thieves? How can a lady crown her head with diamonds, and so many poor without bread! it is unjust. Jewellers, please to close your shops: we have no need of you, my friends: your art only serves to irritate the poor: you encourage vice in exhibiting all these treasures: go, do penance, and become good citizens.

"But the ribbons! Ah! they are so light, so graceful, so pretty! spare them. And why should we spare them? They fasten nothing, neither the hair, nor the dress: they are only ornaments, and ornaments must not be retained. The useful, and nothing but the useful! the useful is now the ornamental: we need to be dressed, not ornamented. What need have you of ribbons, Madam? To keep you warm! eh! No. Then renounce ribbons, and give rest to the thousands of arms that are now fatiguing themselves at St. Etienne to indulge your caprices. Leave these brave men time to occupy themselves with politics. Why should they spend the long day at labor? To support their wives and children—nonsense. It is only to indulge your whims in the fabrication of cabbage heads, true love knots, and perfect contentments, charming fantasies to which your inconstancy adds a new name every year. No more ribbons, dear weavers! you are all good citizens: cross your arms, and amuse yourselves with an excursion on your railroad.

"But as we have extinguished silks, velvets, manufactures of Lyons and manufactures of St. Etienne, why should we not render their liberty to the silk worms? The poor creatures! they are literally stifled. They are kept in an intolerable atmosphere; their fate is frightful. Poor insect! our luxury has kept you in durance vile, till now: bless this era of equality which restores you to liberty. The first century of our era saw the emancipation of the woman, the twelfth that of the slave, the eighteenth took the chains off the serf, the nineteenth will see the freedom of the silk worm. But here a disagreeable idea intrudes. What will the interesting reptile do with his independence? To pass from the dense air of servitude to which he has been accustomed for ages, into the inebriating atmosphere of liberty, will be too abrupt a transition to a being so delicate. And then you cannot emancipate an entire nation of caterpillars without some anxiety for their future well being. What employment can we procure for the insect? Shall we make him a citizen, or allow him political rights? he would not thank us for these privileges. Perhaps the place of butterfly in the royal gardens, or cockchafer in the crown forests might be secured for him.

"The more we think, the wider spreads the economical field before us. Suppress rich dress and ornament: then will the women, particularly the ugly ones, give no encouragement to mirrors, toilet-tables, or psyches. The manufacture of glass ceases, and the contented workmen will turn out the best of citizens. No longer caring to be seen by others, of course we go to no expense for crystal lustres or candelabras of gilt bronze. Ladies at a party in woollen dressess, would not relish to be set in high relief by these artificial suns. Smash the chandeliers! the lights of the understanding will suffice for us: behold thousands of workmen now metamorphosed into joyous citizens!

"And now figure to yourself, saddlers, lace makers, ribbon weavers, and workers in bronze, giving their arms to their wives, and followed by their children, hungry and on foot, but on foot like the rest of the world; without money but equally without envy, without bread but without humiliation, without salary but without a tyrant master, naked but free, wretched but proud, and enjoying that greatest of luxuries, idleness.

"There will be no longer a barrier between poor and rich; the strictest equality will unite the great and little, for all will be little. The dreams of our modern economists will be fulfilled, and themselves will be content. They will rub their hands,—perhaps they would wash them, but for a long time, Windsor soap (made at Marseilles), will have been suppressed as a most unnecessary fantasy; the reign of the people will be established, and the enemies of opulence triumphant."

"After all, these very means will be the surest to establish aristocracy in time. Why were sumptuary laws enacted in former ages? Why in Rome and Venice, did they forbid expensive displays? Merely to prevent the nobility from impoverishing themselves by their follies, and enriching the inferior classes by their spoils. You say that the great are enriched by the sweat of the poor; on the contrary the people are fattened on the prodigal follies of the rich nobles. It is because the Duke of——is ruined by his waistcoats, that his tailor has made a fortune; the Marquis of——and the count of—— have lost their estates on the race-course, and Crémieux and Hobbs are thereby enriched. And you desire that our young elegants should go on foot! they ought to be thankful to you, for you save them from that misery which would make them your equals; and you deprive the people who labor, of all the money they would gain by these young fools. Bravo gentlemen! you establish sumptuary laws which your opponents would not venture to tamper with, and which in the end will crush yourselves; you protect accumulated fortunes in forbidding their owners to spend them, you stifle growing ones which might tend by rivalling them in time to preserve equality; in fine you work for the revival of the aristocracy, but the masses will pardon you as being ultra-democrats."

* Notwithstanding all our Lady's keenness of penetration, moderate fortunes and little luxurious expenditure would make a happier state of things than our present boundless luxury and miserable destitution. It is a hard thing for a delicately nurtured lady, one gifted with a fine taste for literary and other luxuries, to see these things from the point of view of the struggling tradesman or labourer.

It would not be doing justice to our fair writer, if we omitted to give some specimen of her devotional thoughts and feelings. The reader will be struck with the religious element as seen through her poetic coloring.

“Every one of us has some favorite festival. Some prefer the FÊTE DIEU, and regret the beautiful processions, which formerly traversed the city in every direction, with waving banners, young girls with downcast eyes, and adorned with white crowns and veils, and battalions of choir children exhibiting their scarlet robes in the sun. And then the rich tapestries hung out from balconies, the magnificent tabernacles, with their rich accompaniments of superb candelabras, and precious vases—fairest mansions that could be devised by the rich of the earth to receive the Lord of Heaven. It is the most poetic of ceremonies, the vapour of perfumes uniting itself to the scent of roses, so as to intoxicate the senses of the devout worshippers.

“Other spirits, we should say other hearts affect the day of the ASSUMPTION. For them the BLESSED MARY is the heavenly load-star: from her radiates the effulgence of beauty, purity, and love. She rules by every claim and right; she unites the chastity of the young Virgin to the august dignity of the Mother; she is powerful by her grace, absolute by her sweetness, awful in her innocence; and yet it is to her intercession we sue, to obtain pardon of offences against this spotless virtue.

“To young wives, the festival of CHRISTMAS is a welcome solemnity. The lovely new-born INFANT captivates their eyes: they feel for him devotion blended with maternal love. To the hearts of women, the Saviour of the world scarcely speaks as powerfully as the INFANT JESUS. This festival is of so affecting a character, that it once made a poet of a friend of ours, who was very ignorant of verse, till one morning, when on returning from early mass she improvised the following stanzas.”

Then follow some beautiful lines, which we would most gladly translate, had the poetic gift been among our birth-day presents. They are the aspirations of a childless mother for that very doubtful blessing, a child. We pray some lady on whom the divine afflatus has breathed, to open the fourth volume at page 10, and send us, either prepaid or unpaid, a worthy transfusion of the sweet poesy they will there find. Delphine was then a young childless wife, and there is an indescribable melancholy charm about the lines, that may be well attributed to this circumstance.

“TWELFTH DAY is also an imposing festival from the prevailing sentiment which it brings with it. These proud kings prostrate before the lowly crib, human power humbling itself before the divine, the crown lost in the encircling glory,—all these images, grand and gracious at the same time, strike the soul by their deep meaning, and charm the eyes by their vastness. Along with this the EPIPHANY is a household festival. It brings together a joyful group animated with sportive contests, and childish merriment. It is celebrated with joy while the family reunion is complete; but alas, where a seat is vacant, the festival is only a day of mourning.

"But our own favorite solemnity is PALM SUNDAY. The very sight of a bit of blessed palm (box wood) still affects us as when a child. At Rome they have the genuine palm brought from the environs of Genoa. God knows how we love the palms! and with what profound respect we are inspired by this tree of the Scriptures! these waving branches embracing in themselves all the poetry of the EAST; and yet the memories of our childhood are so strong, that the sacred palm blessed by the Pope himself, had a weaker effect on us than a little branch of Parisian box wood.

"Last Sunday the inhabitants of this great city seemed to sympathise strongly with us. The drivers of the public vehicles had the collars of their horses ornamented with branches of palm, and the women returning from church had their hands filled with a provision of the blessed shrub. Every one attached an idea, a belief, a souvenir to this sacred ornament, which he or she was going to fasten over some revered object—one over the portrait of his mother, another (it must be confessed) above the bust of Napoleon, a third over the holy-water vessel, a fourth over the image of her patroness. 'What folly,' cry the philosophers, 'to pay such reverence to a dwarfish little shrub, which scarcely requires an inch of soil, and is only fit for making combs and snuff boxes!' Ah, what fine people the philosophers are! they never have the slightest distrust of themselves: their proud revelations, their lofty thoughts are ever at command; and they have no need of exterior objects to recal them from a distance. What use can the image be to him who is never without the idea, or the guardian recollection to him, whom a defect of memory has never led into a fault? We acknowledge that we have not this strength of soul. We have need in our hours of prostration of a holy image, of a sacred souvenir, to come to our assistance. when our souls are in trouble, consolation and counsel enter again through our eyes; and we make this acknowledgment the more readily, as we have seen minds of a very superior order subject to the same weakness."

The longest article must have an end, but in this instance it is not for lack of material, as our selections have scarcely extended beyond the first volume. For an exact picture of the period over which the papers extended, as to fashions, public feeling, state of the fine arts, groupings in private and public life, they will be of the greatest value to the future historian of those things which are neglected by the setters up of the skeletons of past national events. We scarcely know a book better adapted to fill up hours spent in railroad carriages, by the banks of country streams, or on the rocks of watering places. Accounts of spectacles, races at Chantilly, exhibitions, fireworks, and glances at the fashions, necessarily occupied some space as the feuilletons appeared. They will enter into the tableaux of some future Macaulay of the Champs Elysées; but to a large portion of ordinary readers they would be supremely uninteresting. However they do not take up disproportionate space. Some of the novels of this lady have not given us as much satisfaction as these journals of the Chevalier de Launay. From the healthy tone of his lucubrations we expected something more edifying than the plan and details of the Marquis de Pontanges. A model lady marries a violent idiot (we would be glad to know how the dispensation was procured), and bestows the most tender care on him. Lovelace becomes domesticated at the castle; and if she does not fall into his clutches, it is not her religious nor moral strength that saves her. We are made to see however that if she had gone astray, it would be a mere self-sacrifice to her lover's ease of mind, not a gratification to herself.* This fascinating youth at last runs off out of pique, and marries; but on returning from the church with his bride, he hears of the death of his true love's husband. Oh, woe and desolation! he runs off to her chateau, and she knowing nothing of his marriage, receives him with the sincerest joy, as her future husband.

However she is presently undeceived, and he is obliged to be off to console his deserted spouse. When she considers herself cured of her fantasy, they meet again in the gay world. He is more infatuated than ever, and she, finding her heart not entirely healed, makes a marriage of reason and esteem. This is done suddenly, and without the knowledge of Lovelace, whose wife dies most inconveniently the very same time. After some genuine, but not very enduring sorrow on his part, he flies like a steam coach to the castle of his long tried love, and is politely welcomed by her husband. We next hear of him in a mad house, and we are not informed that she enjoyed much happiness in her second espousals. She is however strongly commended for having retained her virtue and reason between two madmen. Now, however faulty the novel may be in outline and coloring, there was evidently no malice preference in the authoress's mind. She wrote to excite sympathy for the sufferings which the weaker portion of humanity endure at the hands of their selfish and unprincipled tyrants.

It is probable that Gay had no design of encouraging informers' or turnkeys' daughters to loose conduct, or shop-boys to take to the road, when he wrote his dramatic sermon against hypocrisy and political knavery ; yet the Beggar's Opera is a decidedly unedifying spectacle for young people. Blame of the same quality but lighter in quantity, may be justly laid to the Marquis of Portanges.

The Lorgnon (Eye-glass) is a very pleasant novellette. She evidently sketches herself in the heroine of the story : for the hastiness of expression, occasional sharpness of repartee or sarcasm, speedy remorse, and satisfaction for pain given thereby, kindness of heart, and defence of absent friends, qualities ascribed to the lady of the story, are thoroughly appropriate to herself, as we find her painted by her sorrowing literary friends and admirers.

In Balzac's Cane, an article which, carried in its master's left hand renders him invisible, she humourously ascribes his wonderful insight into character, modes of life of all classes, intimate knowledge of puzzling business affairs, &c., to the wonderful virtue of his bamboo—we are sorry for not having room for the extract.

It is surprising, and pleasant at the same time, to find respectful and affectionate references to religious usages, and sincere tribute to the spirit of religious influence, thro various papers of the series, when we reflect on the continual attendance of such lax professors as Balzac, Théophile Gautier, Latouche, &c., at her select reunions. Though we hear of no domestic complaints nor amicable arrangements for living apart, but on the contrary, great and successful efforts made at times by the lady to extricate the gentleman out of the hands of powerful foes in high places, we can scarcely suppose that her married life was blessed with much domestic comfort ; she, living in the world of poetry and romance, he occupied day and night, struggling for a high political position, devising giant posters for the dead walls, and canards for the rise and fall of bubble and other shares in new companies. She is gone, and France will not see her peer for a century to come.

ART. III.—FAT AND LEAN.

1. The Philosophy of Living. By Herbert Mayo, M.D.
Third Edition. London: Parker, 1851.
2. Physiologie Du Gout, ou Meditations de Gastronomie Transcendante, &c. &c. Paris: Charpentier, 1842.

If we were a physician we should first write a good history of obesity; we should then establish one empire in that nook of science, and we should have the double advantage of having for our patients those who enjoy the best health, and of being daily besieged by the fairest portion of the human race; for to have a natural portion of plumpness—to be neither too much, nor too little in flesh—is the study of woman's entire life.

What we have not done, some doctor will yet do; and if he be skilful, discreet, and of an amiable disposition, we promise him miracles of success. “Exoriare aliquis nostris ex ossibus hæres.” We understand by obesity that state of oily congestion, in which, although the individual be not sick, his limbs increase by degrees in size, and lose their original form and symmetry.

There is a kind of obesity which is confined to the abdomen; it is rarely observed in woman; as their fibre is softer and much weaker, when they are attacked by obesity, it spares nothing. We call this variety gastrophory, and gastrophories those who are attacked by it. We are even one of this class ourselves; but although our corporation is rather prominent, the lower part of the leg is thin and wiry, and the nerve as free as in an Arab steed.

Nevertheless we have always looked upon this developement as our greatest enemy. We have however conquered it, and reduced it to a fixed and convenient size: but to overcome it, it was necessary to make war against it; and it is to a contest of thirty years that we owe whatever we have gained by the struggle. This was also Savarin's weakness. He writes:—

“I will begin by giving an extract from more than five hundred dialogues which I formerly had with my table companions, who were threatened with, and suffering from obesity.

Obese.—What delicious bread! Where do you get it?

Myself.—At Limet's, rue de Richelieu; he is baker to their R. H. the Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Condé; I get it because he is a neighbour of mine, and I continue it because I have said he makes the best bread in the world.

Obese.—I shall take a note of it, I eat a good deal of bread, and with such bread as this I should never wish for any other.

Another Obese.—But what are you doing there? You are collecting all the meat in your soup, without touching that fine Carolina rice.

Myself.—It is a particular regime that I have adopted.

Obese.—It's a bad regime! I am passionately fond of rice, as well as lees, paste, and such things; nothing is more nourishing, cheaper, or more easily procured.

A perfect Obese.—Be kind enough sir, to pass me up those potatoes that you have before you. At the rate things are going, I fear I shall be late.

Myself.—There they are at your hand.

Obese.—But serve yourself first; there is enough for us both, and after us the end of the world.

Myself.—As for me, I never use potatoes; I look upon them as only useful in time of famine; in any other case I think them abominably insipid.

Obese.—This is a gastronomical heresy! there is nothing better than potatoes; I eat them in every form; and should they be served up at the second course, either à la lyonnaise, or au soufflé, I here protest that I am resolved to have my rights.

A lady Obese.—I should feel much obliged for those Soissons beans which I perceive at the end of the table.

Myself.—After having complied with the request, and humming to myself a well known air—

Les Soissonnais sont heureux,
Les haricots sont chez eux.

Obese.—Don't joke; they are a source of great wealth for that country. Paris consumes an immense quantity. I must also claim your indulgence for those small beans that grow in marshy ground, and which are called Windsor beans; when they are young, they are a dish for the gods.

Myself.—My curse on all beans!

Obese, with a determined air.—I scorn your anathema; will it not be said that you are a council in yourself, that you wish to dictate to every body?

Myself to another lady.—I have to congratulate you, madam, on your improved health; it seems to me that you have got somewhat stouter since last I had the pleasure of seeing you.

Obese.—I am probably indebted for that to my new regime.

Myself.—How is that?

Obese. For some time I breakfast on good gravy soup, a bowl sufficient for two; and such soup! the spoon would stand in it.

Myself to another.—Madam, if I am not deceived by your eyes, you will accept a part of this charlotte I am about to cut for you.

Obese.—Then, Sir, my eyes do deceive you; I have before me two things which I prefer; and they are both of the masculine gender ; the one is this cake of rice from the gold coasts ; the other is this enormous Savoy biscuit ; for you must know that I am passionately fond of sweet pastry.

To another lady.—Allow me, Madam, while they are discussing politics, the other side, to serve you to this Frangipane tart ?

Obese.—With the greatest pleasure, there is nothing agrees with me better than pastry. We have as tenant of ours a pastry cook ; and between my daughter and myself, I believe we expend the whole of the rent, and even more, on pastry.

Myself, after looking at the young lady.—It seems to agree with you wonderfully, your daughter is a very fine looking person, well fed.

Obese.—Well, sir, would you believe that her companions sometimes tell her she is too fat.

Myself.—It is perhaps from motives of envy.

Obese.—That is very possible. But I mean to get her married, and the first child will settle all that.

It is by such conversation that I have illustrated a theory, the elements of which I did not think existed in the human species : which is that corpulency is chiefly produced by a diet too much mixed with mealy substances ; and thus I learned that the same system of diet is always followed by the same effect.

And so we find that carnivorous animals never get fat (the wolf, the jackall, birds of pray, the raven, &c., for instance)

Herbivorous animals do not get very fat, at least so long as age has not reduced them to a state of repose ; and on the contrary they have been always known to fatten, and in a little time, when they are fed on potatoes, corn and meal of every description.

Obesity is unknown amongst savages, or amongst those who are obliged to work to support themselves, and who eat but what is necessary to support life."

According to the preceding observations, the truth of which any one can verify, it is easy to determine the chief causes of obesity.

The first is the natural disposition of the individual. Almost all men come into the world with certain predispositions of which they bear the mark on their countenance. Out of a hundred who die of consumption, ninety-nine have brown hair, the visage long and the nose pointed. Out of a hundred obeses ninety-nine have short faces, round eyes and flat noses.

It is then true that there are some persons predestined to a certain degree of obesity, and whose digestive faculties, supposing everything else equal, absorb a greater quantity of fat.

This physical fact, of which we are thoroughly convinced, has the effect of making us take rather pleasant views of things on certain occasions.

When we meet in society a young girl, very sprightly, rosy-cheeked, with a roguish nose, round figure, plump fat hands and short round little-feet, every one is delighted with her, and consider her a charming creature ; whereas we, instructed by experience, look upon her when ten years older, and see the ravages which obesity shall have made on all that is now so fresh and so much admired, and we lament over afflictions that have not yet come. This premature compassion is a painful feeling, and furnishes a proof amongst a thousand others, that man would be more unhappy if he could see into futurity.

The second and principal cause of obesity lies in the meal or flour which is the principal element of our daily food.

We have already stated that all animals fed on farinuous substances are sure to fatten ; and man is subject to the same laws.

Mealy food produces more expeditiously, and with more certainty, its effects when it is mixed with sugar ; the sugar and fat contain hydrogen, a principle common to both ; and they are both inflammable substances. Being thus combined, it is the more active, inasmuch as it is agreeable to the taste, and thus sweet meats are seldom taken before the natural appetite is satisfied, when there remains but that other appetite for luxuries, which we are obliged to excite by all that the most refined art and the most enticing changes can produce.

This kind of food is not less incrustating when it is mixed with drink, as beer and other beverages of the same nature. Those who drink it habitually are known to have the largest bellies, and some families in Paris who, in 1817, drank beer for economy, because wine was too dear, were rewarded by an increase in their appearance which they found very inconvenient.

A double cause of obesity results from too much indulging in sleep, and want of exercise.

The human body gains much during sleep, while it loses but little, as the muscular action is suspended. It would be necessary then that the surplus acquired during sleep be spent by exercise ; but by the fact of sleeping too much we deprive ourselves of the opportunity of action.

Another consequence is that, as great sleepers avoid even the shadow of fatigue, the excess of assimilation is carried away by the force of circulation, and becomes charged, by a process, of which nature has reserved to herself the secret, with additional particles of hydrogen ; and fat is formed to be deposited by the same operation, in the capsules of the cellular tissue.

The final cause of obesity consists in excess in eating and drinking.

It has been well remarked that one of the privileges of the human species is to be able to eat without being hungry, and drink without being thirsty. This is a privilege that does not belong to the brute, for it has its origin in our indulging in the pleasures of the table, and our passion for prolonging them. This two-fold propensity has been found wherever man exists; we know that savages eat to excess, and get brutally intoxicated whenever the opportunity presents itself.

We take from Savarin the following curious passages:—

“We have before us an example which may be known to half Paris.

Mr. Lang had one of the most brilliant houses of the city; he was particularly noted for the splendour of his entertainments, but he was as remarkable for his bad stomach as he was for his love of the pleasures of the table, and he ate, what he knew would not agree with him, with a courage worthy of a better fate.

Everything went on well up to the coffee inclusively; but soon his stomach rebelled against the labour imposed upon it, pains set in, and the unfortunate man was obliged to throw himself on a sofa, where he remained till the next day, to expiate, by long sufferings, the pleasures of a moment.

What is most remarkable is that he never reformed; during his life he was known to submit to this strange alternative; and his sufferings of the day before had no effect on the repast of the next.

Those whose stomachs are in order are effected by excess in eating and drinking in the manner we have stated in the preceding instance. Everything is digested; and what is not necessary for the renovation of the body becomes settled and is converted into fat.

Others again suffer from constant indigestion; whatever they take does no good, and those who are ignorant of the cause are surprised that so many good things do not produce a better effect.

It may be easily seen that I am not exhausting, or entering too minutely into this subject: there are many other secondary causes which spring from our habits, the confused state of our passions and pleasures, which aid and stimulate those I have specified.

I leave all that to my successor whom I have introduced in the beginning of this chapter, and will confine myself to what is the right of the first come in all matters.

It is now many years since intemperance first attracted the attention of observers. Philosophers extolled temperance, princes made laws to promote it, religion censured all excesses in eating and drinking, but, alas! people ate as much as ever, and the pleasures of the table are indulged in more and more every day.

I should perhaps be more fortunate were I to take another course. I shall describe the physical inconveniences of the stomach, self preservation perhaps will be more persuasive than the voice of religion, more eloquent than sermons, more powerful than laws, and I am convinced that the fair sex will not be deaf to the voice of reason and common sense.

Inconveniences of Obesity.

Obesity has a very disagreeable effect on both sexes, inasmuch as it impairs both strength and beauty.

It impairs strength, because in increasing the weight of the body to be put in motion, it does not increase the motive power; it is still more injurious in obstructing respiration, which renders it impossible to continue, for any time, any occupation which requires muscular strength.

Obesity impairs beauty as it destroys that harmony of proportion primitively established; because all the parts do not increase to the same extent, or in the same manner.

It is injurious to it also by filling up those cavities which nature intended to be empty: hence, nothing is more common than to meet faces which were once interesting, and which obesity has rendered almost insignificant.

Napoleon was not an exception to this law. He became very stout during his last campaigns; from pale his complexion assumed a dull and heavy appearance, and his eyes lost a good deal of their usual expression.

Obesity produces a dislike for dancing, walking, riding, and an unfitness for all kinds of occupations and amusements which require activity and skill.

It predisposes us also to various diseases, such as apoplexy, dropsy, ulcers on the legs, and other affections difficult to be cured.

Examples of Obesity.

Amongst the heroes who were remarkable for their size, I only remember Marius, and John Sobieski.

Marius, who was originally of small stature, became as broad as he was long; and it was perhaps his huge size that frightened the Cimbri who were sent to murder him.

As to the King of Poland, his obesity was very near costing him his life. Having fallen into the midst of the main body of the Turkish cavalry, before which he was obliged to fly, he soon lost his breath, and he would have been certainly killed, if some of his aides-de-camps had not supported him, almost insensible, on his horse, while others generously sacrificed themselves to stop the enemy. If I am not mistaken the Duke de Vendôme, that worthy son of the great Henry, was also remarkable for his size. He died at an inn; abandoned by all; he had strength enough to see the last of his followers carry off the cushion on which he was lying, at the moment when he was about to breath his last.

History furnishes numerous examples of monstrous obesity; I shall omit them to speak only of those that have come under my own observation.

M. Rameau, my school-fellow, Mayor of Chaleur, in Burgundy, was only five feet two inches, and weighed twenty stone.

The Duke of Luynes, with whom I often sat on the bench, became an enormous size, his naturally fine figure was quite deformed by his huge shape, and he spent the last years of his life in a state of almost habitual somnolency.

But the most extraordinary of all that I have seen in this way is a native of New York, whom many Frenchmen, at present living in Paris, may remember to have seen in Broadway, seated in an immense arm chair, the legs of which were strong enough to support a church. Edwards was at least five feet ten, French measurement, and eight feet in circumference. His fingers were like those of the Roman emperor who wore his wife's necklaces as rings ; his arms and thighs were like tubes, of the size of an ordinary man's body, and he had feet like an elephant, which were concealed by the size of his legs ; his lower eye-lids were considerably drawn down by the weight of fat ; but what made him hideous to look at was his three chins, or spheroids which were hanging on his chest more than a foot long, so that his figure presented the appearance of the capital of a wreathed column. In this state Edwards passed his days, at the window, in a ground parlour which looked into the street, drinking, from time to time, his glass of ale, of which he had always a large tankard before him.

Such an extraordinary figure could not but attract the attention of the passers by, whom, if they imprudently delayed anytime, Edwards was sure to put to flight, roaring with a sepulchral voice : " what do you stare at, like wild cats ! Go your way, you lazy body. Begone, you good for nothing dogs," and such other gentle phrases. Having often saluted him by his name, I frequently conversed with him ; he assured me that he was not dissatisfied with his condition, that he was not unhappy, and that if death would not trouble him he would be satisfied to live so till the end of the world.

It follows from the preceding that, if obesity be not a disease, it is at least an indisposition, into which we fall, almost always, through our own fault.

It follows also that it is a state that all should endeavour to avoid who are not attacked by it, and that when they are, they should lose no time in curing themselves ; it is for their benefit that we are about to investigate those resources with which science, aided by experience has provided us.

*Preservative against, or curative treatment of Obesity.

I will begin this article by a fact which proves that it requires much resolution and strength of mind to preserve ourselves from, or to cure obesity.

* It is about twenty years since I undertook to write a treatise ex officio, on obesity. My readers have much reason to regret the preface ; it was somewhat of a dramatic form ; and in it I proved to a doctor that fever was much less fatal than a law-suit ; for by the latter the litigant is kept in constant anxiety and suspense, obliged to swear falsely, and to suffer all sorts of annoyance ; and after being deprived of his rest, his pleasures and his money, finishes by dying of a broken heart : a truth as useful to be known as any other.

M. Louis Greffulhe, whom his majesty subsequently honoured with the title of count, came to me one morning, and said he had been informed that I was about publishing a work on obesity; that he was in much danger of being attacked by it, and wished to have my advice.

"Sir," said I to him, "not being a physician I am at liberty to refuse you: however I am at your service, but on one condition, which is, that you will pledge your word of honor that you will rigorously observe for one month, the line of conduct which I shall propose to you."

M. Greffulhe made the required promise, shaking me by the hand, and the next day I delivered him my fetva, the first article of which was to weigh himself at the beginning and end of the treatment, in order to have a mathematical basis to verify the result.

A month afterwards M. Greffulhe came to me and spoke nearly as follows:—

"Sir, I have followed your directions with as much care as if my life depended upon it, and I have found that my weight diminished by something more than three pounds. But to arrive at this result I have been obliged to do such violence to my feelings and my habits; in a word I have suffered so much, that in thanking you for your valuable advice, I renounce whatever good I might derive from it, and I resign myself for the future, to whatever Providence has reserved for me."

After coming to this resolution, which I heard with much pain, the event proved what might be expected: M. Greffulhe got more and more into flesh, suffered all the inconveniences of extreme obesity, and, when scarcely forty years of age, he died of a fit of apoplexy to which he was subject.

Generalities.

Every remedy against obesity should begin with those three precepts of absolute theory; discretion in eating, moderation in sleep, and exercise by walking and riding; these are the principal resources afforded us by science; however I have not much confidence in them, because, from my experience of men and things, I know that no prescription which is not carried out to the letter can have any effect.

For 1st, It requires much self-control to stand up from table before our appetite is satisfied; as long as we feel this want, whatever we take irresistably leads us to take more; and in general we eat as long as we are hungry, in spite of doctors, but perhaps by the example of doctors.

2nd, You could not pain persons suffering from obesity more, than to propose to them to get up early: they will tell you their health would not permit it, that when they rise early they are good for nothing during that day; the women will complain of their eyes being dull and heavy; all are satisfied to stop up late at night, and reserve the entire morning for sleep; this is one resource lost.

3rd, Riding is a dear remedy, and is not adapted to people of all circumstances, and to every position.

If you propose to a handsome woman to take exercise on horseback, she will gladly consent, but on three conditions: first, that she shall have a fine horse, both fiery and gentle; the second is, that she have a new riding habit, cut after the last fashion; the third is, that she shall have a gentleman to accompany her, agreeable and well-looking. It is very difficult to procure all these, and therefore riding is out of the question.

Walking gives rise to many more objections. It tires one to death; it makes us perspire, and exposes us to cold; the dust ruins the stockings; the stones get through the thin shoes, and it is impossible to continue. In fine, if, during any of those various attempts, they suffer the slightest head-ache, or a pimple the size of the head of a pin should appear on the skin, they put it down to the system; it is abandoned at once, and the doctor gets furious.

Being thus convinced that to reduce our size we must eat with moderation, sleep little, and take as much exercise as possible, we must, however look for another way to arrive at this result. There is an infallible method for preventing our corpulency growing to excess, or diminishing it when it has come to that point. This method, which is based on well known principles of physics and chemistry, consists in a dietary system adapted to the end we wish to attain.

Of all medicinal remedies, system is the most effective, because it is always in operation, day and night, sleeping and waking; because the effect is reproduced every day, and it ends in subduing all parts of the body.

The anti-obésique regimen has been suggested as the principal and most general cause of obesity, since it has been proved that it is by mealy substances that fat is generated, in man, as well as in the brute; since with regard to the latter we see this effect produced every day under our eyes, in the trade of fat cattle to which it has given rise, we may conclude with certainty, that an abstinence, more or less rigid from all mealy food, will have the effect of reducing our size.

"Good Heaven!" exclaim my readers, of both sexes, "see what a savage this professor is: he condemns in one word everything we like, this fine bread from Linet's, those biscuits from Achard's, those cakes from——and all those good things which are made with flour and butter flour and sugar, and of flour, sugar and eggs. He does not except even potatoes, nor macarones. Who would ever expect this from an amateur who appeared in every other respect so amiable?"

"What is that," I ask, putting on a very wry face, which I assume once a year. "Well then, eat as long and as much as you like, get fat; become ugly, heavy, asthmatic, and die, if you choose of fat: depend upon it, you shall appear in my second edition. But, what now! This seems to terrify you, and you pray to avert the blow: take courage; I shall lay down a rule for you, and prove that there are yet enjoyments reserved for you on this earth where we live but to eat. You like bread: well then you shall eat rye bread; it has been long since extolled by the excellent Cadet de Vaux; it is less strengthening, and certainly not so palatable, which makes it less difficult not to eat too much. For to be sure of ourselves, we must avoid temptation; bear this well in mind, it is worth remembering."

"Are you fond of soup: take it then, a la gaulienne, with green vegetables, such as cabbages, herbs &c. but I forbid bread, pies, or pea soup.

"You may partake of everything at the first course, with a few exceptions, such as rice and hot pastry. Eat, but eat with discretion, if you do not wish to satisfy a want hereafter, which will not exist unless you make it now.

"The second course is about to appear, and now all your good resolutions will be put to the test. Avoid all farinuous substances, under whatever form they may be presented. You have roast fowl, salad and vegetables of which you can partake; and since you will be served to sweetmeats, prefer chocolate cream, and orange jellies, &c. &c.

"Now comes the dessert. More danger: but, if up to this, you have acted prudently, you have nothing to fear.

"Have nothing to do with the ends of the table (they are always provided with cakes, more or less ornamented) take neither biscuits nor macarons; you have all kinds of fruit, jams, and many other things which you will know how to select, if you follow my directions.

"After dinner I would advise you to take coffee and liqueur; and I would also recommend occasionally both tea and punch.

"For breakfast, rye bread by all means, chocolate rather than coffee. However, I do not object to coffee on milk, reasonably strong; no eggs, but everything else as you please. But breakfast can never be too early. When breakfast is late, dinner comes on before it is properly digested, which does not however prevent us from dining; and this habit of eating without an appetite, produces marked obesity, in as much as it is of frequent occurrence.

Up to this I have traced the outlines of a system which you should adopt when threatened by obesity; I will now add a few precepts as a remedy for it when you are attacked.

"Drink every summer, about thirty bottles of sedlitz-water, one large glass in the morning, two before dinner, and as many before going to bed. Use at dinner light white wine such as those of Anjou. Shun beer as you would the plague. Eat frequently raddishes, artichokes, pepper and salt, asparagus, celery, and cardoons; of meat you should prefer veal and fowl; never eat but the crust of bread; in cases of doubt be guided by some doctor who has adopted my system; and whatever time you begin to practice it, you shall before long feel fresh, lively, active and in good health, in a word fit for anything.

"Having thus placed you on your road, it is but right to point out the dangers to which you are exposed, lest that carried away by too great zeal in guarding against obesity, you might over-hit the mark by running into the opposite extreme.

"The danger to which I wish to draw your attention, is the constant use of acids, which are often recommended by ignorant people, and which experience has often proved to be most pernicious."

Dangers attending the use of acids.

There is a very dangerous doctrine prevalent amongst women, and which every year causes the death of many young persons, which is, that acids, especially vinegar, are a preservative against obesity.

No doubt, the frequent application of acids makes us thin, but it is injurious to our freshness, health and life itself; and although lemonade is the mildest of them all, there are few stomachs that can resist it a long time.

This is a fact which cannot be too well known; there are few of my readers who could not furnish me with examples in support of it; but I will select the following, as it somewhat relates to myself.

In 1776, I was residing at Dijon, studying a course of law in the faculty, a course of chemistry under M. Guyton de Morveau, then Attorney-general, and a course of domestic medicine under M. Maret, perpetual secretary of the Academy, and father of the Duke de Bassano.

I entertained a feeling of friendship for one of the handsomest persons I ever remember to have seen; I say a feeling of friendship, which is strictly true, and at the same time surprising, for I was then well disposed for stronger and more endearing ties.

This friendship, which we must take for what it was, and not for what it was likely to become, was characterised from the first moment of our acquaintance, by great familiarity, and we enjoyed that confidence in each other which seemed very natural to us both; our intercourse and whisperings without end, did not alarm mamma, for they had the appearance of innocence and simplicity, worthy of the primitive ages. Louise then, was very handsome, and she was particularly remarkable for that just proportion of classical fulness and roundness of figure, which the eye delights to dwell on, and artists glory in copying.

Although I was but her friend, I was by no means insensible to those charms which she unconsciously displayed; and perhaps they contributed, without my suspecting it, to that chaste sentiment which attached me to her. Let this be as it may, one evening, after looking at Louise with more attention than usual, "my dear friend," said I to her, "you are unwell; it seems to me that you have got thin."—"Oh! no," she replied with a melancholy smile, "I am very well, and if I am somewhat thinner than usual, I can, in that respect, afford to lose a little." "Lose!" replied I earnestly, "you don't want to lose or gain, remain as you are, charming creature," and other such phrases, as a friend of twenty has always at his command.

From this time, I looked upon the young girl with interest and uneasiness, and I soon observed her complexion become pale, her cheeks hollow, and her beauty gradually decaying. Oh! how fragile and passing is beauty! At last, I accompanied her to a ball, where she went as usual; I prevailed upon her to rest herself during two country-dances, and availing myself of this opportunity, I extorted from her the confession, that, annoyed by the pleasantries of some of her friends, who assured her that before two years, she would be as large as St. Christopher, and aided by the advice of others, she contrived to become thin by taking, every morning, a large glass of vinegar; she added, that up to that moment, no person knew anything of what she had been doing but myself.

I shuddered on hearing this confession, I felt the extent of the danger, and I lost no time in acquainting her mother of it the next day, who was as much alarmed as myself, for she idolized her daughter. No time was let pass in assembling her friends, and holding consultations, and medical aid was immediately called in. But all to no purpose! her health was irremediably undermined, and at a moment when her friends were beginning to suspect the danger, all hopes of her recovery were gone.

Thus, for having followed imprudent advice, after been reduced to the frightful state that accompanies consumption, the amiable Louise fell asleep for ever, when scarcely eighteen years of age.

She died casting a painful look on that future, which was lost to her for ever; and the idea of having, though unconsciously, shortened her own life, hastened her dissolution, and added to the sufferings of her last moments.

She was the first person I ever saw dying, for she breathed her last in my arms, at the moment when, according to her desire, I raised her up to show her the light of day for the last time.

About eight hours after her death, her afflicted mother requested me to accompany her in a last visit which she wished to pay the remains of her daughter; and we observed with surprise, that her whole countenance had assumed a bright extatic expression which we never remarked before. I was somewhat astonished, and the mother drew from it a consoling omen. But it seems this is not a rare occurrence. Lavater alludes to it in his Treatise on Physiognomy.

Anti-Obesique Belt.

Every Anti-Obesique regimen ought to be accompanied by a precaution which I had forgotten, and with which I should have commenced: it consists in wearing, both night and day, a belt to support the abdomen, tightened moderately.

In order to comprehend the necessity of it we should bear in mind that the vertebral column which forms one of the coats of the intestinal thigh, is firm and inflexible; whence it results, that all excess of weight that the intestines acquire, when they are turned from the vertical line by the presence of too much flesh, rests upon the different coatings which compose the skin of the abdomen, and the latter, from their facility of distending themselves indefinitely,* might not have elasticity enough to fall back into their usual position, when the strain is removed, if they were not assisted by mechanical aid, which, resting on the dorsal column itself, opposes it and establishes the equilibrium. Thus, the belt has the double effect of preventing the abdomen from yielding to the actual weight of the intestines, and giving it the strength necessary to contract itself when the pressure is diminished. The belt should never be discontinued; otherwise the good produced during the day will be counteracted by leaving it aside at night; it is not very inconvenient, and we soon become accustomed to it.

* Mirabeau said, when speaking of an excessively large man, "that God only created him to show to what an extent the human skin could be distended without breaking."

The belt, which is also useful, as it seems as a monitor to warn us when we have eaten sufficient, ought to be made with great care; its pressure should be moderate, and always the same: that is it should be so made as to contract in proportion as the pressure is removed.

We need not wear it all our lives; we may leave it aside without inconvenience when we have gained the object in view, and that we have remained stationary for some weeks, provided we observe a certain and proper system of diet. It is now six years since I wore one.

Cascarilla.

There is a substance which I believe useful as a remedy against obesity; many observations have strengthened me in this belief; however I am not opposed to any one doubting it, and I call the attention of doctors to it.

This substance is cascarilla.

Ten or twelve of my acquaintances suffered from long and unremitting fever; some of them were cured by old women's remedies, that is by powders, &c.; others by the continued use of cascarilla, which always produced its effect.

All those of the first class, who were victims to obesity, became as large as usual when recovered from the fever, while the others lost all their superfluous flesh; which justifies me in thinking, that the last effect was produced by the application of cascarilla, for there was no difference between them but the mode of treatment.

Rational theory is not opposed to this result; for, on the one hand, cascarilla may very probably so promote the circulation as to rouse and disperse those gaps destined for the generation of fat; and on the other hand, it is known that there is in cascarilla a portion of bark which may fill up those capsules, or cups, intended in ordinary cases, for the reception of the oily congestions. It is even probable that those two causes conspire and assist each other.

It follows from these data, which any one may verify, that I think myself safe in recommending the use of cascarilla to all those who wish to disencumber themselves of superfluous flesh. Thus, dummodò annuerint in omni medicationis genere doctissimi facultatis professores, I think that after the first month of a proper system, whoever wishes to become thin will do well to take, during one month, every second day, at seven o'clock in the morning, two hours before breakfast, a tumbler of white wine without water, into which is diluted a tablespoon full of good red cascarilla, and that good will result from it. Such are the remedies which I recommend for an inconvenience as disagreeable as it is general. I have adapted them to our human weakness, modified by the state of society in which we live. And in this, I am supported by this experimental truth, which is, that the more rigorous a regimen be the less effect it will have, because it is badly carried out, or not carried out at all.

Great efforts are very uncommon, and if we wish to have our directions attended to, we must propose nothing to man which he will find it difficult to accomplish ; and when in our power the remedy should be an agreeable one.

Leanness is that state of the individual whose muscular flesh, not being swelled by fat, exposes the form and angles of the frame.

There are two kinds of leanness ; the first is that which, being caused by the natural disposition of the body, is accompanied by health, and the perfect action of the organic functions. The second is that which is caused by the weakness of certain organs, or the defective action of others, and gives us a miserable and wretched appearance. We have known a young woman of middle size who weighed only sixty-five pounds.

Man does not suffer much inconvenience from leanness ; it does not render him less vigorous ; on the contrary, it makes him much more active. The father of the young woman just mentioned, although as thin as herself, had sufficient strength to take a heavy chair with his teeth, and throw it behind his back, passing it over his head.

But it is a terrible affliction for woman, who values her beauty more than her life, and beauty consists principally in roundness of form and the graceful curve of the features. The most exquisite toilet, the most fashionable dressmaker, cannot hide certain defects, or dissemble certain angles ; and it is often said of a thin woman, however beautiful she may appear, that every pin she takes from her dress lessens her charms.

For excessively thin women there seems to be no remedy, or at least the cure should be taken in hands by the faculty ; otherwise the process may be so long that the recovery will be too late.

But we do not see why it should be more difficult to fatten those women who are born thin than it is to fatten chickens ; and if more time is necessary, it is because women have comparatively a much smaller stomach, and cannot be got to submit to a rigorous regimen, which must be punctually observed, as in the case of domestic animals.

Nature, so varied in her works, has her moulds for leanness as well as for obesity.

Those persons destined to be thin are shaped in a long mould. They have small, bony hands and feet, thin legs, the back and sides emaciated, the ribs protruding, an aquiline nose, almond shaped eyes, a large mouth, the chin pointed, and dark hair.

Such is the general appearance; some parts of the body may be an exception, but this is very rare.

Sometimes we see very thin persons with very good appetites. All those whom we have been able to question on the subject have admitted that they digest badly, and that this is why they always remain in the same state.

Very thin persons are of any colour or form; they are remarkable for having nothing striking either in their features or their manners; their eyes are dead, the lips pale, and their whole appearance indicates weakness and a want of energy, something even bordering on suffering. In fine, it might be said of them, that they seem to be but half finished, but half alive.

Savarin tells us that—

“Every thin woman wishes to get fatter: it is a wish I heard expressed a thousand times; it is therefore to pay a last tribute of respect to this all-powerful sex, that I shall endeavour to substitute real forms for those attractions of silk and calico, which we see displayed in such profusion in our fashionable shops, to the great scandal of austere critics, who pass them by with a surly countenance, and avoid those shadows of pride and ambition, with as much care as if the reality were before them.

With this regimen doctors' prescriptions with regard to repose and sleep may be disregarded, and we are equally sure of gaining the object in view. For if you do not take exercise, you will be disposed to get fat; if you take exercise, it will equally dispose you to get fat, for then you will eat more, and when the appetite is judiciously satisfied, not only is our strength restored, but we acquire new strength when it is necessary to acquire it.

If you sleep much, sleep makes you fat; if you sleep but little, your digestion will be quicker, and you will therefore, eat more.

For those, then, who are anxious to acquire a plump, round figure, it is only necessary to point out the system of diet they ought to adopt; and this cannot be a difficult task, after the principles we have already laid down.

To solve this problem, then we should introduce nothing into the stomach, which it will not bear without fatigue, nor to the assimilating organs, any substance which cannot be converted into fat.

I shall then endeavour to trace what would be the daily food of a sylph, supposing that she fancied to become one of us mortals.

General Rule—To eat a good deal of very fresh bread, taking care to use the soft part.

To take before eight o'clock in the morning, in bed if necessary, a bowl of soup with bread, or pâtes, not too much, that it be soon digested, or if preferred, a cup of good chocolate.

To breakfast at eleven o'clock on eggs, pâtes, or chops, but eggs are indispensable ; a cup of coffee would be no harm.

The dinner-hour may be regulated, so that the breakfast may be digested before going to table ; for we often hear it said, that it is very injurious, or at least does no good, to take a meal before the preceding one is digested.

After breakfast, a little exercise should be taken by men, if the nature of their occupation permit it, for business above all ; the ladies should go to the Bois de Boulogne, the Tuileries, to their dress-makers', their milliners', to the fashionable shops, and to visit their friends, to talk about all they may have seen. I hold it as certain, that such conversation and meetings are highly calculated to produce a salutary effect from the pleasure they afford.

For dinner, soup, meat, and fish, at discretion, together with rice, macarones, sweet pastry, creams and charlottes, &c.

At dessert, Savoy biscuits, cakes, and other mixtures of mealy food, eggs, and sugar.

This regimen, though apparently limited, is susceptible of great variety ;—it admits of the entire animal kingdom, and care should be taken to vary the nature, preparation and seasoning of the dishes to be used, and to render them palatable by every means in our power, in order to prevent that dislike, which is always an irresistible barrier to our deriving any ultimate benefit from our food.

Beer should be preferred for drink ; if not, Bordeaux, or other wines from the South of France.

Acids should be avoided, except salad, which is always refreshing.

Fruit might be sweetened, when it is susceptible of it ; baths should not be taken too cold, and we should breathe from time to time the pure air of the country, we should also eat grapes when in season ; and care should be taken not to exhaust ourselves by dancing.

We should generally go to bed at eleven o'clock, and never later than one in the morning, on extraordinary occasions.

By adhering to this system with exactness and perseverance, we shall soon recover our natural strength ; health and beauty will be improved, luxury will be promoted by both, and the sounds of praise and gratitude shall resound in the ears of the professor.

Sheep, calves, oxen, fowl, carp, crabs and oysters, are fattened ; whence I draw the following maxim :—Everything that eats can be fattened, provided its food be well and properly selected."

But perhaps the impatient reader will ask how should a repast be prepared so as to comprise, in a supreme degree, all that constitutes the pleasures of the table for Fat or Lean ?

"I shall answer this question—collect yourself, then, reader, and pay attention : it is Gasterea herself, the fairest of the Muses, that inspires me ; I shall be more intelligible than an oracle, and my maxims shall go down to future generations.

Let the number of guests not exceed twelve, so that the conversation be general and uninterrupted; let them be so selected, that they be of different professions, of the same taste, and on such terms of intimacy as will render it unnecessary to have recourse to that odious formality of introduction.

The dining room should be well lighted, and the table-cloth and napkins unexceptionable, and the temperature of the room should be between thirteen and sixteen degrees of Réaumur's thermometer.

Let the men be naturally witty, without affectation, and the women amiable without being coquettes.*

The dishes should be exquisite, but not too numerous, the wines of the best quality each in its own degree.

The order in which the former should be served is from the substantial to the light and delicate; and for the latter, to begin with the strong wines, and end with the sweetest and most perfumed.

The dinner being the last act of the day, should not be hurried, and the guests should consider themselves as travellers who are to arrive together at the same destination.

The room intended for the guests should be large enough to admit of a game of cards for those who cannot dispense with it, and leave room sufficient for such as wish to discuss the topics of the day.

The guests should be induced to remain by the pleasure of each other's society, and cheered by the hope that the evening will not pass without other enjoyments.

The tea should not be too strong, and the toast properly buttered, and the punch should be made with great care.

The guests should not retire before eleven o'clock, but all should be in bed before twelve.

If any one has partaken of a repast uniting all those conditions, he may boast of having assisted at his own deification; and the more of those conditions that have been omitted, or neglected, the less will be the pleasure.

I have said that the pleasure of the table might be considerably prolonged, and I am about to prove it by giving a true and circumstantial account of the longest repast I have ever assisted at; I intend it as a bon bon for the reader to recompense him for his kindness in reading this work. Here it is.

There resided in the Rue du Bac, a family of my relations, consisting of a doctor, aged seventy, a captain seventy six, and their sister Jeannette seventy-four. I frequently visited them, and was always received in the most friendly manner.

"By-the-by," said Doctor Dubois, to me one day, standing on his toes to tap me on the shoulder, "you are a long time talking about your famous fondue (eggs beaten up with cheese), "you are continually bringing water from our teeth with it, and it is high time to put an end to this. We shall go some day and breakfast with you, the captain and myself, and we shall see what it is made of." (It was I think in 1801, that he made this attack on me,) "With the greatest pleasure," replied I, "and you shall have it in its prime, for I shall prepare it myself. I am quite delighted at your proposal, so, to-morrow at ten o'clock, military hour.*"

* I am writing in Paris in the neighbourhood of the Palais Royal and the Chaussée d'Antin.

At the hour appointed I saw my two guests arrive, well shaved, and their hair well powdered, combed and brushed; two little old men still fresh and healthy.

They smiled with pleasure when they saw the table laid, the white cloth, and the three covers, at each place two dozen of oysters with a bright and golden lemon.

At each end of the table was a bottle of wine carefully polished, which appeared from the cork to be very old.

Alas ! I have seen those oyster breakfasts disappear from amongst us, which were formerly so common and so gay, when they were eaten by the thousand ; the oysters disappeared with the abbés, who ate them by the gross, and the knights who were never done with them ; I regret them, but as a philosopher. If time brings such changes in governments, what influence has it not on our simple customs.

After the oysters, which were considered very good, skewered kidneys, a dish of rich liver with truffles, were served up, and then came the fondue.

The ingredients of this dish were collected in a saucepan, and placed on the table, with a contrivance for cooking, heated by spirits of wine ; I immediately set to work, and my two cousins never lost sight of my movements. They were delighted with this preparation, and begged of me to give them the receipt, which I did while relating two anecdotes which the reader will find elsewhere.

Then came the fruits in season, with sweetmeats, and a cup of real Moka—à la dubelloy—a method which was then beginning to be generally adopted, and then two sorts of liqueurs, one, spirituous, for deterging, the other, of an oily nature, for soothing.

Breakfast over, I proposed to my guests to take a little exercise, and for that purpose to take a turn round my apartment, which, though far from elegant, is large and comfortable, and which was the more pleasing to my friends, as the ceiling and gilding were of the middle of the reign of Louis XV.

I showed them the original cast of the bust of my handsome cousin, Madam Reclamier, by Olinard, and her portrait in miniature by Augustin, which so pleased them that the doctor, with his thick lips, kissed the portrait, and the Captain took a liberty with the bust for which I rebuked him ; for if all the admirers of the original did as much, this bosom so volutuously formed, would soon be in the same state as the toe of St. Peter in Rome, which has been considerably shortened by the pilgrims' embraces.

I afterwards showed them some casts in plaster of the best ancient sculptors, some paintings of merit, fossils, and musical instruments, and several beautiful editions of both French and foreign works.

* Whenever an appointment is thus made, the repast should be served up as the clock strikes, and those who are absent should be treated as deserters.

In this scientific journey they did not forget my kitchen. I showed them the economical pot for boiling meat, my roasting shell, the spit turned by clock-work, and my evaporating machine. They examined all with the greatest minuteness, and were the more surprised as they themselves had everything dressed after the manner of the regency.

It was just two o'clock as we entered the drawing room. "This is too bad," said the doctor, "there it is two o'clock, the hour sister Jeannette expects us to dinner! we must be off immediately. It is not because I am very anxious for my dinner, but I must have my bowl of soup; it is an old habit of mine, and when I pass the day without taking it, I exclaim with Titus, 'diem perdidit.'" "My dear doctor," said I, "why go so far for what you have at your hand? I shall send word to my cousin that you will stop with me, and that you will do me the pleasure of taking your dinner with me, for which I must claim your indulgence, because it will not have all the merit of an impromptu, as it must be dressed in a hurry."

On this subject the two brothers deliberated with their eyes, and then formally consented. Then I sent word to the faubourg Saint Germain, and gave directions to the cook; who, in reasonable time, partly out of his own resources, and partly by the aid of the neighbouring restaurateurs, served us up a very comfortable and tempting little dinner.

I was highly amused and gratified at seeing the coolness and assurance with which my two friends sat down to table, unfolded their napkins and prepared for work.

They experienced two surprises which I myself did not think of at the moment; for I treated them to Parmesan, (cheese from Parnia), after which I made them take a glass of pure Madeira. These were two novelties then lately introduced by Prince Talleyrand, the first of our statesmen, to whom we are indebted for so many bon mots, delicate and profound, on whom the attention of the public has been always concentrated with marked interest, whether in power or obscurity.

The dinner passed off very well, both as regarded the substantial dishes and their necessities; and my friends were as amiable as they were gay.

After dinner I proposed a game of piquet which was objected to; they preferred the far niente of the Italians, said the captain; and we then formed a little circle round the fire.

Notwithstanding the pleasure the far niente afforded us, I considered that nothing adds more charms to conversation than some sort of occupation, when it does not absorb the attention too much, so I proposed tea.

Tea was then a novelty to the French of the old school; however it was accepted. I made it in their presence, of which they took a few cups with the more pleasure as they never looked upon it but as a physic.

Long experience has taught me that one act of civility begets another, and when once we have complied with a request, we lose the power of refusing. Thus it was almost with an air of authority, that I proposed to finish with a bowl of punch.

"But you will be the death of us," said the doctor; "you will make us tipsy," said the captain, to which I only replied by loudly calling for lemons, sugar and rum.

I made the punch then, and while I was so engaged, the toast was prepared, very thin, delicately buttered and salted to perfection.

Here they protested, saying they had eaten quite sufficient, and that they could not touch it; but as I well knew how tempting this simple preparation is, I replied, that I only wished there would be enough of it.

Shortly after as the captain had taken the last cut, I surprised him looking if there remained any more, or if more was being prepared, which I directed to be done immediately.

However the time passed quickly, and it was just eight o'clock by my time-piece. "Let us go," said my guests, "we must have a little salad with our good sister, whom we have not seen the entire day."

I made no objection to this proposition; faithful to the duties of hospitality towards the two amiable old men, I accompanied them to their carriage, and saw them depart.

It may be asked, perhaps, if we did not feel a few moments ennui during this long sitting.

I reply in the negative; the attention of my guests was constantly kept up by the perfection of the fondue, by the voyage round my apartment, by some novelties in the dinner, by the tea, and particularly by the punch, of which they had never taken before.

Besides, the doctor was familiar with the genealogy and anecdotes of all Paris; the captain had spent a portion of his life in Italy, either in the army, or as ambassador at the court of Parma; I myself had travelled much, we conversed without pretensions, and listened to each other with pleasure; it is not so difficult to make time pass agreeably and rapidly.

The next morning I received a note from the doctor, in which he stated that the little revelling of the night before did them no harm; on the contrary, after a most refreshing sleep, they got up, fresh, cheerful, and ready for another.

If we have interested the reader sufficiently to send him to the pages of the Physiologie du Gout to study for himself, he will there find ample repayment in wit, and learning; in sound sense and profound knowledge of men and things.

ART. IV.—THE GOOD PEOPLE.

Fairy Tales, Now First Collected: To which are prefixed Two Dissertations on Pigmies and Fairies. By Joseph Ritson.
London: Payne and Foss.

“THE GOOD PEOPLE:” so, reader, we call the Fairies in Ireland. Our country has been famous for them; we have had them of all kinds, from the Merrows and Fir-Darrigs and Cluricaunes, to the little rogues who, as Sam Lover sings, dwell in laughing eyes.*

The decline of the Good People may be said to have begun when the National schoolmasters came in. Now their gentle sway is past for ever, and we may say with Dryden—

“now the swain
Returning late, may pass the woods in vain,
And never hope to see the nightly train.
In vain the dairy now with mint is dress’d,
The dairy-maid expects no fairy guest
To skim the bowls, and after pay the feast.
She sighs, for ah! and shakes her shoes in vain,
No silver penny to reward her pain.”

But what a grand life they had; how poets sung of them, how children loved them, how painters idolized them, how learned men of undoubted genius have written their history, and last but not least, a Bishop of Oxford and Norwich, quaint old Richard Corbet, wrote The Fairy's Farewell.

We have, ourselves, always loved the fairies, and what we know of them we now propose to tell our readers.

* How well Lover sings this the reader shall judge:—

As Cupid one day
Hide and seek went to play,
He knew where to hide himself, sly and secure;
So, away the rogue dashes
To hide 'mid the lashes
That fringe the bright eyes of sweet Kitty Maclure.
She thought 'twas a fly
That got into her eye,
So she wink'd—for the tickling she could not endure;
But love would not fly
At her winking so sly,
And still lurks in the eye of sweet Kitty Maclure.

The term "fairy mythology" adopted by Mr Keightley we take to signify the popular mythology of the Teutonic nations ; and we in England give it this title, because in our language the name fairies has become the common appellation of the elves of the popular creed. We therefore think that Mr. Keightley has quite lost sight of the object of his book, or that its title is a misnomer, when he makes an exhibition of his learning in running wild among the Persians and Arabs, about whose superstitions we are, if necessary, prepared to shew that he knows nothing beyond the shreds and patches to be picked out of a grammar or a dictionary. We could also very well do without the fairy mythologies of Greece and Italy ; but we have an especial objection to either a fairy mythology of the Jews or a fairy mythology of the Hottentots. It may be granted that the Greeks and the Persians are both branches of the great Indo-Teutonic stock, and, therefore, that there is every reason to believe, if we could trace their popular superstitions far enough back, that we should find in them an agreement with those of the Teutons in the west. But as we are no believers in the transmission of these superstitions from one people to another, and as the particular causes which have so long been constantly producing changes in the mythology of the Greeks and the Latins, and again in that of the eastern nations, are so very different from those which have operated upon our own, we imagine that to attempt a comparison, without more knowledge of each than we at present have, would be but a vain and useless labour. We need rather such books as the Germans, and Danes, and Swedes have written for the popular mythology of their countries,—such books as Crofton Croker has written for Ireland—the only one that has yet rendered justice to the superstitions of the peasantry of any part of our islands. There is much yet to be gathered : not enough has been accomplished towards collecting the fairy legends of Scotland and Wales ; and as for England, where there is still room for a good harvest, there has been done—nothing ! But it is easier and more flattering to our vanity to invent schemes, than to gather together materials which may establish truth.

Mr. Keightley tells us at some length how, after a long consideration of the subject, he has come to the conclusion, that of the tales and stories which have during ages floated about in every country, some are, as it were, "geological formations ;"

having grown up with the people themselves, some have come in by transmission from other countries, and some by other means. All this is very true, and indeed only amounts to the same thing as saying, in familiar English, that they came one way or another. But, then, Mr. Keightley claims this as a discovery,* and makes a book on the subject, in which he certainly proves the proposition, but he makes no great progress towards giving any answer, much more a general answer, to those most important questions, — what? how? when? and why? However, the volume to which we allude hardly belongs to the subject of the present article, in which we intend to confine ourselves to popular mythology, and to the popular mythology of our own island; yet we hope to shew, that it is by investigating this mythology in one country, and by examining historically the changes, which it has there undergone, and the causes to which we may attribute those changes, that we are most likely to find satisfactory answers to those questions, and to place the subject in a clearer light. Perhaps we may at some future time be tempted to return to the volume which has occasioned these remarks. We will observe, however, in passing, that there are stronger grounds than its author seems to suspect for believing Wilhelm Tell to be a mythic personage, at least as far as he is concerned in shooting the apple off his son's head. Sprenger, an early writer on these matters, in his Malleus Maleficarum, has a chapter "de Sagittariis Maleficis," where he relates the same story of one Punkler, a magician of Rorbach, in the diocese of Worms; and, if our memory be not very treacherous, we have read in one of these older works on spirits and magic of a wood-spirit, concerning whom some such observation as the following was added—"this is the hobgoblin who shot the apple off the child's head." Mr. Keightley will find, too, from the excellent old ballad of those three worthies, Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough,

* We cannot forbear saying a word or two on Mr. Keightley's discoveries, because he makes so much parade of them. He asserts that he has proved, that the name Oberon, in French, is the German Elberich; yet he has but taken it on the authority of Grimm, who has shewn, not merely that the word Elberich did take that form in French, but that it could not have taken any other! He says, that he alone has discovered why Shakspeare gave the fairy queen the name Titania — we can assure him, that a tolerably advanced boy in one of our public schools would stand in peril of dire birch if he could not make the discovery at a very short notice. We will only add, that his account of the origin and meaning of the word fairy is, at best, but a lame and most unsatisfactory performance.

and William of Cloudeslee, that legend was also current at an early period in England.

The memorials of the days of Anglo-Saxon heathendom are unfortunately few. The only work which we can ascribe with any degree of certainty to so early a period of their history, or rather of the history of their forefathers before they came here, is the poem of Beowulf, of which an excellent edition was published by the late Mr. Kemble; and this poem has been much interpolated by Christian transcribers before it was reduced to the state in which it has come down to us. The chief exploit of the hero, Beowulf the Great, is the destruction of the two monsters Grendel and his mother; both, like most of the evil beings of old times, dwellers in the fens and the waters; and both, moreover, as some Christian bard has taken care to inform us, of "Cain's kin," as were also the eotens, and the elves, and the orcs (eòtenas, and ylfe, and orcneas). The haunt of the Grendels was a lake in the middle of a dark and dreary morass; it was overshadowed by the thick branches of an ancient wood, and by night the surface of its waters appeared covered with flame.

" They keep the secret land,
the refuges of the wolf,
the windy promontories,
the fearful path of the fen;
there where the mountain-stream under the darkness of the promontories rushes downwards—
the flood under the earth.
It is not hence [from Heorot]
a mile distant where that lake standeth, over which hang the rinded thickets, the wood fast with its roots
overhange the water:
There by night to any one an evil wonder appears, fire on the flood."

When, after the death of the son, Beowulf and his companions pursued the mother into her retreat, they found the water full of sea-drakes and serpents (wurm-cynnes fela), and nicers lying on the banks. To Beowulf these were no new antagonists; in one of his exploits by sea, the nicers—for there were nicers in the sea as well as in the lakes—had, during a storm, dragged him out of his boat, and carried him to the bottom, where the desperate struggle between them ended with the death of nine of his opponents. We learn little from the poem of the form, or magnitude, or nature of these "heathen beasts," as they are called, except that against them weapons, the work of men, were useless; and Beowulf's sword, when it touched the Grendel's blood, melted like ice.

The last exploit of Beowulf was against another personage of the fairy mythology, a dragon, or fire-drake, that sat brooding over his heaps of treasures of the olden days. During the slumber of its guardian, the "heathen hoard" had been plundered; and when the fire-drake awoke, and discovered that the object of his cares had been visited, he paced furiously about the entrance of his den in search of the intruder. He then returned to ascertain the extent of his loss, and at night he issued forth, and in revenge spread devastation through the country. The house of the dragon was a tumulus under a mountain near the waves of the sea.

When the surviving conqueror, the companion of Beowulf, who was mortally wounded in the combat, entered it,—

" He, exulting in victory, saw there a multitude of costly gems, gold glittering heavy upon the ground, a wonder on the wall;
and in the den of the dragon —
the old flier in the twilight—platters standing, the vessels of men of old
no longer living, fretted with ornaments:
there was many a helmet old and rusty,
many an armlet
skilfully bound together.

So also he saw raised there an ensign, all of gold, high over the hoard,
the most wonderful of handy works, locked together by magic arts;
from which the light shone forth, so that he might scrutinise
the whole bottom of the cave. "

Popular superstitions are not easily removed ; and with the introduction of Christianity the Anglo-Saxons did not cease to believe in the existence and operations of the elves and the nicers, the orcs and the giants ; nor did they cease to trust in the effects of charms and incantations, or to revere wells and fountains. The preachers of the faith of their Redeemer saw nothing in that faith which was contrary to the belief which they had sucked in even with their mother's milk ; for though it asserted the unity of God, yet it did not deny the existence of spirits. It was impossible, however, that so great a change should be made as the total subversion of the previously established religion of a country, without affecting in some measure even the superstitions of the peasant ; and we find accordingly that the Christian Anglo-Saxons tried to account for the existence of these beings in a way very different from that of their Pagan forefathers. They attempted to rationalise the belief in the elves which they found already established ; and they defined their pedigrees and functions, and limited their powers, on principles which varied according to the proportion wherein Christianity or heathendom ruled in their minds. Hence we hear at one time of the Elfin descendants of the first murderer, Cain, who were fated to wander over the wastes and fens, the terror and scourge of mankind ; at another, of the spirits unworthy of heaven, yet too good for hell, who were allowed or compelled to inhabit the air, and the water, and the earth. Just the same influence did Mahomedanism exert on the popular creed of the easterns—the beings with which it had peopled water and earth and air became a race of Peris, beautiful, and to a certain degree happy, and permitted even to approach the gates of paradise and to behold the joys within, joys which they could only hope to partake of after ages of penitence.

The belief of the monks themselves in these spirits will account for the silence with which they are passed over in the homilies and religious discourses of the time. When they preached against heathendom, instead of attacking the superstitions of their countrymen, they broke out into declamations against the heathen practices of the Greeks and Romans. A manuscript homily, bearing the inviting title De falsis diis, told us much about Saturn, and Jupiter, and Venus, and their evil deeds, but of elves and nicers not a word. Another homily in the same collection is directed against witchcraft and magic, a title more tempting even than the former. We learn from it much about the witch of Endor, but of native superstitions we find only the following short and scattered notices. "Every one," says the writer, "who uses witchcraft either by fowls, or by sneezings, or by horses, or by hounds, he is no Christian, but he is a notorious apostate." "I am ashamed, he says, "to mention all the scandalous witchcrafts that men practise through the devil's teaching, either at spousals, or at the solemnisation of marriage, or in brewing, &c." "Some men are so foolish, that they bring their offering to firm rocks, and also to trees, and to well-springs, as witches teach. And they will not understand how foolishly they do; or how the dead stone or the dumb tree can help or save them, which themselves never stir from the place where they stand." "Now a witless woman goes to the high way, and drags her child through the earth, and thus gives both herself and her offspring to the devil."

The monks, however, were not content with giving a different account of the origin and nature of the elves, but they at once transformed them into devils, whose business it was to plague and tempt frail mortality. They moreover adopted the popular stories, and turned them into saints' legends; and a more extensive knowledge of the Anglo-Saxon fairies may perhaps be gathered by a careful perusal of the legends of the Anglo-Saxon saints, than all the other books together can afford us. It only need be borne in mind, that in the transformation the elves, when mischievously inclined, became devils; when beneficent, angels. The fends and wilds are in Beowulf constantly peopled by troops of elves and nicers and worms (dragons and serpents). So in the saints' legends are they ever the haunts of hobgoblins (dæmoues); and many and fierce were the struggles between them and the hermits, before the latter succeeded in establishing themselves in their deserted abodes. St. Guthlac built him a mud-oot in the isle of Croyland, a wild spot, then covered with woods and pools and sedgy marshes. The isle had hitherto been uninhabited by men; but many a goblin played among its solitudes, and very unwilling were they to be driven out. They came upon him in a body, dragged him from his cell, sometimes tossed him in the air, at others dipped him over head in the bogs, and then tore him through the midst of the brambles; but their efforts were vain against one who was armed like Guthlac, for he carried to the combat "scutum fidei, lorica spei, galeam castitatus, arcum pœnetentiæ, sagittas psalmodiæ." St. Botulf chose for his residence Ykanho, a place not less wild and solitary than Croyland itself, which had hitherto, his historian tells us, been only the scene of the "fantastic illusion" (faery, we might say) of the goblins, now to be banished by the intrusion of the holy recluse.* At his first appearance they attempted to scare him with horrid noises; but finding him proof against their attacks (for he was not worse armed than Guthlac), they endeavoured to move him by persuasive expostulations. "A long time," they said, "we have possessed this spot, and we had hoped to dwell in it for ever. Why, cruel Botulf, dost thou forcibly drive us from our haunts? Thee or thine we have neither injured nor disturbed. What seekest thou by dislodging us? and what wilt thou gain by our expulsion? When we are already driven from every other corner of the world, thou wilt not let us stay quietly even in this solitude." Botulf made the sign of the cross, and the elves and nicers departed.

Sometimes these goblins were more obliging towards their new neighbours, and directed them where to dig for treasures; though it appears that they seldom gained much by seeking after "heathen gold." Godric, at a later period, occupied a cell in the wilds of Durham, and was often troubled by these spiritual enemies. On a time, however, one of them appeared by night, and told him where he would find a hidden hoard. Godric was not, it appears, an avaricious man; but he thought he might do some good with the money which was thus revealed to him, and to work he went with pickaxe and shovel. When, however, he had dug a considerable depth—though we are not told that he obtained a sight of the promised treasure—he was terror struck by seeing come out of the hole a troop of little black dwarfs, who, with a laugh of derision, cast at him little smoking balls. Godric dropped his shovel, and, it is almost needless to add, never sought treasures again.

* The place chosen by Botulf, and its inhabitants, are thus described in the legends of saints in English verse; of which there is a good old MS. in the library of Trin. Coll., Cant.

"A stede ther was in wyldernysse, that me clyped Thorze eyze,
That ful was of luther thynges, the men this by seye,
For deuelen and luther gostes here eyse hadde ther,
And her wouyge al at wylle, for non men ther nere."

Among others, the following anecdote is related of Godric's encounters with the spirits. It must be premised that Godric had a garden before his cell, which was on the banks of the Wear, and which it was his daily labour to tend. Once when weary with digging, he had stopped to rest himself, a strange man suddenly made his appearance, and looked earnestly at the saint for some time. Then he spoke, and accused the good saint of idleness, and told him that he did not work half so hard as the saints of former times used to work. The saint, who at first thought it had been a messenger from God sent to instruct him in his duty, answered, "Do you then first set me an example." And he gave him the spade, and left him, for it was then his customary hour of devotion, and he promised to return soon and see how much work he had done. The strange man took the spade, and worked, says the legend, most vigorously; and when Godric returned, he was astonished to find that in the space of an hour his new labourer had dug as much ground as he himself could dig in eight days. "There," said the stranger, "that is the way to work." But Godric was frightened, for he was now sure that it could not be a real man; and indeed appearances were much against him, for he was dark and hairy, and somewhat tall; and, which appeared oddest of all, though he had worked so hard, yet he shewed no signs of weariness, and did not even sweat. Then Godric went to his cell, and concealed a little book in his bosom, and returned and said, "Now tell me who thou art, and why thou hast come here?" "Do you not see that I am a man like yourself?" was the answer. "Then," said Godric, "if you are a man, tell me if you believe in the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and join with me in adoring the Mother of our Lord." But the goblin said, for a goblin it was sure enough, "Be not solicitous about my belief, for it is no concern of yours." Godric now became more suspicious than before; he took the book out of his bosom—it contained pictures of our Lord and of the Virgin and of St. John—and he placed it suddenly against the other's mouth, telling him if he believed in God to kiss it devoutly; on which the goblin laughed at him and vanished. Godric, like a pious man, watered with holy water the ground which had thus been dug, and let it lie uncultivated for seven years.*

* Other authorities for the superstitions of the Anglo-Saxons are the various spells and counter-charms, which are still extant, and often found on the margins of other books; the civil laws; and, more particularly, the ecclesiastical laws and the penetentiali.

Some may think, perhaps, that we speak incautiously in talking of elves and nicers, when no such names occur in the writings from which we quote. But here, fortunately, there steps in to our aid an important passage of the poetic Layamon which assures us that in the twelfth century elves and *nicers were as busily employed among the wilds, wherever they had not been driven out by the powerful weapons of the hermits, as they had been even in the time of the heroic Beowulf. In describing a lake in Scotland, he says (MS. Cott. Calig. A. ix. f. 125):

"That is a wonderful lake
Set in middle earth,
With fen and with reed,
With water very broad,
With fishes and with fowls,
With ugly things,
That water is immeasurably broad;
Nicers bathe therein;
There is play of elves
In the venomous pool."

It was an elf, too, which, in Robert of Gloucester, is said to have been the father of the far-famed Merlin; and when King Vortiger inquired of his sages what kind of being it might be, they said.

"That ther beth in the eir an hey, fer fro the gronde,
As a maner gostes, wygtes as it be,
And me may hem ofte on erthe in wylde studes yse,
And ofte in monnes fourme wymmen heo cometh to,
And ofte in wymmen forme thei cometh to men also,
That men clepute eluene."

For our extensive knowledge of the English fairies of the twelfth century we are indebted chiefly to two writers, Gervase of Tilbury, and the Cambrian Giraldus. The tales which are found in the writings of Giraldus are mostly Welsh; but on that account they are none the less valuable to us, for they enable us to compare the Welsh superstitions of that remote period with the English; and it appears from the comparison that they hardly differed from each other. We are told by Bale and others, that Giraldus was author of a topography and itinerary of England, as well as of Wales and Ireland—a work which would be to us invaluable; but we have sought carefully for it in all the manuscript collections where it was supposed to be preserved, and we have been obliged, much against our inclinations, to conclude that—if such a work has been attributed to him on any better grounds than hearsay—now at least it is no longer in being. From Giraldus and Gervase we can form a very tolerable outline of the popular belief of their age. We have in them not only the spirits which dwelt in the wild woods and the waters, the dragons, too, and the mer-women, but we have also the elves which entered people's houses and carried off the new-born children from their cradles to be denizens of the land of faery; and, which is still more important, we have the domestic elves, the dwarfs which laboured zealously in the service of the family to which they had attached themselves, and those “mad-merry” sprites whose joy was in playing mirthful tricks on the deluded peasantry. The stories which lie scattered through the Olai Imperialia of Gervase have been told over and over; but Giraldus has not been so well used, and his account of the familiar spirits is exceedingly curious. They made their presence known by throwing dirt and other harmless things at every one they came near; and they continually plagued them by cutting holes in their coats, and playing other such mischevious pranks. Sometimes they would talk with the people of the house; and when displeased or mischeviously inclined, they scrupled not to tell in their presence all their secrets and private actions much to the shame and confusion of many who were so exposed. When any attempt was made to exorcise them, they threw dirt at the priests themselves; and Giraldus thinks, from the inefficiency of the exorcisms of the church in driving them away that the power of the priests was only efficient against spirits of a malignant nature. These hob-goblins sometimes appeared visably; and one in Pembrokeshire, where they were very common, took up his abode in the house of one Elidor Stakepole, in the form of a red boy, who called himself Simon. Master Simon began—“impudently,” says our author—by taking the keys from the butler, and usurping his office. However, he was himself so provident a butler, that, while he held the office, every thing seemed to prosper. He never waited to be told to do any thing; but whatever his master or mistress were thinking of calling for, he brought it immediately saying "You want so and so; here it is." Moreover, he knew all about their money and their secret hoards; and often did he upbraid them on that account, for he hated nothing more than avarice, and he could not bear to see money laid up in holes which might be employed in good and charitable uses. There was nothing, on the contrary, he liked better than giving plenty to eat and drink to the rustics; and he used to tell his master that it was right he should be free in giving to them those things which by their labours he himself obtained. Indeed, Simon was an excellent servant: but he had one failing—he never went to Church, and he never uttered a single "Catholic word," (nec verbum aliquid Catholicum unquam pronunciabat.) One remarkable thing was, that he never slept in the house at night, though he was always at his post by daybreak. Once, however, he was watched, and found to take up his lodging about the mill and the mill-dam. The next morning Simon came to his master, delivered up his keys, and left the house, after having filled the post of butler for about forty days. (Girald. Cam. Itin. lib. i. pp. 824, 853.)

* In the fifteenth century, in the Promptuarium Parvulorum, the word nicker still occurs, and is used to explain the classic sirens. It is a singular instance of the tendency of the monks to turn the elves into devils, that this word is now only preserved in the name "Old Nick," which is given to the arch-fiend himself.

From the time of Giraldus, we have plenty of materials for a history of the fairy superstitions of our country. The author of the French poem on the deposition of Richard II., of which there is a copy in the Harleian manuscripts (No. 1316), in the prose part of it, accuses the English, among other things, of being given entirely to the belief in prophecies, phantoms, and sorcery ("car il sont de telle nature en leur pays, que en prophecies en fanthomes et sorceries croient tresparfaitement, et en usent très volontiers.") Accordingly, in the old chronicles, both those which have been published and those which still remain in MS., we find many fairy tales introduced among the severer records of actual life. We find there, for instance, a series of stories of those who have at different times had interviews with the illustrious Arthur where he abode under the influence of faery, exactly parallel to the Kyffhäuser legends which Mr. Thoms in his first number has given from Büsching; and we would willingly suggest to him that he will do a service by collecting them together in that part of his "Lays and Legends" which will be occupied on the superstitions of our own country. We will merely notice as we pass on, that in the year 1344, according to Thomas of Walsingham, a certain Saracen physician came to Earl Warren (or Guarene) to ask of him permission to kill a serpent which was troublesome in his possessions on the Welsh marches, at the village of Bromfield, near the town of Ludlow. The serpent was overcome by the incantations of the Saracen ; but some words which were dropped by the latter, led to the suspicion that large treasures lay concealed in the serpent's den. The men of Herefordshire, taking the hint, went by night, at the instigation of a Lombard, called Peter Pikard, to dig for the gold ; and they had just reached it, when the retainers of the Earl Warren, having discovered what was going on, fell suddenly upon them and put them in prison. The Earl, says the historian, was no little gainer by the affair.

During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, two circumstances tended to encumber and confuse, in our literature at least, the fairy mythology of England—the introduction of French poetry, and of the mythic tales of Greece and Italy. Both these causes acted together in the metrical romances, which formed so large a portion of the poetry of that age. We think that Mr. Keightley has most unadvisedly made a separate chapter of his fairy mythology on the fairies of romance ; and instead of considering them as a mere modification of the popular creed of the country to which they belong, he seems to think that the fairies of the romances, whether of England, France, or Germany, all belong to one peculiar and individual system.

Much of the popular mythology of the French was probably, as we suspect also is the case with that of the Scotch, Welsh, and Irish, essentially Teutonic : and Grimm has long ago observed that the Oberon (Auberon) of French stories is in name and person the Elberich of German poetry. The French, with their poetry, brought into English literature their own popular fairies, as modified in character by the fertile imagination of their poets ; and the English imitators of those poets naturally adopted the forms which were thus presented to them. These forms, indeed, were not altogether abhorrent to their own notions ; and we cannot suppose they would find much difficulty in accepting, as a tale of their own elves, the lai of Sir Launfal, who were accustomed to listen to the adventures of True Thomas “be Huntley banks,” which was altogether an English popular legend. But, even in Sir Launfal itself, we have evidence that the English bards thought they were talking of their own elves, and actually altered and made additions in the circumstantial parts of the story they were translating, in accordance with that notion.

Many of the stories which were current at this period—more perhaps than has generally been supposed—were formed on Grecian and Roman models; and we may point out, as an instance, one of the tales in the Seven Sages, printed by Weber, “The Two Dreams,” the plot of which is substantially the same as that of the Miles Gloriosus of Plautus. Several of the persons of Grecian mythology at first sight bore a resemblance to the popular elves and fairies; and hence translators both into Anglo-Saxon and into the English of later times, have sometimes used these latter names as a sort of equivalent for them, just as Alfred translates the Roman sacerdotes by the Saxon biscopeas; but it follows no more that those translators considered, as Mr. Keightley thinks they did, that the nymphs of Grecian fable were elves and fairies, in the strict sense of the word, than that Alfred thought the heathen priests were actually Christian bishops. However, we find instances of Grecian stories adopted as legends of faery; and some poet, having heard the story of Orpheus, who by the power of his lyre rescued his wife from the regions below, took it for a legend of his own fairies, and invented the beautiful little romance of Orfeo and Herodys, a poem which in its English dress contains not one incident which is inconsistent with the native mythology; and indeed the writer—the translator we may say, for the form of the names shews that it came from the French—was so certain of this, that he looked over his histories, and discovered that Thrace, which had somehow been retained in the French story, was none other than an old name of the good and ancient city of Winchester, where Sir Orfeo was king.

The mention of Sir Launfal, Sir Orfeo, and Thomas of Ersildoun, naturally brings our mind to the fairy land itself, which has been quite as ill treated by Mr. Keightley, and in the same way, as the fairies of romance. The consideration of the underground residence of the fairies as a part of the English mythology, would lead us into long and curious investigations for which now we have not room. The elves have always had a country and dwellings under ground as well as above ground; and in several parts of England the belief that they descended to their subterraneous abodes through the barrows which cover the bones of our forefathers of ancient days is still preserved.

There were other ways, however, of approaching the elves' country, and one of the commonest was by openings in the rocks and caverns, as we find in the poem of Sir Orfeo and in the tale of Elidurus, told by Giraldus. The great cave of the peak of Derby was also a celebrated road thither, and Gervase of Tilbury has preserved a tale how William Peverell's swineherd ventured once to descend it in search of a brood-sow; and how he found beneath a rich and cultivated country, and reapers cutting the corn. The communication, however, has long been stopped up; and those who go now to explore the wonders of the cavern find their progress stayed by the firm, impenetrable rock. The stories of this subterranean land underwent the same changes as the other part of the system, and among the monks formed the groundwork of such legends as the visions of Fursus and Drihthelm, and the far-famed purgatory of St. Patrick. The mixture of the monkish with the true mythic stories is nowhere more conspicuous than in the ballad of "True Thomas," which Jamieson has printed from a MS. in the Public Library, Cambridge: we quote from the MS. itself because the printed copy is not very correct. The elf-queen says to Thomas, after they have passed a long dreary way under ground.*

"Sees thu yonder is fayr way,
That lyes ouer yonder mounteyne?
Yonder is the way to heven for ay,
When synful soulis have duryd ther payne.

Seest thu now, Thomas, yonder way,
That lyse low under yon rise?
Wide is the way, the sothe to say,
Into the joyes of paradyse.

Sees thu yonder thrid way,
That lies ouer yonder playne?
Yonder is the way, the sothe to say,
Ther [where] sinfull soules shall drye ther [suffer their] payne.

Sees thu now yonder fourt way,
That lyes ouer yonder felle?
Yonder is the way, the sooth to say,
Vnto the brennard fyre of hell.

Sees thu now yonder fayre castell,
 That stondis vpon yonder fayre hill ?
 Off towne and toure it berith the bell ;
 In mydul erth is ther non like ther till.

In faith, Thomas, yonder is myne owne,
 And the kyngus of this countre."

We now approach a melancholy period in the history of our mythology—a period when the superstitions of the peasant governed the minds of judges and rulers, and at the same time the merciless arm of fanaticism too often wielded the sword of justice. Two superstitions—astrology and witchcraft—have always been found connected with popular mythology. The elves and other spiritual beings were believed to be variously affected by different things and different combinations of things, and certain noises, as the ringing of bells, were sufficient in many instances to drive them away ; while even the possession of particular herbs and stones was enough to defend the bodies and properties of men from their depredations. The agate, for instance, among the Anglo-Saxons had various virtues ; if a man had it about his person, or in his house, no fiend could remain there (ne mæg pær inne feond wesan), and the man who carried it constantly about with him was proof against all witchcraft and magic arts.

Again, by certain spells, the performance of certain ceremonies attended by particular combinations of words, the strongest charms which had been worked by means of these spirits might be dissolved. Other things and ceremonies were believed to be so potent as to bind down these spirits, and put them effectually under the disposal of those who possessed or performed them. To know these things, and how to perform these acts, was, as might be expected, the ambition of many ; and those who had arrived at that wisdom, became magicians and astrologers,—cunning, but sometimes weak and deluded men.

The astrologers made greater transformations in the popular creed than had been effected by any other cause—we of course mean, after astrology had in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries been reduced to an extensive system ; for they made new and artificial divisions of the spirits of earth, and air, and water, into tribes, and legions, which were placed under thrones and dominations, bearing names such as the ears of the peasant were never accustomed to. Thus we are told in

Reginald Scott—to take a few names from among a host—that “the spirit Paymon is of the power of the air, the sixteenth in the rank of thrones, subordinate to Corban and Marbas. Bathin is of a deeper reach in the source of the fire, the second after Lucifer’s familiar, and hath not his fellow for agility and affableness in the whole infernal hierarchy. Barma is a mighty potentate of the order of seraphims, whom twenty legions of infernal spirits do obey.” The incantation which must bind down these spirits is, as might naturally be expected, a very serious thing; and when, after various ceremonies performed, they first make their appearance, they address the magician, in their own language of course,—“Gil pragma burthon machatan dermah : to which the magician must boldly answer, Beral Beroald, Corath, Kermiel,” and so forth. Good Reginald Scott enlivens the recital of all these formidable proceedings by the following pleasant story of a worthy monk, Sir John, who was desired to utter some most efficient exorcism against the robbers of a miller’s weir.*

“So it was, that a certain Sir John, with some of his company, once went abroad a jetting, and in a moonlight evening robbed a miller’s weir, and stole all his eels. The poor miller made his moan to Sir John himself, who willed him to be quiet; for he would so curse the thief, and all his confederates, with bell, book, and candle, that they should have small joy of their fish. And therefore the next Sunday Sir John got him to the pulpit, with his surplice on his back, and his stole about his neck, and pronounced these words following in the audience of the people :

‘All you that have stol’n the miller’s eelis,
Laudate dominum de cælis ;
 And all they that have consented thereto,
Benedicamus domino.

‘Lo,’ saith he, ‘there is sauce for your eeles, my masters!’ ”

The following passage of an old writer, whose notions, like that of many of his contemporaries, were moulded in the astrological doctrines of the age, will shew sufficiently the connexion between that “science” and the fairy mythology. He is speaking of the different orders and classes of spirits.

“The spirits of the earth keepe for the most part in forrests and woods, and doe hunters much noyance; and sometime in the broad fields, where they leade trauellers out of the right way, or fright men with deformed apparitions, or make them run mad through excessive melancholy, like Aiax Telamonius, and so proue hurtful to themselues and dangerous to others. * * * The vnder-earth spirits are such as lurk in dens and little cauernes of the earth, and hollow crenices of mountaines, that they may diue into the bowels of the earth at their pleasure; these dig metals and watch treasures, which they continually transport from place to place, that none should haue vse of them: they raise windes that uomit flames, and shake the foundation of buildings: they daunce in rounds in pleasant launds and green meadowes, with noyses of musick and minstralsie, and uanish away when any comes neere them: they will take vpon them eny similitude but of a woman, and terrifie men in the likeness of dead men's ghosts in the night-time."*

Similar ideas are evidently the groundwork of the following spell, from the "History of Friar Bacon," which is printed in Mr. Thom's Prose Romances. The fairies, it must be observed, were always believed to be dwellers in dens, and lakes, and trees; and it was them whom the astrologer conjured into his glass, or crystal, to direct him to the hidden treasures which they only knew.

" Now the owle is flowne abroad,
For I hear the croaking toade;
And the bat that shuns the day
Through the darke doth make her way.
Now the ghostes of men doe rise,
And with fearful hideous cryes,
Seeke revengement (from the goode)
On their heads that spilt their blood.
Come some spirit, quicke! I say,
Night's the devil's holyday,
Where ere you be, in dennes, or lake,
In the ivy, ewe, or brake.
Quickly come, and me attend,
That am Bacon's man and friend."

The witch differed from the astrologer in this, that her power over the spirits was believed to be the result of a compact with the spirit of darkness, whereby he bound himself to serve her for a time, on condition that he should afterwards be her master for ever. The witches were among the peasantry what the astrologer was in rather more refined society, in their intercourse with the spirits. But they had no invention of their own; and there seems to be little room for doubting that the systematic story of their dealings, which we find them made to confess to at their trials, was all put into their mouths by others; and when we do find an instance where, instead of being asked if they believed and had done and seen so and so, the question was, "What had they done or seen?" Whatever confession is made may be traced to the fairy superstitions which they had imbibed from their childhood. One new circumstance was brought in with the witchcraft of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries—the power of fairies to enter into people, and "possess" them. It is not difficult to see whence and how this notion came, and we might point out a hundred instances of it; but we will only mention one, which seems to have some allusion to the merry and mischievous Puck. It is observed of the celebrated Surrey demoniac,—“He stands upon his head, dances upon his knees, and runs of all fours like a dog, and barks. He seems sometimes extremely heavy, and at other times light, and was thought to be possessed with a merry ludicrous spirit.”*

Our space forbids further quotation than one more, with which to conclude our short survey of the history of the fairy mythology in England; It is an extract from “A Dialogue concerning Witches and Witchcrafts,” written “by George Giffard, minister of God’s word in Maldon” (1598). The dialogue is spiritedly written, and gives a curious view of the popular belief at that time. The interlocutors are Samuel, Daniel, and the wife of Samuel. Samuel and Daniel have met in their walk in the fields.

“Dan. What! doe you take yourselfe to be bewitched?

“Sam. No, no; I truste no euill spirite can hurt me; but I heare of much harme done by them; they lame men, and kill their cattle yea, they destroy both men and children. They say there is scarce any towne or village in all this shire, but there is one or two witches at the least in it. In good sooth, I may tell it to you as to my friend, when I goe but into my closes I am afraide; for I see now and then a hare, which my conscience giueth me is a witch, or some witches spirite, shee stareth so vpon me. And sometimes I see an vgly weasell runne through my yard; and there is a foule great catte sometimes in my barne, which I haue no liking vnto.

“Dan. You neuer had no hurt done yet, had you, by any witch?

* Hutchinson's Hist. Essay on Witchcraft, p. 125.

“ Sam. Trust me, I cannot tell ; but I feare me I haue : for there be two or three in our towne which I like not, but especially an old woman. I haue been as careful to please her as euer I was to please mine own mother, and to giue her euer anon one thing or other ; and yet methinks shee frownes at me now and then. And I had a hogge, which eate his meate with his fellowes, and was very well to our thinking ouer night, and in the morning he was starke dead. My wife hath had fīue or sixe hennes euen of late dead. Some of my neighbours wishe me to burne some thing aliue, as a henne or a hogge ; others will me in time to seeke helpe at the handes of some cunning man, before I haue any further harme. I would be glad to do for the best.

*“ Sam. There is one, they say here, a twenty miles off, at T. B., which hath holpe many. And thus much I know, there was one of my acquaintance but two miles hence which had great losses ; he lost two or three kine, six hogs (he would not haue tooke fīteene shillings a hog for them), and a mare. He went to that same man, and told him hee suspected an old women in the parish. And I think he told me that he shewed him her in a glasse, and tolde him shee had three or foure imps—some call them puckrels ; one like a grey catte, an other like a weasell, an other like a mouse—a vengeance take them ! it is great pittie the countrey is not ridde of them—and told him also what he should doe. It is halfe a yeare agoe, and he neuer had any hurt since. There is also a women at R. H., fīue-and-twenty miles hence, that hath a greate name ; and great resort there is dayly unto her. A neighbour of mine had his childe taken lame, a girle of ten yeares olde, and such a paine in her backe, that shee could not sit vpright. He went to that woman ; she told him he had some bad neighbour—the childe was forespoken as he suspected. Marry, if he would goe home, and bring her some of the clothes which the child lay in all night, shee would tell him certainly. He went home, and put a table-napkin about her necke all night, and in the morning tooke it with him ; and she told him the girle was bewitched indeede, and so told him what hee should doe : and he had remedy. The girle is as wel at this day, and a pretty quicke girle. There was another of my neighbours had his wife much troubled, and he went to her, and shee told him his wife was haunted with a fairy. I cannot tell what shee bad him doe, but the woman is merry at this howre. I have heard—I dare not say it is so—that shee weareth about her Saint John’s Gospel, or some part of it. * * If I had heard but of one [cunning person], I should have gone ere this time ; and I glad that I met with you. * * We haue a schoolmaister that is a good prettie scholler, they say, in the Latine tongue, one M. B. ; he is gone to my house euen now ; I pray you let me entreat you to go thither, you two may reason the matter.*

“ Dan. Well, I will goe with you.

“ Sam, Wife, I have brought an olde friend of mine ; I pray thee, bid him welcome,

“ The Wife. He is verie welcome. But trulie, man, I am angrie with you, and halfe out of patience, that you go not to seek helpe against yonder same olde beaste ; I haue anothar hen dead this night. Other men can seek remedy. Here is M. B. tells me, that the goode wife R. all the laste weeke could not make her butter come. She neuer rested until she had got her husbund out to the woman at R. H. ; and when he came home they did but heat a spit red hotte, and thrust into the creame, vsing certaine wordes that she willed him, and it came as kindly as anie butter that ever she made. I met the olde filth this morning, Lord how sowerlie she looked upon me ! and mumbled as she went : I heard part of her words. ‘ Ah ! ’ quod she, ‘ you haue an honest man to your husband ; I heare how he doth vse me. ’ In trueth, husband, my stomacke did so rise against her, that I could haue found in my heart to haue flowen upon her and scratched her, but that I feared she would be too strong for me. It is a lustie olde queane.”

We will only add that, in looking back to the fairy mythology of former days, it is the more necessary to take into consideration the causes that have produced changes in the form of those superstitions, because our only source of information is the literature of the times, which generally came from those who were most apt to garble the superstitions of their countrymen. In them, therefore, the changes are by far greater and more perceptible than they would be at the same time in their true depositories—the oral legends of the peasant. On the latter, the causes, which did effect them would act slowly and gradually ; and many of the tales of Gervase and Giraldus may very well be compared with those which we can still gather in the more retired parts of England, where perchance the schoolmaster, who is abroad, has not yet shewn his face, and where the baneful effects of political agitation on men’s minds have not been felt.

The fairy may be defined as a species of being partly material, partly spiritual ; with a power to change its appearance, and be, to mankind, visible or invisible, according to its pleasure. In the old song printed by Peck, Robin Good-fellow, a well-known fairy, professes that he had played his pranks from the time of Merlin, who was the contemporary of Arthur.

Chaucer uses the word faërie as well for the individual, as for the country or system, or what we should now call fairy-land or fairyism. He knew nothing, it would seem, of Oberon, Titania, or Mab, but speaks of

And many a ladie in his campaigne,
Folwing his WIF, THE QUEEN PROSERPINA, &c.”

(The Marchante’s Tule, l. 10101.) From this passage of Chaucer, Mr. Tyrwhit “cannot help thinking that his Pluto and Proserpina were the true progenitors of Oberon and Titania.”

In the progress of The Wif of Bath's Tale, it happed the knight

" — In his way to ride
In all his care, under a forest side,
Whereas he saw upon a dance go
Of ladies foure-and twenty, and yet mo.
Toward this ilke dance he drow ful yerne,
In hope that he som wisdom shulde lerne,
But, certainly, er he came fully there,
Yvanished was this dance, he wiste not wher."

These ladies appear to have been fairies, though nothing is insinuated of their size. Milton seems to have been upon the prowl here for his "Forest-side."

In A Midsummer Night's Dream, a fairy addresses Bottom the weaver, which sufficiently shows she was not so herself.

" Hail, mortal, hail !"

Puck, or Robin Goodfellow, in the same play, calls Oberon,

" — king of shadows" —

and in the old song, just mentioned,

The king of ghosts and shadows :

and this mighty monarch asserts of himself and his subjects,

" But WE ARE SPIRITS of another sort."

The fairies, as we already see, were male and female ; but it is not equally clear that they pro-created children.

Their government was monarchical, and Oberon, the king of Fairy-land, must have been a sovereign of very extensive territory. The name of his queen was Titania, both are mentioned by Shakspeare, being personages of no little importance in the above play ; where they in an ill humour, thus encounter :

" Obe. Ill met by moonlight, proud TITANIA.
Tita. What, jealous OBERON ? Fairy skip hence ;
I have forsworn his bed and company."

That the name [OBERON] was not the invention of our great dramatist is sufficiently proved. The allegorical Spencer gives it to king Henry the eighth. Robert Greene was the author of a play entitled "The Scotishe History of James the fourthe . . . intermixed with a pleasant comedie presented by Oberon, king of the fuiries." He is likewise a character in the old French romances of Huon de Bourdeaux, and Ogier le Danois ; and there even seems to be one upon his own exploits : "Roman de Auberon." What authority, however, Shakspeare had for the name TITANIA, it does not appear, nor is she so called by any other writer. He himself, at the same time, as well as many others, gives to the queen of fairies the name of MAB, though no one, except Drayton, mentions her as the wife of OBERON :

" O then, I see, Queen MAB hath been with you,
She is the fairy's midwife, and she comes
In shape no bigger than an agate-stone
On the fore-finger of an alderman,
Drawn with a team of little atomies
Athwart men's noses as they lie asleep :

Her waggon spokes made of long spinners' legs;
 The cover, of the wings of grasshoppers;
 The traces, of the smallest spider's web;
 The collars, of the moonshine's wat'ry beams;
 Her whip of cricket's bone: the lash, of film;
 Her waggoner, a small grey-coated gnat,
 Not half so big as a round little worm
 Prick'd from the lazy finger of a maid;
 Her chariot is an empty hazel-nut,
 Made by the joiner squirrel, or old grub,
 Time out of mind the fairy's coach-makers,
 And in this state she gallops night by night,
 Through lovers' brains and then they dream of love.—
 ————This is that very MAN,
 That platts the manes of horses in the night;
 And bakes the elf-locks in foul sluttish hairs,
 Which, once untangled, much misfortune bodes."

Ben Jonson, in his "Entertainment of the queen and prince at Althrope," in 1603, describes to come "tripping up the lawn a bevy of fairies attending on MAN, their queen, who, falling into an artificial ring that was there cut in the path, began to dance around."

In the same masque the queen is thus characterized by a satyr :

"This is MAN, the mistress fairy,
 That doth nightly rob the dairy,
 And can hurt or help the churning,
 (As she please) without discerning.
 She that pinches country wences,
 If they rub not clean their benches,
 And with sharper nails remembers
 When they rake not up their embers;
 But, if so they chance to feast her,
 In a shoe she drops a tester.
 This is she that emptys cradles,
 Takes out children, puts in ladles;
 Trains forth midwives in their slumber,
 With a sieve the holes to number;
 And thus leads them from her boronghs,
 Home through ponds and water-furrows.
 She can start our franklin's daughters,
 In 'their' sleep, with shrieks and laughers,
 And on sweet St. 'Agnes' night,
 Feed them with a promis'd sight,
 Some of husbands, some of lovers,
 Which an empty dream discovers."

Fairies, they tell you, have frequently been heard and seen, nay, that there are some living who were stolen away by them, and confined seven years. According to the description they give, who pretend to have seen them, they are in the shape of men, exceeding little. They are always clad in green, and frequent the woods and fields; when they make cakes (which is a work they have been often heard at) they are very noisy; and when they have done they are full of mirth and pastime. But generally they dance in moonlight, when mortals are asleep, and not capable of seeing them, as may be observed on the following morn; their dancing places being very distinguishable. For as they dance hand in hand, and so make a circle in their dance, so next day there will be seen rings and circles on the grass.

These circles are thus described by Browne, the author of Britannias pastorals :

—“A pleasant meede,
Where fairies often did their measures treade,
Which in the meadow made such circles greene,
As if with garlands it had crowned beene.
Within one of these rounds was to be scene
A hillock rise, where oft the fairie queene
At twy-light sate, and did command her elves,
To pinch those maids that had not swept their shelves :
And further, if by maidens' over-sight,
Within doores water were not brought at night,
Or if they spred no table, set no bread,
They should have nips from toe unto the head :
And for the maid who had perform'd each thing,
She in the water-pail had leave a ring.”

The same poet, in his “Shepherd's Pipe,” having inserted Hoccleve's Tale of Jonathas, and conceiving a strange unnatural affection for that stupid fellow, describes him as a great favourite of the fairies, alleging that “Many times he hath been scene

With the fairies on the greene,
And to them his pipe did sound,
While they danced in a round,
Mickle solace would they make him,
And at midnight often wake him
And convey him from his roome,
To a field of yellow broome ;
Or into the medowes, where Mints perfume the gentle aire,
And where Flora shreds her treasure,
There they would begin their measure.
If it chanced night's sable shrowds
Muffled Cynthia up in clouds ;
Safely home they then would see him,
And from brakes and quagmires free him.”

The fairies were exceedingly diminutive, but it must be confessed, we shall not readily find their actual dimensions. They were small enough, however, if we may believe one of queen Titania's maids of honour, to conceal themselves in acorn shells ; speaking of a difference between the king and queen, she says :

“But they do square ; that all their elves for fear, Creep into acorn cups and hide them there.”

They, uniformly, and constantly wore green vests, unless when they had some reason for changing their dress. Of this circumstance we meet with many proofs ; Thus in The Merry Wives of Windsor :

‘Like urchins, ouphes, and fairies green.’

In fact we meet with them of all colours : as in the same play :

That white, on some occasions, was the dress of a female, we learn from Reginald Scot. He gives a charm “to go invisible by [means of] these three sisters of fairies,” Milia, Achilia, Sibylia : “I charge you that you doo appeare before me visible, in forme and shape of faire women, in white vestures, and to bring with you to me the ring of invisibilitie, by the which I may go invisible, at mine owne will and pleasure, and that in all hours and minutes.”

It was fatal, if we may believe Shakspeare, to speak to a fairy : Falstaff, in The Merry Wives of Windsor, is made to say, “They are fairies ; he that speaks to them shall dye.”

They were accustomed to enrich their favourites ; as we learn from the clown in A Winter's Tale : " It was told me I should be rich by the fairies." They delighted in neatness, could not endure sluts, and even hated fibsters, tell-tales, and divulgers of secrets, whom they would sily and severely be-pinch, when they little expected it. They were as generous and benevolent on the contrary, to young women of a different description, procuring them the sweetest sleep, the pleasantest dreams, and on their departure, in the morning, always slipping a tester in their shoe.

They are supposed by some to have been malignant, but this, it may be, was mere calumny, as being utterly inconsistent with their general character, which was singularly innocent and amiable. Imogen, in Shakspeare's Cymbeline, prays, on going to sleep,

" From fairies, and the tempters of the night, Guard me beseech you."

It must have been the Incubus she was so afraid of. Old Gervase of Tilbury, in the twelfth century, says, in a more modest language than English : "Vidimus quosdam dæmones tanto zelo mulieres amare quod ad inaudita prorumpunt ludibria, et cum ad concubitum earum accedunt mirâ mole eas opprimunt, nec ab aliis videntur."

Hamlet, too, notices this imputed malignity of the fairies :

" ——— Then no planets strike,
No FAIRY takes, nor witch has power to charm."

Thus, also, in The Comedy of Errors :

" A fiend, a FAIRY, pitiless and rough."

They were amazingly expeditious in their journies : Puck, or Robin Good-fellow, answers Oberon, who was about to send him on a secret expedition :

" I'll put a girdle round about the earth
In forty minutes."

Again, the same goblin addresses him thus :

" Fairy king, attend and mark,
I do hear the morning lark.
Obe. Then my queen, in silence sad,
Trip we after the night's shade,
We the globe can compass soon,
Swifter than the wand'ring moon."

In another place Puck says :

" My fairy lord this must be done in haste;
For night's swift dragons cut the clouds full fast,
And yonder shines aurora's harbinger;
At whose approach, ghosts, wandering here and there,
Troop home to church-yards, &c."

To which Oberon replies :

" But we are spirits of another sort:
I with the morning's love have oft made sport;
And, like a forester, the groves may tread.
Even till the eastern gate, all fiery red,
Opening on Neptune, with fair blessed beams,
Turns into yellow gold his salt-green stream."

Compare, likewise, what Robin himself says on this subject, in the old song of his exploits.

They never ate :

" But that it eats our victuals, I should think, Here were a fairy."

says Belarius at the first sight of Imogen, as Fidele.

They were humanely attentive to the youthful dead. Thus, Guiderius, at the funeral of the above lady :

" With FEMALE FAIRIES will his tomb be haunted."

Or, as in the pathetic dirge of Collins on the same occasion :

" No wither'd witch shall here be seen,
No goblins lead their nightly crew ;
The FEMALE FAIRS shall haunt the green,
And dress thy grave with pearly dew."

This amiable quality is, likewise, thus beautifully alluded to by the same poet :

" By FAIRY HANDS their knell is rung,
By FORMS UNSEEN their dirge is sung."

Their employment is thus charmingly represented by Shakspeare, in the address of Prospero :

" Ye elves of hills, brooks, standing lakes, and groves,
And ye, that on the sands, with printless foot,
Do chase the ebbing Neptune, and do fly him
When he comes back ; you demy-puppets, that
By moon-shine do the green-sour ringlets make,
Whereof the ewe not bites ; and you whose pastime
Is to make midnight mushrooms ; that rejoice
To hear the solemn curfew" —

In The Midsummer Night's Dream, the queen, Titania, being desirous to take a nap, says to her female attendants :

" Come now a roundel, and a fairy song ;
Then, for the third part of a minute hence ;
Some, to kill cankers in the musk-rosebuds ;
Some war with rear-mice, for their leathern wings,
To make my small elves' coats ; and some keep back
The clamorous owl, that nightly hoots, and wonders,
At our quaint spirits : Sing me now asleep ;
Then to your offices, and let me rest."

Milton gives a most beautiful and accurate description of the little green-coats of his native soil, than which nothing can be more happily or justly expressed : he had certainly seen them, in this situation, with " the poet's eye :

" ——— fairy elves,
Whose midnight revels, by a forest side
Or fountain, some belated peasant sees,
Or dreams he sees, while overhead the moon
Sits arbitress, and nearer to the earth
Wheels her pale course, they, on their mirth and dance
Intent, with jocund music charm his ear ;
At once with joy and fear his heart rebounds."

The impression they had made upon his imagination in early life appears from his " Vacation Exercise," at the age of nineteen :

" Good luck befriend thee, son ; for, at thy birth,
The FAIRY LADIES daunc't upon the hearth ;
The drowie nurse hath sworn she did them spie,
Come tripping to the room where thou didst lie ;
And sweetly singing round about thy bed,
Strew all their blessings on thy sleeping head."

L'abbé Bourdelon, in his "Ridiculous Extravagances of M. Oufle," describes "The fairies, of which," he says, "grandmothers and nurses tell so many tales to children ; these fairies," adds he, "I mean, who are affirmed to be blind at home, and very clear-sighted abroad ; who dance in the moonshine when they have nothing else to do ; who steal shepherds and children, to carry them up to their caves, &c."

The fairies have already called themselves spirits, ghosts, or shadows, and consequently, THEY NEVER DIED ; a position, at the same time, of which there is every kind of proof that a fact can require. The revisor of Johnson and Steevens's edition of Shakspeare, in 1785, crows not a little, upon his dunghill, at having been able to turn the tables upon his adversary, by a ridiculous reference to the allegories of Spender, and a palpably false one to Tickell's Kensington-gardens," which he affirms, 'will show that the opinion of fairies dying prevailed in the present century,' whereas, in fact, 'it' is found, on the slightest glance into the poem, to maintain the direct reverse :

" Meanwhile sad Kenna, loath to quit the grove
Hung o'er the body of her breathless love,
Try'd every art (vain arts !) to change his doom,
And vow'd (vain vows !) to join him in the tomb.
What could she do ? THE FATES ALIKE DENY
THE DEAD TO LIVE, OF FAIRY FORMS TO DIE."

Ashamed, however, of the public detection of his falsehood, he meanly omitted it in the next edition, without having a single word to allege in his defence ; though he had still the confidence to represent it as "a misfortune to the commentators of Shakspeare, that so much of their [invaluable] time is obliged [for the sake of money] to be employed in explaining [by absurdity] and contradicting [by falsehood] unfounded conjectures and assertions ;" which, in fact, (unfounded if they were, as is by no means true), though he was hardy enough to contradict, he was unable to explain, and did not, in reality, understand, contenting himself with an extract altogether foreign to the purpose, at second hand.

The fact, after all, is so positively proved, that no editor or commentator of Shakspeare, present or future, will ever have the folly or impudence to assert "that in Shakspeare's time the notion of fairies dying was generally known."

Ariosto informs us (in Harrington's translation, b. 10, s. 47) that ———" (either auncient folke believ'd a lie, Or this is true) a FAIRIE CANNOT DIE."

and again, (b. 43, s. 92) :

" I AM a FAIRIE, and, to make you know,
To be a fayrie what it doth import,
WE CANNOT DYE, how old so ear we grow,
Of paines and harmes of ev'rie other sort
We tast, onellie NO DEATH WE NATURE OW."

Beaumont and Fletcher, in The Faithful Shepherdess, describe

"A virtuous well, about whose flow'ry banks
The nimble-footed fairies dance their rounds,
By the pale moonshine, dipping oftentimes
Their stolen children, SO TO MAKE 'EM FREE
FROM DYING FLESH, AND DULL MORTALITY."

Puck, alias Robin Good-fellow, is the most active and extraordinary fellow of a fairy that we anywhere meet with, and, it is believed, we find him nowhere but in our own country, and, peradventure also, only in the south. Spenser, it would seem, is the first that alludes to his name of Puck :

No let the Pouke, nor other evill spright,
No let Hob-goblins, names whose sense we see not.
Fray us with things that be not."

"In our childhoood," says Reginald Scott, "our mother's maids have so terrified us with an oughe divell, having hornes on his head, fier in his mouth, and a taile in his breech, eies like a bason, fanges like a dog, clawes like a beare, a skin like a niger, and a voice roaring like a lion, whereby we start and are afraid when we heare one crie Bough! and they have so fraied us with bull-beggars, spirits, witches, urchens, elves, hags, fairies, satyrs, pans, sylens, Kit with the cansticke, tritons, centaurs, dwarfes, giants, imps, calcars, conjurors, nymphes, changeling, Incubus, ROBIN GOOD-FELLOW, the spoorne, the mare, the man in the oke, the hell wain, the fier drake, the puckle, Tom Thombe, Hob goblin, Tom Tumbler, boneles, and such other bugs, that we are afraid of our owne shadowes." "And know this by the waie," he says, "that heretofore Robin Good-fellow, and Hob goblin, were as terrible, and also as credible to the people, as hags and witches be now . . . And in truth, they that mainteine walking spirits have no reason to denie Robin Good-fellow, upon whom there hath gone as manie, and as credible tales, as upon witches; saving that it hath not pleased the translators of the bible to call spirits by the name of Robin Good-fellow."

"Your grandam's maides," he says, "were woont to set a boll of milke before 'Incubus,' and his cousine, Robin Good-fellow, for grinding of malt or mustard, and sweeping the house at midnight; and you have also heard that he would chafe exceedingly, if the maid or good-wife of the house, having compassion of his nakednes, laid anie clothes for him, beesides his messe of white bread and milke, which was his standing fee. For in that case he saith, What have we here?"

"Hemton hamten,
Here will I never more tread nor stampen."

Robin is thus characterised in the Midsummer Night's Dream, by a female fairy :

"Either I mistake your shape and making quite,
Or else you are that shrewd and knavish sprite Call'd Robin Good-fellow; are you not he
That fright the maidens of the villagery,
Skim milk; and sometimes labour in the quern,
And bootless make the breathles housewife churn;
And sometime make the drink to bear no barm,
Mislead night-wanderers, laughing at their harm?
Those that Hob-goblin call you, and sweet Puck,
You do their work, and they shall have good luck."

To these questions Robin thus replies :

—— “Thou speak'st aright.
I am that merry wanderer of the night.
I jest to Oberon, and make him smile,
When I a fat, and bean-fed horse beguile,
Neighing in likeness of a filly foal;
And sometimes lurk I in a gossip's bowl,
In very likeness of a roasted crab;
And when she drinks, against her lips I bob,
And on her wither'd dewlap pour the ale.
The wisest aunt, telling the saddest tale,
Sometime for three-foot stool mistaketh me,
Then slip I from her bum, down topples she,
And 'rails or cries,' and falls into a cough,
And then the whole quire hold their hips and lough.”
And 'yaxen' in their mirth, and neeze and swear
A merrier hour was never wasted there.”

So in Grim, the Collier of Croydon :

“Ho, Ho, Ho, my masters! No good fellowship!
Is Robin good-fellow a bug-bear grown,
That he is not worthy to be bid sit down?”

“If that the bowle of curds and creame were not duly set out for Robin Good-fellow, the frier, and Sisse, the dairy-maid, why then either the pottage was burnt-to next day in the pot, or the cheeses would not curdle, or the butter would not come, or the ale in the fat never would have good head. But if a Peter-penny, or an housle-egge were behind, or a patch of tythe unpaid,—then 'ware of bull-beggars, spirits, &c.”

This frolicksome spirit thus describes himself in Jonson's masque of Love Restored: “Robin Good-fellow, he that sweeps the hearth and the house clean, riddles for the country-maids, and does all their other drudgery, while they are at hot-cockles; one that has conversed with your court-spirits ere now.” Having recounted several ineffectual attempts he had made to gain admittance, he adds: “In this despair, when all invention, and translation too, failed me, I e'en went back and stuck to this shape you see me in of mine own, with my broom, and my canles, and came on confidently.” The mention of his broom reminds us of a passage in another play, Midsummer Night's Dream, where he tells the audience,

To sweep the dust behind the door.”

He is likewise one of the dramatis personæ in the old play of Wily Beguiled, in which he says “Tush! fear not the dodge: I'll rather put on my flashing red nose and my flaming face, and come wrapp'd in a calf-skin, and cry bo, bo! I'll pay the scholar I warrant thee.” His character, however, in this piece, is so diabolical, and so different from anything one could expect in Robin Good-fellow, that it is unworthy of further quotation.

He appears, likewise, in another, intitled Grim, the Collier of Croydon, in which he enters "in a suit of leather close to his body; his face and hands coloured russet colour, with a 'flail.'"

He is here, too, in most respects, the same strange and diabolical personage that he is represented in Wily Beguiled; only there is a single passage which reminds us of his old habits

"When as I list in this transform'd disguise,
I'll fright the country people as I pass;
And sometimes turn me to some other form,
And so delude them with fantastic shews.
But woe betide the silly dairy-maids,
For I shall fleet their cream-bowls night by night."

In another scene he enters, while some of the other characters are at a bowl of cream, upon which he says;

"I love a mess of cream as well as they,
I think it were best I stept in and made one;
Ho, ho, ho, my masters! No good fellowship?
Is Robin Good-fellow a hug-bear grown,
That he is not worthy to be bid sit down."

Here, reader, we part company; and as good old Drayton says in The Nymphida, of "Queen Mab and her light maids," we say of ourselves—

"And to the fairy-court they went,
With mickle joy and merriment,
Which thing was done with good intent."

We have brought the reader to the fairy court, and so we leave him, to whistle The Wedding March if he be good-humored; if not, "never look gash or grim at me, man—if ye're angry, ye ken how to turn the buckle o' your belt behind you"—and then, like that practical philosopher, Uncle Toby, whistle "Lillibulero" till next Number, when we shall perhaps tell you of Pygmies, Witches, and other "Night Fears."

ART. V.—FOUR AMERICAN AUTHORS.

Characteristics of Literature. By Henry T. Tuckerman.
New York : Putnam, and Co.

We have, from time to time, endeavoured to interest our readers by sketches of the authors of various countries, and have devoted two papers to the works of American Poets ;* and we now propose, in our present paper, to consider, in a variety of phases, four American Authors, Washington Irving, George Bancroft, William H. Prescott, and Henry W. Longfellow.

Washington Irving, although so obviously adapted by natural endowments for the career in which he has acquired such eminence, was educated, like many other men of letters, for the legal profession ; he, however, early abandoned the idea of practice at the bar for the more lucrative vocation of a merchant. His brothers were established in business in the city of New-York, and invited him to take an interest in their house, with the understanding that his literary tastes should be gratified by abundant leisure. The unfortunate crisis in mercantile affairs that followed the peace of 1815, involved his family, and threw him upon his own resources for subsistence. To this apparent disaster is owing his subsequent devotion to literature. The strong bias of his own nature, however, had already indicated this destiny ; his inaptitude for affairs, his sensibility to the beautiful, his native humor, and the love he early exhibited for wandering, observing, and indulging in day-dreams, would infallibly have led him to record his fancies and feelings. Indeed, he had already done so with effect in a series of letters which appeared in a newspaper of which his brother was editor. His tendency to a free, meditative, and adventurous life, was confirmed by a visit to Europe in his early youth. Born in the city of New-York on the 8rd of April, 1783,† he pursued his studies, his rambles, and his occasional pencraft there until 1804, when ill-health made it expedient for him to go abroad.

* See IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, vol. VI., No. 18, p. 193, No. 19, p. 561.

He sailed for Bordeaux, and thence roamed over the most beautiful portions of Southern Europe, visited Switzerland, and Holland, sojourned in Paris, and returned home in 1806. During his absence he seriously entertained the idea of becoming a painter; but subsequently resumed his law studies, and was admitted to the bar. Soon after, however, the first number of Salmagundi appeared, an era in American literary annals; and in December, 1809, was published "Knickerbocker's History of New-York." He afterwards edited the Analectic Magazine. In the autumn of 1814 he joined the military staff of the Governor of New-York, as aid-de-camp and secretary, with the title of colonel. At the close of the war he embarked for Liverpool, with a view of making a second tour in Europe; but the financial troubles intervening, and the remarkable success which had attended his literary enterprises being an encouragement to pursue a vocation which necessity, not less than taste, now urged him to follow, he embarked in the career of authorship. The papers which were published under the title of "The Sketch-Book," at once gained him the sympathy and admiration of his contemporaries. They originally appeared in New-York, but attracted immediate attention in England, and were republished there in 1820. After residing there five years, Mr. Irving again visited Paris, and returned to bring out "Bracebridge Hall" in London, in May, 1822. The next winter he passed in Dresden, and in the following spring put "Tales of a Traveller" to press. He soon after went to Madrid and wrote the Life of Columbus, which appeared in 1828. In the spring of that year he visited the South of Spain, and the result was the Chronicles of the Conquest of Granada, which was published in 1829. The same year he revisited that region, and collected the materials for his "Alhambra." He was soon after appointed Secretary of Legation to the American Embassy in London, which office he held until the return of Mr. McLane in 1831. While in England he received one of the fifty-guinea gold medals provided by George IV. for eminence in historical composition, and the degree of LL.D. from the University of Oxford. His return to New-York in 1832 was greeted by a festival, at which were gathered his surviving friends, and all the illustrious men of his native metropolis. The following summer he accompanied one of the Commissioners for removing the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi. The fruit of this excursion was his graphic "Tour on the Prairies." Soon after appeared "Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey," and "Legends of the Conquests of Spain." In 1836 he published "Astoria," and in 1837 "The Adventures of Capt. Bonneville." In 1839 he contributed several papers to the "Knickerbocker Magazine." Early in 1842 he was appointed Minister to Spain. On his return to his own country in 1846, he began the publication of a revised edition of his works, to the list of which he has since added a Life of Goldsmith, and "Mahomet and his Successors;" and he is now engaged upon a revised Life of Washington. This outline should be filled by the reader's imagination with the accessories, and the coloring incident to so varied, honorable, and congenial a life. In all his wanderings, his eye was busied with the scenes of nature, and cognizant of their every feature, his memory brooded over the traditions of the past, and his heart caught and reflected every phase of humanity. With the feelings of a poet and the habitudes of an artist, he thus wandered over the rural districts of merry England, the melancholy hills of romantic Spain, and the exuberant wilderness of his native land, gathering up their most picturesque aspects, and their most affecting legends, and transferring them, with the pure and vivid colors of his genial expression, into permanent memorials. Every quaint outline, every mellowed tint, the ærial perspective that leads the sight into the mazes of antiquity, the amusing still-life or characteristic human attributes,—all that excites wonder, sympathy, and merriment, he thus recognised and preserved, and shed over all, the sunny atmosphere of a kindly heart, and the freshness of a natural zest, and the attraction of a modest character,—a combination which has been happily charactersied by Lowell in the Fable for Critics:

"What! Irving? thrice welcome warm heart and fine brain,
 You bring back the happiest spirit from Spain,
 And the gravest sweet humor, that ever were there
 Since Cervantes met death in his gentle despair;
 Nay, don't be embarrassed, nor look so beseeching,
 I shan't run directly against my own preaching,
 And having just laughed at their Raphaels and Dantes,
 Go to setting you up beside matchless Cervantes;
 But allow me to speak what I honestly feel,
 To a true poet-heart add the fun of Dick Steele;
 Throw in all of Addison, minus the chill,
 With the whole of that partnership's stock and good-will;

Mix well, and while stirring, hum o'er, as a spell,
The 'fine old English Gentleman,' simmer it well;
Sweeten just to your own private liking, then strain,
That only the finest and clearest remain.
Let it stand out of doors till a soul it receives
From the warm lazy sun loitering down through green leaves,
And you'll find a choice nature not wholly deserving,
A name either English or Yankee—just Irving."

The eminent success which has attended the late republication of Irving's works, teaches a lesson that we hope will not be lost on the cultivators of literature. It proves a truth which all men of enlightened taste intuitively feel, but which is constantly forgotten by perverse aspirants for literary fame, and that is—the permanent value of a direct, simple and natural style. It is not only the genial philosophy, the humane spirit, the humor and pathos of Irving, which endear his writings, and secure for them an habitual interest, but it is the refreshment afforded by a recurrence to the unalloyed, unaffected, clear, and flowing style in which he invariably expresses himself.

The place which our author holds in national affection can never be superseded. His name is indissolubly associated with the dawn of American recognised literary culture. We have always regarded his popularity in England as one of the most charming traits of his reputation, and that, too, for the very reasons which narrow critics once assigned as derogatory to his national spirit. His treatment of English subjects; the felicitous manner in which he revealed the life of his ancestral land to her prosperous offspring, mingled as it was with vivid pictures of her own scenery, touched a chord in the heart of America which responds to all that is generous in sympathy, and noble in association. If they regard Irving with national pride and affection, it is partly on account of his cosmopolitan tone of mind—a quality, among others, in which he greatly resembles Goldsmith. It is, indeed, worthy of a true American writer that, with his own country and a particular region thereof as a nucleus of his sentiment, he can see and feel the characteristic and the beautiful, not only in old England, but in romantic Spain; that the phlegmatic Dutchman and the mercurial southern European find an equal place in his comprehensive glance. To range from the local wit of Salmagundi to the grand and serious historical enterprise which achieved a classic Life of Columbus, and from the simple grief embalmed in the "Widow's Son" to the observant humor of the "Stout Gentleman," bespeaks not only an artist of exquisite and versatile skill, but a man of the most liberal heart and catholic taste.

Reputations, in their degree and kind, are as legitimate subjects of taste as less abstract things,—and in that of Washington Irving there is a completeness and unity seldom realized. It accords, in its unchallenged purity, with the harmonious character of the author and the serene attractions of his home. By temperament and cast of mind he was ordained to be a gentle minister at the altar of literature, an interpreter of the latent music of nature, and the redeeming affections of humanity; and with a consistency not less dictated by good sense than true feeling, he has instinctively adhered to the sphere he was specially gifted to adorn. Since his advent as a writer, an intense style has come into vogue; glowing rhetoric, bold verbal tactics, and a more powerful exercise of thought characterize many of the popular authors of the day; but in literature as in life, there are various provinces both of utility and taste; and in this country and age, a conservative tone, a reliance on the kindly emotions and the refined perceptions, are qualities eminently desirable. Therefore as we look forth upon the calm and picturesque landscape that environs him, we are content that no fierce polemic, visionary philanthropist, or morbid sentimentalist has thus linked his name with the tranquil beauties of the scene; but that it is the home of an author who, with graceful diction and an affectionate heart, celebrates the scenic charms of the outward world, and the harmless eccentricities and natural sentiment of his race. The true bias of Irving's genius is artistic. The lights and shadows of English life, the legendary romance of Spain, the novelties of a tour on the Prairies of the West, and of adventures in the Rocky Mountains, the poetic beauty of the Alhambra, the memories of Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey, the quaint and comfortable philosophy of the Dutch colonists, and the scenery of the Hudson, are themes upon which he expatiates with the grace and zest of a master. His affinity of style with the classic British essayists served not only as an invaluable precedent in view of the crude mode of expression prevalent half a century ago in America, but also proved a bond in letters between that country and England, by recalling the identity of language and domestic life, at a time when great asperity of feeling divided the two Nations.

The circumstances of American daily life, and the impulse of the national destiny, amply insure the circulation of progressive and practical ideas ; but there is little in either to sustain a wholesome attachment to the past, or inspire disinterested feeling and imaginative recreation. Accordingly, we rejoice that this literary pioneer is not only an artist of the beautiful, but one whose pencil is dipped in the mellow tints of legendary lore, who infuses the element of repose, and the sportiveness of fancy into his creations, and thus yields genuine refreshment and a needed lesson to the fevered minds of his countrymen. Of all his immortal pictures, however, the most precious to his countrymen is that which contains the house of old Baltus Van Tassell, especially since it has been refitted and ornamented by Geoffrey Crayon ; and pleasant as it is to their imagination as Wolfert's Roost, it is far more dear to their hearts as Sunnyside

And the legends which he has so gracefully woven around every striking point in the scene, readily assimilate with its character, whether they breathe grotesque humour, harmless superstition, or pensive sentiment. We smile habitually, and with the same zest, at the idea of the Trumpeter's rubicund proboscis, the valiant defence of Bearn Island, and the figure which the pedagogue cuts on the dorsal ridge of old Gunpowder ; and, inhaling the magnetic atmosphere of Sleepy Hollow, we easily give credit to the apparition of the Headless Horseman, and have no desire to repudiate the frisking imps of the Duyvel's Dans Kamer. The buxom charms of Katrina Van Tassel, and the substantial comforts of her paternal farmhouse, are as tempting to us as they once were to the unfortunate Ichabod and the successful Brom Bones.

The mansion of this prosperous and valiant family, so often celebrated in his writings, is the residence of Washington Irving. It is approached by a sequestered road, which enhances the effect of its natural beauty. A more tranquil and protected abode, nestled in the lap of nature, never captivated a poet's eye. Rising from the bank of the river, which a strip of woodland alone intercepts, it unites every rural charm to the most complete seclusion. From this interesting domain is visible the broad surface of the Tappan Zee ; the grounds slope to the water's edge, and are bordered by wooded ravines ; a clear brook ripples near, and several neat paths lead to shadowy walks or fine points of river scenery. The house itself is a graceful combination of the English cottage and the Dutch farm-house. The crow-stepped gables, the tiles in the hall, and the weathercocks, partake of the latter character; while the white walls gleaming through the trees, the smooth and verdant turf, and the mantling vines of ivy and clambering roses, suggest the former. Indeed in this delightful homestead are tokens of all that is most characteristic of its owner. The simplicity and rustic grace of the abode indicate an unperverted taste,—its secluded position a love of retirement; the cottage ornaments remind us of his unrivalled pictures of English country-life; the weathercock that used to veer about on the Stadt-house of Amsterdam, is a symbol of the fatherland; while the one that adorned the grand dwellings in Albany before the revolution, is a significant memorial of the old Dutch colonists; and they are thus both associated with the fragrant memory of that famous and unique historian Diedrich Knickerbocker. The quaint and the beautiful are thus blended, and the effect of the whole is singularly harmonious. From the quietude of this retreat are obtainable the most extensive prospects; and while its sheltered position breathes the very air of domestic repose, the scenery it commands is eloquent of broad and generous sympathies.

Not less rare than beautiful is the lot of the author, to whom it is permitted to gather up the memorials of his fame, and witness their permanent recognition;—the first partial favor of his cotemporaries renewed by the mature appreciation of another generation; and equally gratifying is the coincidence of such a noble satisfaction, with a return to the cherished and picturesque haunts of childhood and youth. It is a phase of life scarcely less delightful to contemplate than to enjoy; and we agree with a native artist who declared that in his many trips up and down the Hudson, he never passed Sunnyside without a thrill of pleasure. Nor, if thus interesting even as an object in the landscape, is it difficult to imagine what moral attractions it possesses to the kindred and friends who there habitually enjoy such genial companionship and frank hospitality. To this favored spot, around which his fondest reminiscences hovered during a long absence, Mr. Irving returned, a few years since, crowned with the purest literary renown, and as much attached to his native scenery as when he wandered there in the holiday reveries of boyhood. And here, in the midst of a landscape his pen has made attractive in both hemispheres, and of friends whose love surpasses the highest meed of fame, he lives in daily view in scenes thrice endeared—by taste, association, and habit;—the old locust that blossoms on the green bank in spring, the brook that sparkles along the grass, the peaked turret and vine-covered wall of that modest yet traditional dwelling, the favorite valley watered by the romantic Pocantoro, and, above all, the glorious river of his heart.

We are strongly tempted to record some of the charming anecdotes which fall from his lips in the hour of genial companionship; to revert to the details of his personal career; the remarkable coincidences by which he became a spectator of some of the most noted occurrences of the last half century;—his personal intercourse with the gifted and renowned of both hemispheres; the fond admiration manifested by his countrymen in making his name familiar as a household word, on their ships and steamers, their schools, hotels, and townships; the beautiful features of his domestic life; the affectionate reverence with which he is regarded by his relatives and his immediate friends and neighbours;—the refined yet joyous tone of his truly “Sunnyside” hospitalities, so charmingly enlivened by his humorous and historical reminiscences. But two considerations warn us from these seductive topics—the one a cherished hope that the reminiscences thus briefly alluded to may yet be gathered up by his own hand; the other our knowledge of his delicacy of feeling and sensitive habit in regard to personalities. In a letter to the editor of the “Knickerbocker Magazine,” Mr. Irving, under the character of Geoffrey Crayon, gives an account of his purchase of the Van Tassel estate, now called “Sunnyside,” and a characteristic description of the neighbourhood, which abounds in some of the happiest touches of his style. This letter was the commencement of a series of articles published in the Knickerbocker, which, excepting his “Life of Washington,” are the last of his published writings. It appeared in the Knickerbocker for March, 1839, from which we extract it.

“ Sir : I have observed that as a man advances in life, he is subject to a kind of plethora of the mind, doubtless occasioned by the vast accumulation of wisdom and experience upon the brain. Hence he is apt to become narrative and admonitory, that is to say, fond of telling long stories, and of doling out advice, to the small profit and great annoyance of his friends. As I have a great horror of becoming the oracle, or, more technically speaking, the 'bore' of the domestic circle, and would much rather bestow my wisdom and tediousness upon the world at large, I have always sought to ease off this surcharge of the intellect by means of my pen, and hence have inflicted divers gossiping volumes upon the patience of the public. I am tired, however, of writing volumes; they do not afford exactly the relief I require; there is too much preparation, arrangement, and parade, in this set form of coming before the public. I am growing too indolent and unambitious for any thing that requires labor or display. I have thought, therefore, of securing to myself a snug corner in some periodical work, where I might, as it were, loll at my ease in my elbow chair, and chat sociably with the public, as with an old friend, on any chance subject that might pop into my brain.

"In looking around, for this purpose, upon the various excellent periodicals with which our country abounds, my eye was struck by the title of your work—'THE KNICKERBOCKER.' My heart leaped at the sight.

"DIEDRICH KNICKERBOCKER, Sir, was one of my earliest and most valued friends, and the recollection of him is associated with some of the pleasantest scenes of my youthful days. To explain this, and to show how I came into possession of sundry of his posthumous works, which I have from time to time given to the world, permit me to relate a few particulars of our early intercourse. I give them with the more confidence, as I know the interest you take in that departed worthy, whose name and effigy are stamped upon your title-page, and as they will be found important to the better understanding and relishing divers communications I may have to make to you.

"My first acquaintance with that great and good man, for such I may venture to call him, now that the lapse of some thirty years has shrouded his name with venerable antiquity, and the popular voice has elevated him to the rank of the classical historians of yore, my first acquaintance with him was formed on the banks of the Hudson, not far from the wizard region of Sleepy Hollow. He had come there in the course of his researches among the Dutch neighbourhoods for materials for his immortal history. For this purpose, he was ransacking the archives of one of the most ancient and historical mansions in the country. It was a lowly edifice, built in the time of the Dutch dynasty, and stood on a green bank, overshadowed by trees, from which it peeped forth upon the Great Tappan Zee, so famous among early Dutch navigators. A bright pure spring welled up at the foot of the green bank; a wild brook came babbling down a neighbouring ravine, and threw itself into a little woody cove, in front of the mansion. It was indeed as quiet and sheltered a nook as the heart of man could require, in which to take refuge from the cares and troubles of the world; and as such, it had been chosen in old times, by Wolfert Acker, one of the privy councillors of the renowned Peter Stuyvesant.

"This worthy but ill-starred man had lead a weary and worried life, throughout the stormy reign of the chivalric Peter, being one of those unlucky wights with whom the world is ever at variance, and who are kept in a continual fume and fret, by the wickedness of mankind. At the time of the subjugation of the province by the English, he retired hither in high dudgeon; with the bitter determination to bury himself from the world, and live here in peace and quietness for the remainder of his days. In token of his fixed resolution, he inscribed over his door the favorite Dutch motto, 'Lust in Rust' (pleasure in repose). The mansion was thence called 'Wolfert's Rust'—Wolfert's Rest; but in process of time, the name was vitiated into Wolfert's Roost, probably from its quaint cock-loft look, or from its having a weather-cock perched on every gable. This name it continued to bear, long after the unlucky Wolfert was driven forth once more upon a wrangling world, by the tongue of a termagant wife; for it passed into a proverb through the neighbourhood, and has been handed down by tradition, that the cock of the Roost was the most hen-pecked bird in the country.

"This primitive and historical mansion has long since passed through many changes. At the time of the sojourn of Diedrich Knickerbocker, it was in possession of the gallant family of the Van Tassels, who have figured so conspicuously in his writings. What appears to have given it peculiar value, in his eyes, was the rich treasury of historical facts here secretly hoarded up, like buried gold; for it is said that Wolfert Acker, when he retreated from New Amsterdam, carried off with him many of the records and journals of the province, pertaining to the Dutch dynasty; swearing that they should never fall into the hands of the English. These, like the lost books of Livy, had baffled the research of former historians; but these did I find the indefatigable Diedrich diligently deciphering. He was already a sage in years and experience, I but an idle stripling; yet he did not despise my youth and ignorance, but took me kindly by the hand, and led me gently into those paths of local and traditional lore which he was so fond of exploring. I sat with him in his little chamber at the Roost, and watched the antiquarian patience and perseverance with which he deciphered those venerable Dutch documents, worse than Herculanæum manuscripts. I sat with him by the spring, at the foot of the green bank, and listened to his heroic tales about the worthies of the olden time, the paladins of New Amsterdam. I accompanied him in his legendary researches about Tarrytown and Sing-Sing, and explored with him the spell-bound recesses of Sleepy Hollow. I was present at many of his conferences with the good old Dutch burghers and their wives, from whom he derived many of those marvellous facts not laid down in books or records, and which give such superior value and authenticity to his history, over all others that have been written concerning the New Netherlands.

"But let me check my proneness to dilate upon this favorite theme; I may recur to it hereafter. Suffice it to say, the intimacy thus formed, continued for a considerable time; and in company with the worthy Diedrich, I visited many of the places celebrated by his pen. The currents of our lives at length diverged. He remained at home to complete his mighty work, while a vagrant fancy led me to wander about the world. Many, many years elapsed, before I returned to the parent soil. In the interim, the venerable historian of the New Netherlands had been gathered to his fathers, but his name has risen to renown His native city, that city in which he so much delighted, had decreed all manner of costly honors to his memory. I found his effigy imprinted upon new-year cakes, and devoured with eager relish by holiday urchins; a great oyster-house bore the name of 'Knickerbocker Hall;' and I narrowly escaped the pleasure of being run over by a Knickerbocker omnibus!

"Proud of having associated with a man who had achieved such greatness, I now recalled our early intimacy with tenfold pleasure, and sought to revisit the scenes we had trodden together. The most important of these was the mansion of the Van Tassels, the Roost of the unfortunate Wolfert. Time, which changes all things, is but slow in its operations upon a Dutchman's dwelling. I found the venerable and quaint little edifice much as I had seen it during the sojourn of Diedrich. There stood his elbow-chair in the corner of the room he had occupied; the old fashioned Dutch writing-desk at which he had pored over the chronicles of the Manhattoes; there was the old wooden chest, with the archives left by Wolfert Acker, many of which, however, had been fired off as wadding from the long duck gun of the Van Tassels. The scene around the mansion was still the same; the green bank; the spring beside which I had listened to the legendary narratives of the historian; the wild brook babbling down to the woody cove, and the overshadowing locust trees, half shutting out the prospect of the Great Tappan Zee.

"As I looked round upon the scene, my heart yearned at the recollection of my departed friend, and I wistfully eyed the mansion which he had inhabited, and which was fast mouldering to decay. The thought struck me to arrest the desolating hand of Time; to rescue the historic pile from utter ruin, and to make it the closing scene of my wanderings; a quiet home, where I might enjoy 'lust in rust' for the remainder of my days. It is true, the fate of the unlucky Wolfert passed across my mind; but I consoled myself with the reflection that I was a bachelor, and that I had no termagant wife to dispute the sovereignty of the Roost with me.

"I have become possessor of the Roost! I have repaired and renovated it with religious care, in the genuine Dutch style, and have adorned and illustrated it with sundry reliques of the glorious days of the New Netherlands. A venerable weather-cock, of portly Dutch dimensions, which once battled with the wind on the top of the Stadt-House of New Amsterdam, in the time of Peter Stuyvesant, now erects its crest on the gable end of my edifice; a gilded horse, in full gallop, once the weather-cock of the great Vander Heyden Palace of Albany, now glitters in the sunshine, and veers with every breeze, on the peaked turret over my portal: my sanctum sanctorum is the chamber once honored by the illustrious Diedrich, and it is from his elbow-chair, and his identical old Dutch writing-desk, that I pen this rambling epistle.

"Here, then, have I set up my rest, surrounded by the recollection of early days, and the mementos of the historian of the Manhattoes, with that glorious river before me, which flows with such majesty through his works, and which has ever been to me a river of delight.

"I thank God I was born on the banks of the Hudson! I think it an invaluable advantage to be born and brought up in the neighbourhood of some grand and noble object in nature ; a river, a lake, or a mountain. We make a friendship with it, we in a manner ally ourselves to it for life. It remains an object of our pride and affections, a rallying point, to call us home again after all our wanderings. 'The things which we have learned in our childhood,' says an old writer, 'grow up with our souls, and unite themselves to it.' So it is with the scenes among which we have passed our early days ; they influence the whole course of our thoughts and feelings ; and I fancy I can trace much of what is good and pleasant in my own heterogeneous compound, to my early companionship with this glorious river. In the warmth of my youthful enthusiasm, I used to clothe it with moral attributes, and almost to give it a soul. I admired its frank, bold, honest character ; its noble sincerity and perfect truth. Here was no specious, smiling surface, covering the dangerous sand-bar or perfidious rock ; but a stream deep as it was broad, and bearing with honorable faith the bark that trusted to its waves. I gloried in its simple, quiet, majestic, epic flow ; ever straight forward. Once indeed, it turns aside for a moment, forced from its course by opposing mountains, but it struggles bravely through them, and immediately resumes its straightforward march. Behold, thought I, an emblem of a good man's course through life ; ever simple, open, and direct, or if, overpowered by adverse circumstances, he deviate into error, it is but momentary ; he soon recovers his onward and honorable career, and continues it to the end of his pilgrimage.

"Excuse this rhapsody, into which I have been betrayed by a revival of early feelings. The Hudson is, in a manner, my first and last love ; and after all my wanderings, and seeming infidelities, I return to it with a heart-felt preference over all the other rivers in the world. I seem to catch new life, as I bathe in its ample billows, and inhale the pure breezes of its hills. It is true, the romance of youth is past, that once spread illusions over every scene. I can no longer picture an Arcadia in every green valley ; nor a fairy land among the distant mountains ; nor a peerless beauty in every villa gleaming among the trees ; but though the illusions of youth have faded from the landscape, the recollections of departed years and departed pleasures shed over it the mellow charm of evening sunshine.

"Permit me then, Mr. Editor, through the medium of your work, to hold occasional discourse from my retreat, with the busy world I have abandoned. I have much to say about what I have seen, heard, felt, and thought, through the course of a varied and rambling life, and some lucubrations, that have long been encumbering my portfolio ; together with divers reminiscences of the venerable historian of the New Netherlands, that may not be unacceptable to those who have taken an interest in his writings, and are desirous of anything that may cast a light back upon our early history. Let your readers rest assured of one thing, that, though retired from the world, I am not disgusted with it ; and that if, in my communings with it, I do not prove very wise, I trust I shall at least prove very good-natured.

Which is all at present, from

Yours, etc.,

GEOFFREY CRAYON."

The Indians called the finest of New England rivers, Connecticut, River of Pines. The summer tourist to the White Mountains, ascending or descending its valley, finds little reason for the name remaining, until he reaches its upper shores, where occasional groves of pines remind him of the name and its significance. A broad, tranquil stream, it flows through much of the most characteristic scenery of the Northern States, from out the "crystal hills,"—from the shadow of Agiocochook, "throne of the Great Spirit," as the Indians called Mount Washington, dividing New Hampshire from Vermont, the granite from the green,—beneath graceful Ascutney Mountain at Windsor, through wide-waving grain-fields, foaming over the rocks in its sole important cascade at Bellows Falls, then into a broader and more open landscape as it crosses Massachusetts, making at Northampton its famous bend—the Great Ox-bow. At Springfield the railways from every quarter meet upon its banks, and its calm breadth here, with the low clustering foliage of its shores, and the boid cliff of Mount Tom glimmering in the hazy noon, which is the hour of arrival at Springfield, gives the tone to the day's impression. The traveller southward follows the stream toward Hartford and New Haven; the northern traveller clings to its shore until he reaches Northampton.

Lying in the heart of Massachusetts, Northampton is one of the most beautiful of country towns. Looking over a quiet and richly cultivated landscape, the view from Mount Holyoke is of the same quality as that from the Londoner's Richmond Hill. Gentle green hills, fair and fertile meadows, watered by the River of Pines. That river is not classic Thames, and no grotesque Strawberry Hill, nor historic Hampden Court, no Pope's villa at Twickenham, nor stately Bushy Park, tell tales to the musing eye of the singularly artificial and amusing life which is so strangely and intimately associated with the graceful English scene. The River of Pines laves its peaceful shores with Indian lore. Terrible traditions of the fights of the early settlers of New England haunt the stream. Historic life in its neighbourhood is not old enough to be artificial. Like much American pastoral scenery, which seems the natural theatre of tranquil life and a long Arcadian antiquity, the landscape of the Connecticut, so far as it is suggestive, reminds the observer only of the dull monotony of savage existence; but,—irresistibly as the stream flows to the sea,— bears imagination forward to the history that shall be. Alone of all scenery in the world, the American landscape points to the future. The best charm of the European and Asian lies much in its reference to the past. Human interest invests it all.

"The mountains look on Marathon,
And Marathon looks on the sea."

But that sea is not only a sublime waste of waters, with the inherent character of every grand natural feature, but it teems and sparkles all over with another spell. And this charm is undeniable. The pass of Leonidas is more interesting than the Notch of the White Mountains, because man is the master of nature, and wherever human character has entwined itself with natural beauty, it becomes an inseparable element of enjoyment in the scene, and an element which enhances the dignity of the landscape. Thus in Concord, the spot upon the river's bank where the battle was fought, is lovely and tranquil, but how much lovelier—not as water and foliage, but as feeling and inspiration, which is the immortal beauty of landscape—for the remembrance of the human valor which consecrates it, and its significance and results.

No man, of course, grieves that American scenery is not generally invested with this character. Born upon this superb continent, heaped at intervals with the inarticulate mounds of extinct races, yet races which have left no historic trace, and can never be more than romantically interesting, Americans are fed upon the literature and history of the world. The grandeur of Egypt, the grace of Greece, the heroism of Rome, are all theirs, and the lands illustrated by that various character do not fail to fascinate them. But at present the landscape is not unlike the Indian himself. It is grand but silent; or eloquent only with speechless implication. Foreign critics complain that Americans are enamored of foreign scenery, and do not know their own wealth. But their admiration for the old world is only their homage to that human genius which shall make American story as splendid. Seeing what it has elsewhere done, we perceive more truly what, in a sphere so stately and spacious, it will yet accomplish. A Greece more Greek and a more Roman Rome, is the possible future of America. Why are Europeans so jealous of the American's delight in the Parthenon—in the Alps—in the Italian pictures? Shall they not honor the flowering of the power that ornamented the old lands and times, when they look to its future blossoming for America's own glory? Were we an American we would say, "We prospectively honor ourselves in respecting the old world. And if, sometimes, the youth of a sensitive and delicate temperament, fully capable of enjoying to the utmost the resources of European life, and requiring the successes of art and the convenience of an old civilization for the happiest play of his powers, longs for the galleries, the societies, the historic shores, it may well be pardoned to him, in consideration that he is an indication of our capacity for that condition. He shows what we shall be,—he shows that only the genius of creation, but of appreciation, is part of our constitution. When, however, this peculiarity takes the form of a querulous fastidiousness, and, in Broadway, sighs for the Boulevards, and, remembering St. Peter's, sneers at the Capitol, it is foolish and offensive. But, on the other hand, we shall not necessarily improve our nationality by perpetually visiting Niagara or reading Mr. Schoolcraft's Legends, or refusing assent to the positive superiorities of other countries and times. Essentially eclectic in our origin, we shall be so in our development. Foreign critics treat us as if we had not a common ancestry with them, but were descended from the Indians. They say to us,—How are you ever to have a nationality, if you desert all your traditions and devote yourselves to loving and imitating Europe? The question is fair, but the implication is unjust. They forget, especially the English critics, that our diffidence is not absolute and final, but only relative. We have the same history and language with them. Their men and events are peculiarly ours, more, that is, than Italian and Patagonian events and men, and our literature, which they so obstreperously insist must be national, necessarily has a family likeness to their own. Many of our books imitate English books just as they imitate each other. The reason is in the common language and the similarity of habit of thought. But no American need tremble lest the grandeur of his country should fail to be expressed in Art and Literature. Some Homer, or Poet along whose lines shall flash and roar our boundless sea; some Plato, or Catholic Philosopher, in whose calm wisdom the breadth of a continent shall repose; some artist, who shall passionately dash upon immortal canvas the fervor of our topics, and realize in new and unimagined grace the hints of forest and prairie—these must all be, or the conditions of human and national development as they appear in history, will not be fulfilled."

Still as an American we would say, "Certainly, looking from Holyoke, no man grieves that the Connecticut is not the classic Thames, nor that the Great Oxbow is unadorned by Strawberry Hill. Nor do we suppose that he regrets upon the hill the absence of the dandies who composed the court of 'the first gentleman in Europe,' nor that of the Dutch royalty of his three predecessors. Fortunately for us, this law of association works both ways. Horace Walpole in the country, tormenting it with his fantastic fancies, is almost as incongruous a spectacle as Beau Nash by the seaside. But it is the glowing line of history in which these figures are insignificant, that imparts the charm. The elegance of extreme refinement marks the pleasant view from Richmond Hill. It is akin in impression to that of the 'lovely London ladies.' It is in landscape what they are in society. But pastoral peace broods over the valley of the River of Pines. Golden plenty waves in its meadows. Gentle mountains undulate around, covered with green woods. A fresh sweetness and virginal purity every where breathe a benediction. If no historic heroism inspires the mind of the spectator, there is also no taint of sheer artificiality, none of the nameless sadness which haunts the gallery of King Charles's Beauties. This is Nell Gwyn, the ruddy orange-girl, her youth and heart sweeter than the fruit she bore; not the painted and brocaded lady, not the frail but faithful St. Albans."

Looking from the piazza of this house at Round Hill, the eye grasps grim Monadnoc at the north, and the Yankee hills of Connecticut, made poetic by distance. A tranquil and friendly landscape,—somewhat lurid in the early history with Indian fires and desolations,—a broad, fair river,—altogether a fine and suggestive emblem of National condition and resources, it is pleasant to associate with Northampton the commencement of the work that records American history in a manner which secures its final permanence. It is fortunate that it was written now, while the outlines are not lost in the mist of antiquity, and by one who, to an original, clear and profound perception of the great principles which appear in the development of the race, has added the ripeness of rich scholarship, long foreign residence, and that invaluable practical acquaintance with men and affairs, which has made his own life part of contemporary history. Best of all for the purpose, the ineradicable Americanism of the historian imparts his native air to the page. It is not only a History of America, it is an American History. There is a wild vigor and luxuriant richness in its style of treatment, a proud buoyancy of flow, as if it shared the energetic career of the country it describes. The intellectual habit evident throughout is precisely that required of a historian, not so romantic as to limit the story to a sweet and captivating legend, nor so academic as to marshal in colorless masses the hosts of historic facts. It has no withered, scholastic air. The historian has not curiously culled flowers, and offered them to us pressed,—but with generous hands he gathers all the bounties of the field and heaps them before us, wet with morning dew.

Our present duty is not with the work, but with the circumstances which the work has made interesting. Born near Worcester, Massachusetts, Mr. Bancroft was the son of the Rev. Aaron Bancroft, one of the most distinguished Unitarian teachers of the last half century. In his house the religion learned from his lips by his children was of that grave and humane order which, once permeating the young mind, sweetens the man's life for ever after. Freedom of inquiry,—the supremest liberty of moral investigation, was the golden rule of the old man's life. "Prove all things," was the earnest exhortation of his preaching, sure that otherwise there would be little good to hold fast. When, in the declining years of his life, an intellectual and moral excitement, known as Transcendentalism, prevailed in New England, and many good men of his own persuasion fancied that the foundations of things were at last succumbing, the old clergyman went his way quite unperplexed, sympathized with the spirit, although not with the result of the investigation, and assured his alarmed friends that the errors, if such they were, would necessarily pass, and that all grain of truth grew in husks.

At seventeen years of age the historian went to Germany and studied at Göttingen. Like all ardent and serious New England youths, his interest in theological speculations was great, and he often preached to the quiet German country congregations around Göttingen, in their native tongue. This interest was the puritanical inheritance of his native land. The small towns were parishes, and the minister the high priest. It had been so from the earliest times, and the feeling in the matter, which survived until a quarter of a century since, clearly manifested the fact that the emigration of the pilgrims and the settlement of New England was a religious movement. Possibly, seen from Göttingen, the theological traditions of New England might lose some of their awful proportions. In the pleasant pulpits of Boston the observer might not always see the Cotton Mathers, and other clerical Boanerges of the elder day, nor trace in their limpid discourse the fiery torrent of Puritan preaching. But the spirit of inquiry inculcated by the father, the pastor of the quiet country town, was sure to preserve the inquirer by neither exaggerating nor threatening. The young man pursued his studies with ardor, in every direction. His penetrant mind, contrasting the European habit of education with American, perceived where the latter failed, and what it was necessary to do to elevate it's standard in the matter. Of singular intellectual restlessness, his mind bounded and darted through the fields of scholastic culture, hiving the sweets, quite ignorant yet of their probable or final use.

During his residence in Germany, the young American student, bringing to the Savans of that country the homage of a fame they did not know to exist, was doubly welcome. In Berlin he knew Schleirmacher, Wolffe, and Savigny. It was in Jena that he first saw Goethe. The old man was walking in his garden in the morning, clad with German carelessness, in heavy loose coat and trowsers, without a waistcoat. He had the imperial presence which is preserved in all the statues and pictures, and talked pleasantly of many things as they strolled. Lord Byron was then at the height of his fame. Goethe asked of him with interest, and said, although without passion or ill-feeling, that the English poet had modelled his Manfred upon Faust. In this remark, however, Goethe showed more the pride of the author than the perception of the critic. For the theme attempted in both poems is precisely the one sure to fascinate all genius of a certain power, and the treatment in these especial instances reveals all the differences of the men.

Afterwards, in Italy, our student saw Lord Byron. He first met him on board an American vessel lying at Leghorn, and to which the poet had been invited. As he mounted the side of the ship, Byron's eye fell upon a group of ladies, and he wavered a moment, saying afterward that he feared they were English, toward whom, at that time, he was not friendly. He advanced down the deck, however, glad to learn that the dreadful cloud of muslin enveloped nothing but Americans, and fell into animated conversation.

"Ah! Lord Byron," said one of the fairest of the group, "when I return to America no one will believe that I have actually seen you. I must carry them some tangible proof of my good fortune. Will you give me the rose in your button-hole?"

The "free and independent" address did not displease the poet, and he gave the rose.

Upon leaving the vessel, Lord Byron asked Mr. Bancroft to visit him at his villa, Montenero, near the city, to which, a day or two after, he went. They talked of many things, Lord Byron naturally asking endless questions of America. He denied the charge of Goethe about Manfred, and said that he had never read Faust. He had just written the letter upon Pope, and, in conversation, greatly extolled his poetry. Without saying brilliant or memorable things, Byron was a fluent and agreeable talker. It was in the year 1821, and he was writing Don Juan. "People call it immoral," said he, "and put Roderick Random in their libraries." So of Shelley: "They call him an infidel," said Lord Byron, "but he is more Christian than the whole of them." When his visitor rose to leave, the poet took down a volume containing the last cantos he had then written of the poem, and wrote his name in them, as a remembrance "from Noel Byron." But Ambrosia was that day allotted to the young American, for as they passed slowly through the saloon, the host bade him tarry a moment, and leaving the room immediately returned with the Countess Guiccioli. She, too, smiled, and gliding into the mazy music of Italian speech, led the listener on, delighted. Again he rose to go, but a servant threw open a door and discovered a collation spread in the adjoining room. Perhaps the poet pleased himself with the fancy of graciously and profusely entertaining his foreign subjects in the ambassadorial person of his guest. "That is fame," he said, upon reading in some tourist's volume that a copy of the English Bards and Scotch Reviewers had been found by him at Niagara. The modesty of his American visitor might recognise in the cordiality of his reception and treatment Lord Byron's acknowledgment of his American fame.

In 1822 Mr. Bancroft returned home, and served for a year as Greek tutor in Harvard College. During his long residence in Europe he had matured his projects to raise the standard of education in America, and in the following year he, with Mr. Cogswell, Librarian of the Astor Library, commenced the famous Round Hill School at Northampton. Three brothers Sheperd, descendants of the old New England divine, had built three neighbouring houses upon this spot. Gradually they had all passed into the hands of one of the brothers, who was willing to sell them, and they became the seat of the school. The estate comprised about fifty acres. The school was immediately filled by young men from every part of the country, and took rank directly among the finest institutions. Mr. Bancroft devoted himself with unremitting ardor to the enterprise. The system of study pursued at the best schools in the world was introduced, and the scheme was, in itself, completely successful. Unhappily, however, there was no Oxford and no Cambridge for this Eton. The course of study was so high and entire that the graduates of Round Hill were well fitted to enter the advanced classes of any College. But, by a singular provision of College Laws, those who entered an advanced class were held to pay for the preceding years. Nor did the studies in any college carry the student forward to a proportioned result. Shrewd men did not want to pay twice for their son's education. Besides, it was a solitary effort,—possibly some wild whim thought the shrewd men, of this deeply-dyed German student. Thus, although in itself successful, it did not promise to achieve the desired result, like a very perfect blossom, which will yet not ripen into a fruit. Mr. Bancroft's interest in it, therefore, gradually declined.

Meanwhile he had served other aims by translating his friend Heeren's History of Greece, and had been long meditating and preparing the material for a History of the United States. In 1827 he was married at Springfield, and returning to Northampton resumed his connection with the School simply as a teacher, and presently withdrew from it altogether. In the house represented in the engraving, its frontispiece, the first volume of the History was written, and was published in the year 1834. The historian then removed to Springfield, where he resided two years, completing and publishing another volume there.

It was a favorite maxim of Ariosto, and of Lord Byron, that every man of letters must mix in affairs, if he would secure a profound influence upon men. Only by contact, they felt, does man learn to know man. The wandering Homer, the poet Shakspeare, the statesmen Milton, Lord Bacon, the privy councillor Goethe, Michael Angelo planning fortifications for Florence, Leonardo da Vinci designing drains for the Lombardy plains, are names upon their side. It is easy to see how invaluable to a historian must be this practical intercourse with men and affairs, of whose development history is the record. Mr. Bancroft's political career, therefore, is not only a remarkable illustration of the successes opened in a republic to ability and energy, but it has necessarily had the profoundest influence upon his work. A man who makes part of the history of his own time can better write that of another. While still resident at Northampton, he was, quite unwittingly upon his part, elected a representative to the General Court, but his engagements prevented his taking his seat. Other positions were offered him, which he declined. Appointed Collector of Boston in 1838, by President Van Buren, Mr. Bancroft brought to his new duties an intelligence and zeal which secured the acknowledgment of great ability from very determined opponents. He was again married at this time; and, during the engrossing engagements of his office, he labored diligently upon the third volume of the history, which was published in 1842. In the year 1844 he was nominated for Governor by the democratic party. He was not elected, although receiving a larger vote than had ever before been polled upon the purely democratic issue. Party spirit did not spare any prominent man, and plenty of hard things were said during the contest. But in the excited moments of political difference, although great talent is often conceded to opponents, integrity and kindness of heart are too often denied. Throughout a canvass of great acerbity of feeling, the democratic nominee was in New-York, engaged in examining, often for more than the twelve hours of day, the documents illustrative of America's early history, which Mr. Brodhead had then just brought from Holland for the Historical Society of his State.

In 1844 Mr. Polk was elected President, and summoned Mr. Bancroft to Washington as Secretary of the Navy, and in the autumn of 1846, he crossed the ocean as Minister to England. When Rubens, the painter, resided in England as Dutch Ambassador, a company of diplomats one day called upon him and found him, palette in hand, at work before his easel.

"Ah!" said they, "Monsieur the Ambassador is playing painter."

"No, gentlemen," responded the artist, "the painter is playing Ambassador."

So our historian played Ambassador, and played it well. Upon leaving Washington he said to the President that he should devote his energies to the modification of the Navigation Act, and his success in the effort is one of the chief triumphs of Mr. Bancroft's political career. He did not arrive as a stranger in London, but the scholars there, and the learned representatives of other countries, were already correspondents of the American scholar, and loyal to the fame of the American Historian. We have had no American representative more genuinely American. Still devoted to the aim of his life,—by personal intercourse with eminent men and close examination of all material accessible in England, by constant correspondence with other parts of Europe, especially France, and frequent visits to Paris to explore its libraries and search its archives, the History of the United States went on. In 1849 Mr. Bancroft returned to America and took up his residence in New-York. The fourth volume of the History, comprising the French war and the beginning of the Revolution, was immediately prepared for the press and published by his old publishers, in Boston, in the spring of 1852. Its success, after so long and highly-wrought expectation, was entire, and confirmed the satisfaction that the history of the country was to be recorded by a mind so sagacious, so cognizant of the national ideas, so respectful of the national spirit, so affluent in historic lore, so moulded by intercourse and attrition with great times, and their greatest men, so capable of expression at once rich, vigorous, and characteristic.

Mr. Bancroft's time is now divided between the city and the seaside. Early in the summer he repairs to Newport, and works at the concluding volumes of his history; it will be a noble record of great deeds, and will comprise the first events of the greatest epoch of modern times. Nor is it possible to say to how late a date the work will be continued. The great result of independence once achieved, the consequent organization of details can hardly be properly or copiously treated, until the mind can clearly trace the characteristic operation of principles through a somewhat longer course of years.

The true idea of a home includes something more than a place to live in. It involves elements which are intangible. It means a particular spot in which the mind is developed, the character trained, and the affections fed. It supposes a chain of association, by which mute material forms are linked to certain states of thought and moods of feeling, so that our joys and sorrows, our struggles and triumphs, are chronicled on the walls of a house, the trunk of a tree, or the alleys of a garden. Many persons are so unhappy as to pass through life without these sweet influences. Their lives are wandering and nomadic, and their temporary places of shelter are mere tents, though built of brick or wood. The bride is brought home to one house, the child is born in another, and dies in a third. As we walk through the unexpressive squares of one of our cities, and mark their dreary monotony of front, and their ever-changing door-plates, how few of these houses are there that present themselves to the eye with any of the symbols and indications of home. These, we say instinctively, are mere parallelograms of air, with sections and divisions at regular intervals, in which men may eat and sleep, but not live, in the large meaning of the term. But a country-house, however small and plain, if it be only well placed, as in the shadow of a patriarchal tree, or on the banks of a stream, or in the hollow of a sheltering hill, has more of the look of home than many a costly city mansion. In the former, a portion of nature seems to have been subdued and converted to the uses of man, and yet its primitive character to have remained unchanged; but, in the latter, nature has been slain and buried, and a huge brick monument erected to her memory. We read that "God setteth the solitary in families." The significance of this beautiful expression dwells in its last word. The solitary are not set in hotels or boarding-houses, nor yet in communities or phalansteries, but in families. The burden of solitude is to be lightened by household affections, and not by mere aggregation. True society—that which the heart craves and the character needs—is only to be found at home, and what are called the cares of housekeeping, from which so many selfishly and indolently shrink, when lightened by mutual forbearance and unpretending self-sacrifice, become occasions of endearment and instruments of moral and spiritual growth.

The partial deprivation of sight under which Mr. Prescott has long labored, is now a fact in literary history almost as well known as the blindness of Milton or the lameness of Scott. Indeed, many magnify in their thoughts the extent of his loss, and picture to themselves the author of "Ferdinand and Isabella" as a venerable personage, entirely sightless, whose "dark steps" require a constant "guiding hand," and are greatly surprised when they see this ideal image transformed into a figure retaining a more than common share of youthful lightness of movement, and a countenance full of freshness and animation, which betrays to a casual observation no mark of visual imperfection. The weight of this trial, heavy indeed to a man of literary tastes, has been balanced in Mr. Prescott's case by great compensations. He has been happy in the home into which he was born, happy in the home he has made for himself, and happy in the troops of loving and sympathizing friends whom he has gathered around him. He has been happy in the early possession of that leisure which has enabled him to give his whole energies to literary labors, without distraction or interruption, and, most of all, happy in his own genial temper, his cheerful spirit, his cordial frankness, and that disposition to look on the bright side of men and things, which is better not only than house and land, but than genius and fame. It is his privilege, by no means universal with successful authors, to be best valued where most known; and the graceful tribute which his intimate friend Mr. Ticknor, has paid to him, in the preface to his History of Spanish Literature, that his "honors will always be dearest to those who have best known the discouragements under which they have been won, and the modesty and gentleness with which they are worn," is but an expression of the common feeling of all those who know him.

To come down to smaller matters, Mr. Prescott has been fortunate in the merely local influences which have helped to train his mind and character. His lines have fallen to him in pleasant places. His father, who removed from Salem to Boston when he himself was quite young, lived for many years in a house in Bedford-street, now swept away by the march of change, the effect of which, in a place of limited extent like Boston, is to crowd the population into constantly narrowing spaces. It was one of a class of houses of which but few specimens are now left in that densely settled peninsula. It was built of brick, painted yellow, was square in form, and had rooms on either side of the front door. It had little architectural merit, and no architectural pretension; but it stood by itself and was not imprisoned in a block, had a few feet of land between the front door and the street, and a reasonable amount of breathing-space and elbow-room at the sides and in the rear, and was shaded by by some fine elms and horse-chesnuts. It had a certain individual character and expression of its own. Here Mr. Prescott the elder, commonly known and addressed in Boston as Judge Prescott, lived from 1817 to 1844, the year of his death. Mr. Prescott the younger, the historian, upon his marriage, did not leave his father's house to seek a new home, but, complying with a kindly custom more common in Europe, at least upon the Continent, than in America, continued to reside under the paternal roof, the two families forming one united and affectionate household, which, in the latter years of Judge Prescott's life, presented most engaging forms of age, mature life, and blooming youth. As Mr Prescott's circle of research grew more and more wide, the house was enlarged by the addition of a study to accommodate his books and manuscripts; and here fame found him living when she came to seek him after the publication of the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella." No one of those who were so fortunate as to enjoy the friendship of both the father and the son ever walks by the spot where this house once stood, without recalling, with a mingling of pleasure and of pain, its substantial and respectable appearance, its warm atmosphere of welcome and hospitality, and the dignified form, so expressive of wisdom and of worth, of that admirable person who so long presided over it. This house was pulled down a few years since, soon after the death of Judge Prescott: his son having previously removed to the house in Beacon-street, in which he now lives during the winter months.

Few authors have ever been so rich in dwelling-places as Mr. Prescott. "The truth is," says he in a letter to his publisher, "I have three places of residence, among which I contrive to distribute my year. Six months I pass in town, where my house is in Beacon-street, looking on the common, which as you may recollect, is an uncommonly fine situation, commanding a noble view of land and water."

There is little in the external aspect of this house in Beacon-street to distinguish it from others in its immediate vicinity. It is one of a continuous but not uniform block. It is of brick, painted white, four stories high, and with one of those swelled fronts which are characteristic of Boston. It has the usual proportion and distribution of drawing-rooms, dining-room and chambers, which are furnished with unpretending elegance, and adorned with some portraits, copies of originals in Spain, illustrative of Mr. Prescott's writings. The most striking portion of the interior consists of an ample library, added by Mr. Prescott to the rear of the house, and communicating with the drawing-rooms. It is an apartment of noble size and fine proportions, filled with a choice collection of books, mostly historical, which are disposed in cases of richly-veined and highly-polished oak. This room, which is much used in the social arrangements of the household, is not that in which Mr. Prescott does his hard literary work. A much smaller apartment, above the library and communicating with it, is the working study—an arrangement similar to that adopted by Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford.

Mr. Prescott's collection of books has been made with special reference to his own departments of inquiry, and in these it is very rich. It contains many works which cannot be found in any other private library, at least, in America. Besides these, he has a large number of manuscripts, amounting in the aggregate to not less than twenty thousand folio pages, illustrative of the periods of history treated in his works. These manuscripts have been drawn from all parts of Europe, as well as from the States of Spanish origin in the New World. He has also many curious and valuable autographs of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

Nor is the interest of this apartment confined to its books and manuscripts. Over the window at the northern end, there are two swords suspended, and crossed like a pair of clasped hands. One of these was borne by Col. Prescott at Bunker Hill, and the other by Capt. Lizeen, the maternal grandfather of Mrs. Prescott, who commanded the British sloop of war Falcon, which was engaged in firing upon the American troops on that occasion. It is a significant and suggestive sight, from which a thoughtful mind may draw out a long web of reflection. These swords, once waving in hostile hands, but now amicably lying side by side, symbolize not merely the union of families once opposed in deadly struggle, but, as we hope and trust, the mood of peace which is destined to guide the two great nations which, like parted streams, trace back their source to the same parent fountain.

On entering the library from the drawing-room, the visitor sees at first no egress except by the door through which he had just passed; but, on his attention being called to a particular space in the stored shelves, he is, if a reading man, attracted by some rows of portly quartos and goodly octavos, handsomely bound, bearing inviting names, unknown to Lowndes or Brunet. On reaching forth his hand to take one of them down, he finds that while they keep the word of promise to the eye, they break it to the hope, for the seeming books are nothing but strips of gilded leather pasted upon a flat surface, and stamped with titles, in the selection of which, Mr. Prescott has indulged that playful fancy which, though it can rarely appear in his grave historical works, is constantly animating his correspondence and conversation. It is, in short a secret door, opening at the touch of a spring, and concealed from observation when shut. A small winding staircase leads to a room of moderate extent above, so arranged as to give all possible advantage of light to the imperfect eyes of the historian. Here Mr. Prescott gathers around him the books and manuscripts in use for the particular work on which he may be engaged, and few persons, except himself and his secretary, ever penetrate to his studious retreat.

In regard to situation, few houses in any city are superior to this. It stands directly upon the common, a beautiful piece of ground, tastefully laid out, moulded into an exhilarating variety of surface, and only open to the objection of being too much cut up by the intersecting paths which the time-saving habits of the thrifty Bostonians have traced across it. Mr. Prescott's house stands nearly opposite a small sheet of water, to which the tasteless name of Frog Pond is so inveterately fixed by long usage, that it can never be divorced from it. Of late years, since the introduction of the Cochituate water, a fountain has been made to play here, which throws up an obelisk of sparkling silver, springing from the bosom of the little lake, like a palm tree from the sands, producing, in its simple beauty, a far finer effect than the costly architectural fancies of Europe, in which the water spurts and fizzles amid a tasteless crowd of sprawling Tritons and flopping dolphins. Here a beautiful spectacle may be seen in the long afternoons of June, before the midsummer heats have browned the grass, when the crystal plumes of the fountain are waving in the breeze, and the rich, yellow light of the slow-sinking sun hangs in the air and throws long shadows on the turf, and the Common is sprinkled, far and wide, with well-dressed and well-mannered crowds—a spectacle in which not only the eye but the heart also may take pleasure, from the evidence which it furnishes of the general diffusion of material comfort, worth and intelligence.

The situation of the house admirably adapts it also for a winter residence. The sun, during nearly his whole course, plays on the walls of the houses which occupy the western part of Beacon-street, and the broad pavement in front is, in the coldest weather, clear of ice and snow, and offers an inviting promenade even to the long dresses and thin shoes which so many perverse wives and daughters will persist in bringing into the streets. Here, in the early days of spring, the timid crocus and snowdrop peep from the soil long before the iron hand of winter has been lifted from the rest of the city. Besides the near attraction of the Common, which is beautiful in all seasons, this part of Boston, from its elevated position, commands a fine view of the western horizon, including a range of graceful and thickly-peopled hills in Brookline and Roxbury. The brilliant winter sunsets are seen here to the greatest advantage. The whole western sky burns with rich metallic lights of orange, yellow, and yellow-green; the outlines of the hills in the clear, frosty air, are sharply cut against this glowing back-ground; the wind-harps of the leafless trees send forth a melancholy music, and the faint stars steal out one by one as the shrouding veil of daylight is slowly withdrawn. A walk at this hour along the western side of the Common offers a larger amount of the soothing and elevating influences of nature than most dwellers in cities can command.*

In this house in Beacon-street, Mr. Prescott lives for about half the year, engaged in literary research, and finding relief from his studies in the society of a numerous circle of friends, a precious possession, in which no man is more rich. No author in America is so exclusively a man of letters. His time and energies are not at all given to the exciting and ephemeral claims of the passing hour, but devoted to those calm researches the results of which have appeared in his published works. He is strongly social in his tastes and habits, and his manners and conversation in society are uncommonly free from that stiffness and coldness which are apt to creep over students, and retains more youthful ease and unreserve than most men, whatever be their way of life, carry into middle age. He is methodical in his habits of exercise as well as of study, and is much given to long walks, as in former years to long rides. These periods of exercise, however, are not wholly idle. From his defective sight he has acquired the habit (not a very common one) of thinking without the pen, and many a smooth period has been wrought and polished in the forge of the brain while in the saddle or on foot.*

* The beauty of American winter sunsets is, so far as we are aware, peculiar to that country. It depends upon a combination of elements found nowhere else; a low temperature with a brilliant sunlight and a transparent atmosphere: the climate of Sweden with the sky of Italy. In northern Europe, the tone of coloring is too gray and subdued, and the short days of winter leave but little light in the air. In Italy, the beauty of the winter sunsets is essentially the same as that of the summer. In both, the coloring is what painters would call warm. But there is something peculiarly spiritual in the pure light of American winter sunsets, in which the frost keeps down all the clouds and vapors of earth, and the western sky looks like a vault of crystal, through which the glory of some other world is shining.

The occupants of most of the houses in that part of Boston where Mr. Prescott lives, are birds of passage. As soon as the sun of the short-lived summer puts off the countenance of a friend, and puts on that of a foe, one by one they take their flight. House after house shuts up its green lids, and resigns itself to a three or four months' sleep. The owners distribute themselves among various places of retreat, rural, suburban or marine, more or less remote. Mr. Prescott also quits the noise, dust and heat of Boston at this season, and takes refuge for some weeks in a cottage at Nahant. "This place," he writes to his publisher, "is a cottage—what Lady Emeline Stuart Wortley calls in her 'Travels' 'a charming country villa' at Nahant, where for more than twenty years I have passed the summer months, as it is the coolest spot in New England. The house stands on a bald cliff, overlooking the ocean, so near that in a storm the spray is thrown over the piazza, and as it stands on the extreme point of the peninsula, is many miles out at sea. There is more than one printed account of Nahant, which is a remarkable watering-place, from the bold formation of the coast and its exposure to the ocean. It is not a bad place—this sea-girt citadel—for reverie and writing, with the music of the winds and waters incessantly beating on the rocks and broad beaches below. This place is called ‘Fitful Head,’ and Norna’s was not wilder.”

The peninsula of Nahant, which Mr. Prescott has thus briefly described, is a rocky promontary running out to sea from the mainland of Lynn, to which it is connected by a straight beach, some two or three miles in length, divided into two unequal portions by a bold headland called Little Nahant. It juts out abruptly, in an adventurous and defying way, and, laid down on a map of a large scale, it looks like an outstretched arm with a clenched fist at the end of it. Thus going out to sea to battle with the waves on the stormy New-England coast, it is built of the strongest materials which the laboratory of Nature can furnish. It is a solid mass of the hardest porphyritic rock, over which a thin drapery of soil is thrown. At the southern extremity this wall of rock is broken into grand irregular forms, and seamed and scarred with the marks of innumerable conflicts. A lover of Nature in her sterner moods can find few spots of more attraction than this presents after a south-easterly storm. The dark ridges of the rapid waves leap upon the broken cliffs with an expression so like that of animal rage, that it is difficult to believe that they are not conscious of what they are about. But in an instant the gray mass is broken into splinters of snowy spray, which glide and hiss over the rocky points and hang their dripping and fleecy rocks along the sheer wall, the dazzling white contrasting vividly with the reddish brown of the rock, as does the passionate movement with the monumental calm. One is never weary of watching so glorious a spectacle, for though the elements remain the same, yet, from their combination, there results a constant variety of form and movement. Nature never repeats herself. As no two pebbles on a beach are identical, so no two waves ever break upon a rock in precisely the same way.

The beach which connects the headland of Little Nahant with the mainland of Lynn, is about a mile and a half long, and curved into the finest line of beauty. At low tide there is a space of some fifty yards wide, left bare by the receding waters. This has a very gentle inclination, and having been hammered upon so long by the action of the waves it is as hard and smooth as a marble floor, presenting an inviting field for exercise, whether on foot, in carriages, or on horseback. The wheels roll over it in silence and leave no indentation behind, and even the hoofs of a galloping steed make but a momentary impression. On a fine breezy afternoon, in the season, when the tide is favourable, this beach presents a most exhilarating spectacle, for the whole gay world of the place is attracted here; some in carriages, some on horseback, and some on foot. Every kind of carriage that American ingenuity has ever devised is here represented, from the old fashioned family coach, with its air of solid, church-and-state respectability, to the sporting-man's wagon, which looks like a vehicular tarantula, all wheels and no body. The inspiriting influence of the scene extends itself to both bipeds and quadrupeds. Little boys and girls race about on the fascinating wet sand, so that their nurses, what with the waves and what with the horses' hoofs, are kept in a perpetual frenzy of apprehension. Sober pedestrians, taking their "constitutional," involuntarily quicken their pace, as if they were really walking for pleasure and not for exercise. The well-fed family horse pricks up his ears and lifts his feet lightly, as if he felt a sense of pleasure in the coolness and moisture under them. Fair equestrians dash across the beach at full gallop, their veils and dresses streaming on the breeze, attended by their own flying shadows in the smooth watery mirror of the yellow sands. Let the waves curl and break in long lines of dazzling foam and spring upon the beach as if they enjoyed their own restless play; sprinkle the bay with snowy sails for the setting sun to linger and play upon, and cover the whole with a bright blue sky dappled with drifting clouds, and all these elements make up so animating a scene, that a man must be very moody or very apathetic not to feel his heart grow lighter as he gazes upon it.

The position of Nahant, and its convenient distance from Boston, make it a place of much resort in the hot months of summer. There are many hotels and boarding-houses; and also a large number of cottages, occupied for the most part by families, the heads of which come up to town every day and return in the evening. The climate and scenery are so marked, that they give rise to very decided opinions. Many pronounce Nahant delightful, but some do not hesitate to call it detestable. No place can be more marine and less rural. There are no woods and very few trees. There are none but ocean sights and ocean sounds. It is like being out at sea in a great ship that does not rock. As every wind blows off the bay, the temperature of the air is very low, and the clear green water looks cold enough in a hot August noon to make one's teeth chatter, so that it requires some resolution to venture upon a bath, and still more to repeat the experiment. The characteristic climate of Nahant may be observed in one of those days, not uncommon on the coast of New England, when a sharp east wind sets in after a hot morning. The sea turns up a chill steel blue surface, and the air is so cold that it is not comfortable to sit still in the shade, while the sky, the parched grass, the dusty roads, and the sunshine bright and cold, like moon beams, give to the eye a strangely deceptive promise of heat. Under the calm light of a broad full moon, Nahant puts on a strange and unearthly beauty. The sea sparkles in silver gleams, and its phosphoric foam is in vivid contrast with the inky shadows of the cliffs. The ships dart away into the luminous distance, like spectral forms. In the deep stillness the sullen plunge of the long, breaking waves becomes oppressive to the spirits. The roofs of the cottages glitter with spiritual light, and the white line of the dusty road is turned into a path of pearl.

The cottage which Mr. Prescott occupies at Nahant is built of wood, two stories in height, and has a spacious piazza running round it, which in fine weather is much used as a supplementary drawing-room. There is nothing remarkable whatever in its external appearance. Its plain and unassuming aspect provokes neither criticism nor admiration. Its situation is one of the finest in the whole peninsula. It stands upon the extremity of a bold, bluff-like promontory, and its elevated position gives it the command of a very wide horizon. The sea makes up a large proportion of the prospect, and as every vessel that sails into or out of the harbour of Boston passes within range of the eye, there is never a moment in which the view is not animated by ships and canvas. The pier, where the steamer which plies between Boston and Nahant, lands and receives her passengers, and the Swallow's Cave, one of the lions of the place, are both within a stone's throw of the cottage.

Mr. Prescott resides at Nahant from eight to ten weeks, and finds a refreshing and restorative influence in its keenly bracing sea-air. This, though a season of retirement, is by no means one of indolence, for he works as many hours every day and accomplishes as much, here, as in Boston, his time of study being comparatively free from those interruptions which in a busy city will so often break into a scholar's seclusion. As his life at Nahant falls within the travelling season, he receives here many of the strangers who are attracted to his presence by his literary reputation and the report of his amiable manners; and this tribute to celebrity, exacted in the form of golden hours from him as from every distinguished man in our enterprising and inquisitive age, is paid with a cheerful good-humour, which leaves no alloy in the recollections of those who have thus enjoyed the privilege of his society.

Mr. Prescott's second remove—for if Poor Richard's saying be strictly true he is burnt out every year—is from Nahant to Pepperell, and usually happens early in September. His home in Pepperell is thus described by him in a letter to his publisher.

“The place at Pepperell has been in the family for more than a century and a half, an uncommon event among our locomotive people. The house is about a century old, the original building having been greatly enlarged by my father first, and since by me. It is here that my grandfather, Col. Wm. Prescott, who commanded at Bunker Hill, was born and died, and in the village church-yard he lies buried under a simple slab, containing only the record of his name and age. My father, Wm. Prescott, the best and wisest of his name, was also born and passed his earlier days here, and, from my own infancy, not a year has passed that I have not spent more or less of in these shades, now hallowed to me by the recollection of happy hours and friends that are gone.

“The place, which is called ‘The Highlands,’ consists of some two hundred and fifty acres, about forty-two miles from Boston, on the border-line of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. It is a fine rolling country; and the house stands on a rising ground that descends with a gentle sweep to the Nissitisset, a clear and very pretty river, affording picturesque views in its winding course. A bold mountain chain on the northwest, among which is the Grand Monadnoc, in New Hampshire, makes a dark frame to the picture. The land is well studded with trees—oak, walnut, chestnut, and maple—distributed in clumps and avenues, so as to produce an excellent effect. The maple, in particular, in its autumn season, when the family are there, makes a brave show with its gay livery when touched by the frost."

To possess an estate like that at Pepperell, which has come down by lineal descent through several successions of owners, all of whom were useful and honorable men in their day and generation, is a privilege not common any where, and very rare in a country like America, young in years and not fruitful in local attachments. Family pride may be a weakness, but family reverence is a just and generous sentiment. No man can look round upon fields of his own like those at Pepperell, where, to a suggestive eye, the very forms of the landscape seem to have caught an expression from the patriotism, the public spirit, the integrity, and the intelligence which now for more than a hundred years have been associated with them, without being conscious of a rush of emotions, all of which set in the direction of honor and virtue.

The name of Prescott has now, for more than two hundred years, been known and honored in Massachusetts. The first of the name, of whom mention is made, was John Prescott, who came to the country in 1640, and settled in Lancaster. He was a blacksmith and millwright by trade—a man of athletic frame and dauntless resolution; and his strength and courage were more than once put to the proof in those encounters which so often took place between the Indians and the early settlers of New England. He brought with him from England a helmet and suit of armour—perhaps an heir-loom descended from some ancestor who had fought at Poitiers or Flodden-field—and whenever the Indians attacked his house he clothed himself in full mail and sallied out against them; and the advantages he is reported to have gained were probably quite as much owing to the terror inspired by his appearance as to the prowess of his arm.

His grandson, Benjamin Prescott, who lived in Groton, was a man of influence and consideration in the colony of Massachusetts. He represented Groton for many years in the colonial legislature, was a magistrate, and an officer in the militia. In 1735 he was chosen agent of the province to maintain their rights in a controversy with New Hampshire respecting boundary lines, but declined the trust on account of not having had the small-pox, which was prevalent at the time in London.

Mr. Edmund Quincy, who was appointed in his place, took the disease and died of it. But in the same year, the messenger of fate found Mr. Prescott upon his own farm, engaged in the peaceful labors of agriculture. He died in August, 1735, of a sudden inflammatory attack, brought on by over-exertion, in a hot day, to save a crop of grain from an impending shower. He was but forty years old at the time of his death, and the influence he had long enjoyed among a community slow to give their confidence to the young, is an expressive tribute to his character and understanding. He had the further advantage of a dignified and commanding personal appearance. In 1735, the year of his death, he received a donation of about eight hundred acres of land from the town of Groton for his services in procuring a large territory for them from the General Court, and the present family estate in Pepperell forms probably a part of this grant.

His second son was Col. Wm. Prescott, the commander of the American forces at the Battle of Bunker Hill, who, after his father's death, and while he was yet in his minority, settled upon the estate in Pepperell, and built the house which is still standing. Up to the age of forty-nine, his life, with the exception of a few months' service in the old French war, was passed in agricultural labors, and the discharge of those modest civic trusts which the influence of his family, and the confidence inspired by his own character, devolved upon him. Joining the army at Cambridge immediately after the news of the Concord fight, it was his good fortune to secure a permanent place in history, by commanding the troops of his country in a battle, to which subsequent events gave a significance greatly disproportioned both to the numbers engaged in it and to its immediate results. At the end of the campaign of 1776, he returned home and resumed his usual course of life, which continued uninterrupted, except that he was present as a volunteer with Gen. Gates at the surrender of Burgoyne, until his death, in 1795, when he was in his seventieth year. He was a man of vigorous mind, not much indebted to the advantages of education in early life, though he preserved to the last a taste for reading. His judgment and good sense were much esteemed by the community in which he lived, and were always at their service both in public and private affairs. He was of a generous temper, and somewhat impaired his estate by his liberal spirit and hearty hospitality. In the career of Col.

Prescott we see how well the training given by the institutions of New England fits a man for discharging worthily the duties of war or peace. We see a man summoned from the plough, and by the accident of war called upon to perform an important military service, and in the exercise of his duty we find him displaying that calm courage and sagacious judgment which a life in the camp is supposed to be necessary to bestow. Nor was his a rare case, for as the needs of the revolutionary struggle required such men, they were always forthcoming. Nor is there any reason to suppose that Col. Prescott himself ever looked upon his conduct on the seventeenth of June as any thing to be specially commended, but only as the performance of a simple piece of duty, which could not have been put by without shame and disgrace.*

* The revolutionary annals of New England abound in curious and characteristic anecdotes, illustrating the resolute spirit of the people, most of which are preserved only in those town histories which contain the results of minute investigation, applied to a limited territory and guided by a spirit of local pride and affection. The news of the march of the British troops out of Boston on the morning of April 19, 1775, which flew like a fiery cross through New England, reached Pepperell at about ten o'clock in the forenoon. Col. Prescott immediately summoned his company, and put himself at their head and proceeded towards Concord, having been joined by a reinforcement from Groton. A member of the company—Abel Parker—was ploughing in a distant field, and did not receive the alarm in season to start with his fellow soldiers; but as soon as he heard it, he left his oxen in the field unyoked, ran home, seized his gun in one hand and his best coat in the other, and set out upon a run to join his companions, whom he overtook in Groton. After the departure of the Pepperell and Groton troops, these towns were left nearly defenceless, but in a state of great uneasiness from a rumoured approach of the British regulars. In this emergency, several of the women of the neighbourhood met together, dressed themselves in the clothes of their absent husbands and brothers, armed themselves with muskets, pitchforks, and such weapons as they could find, and having elected Mrs. David Wright of Pepperell their commander, took possession of a bridge between Pepperell and Groton, which they resolved to maintain against foreign force or domestic treason. A person soon appeared on horse-back, who was known to be a zealous Tory. He was immediately seized by these resolute heroines, unhorsed and searched, and some treasonable correspondence found in his boots. He was detained prisoner, and his despatches sent to the Committee of Safety. For these anecdotes, as well as for some of the statements in the text, we are indebted to Butler's History of Groton, an unpretending and meritorious work.

Judge Prescott, who died in Boston in the month of December, 1844, at the age of eighty-two, was the only child of Col. Prescott, and born upon the family estate at Pepperell. His son, in one of his previously quoted letters, speaks of him as "the best and wisest of his name." It does not become a stranger to their blood to confirm or deny a comparative estimate like this, but all who knew Judge Prescott will agree that he must have gone very far who would have found a wiser or a better man. His active life was mainly passed in the unambitious labors of the bar; a profession which often secures, in America, a fair share of substantial returns and much local influence, but rarely gives extended or posthumous fame. He had no taste for political life, and the few public trusts which he discharged were assumed rather from a sense of duty than from inclination. He was never a member of Congress, nor in any way connected with the general government, but was always content to move within the narrower sphere of his own State. As a practising lawyer, no person ever enjoyed in a greater degree the confidence of the community or the respect of the courts, and for many years his only difficulty was how to dispose of the great amount of responsible business intrusted to him, without injury to his health. This rank at the bar he had fairly earned both by a large measure and a happy combination of moral and intellectual qualities—by a good sense and sagacity which instinctively led him to the right, by invincible industry, by large stores of legal learning, by natural dignity of manner and a perfect fairness of mind which never allowed him to overstate the testimony of a witness or the force of an authority. To say that Judge Prescott was a man of sense and sagacity is not enough, for in him these qualities ripened into wisdom. As he was never called upon to manage public affairs upon a large scale, or to draw conclusions from a very wide range of observation, we can only reason from what we know to what we do not know, and infer that in the prime of his faculties he would have proved himself competent to the highest trust which his country could have imposed upon him; but, within his sphere of action and experience, his judgment commanded the greatest respect, was sought in the most difficult questions, and reposed upon with the utmost confidence. For the last thirty years of his life there was no one in Boston whose counsel was more solicited or more valued in important matters, whether public or private. He was not called upon, like his father, to serve his country in war ; but the walks of civic and peaceful life allow a man to show of what stuff he is made, and the friends of Judge Prescott knew that he had the hereditary courage of his race, and that had duty required him to face a bristling line of muskets, he would have done it with as much composure as he ever stood up before a jury to argue in behalf of a client against whom an unjust current of popular prejudice was setting.

The resources of his mind and the well-balanced symmetry of his character, were strikingly seen in his declining years, after his retirement from the bar, which took place in 1828, in consequence of failing health. The interval between active life and the grave is apt to be a trying period with lawyers. It is one of the burdens of the profession that they are obliged to spend half their time in learning what they wish to forget the moment it has served some particular end. The brain is like an inn that is constantly receiving new guests and dismissing the old. Thus the mind of an old lawyer is apt to be like a warehouse, which is in part empty, and in part filled with goods of which the fashion has passed away. But such was not the case with Judge Prescott. His social tastes, his domestic affections, his love of general knowledge, and the interest he had taken in every thing which had interested the community in which he lived, had prevented his mind from becoming warped or narrowed by professional pursuits ; and when these were no longer permitted to him, he passed naturally and cheerfully into more tranquil employments. His books, his friends, his family, filled up his hours and gave healthy occupation to his mind. His interest in life was not impaired, nor the vigor of his understanding relaxed, by the change.

The writer of this sketch had the privilege of a personal acquaintance with Judge Prescott during the last years of his life. His appearance at that time was dignified and prepossessing. His figure was tall, thin, and slightly bent ; his movements active, and his frame untouched by infirmity. His features were regular—in outline and proportion resembling the portraits of a kindred spirit, the late illustrious John Jay—and their expression benevolent and intellectual. His manners were simple, but marked by an air of high breeding, flowing from dignity and refinement of character. He was a perfect gentleman, whether judged by a natural or a conventional standard. A stranger, admitted to his society, would at first have been inclined to describe him by negatives. His manner was not overbearing, his tone was not dogmatical, his voice was not loud. He was free from the bad national habit of making strong assertions and positive statements. He was not a great talker ; nor was his conversation brilliant or pointed. But he who had spent any considerable time in Judge Prescott's society, especially if he had had occasion to consult him or ask his advice, would have brought away other than merely negative impressions. He would have recalled the mild and tolerant good sense of his discourse, his penetrating insight, his freedom from prejudice, his knowledge of men so unalloyed by the bitterness, the hardness, the misanthropy with which that knowledge is so often bought, and the natural ease with which the stores of a capacious memory were brought out, as the occasion required. He would have felt that he had been admitted to the presence of a person of eminent wisdom and worth, whose mind moved in higher regions than wit or eloquence alone can soar to. Who can estimate too highly the privilege of having had such a father—so fitted for the paternal office, that if his son could have had the impossible boon bestowed upon him of selecting the parent of whom he would have been born, he could never have found a better guide, a wiser counsellor, a truer friend, than he upon whom, in the providence of God, that trust was actually devolved.

The life of Judge Prescott was as happy in its close as it had been during its continuance. On the morning of Sunday, December 8th, 1844, being then in his eighty-third year, he died suddenly and without pain, surrounded by his family and in the perfect possession of all his faculties. His death, though so natural an event at his advanced age, was widely and sincerely mourned, and the expressions of feeling which it called forth, were proportioned to the respect and veneration which had followed him while living.*

* The widow of Judge Prescott, the mother of the historian, died in March, 1852, at the age of eighty-four. She was a woman of great benevolence, and large, genial and active sympathies. To the last, in winter's cold or summer's heat, her venerable form was constantly seen in the streets of Boston, as she went about on foot upon her errands of charity. She will be long remembered and sincerely mourned by the widow and the orphan, the poor and the friendless, the neglected and the forsaken. She retained her youthful energy of spirit and freshness of feeling in a remarkable degree to the last moment, and her animated smile and cordial greeting were always full of the sunshine of youth and hope.

The town of Pepperell lies in the northern part of the county of Middlesex, bordering upon the State of New Hampshire. Its inhabitants are mostly farmers, cultivating their own lands with their own hands—a class of men which forms the best wealth of a country, the value of whom we never properly estimate till we have been in regions where they have ceased to exist. The soil is of that reasonable and moderate fertility, common in New England, which gives constant motive to intelligent labor, and rewards it with fair returns—a kind of soil very favorable to the growth of the plant, man. The character of the scenery is pleasing, without any claim to be called striking or picturesque. The land rises and falls in a manner that contents the eye, and the distant horizon is dignified by some of those high hills to which, in a magniloquent way, the Bostonians give the name of mountains. The town has the advantage of being watered by two streams, the Nashua and the Nissitisset. The former is a thrifty New England river that turns mills, furnishes water-power, and works for its living in a respectable way; the latter is a giddy little stream that does little else than look pretty; gliding through quiet meadows fringed with alder and willow, tripping and singing over pebbly shallows, and expanding into tranquil pools, gemmed with white water-lilies, the purest and most spiritual of flowers.

Mr. Prescott's farm is about two miles from the centre of the town, in a region which has more than the average amount of that quiet beauty characteristic of New England scenery. The house stands upon rather high ground, and commands an extensive view of a gently-undulating region, most of which is grass land, which, when clothed in the "glad, light green" of the early summer, and animated with flying cloud-shadows, presents a fine and exhilarating prospect. As the farm has been so long under cultivation, and as for many years past the claims of taste and the harvests of the eye have not been overlooked in its management, the landscape in the immediate neighbourhood of the house has a riper and mellower look than is usual in the rural parts of New England. At a short distance in front, on the opposite side of the road, sloping gently down to the meadows of the Nissitisset, is a smooth symmetrical knoll, on which are some happily disposed clumps of trees, so that the whole has the air of a scene in an English park. The meadows and fields beyond are also well supplied with trees, and the morning and evening shadows which fall from these, as well as from the rounded heights, give character and expression to the landscape.

The house itself has little to distinguish it from the better class of New England farmhouses. It wears their common uniform of white, with green blinds; is long in proportion to its height, and the older portions bear marks of age. There is a piazza, occupying one side and a part of the front. Since it was first built there have been several additions made to it—some recently, by Mr. Prescott himself—so that the interior is rambling, irregular and old-fashioned, but thoroughly comfortable, and hospitably arranged, so as to accommodate a large number of guests. These are sometimes more numerous than the family itself. There is a small fruit and kitchen garden on the east side of the house, and on the west, as also in front, is a grassy lawn, over which many young feet have sported and frolicked, and some that were not young.

The great charm of the house consists in the number of fine trees by which it is surrounded and overshadowed. These are chiefly elms, oaks, maples and butternuts. Of these last there are some remarkably large specimens. From these trees the house derives an air of dignity and grace which is the more conspicuous from the fact that these noble ornaments to a habitation are not so common in New England as is to be desired. Its agricultural population have not yet shaken off those transmitted impressions derived from a period when a tree was regarded as an enemy to be overcome. Would that the farmers of fifty years ago had been mindful of the injunction given by the dying Scotch laird to his son, "Be aye sticking in a tree, Jock; it will be growing while you are sleeping." What a different aspect the face of the country might have been made to wear. A bald and staring farmhouse, shivering in the winter wind or fainting in the summer sun, without a rag of a tree to cover its nakedness with, is a forlorn and unsightly object, rather a blot upon the landscape than an embellishment to it.

Behind the house, which faces the south, the ground rises into a considerable elevation, upon which there are also several fine trees. A small oval pond is nearly surrounded by a company of graceful alms, which, with their slender branches and pensive foliage, suggest to a fanciful eye a group of wood-nymphs smoothing their locks in the mirror of a fountain. At a short distance, a clump of oaks and chestnuts, which look as if they had been sown by the hand of art, have formed a kind of natural arbor, the shade of which is inviting to meditative feet. Under these trees Mr. Prescott has passed many studious hours, and his steps, as he has paced to and fro, have worn a perceptible path in the turf. A few perches from the house, towards the east, is another and larger pond, near which is a grove of vigorous oaks; and, in the same direction, about half a mile farther, is an extensive piece of natural woodland, through which winding paths are traced, in which a lover of nature may soon bury himself in primeval shades, under broad-armed trees which have witnessed the stealthy step of the Indian hunter, and shutting out the sights and sounds of artificial life, hear only the rustling of leaves, the tap of a wood-pecker, the dropping of nuts, the whir of a partridge, or the iron call of a sentinel crow.

The house is not occupied by the family during the heats of summer; but they remove to it as soon as the cool mornings and evenings proclaim that summer is over. The region is one which appears to peculiar advantage under an autumnal sky. The slopes and uplands are gay with the orange and crimson of the maples, the sober scarlet and brown of the oaks, and the warm yellow of the hickories. A delicate gold-dust vapor hangs in the air, wraps the valleys in dreamy folds, and softens all the distant outlines. The bracing air and elastic turf invite to long walks or rides, the warm noons are delightful for driving; and the country in the neighbourhood, veined with roads and lanes that wind and turn and make no haste to come to an end, is well suited for all these forms of exercise. There is a boat on the Nissitisset for those who are fond of aquatic excursions, and a closet-full of books for a rainy day. Among these are two works which seem in perfect unison with the older portion of the house and its ancient furniture—Theobald's Shakspeare and an early edition of the Spectator—both bound in snuff-colored calf, and printed on paper yellow with age; and the latter adorned with those delicious copper-plate engravings which perpetuate a costume so ludicrously absurd, that the wonder is that the wearers could ever have left off laughing at each other long enough to attend to any of the business of life. When the cool evenings begin to set in with something of a wintry chill in the air, wood-fires are kindled in the spacious chimneys, which animate the low ceilings with their restless gleams, and when they have burned down the dying embers diffuse a ruddy glow, which is just the light to tell a ghost-story by, such as may befit the narrow rambling passages of the old farmhouse, and send a rosy cheek to bed a little paler than usual.

While Mr. Prescott is at Pepperell, a portion of every day is given to study; and the remainder is spent in long walks or drives, in listening to reading, or in the social circle of his family and guests. Under his roof there is always house-room and heart-room for his own friends and those of his children. Indeed, he has followed the advice of some wise man—Dr. Johnson, perhaps, upon whom all vagrant scraps of wisdom are fathered—and kept his friendships in repair, making the friends of his children his own friends. There are many persons not members of the family, who have become extremely attached to the place, from the happy hours they have spent there. There may be seen upon the window-sill of one of the rooms a few lines in pencil, by a young lady whose beauty and sweetness make her a great favorite among her friends, expressing her sense of a delightful visit made there, some two or three years since. Had similar records been left by all, of the happy days passed under this roof, the walls of the house would be hardly enough to hold them.

And this sketch may be fitly concluded with the expression of an earnest wish that thus it may long be. May the future be like the past. May the hours which pass over a house honoured by so much worth, and endeared by so much kindness, bring with them no other sorrows than such as the providence of God has inseparably linked to our mortal state—such as soften and elevate the heart, and, by gently weaning it from earth, help to “dress the soul” for its new home.

In reply to his publisher's request for a page of Mr. Prescott's manuscript, to be copied in fac-simile, the following interesting note was received:

“NAHANT, July 9, 1852.

“MY DEAR SIR:

“As you desire, I send you a specimen of my autograph. It is the concluding page of one of the chapters of the ‘Conquest of Peru’—Book III., Cap. 3. The writing is not, as you may imagine, made by a pencil, but is indelible, being made with an apparatus used by the blind. This is a very simple affair, consisting of a frame of the size of a common sheet of letter-paper, with brass wires inserted in it to correspond with the number of lines wanted. On one side of this frame is pasted a leaf of thin carbonated paper, such as is used to obtain duplicates. Instead of a pen, the writer makes use of a stylus, of ivory or agate, the last better or harder. The great difficulties in the way of a blind man's writing in the usual manner, arise from his not knowing when the ink is exhausted in his pen, and when his lines run into one another. Both difficulties are obviated by this simple writing-case, which enables one to do his work as well in the dark as in the light. Though my trouble is not blindness, but a disorder of the nerve of the eye, the effect, as far as this is concerned, is the same, and I am wholly incapacitated for writing in the ordinary way. In this manner I have written every word of my historicals. This modus operandi exposes one to some embarrassments; for, as one cannot see what he is doing on the other side of the paper, any more than a performer in the treadmill sees what he is grinding on the other side of the wall, it becomes very difficult to make corrections. This requires the subject to be pretty thoroughly canvassed in the mind, and all the blots and erasures to be made there before taking up the pen or rather the stylus. This compels me to go over my composition to the extent of a whole chapter, however long it may be, several times in my mind before setting down to my desk. When there, the work becomes one of memory rather than of creation, and the writing is apt to run off glibly enough. A letter which I received some years since from the French historian, Thierry, who is totally blind, urged me by all means to cultivate the habit of dictation, to which he had resorted; and James, the eminent novelist, who has adopted his habits, finds it favorable to facility of composition. But I have been too long accustomed to my own way to change. And to say truth, I never dictated a sentence in my life for publication, without its falling so flat on my ear that I felt almost ashamed to send it to the press. I suppose it is habit.

"One thing I may add. My manuscript is usually too illegible (I have sent you a favorable specimen) for the press, and it is always fairly copied by an amanuensis before it is consigned to the printer. I have accompanied the autograph with these explanations, which are at your service, if you think they will have interest for your readers. My modus operandi has the merit of novelty, at least I have never heard of any history monger who has adopted it besides myself.

"I remain, dear Sir,

"Very truly yours,

"WM. H. PRESCOTT."

"Once, ah, once, within these walls,
One whom memory oft recalls,
The Father of his Country dwelt;
And yonder meadow, broad and damp,
The fires of the besieging camp
Encircled with a burning belt;
Up and down these echoing stairs
Heavy with the weight of cares,
Sounded his majestic tread;
Yes, within this very room
Sat he in those hours of gloom,
Weary both in heart and head."

One calm afternoon in the summer of 1837 a young man passed down the elm-shaded walk that separated the old Cragie house, in Cambridge, from the high road. Reaching the door, he paused to observe the huge, old-fashioned brass knocker, and the quaint handle,—relics, evidently, of an epoch of colonial state. To his mind, however, the house and these signs of its age, were not interesting from the romance of antiquity alone, but from their association with the early days of the revolution, when General Washington, after the battle of Bunker Hill, had his headquarters in the mansion. Had his hand, perhaps, lifted this same latch, lingering as he clasped it in the whirl of a myriad emotions? Had he, too, paused in the calm summer afternoon, and watched the silver gleam of the broad river in the meadows—the dreamy blue of the Milton hills beyond? And had the tranquility of that landscape penetrated his heart with "the sleep that is among the hills," and whose fairest dream to him was a hope now realized in the peaceful prosperity of his country?

At least the young man knew that if the details of the mansion had been somewhat altered, so that he could not be perfectly sure of touching what Washington touched, yet he saw what Washington saw—the same placid meadowlands, the same undulating horizon, the same calm stream. And it is thus that an old house of distinct association, asserts its claim, and secures its influence. It is a nucleus of interest,—a heart of romance, from which pulse a thousand reveries enchanting the summer hours. For although every old country mansion is invested with a nameless charm, from that antiquity which imagination is for ever crowding with the pageant of a stately and beautiful life, yet if there be some clearly outlined story, even a historic scene peculiar to it, then around that, as the bold and picturesque foreground, all the imagery of youth and love and beauty, in a thousandfold variety of development is grouped, and every room has its poetic passage, every window its haunting face, every garden path its floating and fading form of a quite imperishable beauty.

So the young man passed on unaccompanied down the elm-shaded path, but the air and the scene were affluent of radiant phantoms. Imaginary ladies of a state and dignity only possible in the era of periwigs, advanced in all the solemnity of mob-caps to welcome the stranger. Grave old courtiers, be-ruffled, be-wigged, sworded and laced, trod inaudibly, with gracious bow, the spacious walk, and comely maidens, resident in mortal memory now, only as shrivelled and tawny duennas, glanced modest looks, and wondered what new charm had risen that morning upon the somewhat dull horizon of their life. These, arrayed in the richness of a poet's fancy, advanced to welcome him. For well they knew whatever of peculiar interest adorned their house would blossom into permanent forms of beauty in the light of genius. They advanced to meet him as the inhabitants of foreign and strange towns approach with supplication and submission the leader in whose eye flames victory, sure that he would do for them more than they could do for themselves.

But when the brazen clang of the huge knocker had ceased resounding, the great door slowly opened, and no phantom serving-man, but a veritable flesh and blood retainer of the hostess of the mansion invited the visitor to enter. He inquired for Mrs. Cragie. In answer the door of a little parlor was thrown upon, and the young man beheld a tall, erect figure, majestically crowned with a turban, beneath which burned a pair of keen gray eyes. A commanding gravity of deportment, harmonious with the gentlewoman's age, and with the ancestral respectability of the mansion, assured profound respect; while, at a glance, it was clear to see that combination of reduced dignity condescending to a lower estate, and that pride of essential superiority to circumstances, which is traditional among women in the situation of the turbaned lady. There was kindness mellowing the severity of her reply to her visitor's inquiry if there was a room vacant in the house.

"I lodge students no longer," she responded gravely, possibly not without regret, — as she contemplated the applicant, — that she had vowed so stern a resolution.

"But I am not a student," answered the stranger; "I am a Professor in the University."

"A Professor?" said she inquiringly, as if her mind failed to conceive a Professor without a clerical sobriety of apparel, a white cravat, or at least, spectacles.

"Professor Longfellow," continued the guest, introducing himself.

"Ah! that is different," said the old lady, her features slightly relaxing, as if professors were, ex-officio, innocuous, and she need no longer barricade herself behind a stern gravity of demeanor. "I will show you what there is."

Thereupon she preceded the Professor up the stairs, and gaining the upper hall, paused at each door, opened it, permitted him to perceive its delightful fitness for his purpose,—kindled expectation to the utmost—then quietly closed the door again, observing, "You cannot have that." It was most Barmecide hospitality. The professorial eyes glanced restlessly around the fine old-fashioned points of the mansion, marked the wooden carvings, the air of opulent respectability in the past, which corresponds in New England to the impression of ancient nobility in old England, and wondered in which of these pleasant fields of suggestive association he was to be allowed to pitch his tent. The turbaned hostess at length opened the door of the southeast corner room in the second story, and, while the guest looked wistfully in, and awaited the customary "You cannot have that," he was agreeably surprised by a variation of the strain to the effect, that he might occupy it.

The room was upon the front of the house, and looked over the meadows to the river. It had an atmosphere of fascinating repose, in which the young man was at once domesticated, as in an old home. The elms of the avenue shaded his windows, and as he glanced from them, the summer lay asleep upon the landscape in the windless day.

"This," said the old lady, with a slight sadness in her voice, as if speaking of times for ever past and to which she herself properly belonged,— "this was General Washington's chamber."

A light more pensive played over the landscape, in the Poet's eyes, as he heard her words. He knew that such a presence had consecrated the house, and peculiarly that room. He felt that whoever fills the places once occupied by the great and good, is himself held to greatness and goodness by a sympathy and necessity sweet as mysterious. For ever after, his imagination is a more lordly picture-gallery than that of ancestral halls. Through that gallery he wanders, strong in his humility and resolve, valiant as the last scion of noble Norman races, devoting himself as of old knights were devoted, by earnest midnight meditation and holy vows, to

Heart within, and God o’erhead !”

The stately hostess retired, and the next day the new lodger took possession of his room. He lived entirely apart from the old lady, although under the same roof. Her manner of life was quiet and unobtrusive. The silence of the ancient mansion which to its new resident was truly “the still air of delightful studies,” was not disturbed by the shrill cackle of a country household. In the morning, after he had settled himself to the day’s occupation, the scholar heard the faint and measured tread of the old lady as she descended to breakfast, her silken gown rustling along the hall as if the shadowy brocade of some elder dame departed, who failed to discover in the ghostly stillness of the well-known passage, that she had wandered from her sphere. Then, after due interval, if, upon his way to the day’s collegiate duties, the professor entered the hostess’s little parlor to offer her good morning or make some domestic suggestion, he found her seated by the open window, through which stole the sweet New England air, lifting the few gray locks that straggled from the turban, as tenderly as Greek winds played with Helen’s curls. Upon her lap lay an open volume of Voltaire, possibly, for the old lady’s mind entertained whatever was vigorous and free, — and from the brilliant wit of the Frenchman, and his icy precision of thought and statement, she turned to the warm day that flooded the meadows with summer, and which in the high tree-tops above her head sang in breezy, fitful cadences of a beauty that no denizen of the summer shall ever see, and a song sweeter than he shall ever hear. It was because she had heard and felt this breath of nature that the matron in her quaint old age could enjoy the page of the Frenchman, even as in her youth she could have admired the delicacy of his point-lace ruffles, nor have less enjoyed, by reason of that admiration, the green garden-walk of Ferney, in which she might have seen them.

Or at times, as the scholar studied, he heard footsteps upon the walk, and the old knocker clanged the arrival of guests who passed into the parlor, and, as the door opened and closed, he could hear, far away and confused, the sounds of stately conversation, until there was a prolonged and louder noise, a bustle, the jar of the heavy door closing, the dying echo of footsteps,—and then the deep and ghostly silence again closed around the small event as the sea ripples into calm over a sinking stone. Or more dreamily still, as at twilight the Poet sat musing in his darkening room—hearing the “footsteps of angels” sounding, melodious and low, through all the other “voices of the Night,” he seemed to catch snatches of mournful music thrilling the deep silence with sorrow, and, listening more intently, he heard distinctly the harpsichord in the old lady’s parlor, and knew that she was sitting, turbaned and wrinkled, where she had sat in the glowing triumph of youth, and with wandering fingers was drawing in feeble and uncertain cadence from the keys, tunes she had once dashed from them in all the fulness of harmony. Or when, the summer following the Poet’s arrival, the blight of canker-worms fell upon the stately old trees before the house, and struck them mortally, so that they gradually wasted and withered away,—if then the young man entered her parlor and finding her by the open window, saw that the worms were crawling over her dress and hanging from her white turban, and asked her if they were not disagreeable and if she would do nothing to destroy them, she raised her eyes from another book than Voltaire’s and said to him gravely, “Why, sir, they are our fellow-worms, and have as good a right to live as we.” And as the Poet returned to his chamber, musing more than ever upon the Saturan Time that so remorselessly consumes his own children, and picturing the gay youth of the grave old hostess, he could not but pause, leaning upon the heavy balusters of the stairs, and remember the tradition of the house, that once, as an old hostess, like his own, lay waiting for death in her chamber, she sent for her young guests, like himself, to come and take last leave of her, and as he entered her room, and advancing to her bedside, saw her lying stretched at length and clutching the clothes closely around her neck, so that only her sharply featured and shrunken face was visible,—the fading eye opened upon him for a moment and he heard from the withered lips this stern whisper of farewell,—“Young man, never marry, for beauty comes to this!”

The lines of the Poet had fallen in pleasant places. With the old house and its hostess, and its many known and unknown associations, there was no lack of material for thought and speculation. A country-house in New England which is not only old, but by the character of its structure and its coherent history, suggests a life of more interest and dignity than that of a simple countryman "whose only aim was to increase his store," is interesting in the degree of its rarity. The traveller upon the high road before the Cragie House, even if he knew nothing of its story, would be struck by its quaint dignity and respectability, and make a legend, if he could not find one already made. If, however, his lot had been cast in Cambridge, and he had been able to secure a room in the mansion, he would not rest until he had explored the traditions of its origin and occupancy, and had given his fancy moulds in which to run its images. He would have found in the churchyard of Cambridge a freestone tablet supported by five pillars, upon which, with the name Col. John Vassal died in 1747, are sculptured the words—Vas-sol, and the emblems, a goblet and sun. Whether this device was a proud assertion of the fact, that the fortunes of the family should be always as happily no historian records ; for the beaker has long since been drained to the dregs, and of the stately family nothing survived in the early part of the Poet's residence in the house, but an old black man who had been born, a slave, in the mansion during the last days of the Vassals, and who occasionally returned to visit his earliest haunts like an Indian the hunting grounds of his extinct tribe.

This Col. John Vassal is supposed to have built the house towards the close of the first half of the last century. Upon an iron in the back of one of the chimneys, there is the date, 1759—which probably commemorates no more than the fact of its own insertion at that period, inasmuch as the builder of the house would hardly commit the authentic witness of its erection to the mercies of smoke and soot. History capitulates before the exact date of the building of the Cragie House, as completely as before that of the foundation of Thebes. But the house was evidently generously built, and Col. John Vassal having lived there in generous style, died, and lies under the free-stone tablet. His son John fell upon revolutionary times, and was a royalist. The observer of the house will not be surprised at the fact. That the occupant of such a mansion should, in colonial troubles, side with the government was as natural as the fealty of a Douglas or a Howard to the king.

The house, however, passed from his hands, and was purchased by the provincial government at the beginning of serious work with the mother country. After the battle of Bunker Hill, it was allotted to General Washington as his head quarters. It was entirely unfurnished, but the charity of neighbours filled it with necessary furniture. The south-eastern room upon the lower floor, at the right of the front door, and now occupied as a study by Mr. Longfellow, was devoted to the same purpose by Washington. The room over it, as Madame Cragie has already informed us, was his chamber. The room upon the lower floor, in the rear of the study, which was afterwards enlarged and is now the Poet's library, was occupied by the aids-de-camps of the commander-in-chief. And the southwest room, upon the lower floor, was Mrs. Washington's drawing room. The rich old wood carving in this apartment is still remarkable, still certifies the frequent presence of fine society. For, although during the year in which Washington occupied the mansion, there could have been as little desire as means for gay festivity; yet Washington and his leading associates were all gentlemen—men who would have graced the elegance of a court with the same dignity that made the plainness of a republic admirable. Many of Washington's published letters, are dated from this house. And could the walls whisper, we should hear more and better things of him, than could ever be recorded. In his chamber are still the gay-painted tiles peculiar to fine houses of the period; and upon their quaint and grotesque images the glancing eyes of the Poet's children now wonderingly linger, where the sad and doubtful ones of Washington must have often fallen as he meditated the darkness of the future.

Many of these peculiarities and memories of the mansion appear in the Poet's verses. In the opening of the poem "To a Child," whence many a motto is taken, the tiles are painted anew.

"The lady with the gay macaw,
The dancing girl, the grave Bashaw
With bearded lip and chin;
And, leaning idly o'er his gate,
Beneath the imperial fan of state,
The Chinese mandarin."

The next figure that distinctly appears in the old house is that of Thomas Tracy, a personage of whom the household traditions are extremely fond. He was a rich man, in the fabulous style of the East ; such a nabob as Oriental imaginations can everywhere easily conjure, while practical experience wonders that they are so rare. He carried himself with a rare lavishness. Servants drank costly wines from carved pitchers in the incredible days of Thomas Tracy ; and in his stately mansion, a hundred guests sat down to banquets, and pledged their host in draughts whose remembrance keep his name sweet, as royal bodies were preserved in wine and spices. In the early days of national disorder, he sent out privateers to scour the seas and bleed Spanish galleons of their sunniest juices, and reap golden harvests of fruits and spices, of silks and satins, from East and West Indian ships, that the bountiful table of Vassal House might not fail, nor the carousing days of Thomas Tracy become credible. But these "spacious times" of the large-hearted and large-handed gentleman suddenly ended. The wealthy man failed ; no more hundred guests appeared at banquets ; no more privateers sailed into Boston Bay, recking with riches from every zone ; Spain, the Brazils, the Indies, no more rolled their golden sands into the pockets of Thomas Tracy ; servants, costly wines, carved pictures, all began to glimmer and go, and finally Thomas Tracy and his incredible days vanished as entirely as the gorgeous pavilions with which the sun in setting piles the summer west.

After this illuminated chapter in the history of the house, Captain Joseph Lee, a brother of Madame Tracy, appears in the annals, but does not seem to have illustrated them by any special gifts or graces. Tradition remains silent, pining for Thomas Tracy, until it lifts its head upon the entry into the house of Andrew Cragie, Apothecary-General to the Northern provincial army, who amassed a fortune in that office, which, like his great predecessor, he presently lost ; but not until he had built a bridge over the Charles river, connecting Cambridge with Boston, which is still known by his name. Andrew Cragie did much for the house, even enlarging it to its present form ; but tradition is hard upon him. It declares that he was a huge man, heavy and dull ; and evidently looks upon his career as the high lyric of Thomas Tracy's, muddled into tough prose. In the best and most prosperous days of Andrew Cragie, the estate comprised two-hundred acres. Upon the site of the present observatory, not far from the mansion, stood a summer-house, but whether of any rare architectural device, whether, in fact, any orphic genius of those days said a summer-house, which, like that of Mr. Emerson's, only "lacked scientific arrangement" to be quite perfect, does not appear. Like the apothecary to the American army, the summer-house is gone, as likewise an aqueduct, that brought water a quarter of a mile. Tradition, so enamored of Tracy, is generous enough to mention a dinner-party given by Andrew Cragie every Saturday, and on one occasion points out peruked and powdered Talleyrand, among the guests. This betrays the presence in the house of the best society then to be had. But the prosperous Cragie could not avoid the fate of his opulent predecessor, who also gave banquets. Things rushed on too rapidly for him. The bridge, aqueduct and summer-house, two hundred acres and an enlarged house, were too much for the fortune acquired in dealing medicaments to the American army. The "spacious times" of Andrew Cragie also came to an end. A visitor walked with him through his large and handsome rooms, and struck with admiration, exclaimed,

"Mr. Cragie, I should think you could lose yourself in all this spaciousness."

"Mr. ———" (tradition has forgotten the name) said the hospitable and ruined host, "I have lost myself in it,"—and we do not find him again.

After his disappearance Mrs. Cragie, bravely swallowing the risings of pride, and still revealing in her character and demeanor the worthy mistress of a noble mansion, let rooms. Edward Everett resided here just after his marriage, and while still Professor in the college of which he was afterwards President. Williard Phillips, Jared Sparks, now the head of the University, and Joseph E. Worcester, the Lexicographer, have all resided here, sometimes sharing the house with Mrs. Cragie, and, in the case of Mr. Worcester, occupying it jointly with Mr. Longfellow when the grave old lady removed her stately turban for the last time.

The Cragie House is now the Poet's, and has again acquired a distinctive interest in history. It was in Portland, Maine, in the year 1807, and in an old square wooden house upon the edge of the sea, that Longfellow was born. The old house stood upon the outskirts of the town, separated only by a street from the water. In the lower story there is now a shop,—a bookseller's, doubtless,—muses imagination,—so that the same house which gave a singer to the world may offer to the world his songs to justify its pride in him. He graduated at Brunswick with Hawthorne, whom then the Poet knew only as a shy youth in a bright-buttoned coat, flitting across the college grounds. During his college days he wooed the muses, as all students woo; and in the United States Literary Gazette, then published in Boston, the world learned how his suit prospered. In 1826 Longfellow first visited Europe. He loitered through France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Holland, and England, and returned to America in 1829. Appointed professor in his alma mater, he devoted himself to the scholar's life, poring long and earnestly over the literature of lands which he knew so well and truly that their literature lived for him and was not a hard hieroglyph only. During these quiet professional years he contributed articles to the North American Review—a proceeding not unprecedented among New England scholars, and in which Emerson, the Everetts, and all the more illustrious of the literary men of the north, have been participants. The forms of foreign travel gradually grouped themselves in his mind. Vivid pictures of European experience, such as illuminate the memory of every young and romantic traveller, constantly flashed along his way, and he began to retrace them in words, that others might know, according to the German proverb, that “behind the mountains there are men also.”

In this way commenced the publication of “Outre Mer, or Sketches from Beyond Sea,” a work of foreign reminiscences, tales and reveries of the life peculiar to Europe. It was published, originally, in numbers, by Samuel Colman, a townsman of the author's. Like the Sketch Book, it was issued whenever a number was prepared, but unlike the author of the Sketch Book, the Professor could not write as his motto, “I have no wife nor children, good or bad, to provide for;” for in the midst of the quiet professorial days, still a very young man, the Poet was married,—a fleeting joy ending by the death of his wife in Rotterdam in 1835. In Brunswick, also, and at this time, he made the translation of the ode upon “Coplas de Manrique,” by his son Don Jose Manrique, a rich, mournfully-rolling Spanish poem. The earlier verses of the young man had made their mark. In school reading-books, and in volumes of elegant extracts, and preserved in many a daintily ribboned manuscript, the “April Day,” “Woods in Winter,” “Hymn of the Moravian Nuns at Bethlehem,” “Burial of the Minnisink," and others, were readily found. As yet the Poet was guiltless of a volume, but his name was known, and upon the credit of a few fugitive pieces he was mentioned first after the monopolizing masters of American verse.

In the year 1835 he received the appointment of Professor in Harvard College, Cambridge, which he accepted, but sailed for Europe again in the course of the year. Upon leaving he committed the publication of "Outre Mer" to the Harpers in New York, who issued the entire work in two volumes. The second European visit was confined to the North of Europe, Denmark, England, Sweden, Germany, a long pause in Holland, and Paris. In the autumn of 1836 he returned, and in December of the same year removed to Cambridge to reside. Here, again, the North American Review figures a little in the literary life of the Poet. He wrote several articles for it during the leisure of his engagements as Professor of Modern Literature, and, at length, as we have seen, one calm afternoon in the summer of 1837, Longfellow first took lodgings in the Cragie House, with which the maturity and extent of his reputation was to be so closely associated.

Some wan ghost of Thomas Tracy, lordly with lace and gracious in perfumed pomp, surely the Poet saw advancing holding in his hand some one of those antique carved pitchers brimmed with that costly wine, and exhorting him to drain potent draughts, that not by him should the fame of the incredible days be tarnished, but that, as when a hundred guests sat at the banquet, and a score of full-freighted ships arrived for Thomas Tracy, the traveller should say,

"A purple light shines over all,
It beams from the Luck of Edenhall."

The vow was pledged, and now under the few elms that remain of those which the fellow-worms of Mrs. Cragie blighted, the ghost of Thomas Tracy walks appeased.

In his still southeastern upper chamber, in which Washington had also slept, the Poet wrote "Hyperion" in the years 1838-9. It is truly a romance, a beaker of the wine of youth, and was instantly received as such by the public. That public was, and must always be, of the young. No book had appeared which so admirably expressed the romantic experience of every poetic young mind in Europe, and an experience which will be constantly renewed. Probably no American book had ever so passionate a popularity as "Hyperion." It was published in the summer of 1839 by Colman, who had then removed to New-York, but at the time of publication he failed, and it was undertaken by John Owen, the University publisher in Cambridge. It is a singular tribute to the integrity of the work, and a marked illustration of the peculiarity of American developement, that Horace Greeley, famous as a political journalist, and intimately associated with every kind of positive and practical movement, was among the very earliest of the warmest lovers of "Hyperion." It shows the national eclecticism of sentiment and sense, which is constantly betraying itself in a thousand other ways

Here, too, in the southeast chamber, were written the "Voices of the Night," published in 1840. Some of the more noted, such as the "Psalm of Life," had already appeared in the Knickerbocker Magazine. Strangely enough as a fact in American literary history, the fame of the romance was even surpassed, and one of the most popular books of the day was Longfellow's Poems. They were read every where by every one, and were republished and have continued to be republished in England and in various other countries. The secret of his popularity as a poet is probably that of all similar popularity, namely, the fact that his poetry expresses a universal sentiment in the simplest and most melodious manner. Each of his most noted poems is the song of a feeling common to every mind in moods into which every mind is liable to fall. Thus "A Psalm of Life," "Footsteps of Angels," "To the River Charles," "Excelsior," "The Bridge," "A Gleam of Sunshine," "The Day is done," "The Old Clock on the Stairs," "The Arrow and the Song," "The Fire of Driftwood," "Twilight," "The Open Window," are all most adequate and inexpressibly delicate renderings of quite universal emotions. There is a humanity in them which is irresistible in the fit measures to which they are wedded. If some elegiac poets have strung rosaries of tears, there is a weakness of woe in their verses which repels; but the quiet, pensive thought,—the twilight of the mind, in which the little facts of life are saddened in view of their relation to the eternal laws, time and change,—this is the meditation and mourning of every manly heart; and this is the alluring and permanent charm of Longfellow's poetry.

In 1842 the Ballads and other Poems were published, and in the same year the Poet sailed again for Europe. He passed the summer upon the Rhine, residing some time at Boppard, where he saw much of the ardent young German poet Freiligrath. He returned after a few months, composing the poems on slavery during the homeward passage. Upon landing, he found the world drunken with the grace of Fanny Ellsler, and learned, from high authority, that her saltations were more than poetry, whereupon he wrote the fragrant "Spanish Student," which smells of the utmost South, and was a strange blossoming for the garden of Thomas Tracy.

In 1843 Longfellow bought the house. The two hundred acres of Andrew Cragie had shrunken to eight. But the meadow-land in front sloping to the river was secured by the Poet, who thereby secured also the wide and winning prospect, the broad green reaches, and the gentle Milton hills. And if, sitting in the most midsummer moment of his life, he yielded to the persuasions of the siren landscape before him and the vague voices of the ancestral house, and dreamed of a fate fairer than any Vassal, or Tracy, or Cragie knew, even when they mused upon the destiny of the proudest son of their house,—was it a dream too dear, a poem impossible?

In 1846 the "Belfry of Bruges" collection was published, in 1847 the "Evangeline," in 1850 "Seaside and Fireside," and in 1851 the best of his works, up to the present time.—"The Golden Legend." In this poem he has obeyed the highest humanity of the poet's calling, by revealing,—which alone the poet can,—not coldly, but in the glowing and affluent reality of life, this truth, that the same human heart has throbbed in all ages and under all circumstances, and that the devotion of Love is for ever and from the beginning, the true salvation of man. To this great and fundamental value of the poem is added all the dramatic precision of the most accomplished artist. The art is so subtly concealed that it is not suspected. The rapid reader exclaims, "Why! there is no modern blood in this; it might have been exhumed in a cloister." Yes, and there is the triumph of art. So entirely are the intervening years annihilated that their existence is not suspected. Taking us by the hand, as Virgil Dante, the Poet introduces us directly to the time he chooses, and we are at once flushed and warmed by the same glorious and eternal heart which is also the light of our day. This is the stroke which makes all times and nations kin, and which, in any individual instance, certifies the poetic power.

The library of the Poet is the long northeastern room upon the lower floor. It opens upon the garden, which retains still the quaint devices of an antique design harmonious with the house. The room is surrounded with handsome book-cases, and one stands also between two Corinthian columns at one end, which impart dignity and richness to the apartment. A little table by the northern window, looking upon the garden, is the usual seat of the Poet. A bust or two, the rich carvings of the cases, the spaciousness of the room, a leopard-skin lying upon the floor, and a few shelves of strictly literary curiosities, reveal not only the haunt of the elegant scholar and poet, but the favourite resort of the family circle. But the northern gloom of a New England winter is intolerant of this serene delight, this beautiful domesticity, and urges the inmates to the smaller, room in front of the house communicating with the library, and the study of General Washington. This is still distinctively "the study," as the rear room is "the library." Books are here, and all the graceful detail of an elegant household, and upon the walls hang crayon portraits of Emerson, Sumner, and Hawthorne Emerging into the hall, the eyes of the visitor fall upon the massive old staircase with the clock upon the landing. Directly he hears a singing in his mind :

" Somewhat back from the village street,
Stands the old-fashioned country-seat,
Across its antique portico
Tall poplar-trees their shadows throw,
And from its station in the hall
An ancient timepiece says to all,
 ' For ever—never !
 Never—for ever ! ' "

But he does not see the particular clock of the poem, which stood upon another staircase in another quaint old mansion,—although the verse truly belongs to all old clocks in all old country-seats, just as the " Village Blacksmith" and his smithy are not alone the stalwart man and dingy shop under the " spreading chestnut-tree" which the Professor daily passes upon his way to his college duties, but belong wherever a smithy stands. Through the meadows in front flows the placid Charles.

" River ! that in silence windest
Thro' the meadows, bright and free,
Till at length thy rest thou findest
In the bosom of the sea ! "

So calmly, likewise, flows the Poet's life. No longer in his reveries can mingle more than the sweet melancholy of the old house's associations. No tradition records a ghost in those ghostly chambers. As if all sign of them should pass away, not only Mrs. Cragie's fellow-worms destroyed the elms in front, but a noble linden-tree in the garden, faded as she failed, and languished into decay after her death. But the pensive grandeur of an old mansion sheds a softer than the "purple light" of the luck of Edenhall upon the Poet's fancies and his page. He who has written the Golden Legend knows, best of all, the reality and significance of that life in the old Craige House, whose dates, except for this slight sketch, had almost dropped from history. And while the exquisite music of this poem of our author's lingers in the heart of the reader, as he turns from this page, will he not seem to be sitting, on one of the dreamy summer afternoons, in the old chamber where so often the young Poet sat lost in the luxury of reverie, and hearing with intoxicating sadness the ghosts of tunes long since forgotten, which the turbaned and trembling widow of Andrew Cragie vaguely played upon the harpsichord :

" The old house by the Lindens
 Stood silent in the shade,
And on the gravelled pathway
 The light and shadow played.

" I saw the nursery window
 Wide open to the air ;
But the faces of the children,
 They were no longer there.

" The large Newfoundland house-dog
 Was standing by the door ;
He looked for his little playmates
 Who would return no more.

" They walked not under the Lindens,
 They played not in the hall ;
But shadow, and silence, and sadness,
 Were hanging over all.

" The birds sang in the branches,
 With sweet, familiar tone ;
But the voices of the children
 Will be heard in dreams alone !

" And the boy that walked beside me,
 He could not understand
Why closer in mine, ah ! closer,
 I pressed his warm, soft hand."

Low lisplings of the summer rain,
Dropping on the ripened grain,
As once upon the flower.

Visions of childhood ! stay, O stay !
Ye were so sweet and wild !
And distant voices seemed to say,
"It cannot be ! They pass away !
Other themes demand thy lay ;
Thou art no more a child !

"The land of Song within thee lies,
Watered by living springs ;
The lids of Fancy's sleepless eyes
Are gates unto that Paradise,
Holy thoughts, like stars, arise,
Its clouds are angels' wings.

"Learn, that henceforth thy song shall be,
Not mountains capped with snow,
Nor forests sounding like the sea,
Nor rivers flowing ceaselessly,
Where the woodlands bend to see
The bending heavens below.

"There is a forest, where the din
Of iron branches sounds !
A mighty river roars between,
And whosoever looks therein
Sees the heavens all black with sin,—
Sees not its depths, nor bounds.

"Athwart the swinging branches cast,
Soft rays of sunshine pour ;
Then comes the fearful wintry blast ;
Our hopes, like withered leaves, fall fast ;
Pallid lips say, 'It is passed !
We can return no more !'

"Look, then, into thine heart, and write !
Yes, into Life's deep stream !
All forms of sorrow and delight,
All solemn Voices of the Night,
That can soothe thee, or affright,—
Be these henceforth thy theme."

ART. VI.—ANOTHER MARY.

Marie Thérèse de Lamourous : Foundress of the House of La Miséricorde, at Bourdeaux. A Biography, abridged from the French By the Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe."
London : John W. Parker and Son, West Strand. 1858.

Deeds of heroism or self-devotion in what phase soever they present themselves to the human mind are possessed of a charm so potent in their efficacy, so ennobling in their tendency that the soul becomes elevated and the heart purified by the mere recital of such records. The physical courage displayed by the soldier on the battle field, or the chivalric feats so frequently performed in civil as well as military life, noble as they undoubtedly are, fade into sheer nothingness when contrasted with that high and holy courage which inspires a pure and saintly woman, refined in mind and elevated in position, to trample under foot all the conventionalities of her station, and devote a life to the moral regeneration of her sex. The sainted sister whose name heads our paper was a true type of that Christian heroism by which nature is superseded by grace, the bitter made sweet, and the outcast soothed into the fold of repentance; the undying zeal of this one gentle woman, has been more prolific of good than all the vaunted prowess of ancient or modern heroes, many of whom worked for evil whilst she laboured for love.

The translation before us is in itself the very highest tribute that can be offered to the foundress of an institution which has tended more to the advance of virtue than almost any other in existence, being the work of one who avowedly differs in religious belief from the Holy woman whose life and virtues are recorded; and whilst making allowance for some slight scepticism on irrelevant matters, we are free to admit that it has been done in a truly liberal and tolerant spirit. After these few prefatory remarks we shall endeavour to give a short resume of the subject of the memoir.

MARIE THERESE DE LAMOUROUS, FOUNDRRESS OF THE HOUSE OF LA MISERICORDE, AT BOURDEAUX, was born at Barsac on the 1st of November 1754; her father was an untitled noble possessing a moderate property, he was a good amiable man, but nothing more, her mother was remarkable for great piety and good sense. Marie Thérèse was the eldest of four children, three girls and one boy, and there is little to be recorded of her childhood save her extreme delicacy, which made her parents at one period dread she would be deformed; this however was not the fact: though not by any means pretty, her expression was so sweet and her eye so soft and gentle, that it gave her a peculiar attractiveness which aided materially in after life to win the hearts of the most froward.

Beside the advantages possessed by the children of having a good mother, their nurse was equally remarkable for her piety, and assisted materially both by precept and example to their mental culture. We must not omit one peculiar trait in her mode of training. She was a communicant on all great Festivals, and the day before she uniformly checked any ebullition of temper or unruliness in her young charges by saying, "My dears, you must not vex your nurse, it will be her good day to-morrow!"—and thus she in a great measure imparted the holy peace and reverence of her own mind to her nursery. On the great day she dressed with peculiar care and neatness, and the children accompanied her to mass, where they became impressed with the strongest devotional feeling, and on returning home, considered themselves bound during that entire day to be particularly good, in order not to disturb their nurse whom they dearly loved; thus were their hearts early trained, not only to love virtue for its own intrinsic worth, but even to respect in others the possession of it.

The little Marie Thérèse began early to practise forbearance and mortification, and for this purpose imposed various penances on herself which she performed with a cheerful and happy spirit, such as denying herself at meals some favorite dish and other little acts of self-restraint. She made a sort of compact before a crucifix every day of bearing "Three crosses without crying;" if a fourth came, however, she was at liberty to indulge her tears; this was sowing the good seed in right earnest, and a rich and plenteous harvest of golden and glorious fruit it produced in her after life of patient self abnegation.

To her good mother was she indebted for that sweet and tender charity which marked her whole career; their household was a truly patriarchal one, and the noble hearted Madame de Lamourous sat like the ladies of old with her little daughters around her, sending them on missions of charity and kindness, carrying dainties to some poor dependent who was ill, or it might be to soothe a fretful infant if the mother were busy performing some domestic duty.

At eleven years old she was admitted to her first communion, and on Ascension day received with much fear and trembling, yet with great eagerness and love, the Holy Communion. The Sunday festival crowned the bliss of the week, and in her old age she would revert to those innocent and happy days when dancing formed one of the greatest pleasures of her life.

"We were very fond of dancing," she would say when in after years recalling those halcyon days of youth, "and to supply the place of a gentleman one of us would wear a bow of rose colored ribbon in her hair. Often in the midst of our sports we would recollect that we had a prayer still unsaid: then we would break off for our devotions, and then resume our game. Sometimes in the midst of a country dance I would recollect that I was to have the happiness of communicating next day, and this thought made me dance on with redoubled joy."

To us, this would appear like levity, did we not take into consideration the difference of country and the pure joyous spirit of the young Therese who thus gave expression to the ecstatic feeling of her heart.

They now resided at Bourdeaux where they removed when Therese was about twelve, and she and her sisters formed a society with the daughters of two ladies of rank and met frequently during the week under the surveillance of the three mothers, who for their remarkable piety were designated by the Bordelois the three Maries.

Thérèse under her mother's instruction acquired a knowledge of all the information necessary for a lady of quality, with a practical knowledge of arithmetic which in after life proved most useful. Her manners were perfect, and she possessed a frank simplicity which, springing from her warm and unselfish heart, had a fascination all her own, and which it was impossible to withstand.

The mother and daughter were particularly attached and dwelt in the utmost confidence; she could not however divest Thérèse of the almost exploded habit of rising from her seat when she entered the room, and often put the question "will you never forget that I am your mother?"

The pure mind of the young girl was not vitiated by the baneful literature of the time, as novels were altogether excluded, and this total freedom from all imaginary excitement may have tended to maintain that freshness of heart and feeling so useful in the great task of her life.

Her love of neatness and elegance in dress frightened her, lest she might give way to vanity; she appealed to her confessor on this point, who gave her an admirable rule for her future conduct. "Do not," said he, "be one of the first to adopt a fashion, neither be one of the last, nor wait to take it up till it be over. Let your dress be just what is least liable to remark. Thus, after dressing, consult your glass, and ask yourself, 'when I pass by will people say, how well she looks?' If so, you must suppose there is something superfluous, and remove it; but if, on the other hand, people would exclaim 'how careless!' something must be wanting. If they are likely to notice nothing either for praise or blame, that is the point to be gained by one who seeks to please God."

Thérèse was now about to encounter her first great trial; her beloved mother fell dangerously ill, and aware of her approaching dissolution dreaded the effect it might produce on the mind and health of her favourite child, (her other daughters had been married whilst very young); she therefore told Thérèse that her greatest pain in dying would be the consciousness that she would grieve too much. Thérèse comforted her parent with the assurance that she would bear her trial with the hope of a Christian. Nature however succumbed under this heavy affliction, and for several days after her mother's death she was dangerously ill; her mind however soon regained its usual tone, but she became anxious to enter a convent and devote herself to a religious life. Her confessor however, after a careful investigation, told her to her surprise and disappointment that she had not sufficient vocation for a conventual life, she bowed to his decision, and gave herself up to the care of her father and general acts of kindness to all her relatives. The Revolution, with all its attendant horrors, broke out soon after Madame's death, and Bourdeaux was presided over during this reign of terror by a schoolmaster named Lacombe, who exercised his power with the most unremitted tyranny.

The Lamourous family were too loyal to be safe under such a dynasty; they were obliged to disperse; the only son fled to America, and Thérèse removed her father to a small estate belonging to the family at the village of Le Pian about four leagues from Bourdeaux.

Here, Thérèse began to shew the nobility of her nature by the warmth of her devotion in attending to her father's comfort, surrounding him with every little luxury in her power in order to try and assuage his grief in leaving his once happy home, and also in watching over the interests of the poor villagers by whom she was almost revered as a saint.

The pastor, under whose guidance these poor people had lived, had now unfortunately from the easiness of his nature been induced to take the constitutional oaths; they were consequently deprived of all spiritual comfort. Mamizelle, as they called her, did all in her power to atone for this deficiency, and invited the women and children of the neighbourhood to meet her at a particular part of the estate every Sunday; she instructed them in all the essentials of their religion, and brought several of them home afterwards to sing vespers in her little oratory.

In all cases of illness she was at their bedside, and though they were deprived of the actual reception of the spiritual rites of their church, she contrived to lead their minds to spiritual communion, and by prayer and gentle offices soothed and cheered the departing spirit. The poor priest, who had been led away by weak fear, actually venerated her, and even requested permission to visit her, in order to thank her for the care she had taken of the flock who had disowned him, and he acknowledged to her the regret he experienced in having abandoned the charge with which God had entrusted him. So much was she loved and revered by the peasantry, that, even after the restoration of the clergy, she had great difficulty in breaking them off the habit of sending for Mamizelle instead of a priest to attend their last moments.

Thérèse fitted up an oratory with every essential necessary for the performance of the holy sacrifice of the mass, in order that whenever Providence permitted a proscribed priest to seek shelter in her vicinity, she might have the happy privilege of mass in her chapel. A lady, who resided near, shared in her feelings, and these heroic women braved all danger, and often in the middle of the night traversed the woods that divided them, when either had the good fortune to harbour a priest. She has herself related a charming incident connected with those nocturnal meetings; on one occasion when returning alone she was overtaken by darkness in a place reported to be haunted by wolves; she thought of her guardian angel, and remembering that wolves were supposed to be afraid of the human voice, and so, as she sweetly and simply related it,

"With my little bundle on my head, my hand in my good angel's, and singing a hymn, I came safely through."

There was a childlike simplicity in her courage which rendered it peculiarly attractive even to those whom she braved. One Sunday evening, when she had been repeating her rosary at the foot of the large crucifix at the entrance of the village, she saw two ruffianly looking men evidently on the watch for her. She immediately went forward and accosted them in a friendly tone. "Good evening citoyens ! you look tired ; you are welcome to come rest in my house, I have some good wine for you." "So much the better, citoyenne, we were on the way to you," they answered. And, concealing her alarm, she led them in and entertained them so hospitably, that after some consultation one of them said to her, "Citoyenne ! do you know what brings us here ?"

"No ; perhaps you are seeking employment ?"

"Poor woman !" said the fellow laughing, "see there !" and he threw on the table an order for her arrest.

"Is that it ?" said Mademoiselle de Lamourous, quietly, "we will go to-morrow morning !"

"No, no," cried the emissaries, "you are too good a creature, it would be a pity to harm you ; we will say you were not at home ;" and they went off after shaking hands warmly with her.

Thérèse was prudent as well as courageous, and had much trouble in preventing her father from ruining them by his violence against the republicans ; she employed a strange ruse to save him from his own imprudence on one occasion. As they were going to Bourdeaux to visit her sister during her husband's absence, the old man insisted on walking into the town, and reckless of consequences was openly and bitterly inveighing against the new order of things. Thérèse, dreading that he would be overheard, walked boldly up to two men, who were evidently republicans, and telling them that she was obliged to go on to Bourdeaux quicker than her old father was able to walk, and that she feared leaving him alone, begged of them to take him under their protection, as she knew he would be safe in their hands. They, feeling complimented at this confidence in their honor, brought him safe to his destination. He died shortly after.

Thérèse still continued her residence at Le Pian where she found many opportunities of doing good. She, on one occasion, had the hardihood to introduce a priest to the bedside of the dying wife of a furious republican, and by her tact, eluded all suspicion on the part of the husband, and obtained for the poor lady the happiness of receiving the last sacraments, and dying with all the consolations of religion. It was hard to expect, that when a name was a crime, Thérèse could escape altogether unscathed; she was not therefore surprised when cited to appear before the revolutionary tribunal, but though prepared to die, her usual tact did not abandon her.

"Citoyenne" began the President, "you stand accused of nobility, and of hiding priests. Have you anything to say for yourself?"

"Possibly Citoyen," she answered; "but pray let me ask one question first. What is that mark on your face?"

"A strange question!" he said, "do you not see it is a mole?"

"But how came you by such a mole on your cheek?"

"How? I was born with it, I had it from my mother?"

"Well Citoyen, it is just so with me; I was born with my nobility, I had it from my mother."

As occasionally even in this fearful time, repartee was the best defensive weapon, the laugh was on her side, and "Go along then, you are a good child," was her order for dismissal. She was exiled from Bourdeaux, but permitted to go any where else she pleased; she therefore chose her old residence Le Pian.

In all the strange vicissitudes with which unhappy France was then visited, it occasionally happened that some of her acquaintance were elevated to the bloody tribunal; she had the temerity to go see them, and even obtained a sight of their list of proscriptions; aware of the peril to which she exposed herself, she, notwithstanding, at various times sent private information to persons not yet arrested, and was so conscious that her own life would be forfeited, that she cut off her hair, in order that the executioner need not have to do it, at the last moment. The Almighty, however, willed otherwise, and she was spared for a high and holy mission.

The reign of terror, however, came to a close, and Bourdeaux breathed again; Mademoiselle de Lamourous having braved the storm, and without any particular cares or duties to attach her to the world, conceived the idea that God had saved her for a special purpose. Active charity towards all her neighbours, had always been her marked characteristic, and she yearned to devote herself more earnestly to the service of God by ministering to his poor. The calm tranquil happiness she enjoyed at Le Pian caused her a struggle in leaving it, and she in after life acknowledged that she had caught herself kissing the very walls in recollection of the happy days she spent there; indulgence in such feelings, however, would not do, and she prayed fervently for enlightenment to know the Divine will, and grace to act faithfully up to it.

Her prayer was heard, and in July 1800, a young woman who had been led into vicious courses, applied to a charitable old lady at Bourdeaux, called Mademoiselle de Pichon Longueville, and begged to be shewn in what manner she could extricate herself from her present way of life. She was placed with a dressmaker, and several of her companions being equally desirous of reformation, Mademoiselle de Pichon hired some rooms in a house in the Rue St. Jean, where fifteen of these poor creatures were assembled; they were very unruly, being unaccustomed to restraint, and frequently rebelled against the authority of the person placed over them. Mademoiselle de Pichon, who was in her eighty-second year, became almost disheartened at the bickering and confusion she saw around her; recollecting however that Mademoiselle, who was only forty-two, was peculiarly gifted in dealing with the froward and always anxious to do good, she entreated her assistance in this meritorious work. Thérèse was at first inclined to reject this mode of charity, having a kind of shrinking horror at even meeting those wretched outcasts in the streets; but, impelled by the spirit of God, she overcame her repugnance, and accompanied her friend to the Rue St. Jean. It being her nature to speak sweetly and gently to all, so great was the effect of her manner on these poor untamed creatures, that they stood whispering together "There is one who would succeed with us." Her very countenance had already won their hearts, and she heard them on the occasion of her next visit, calling joyfully to one another, "Here comes Mademoiselle de Lamourous!" Each visit rendered them more attached and drew her more to them; her sisters, who were anxious she should live with them, did all in their power to dissuade her from undertaking this charge, but she prayed earnestly and ardently to be shewn the right course; and one gentleman, a relative of hers, who was in favour of her turning her attention to these poor penitents, being a man of strong sense and great piety, strengthened her in her resolves by saying "Do sister, reclaim these poor fallen creatures, it is for the glory of God." Her contending feelings to know the right and to follow the Divine impulse, so excited her mind, as to produce an attack of illness, the result of her agitation, and during a feverish dream, imagined herself beholding the Great Day of Doom, and that she recognized each of the sinners in the Rue St Jean standing before the judgment seat, and receiving sentence of condemnation, and then each, in falling, looking full at her and crying, "Had you come to us, we had been saved!"

The recollection of this awful scene had such an effect on her mind that she accepted the dream as an inspiration from God, and determined accordingly; next morning she repaired to Bourdeaux, and having first waited on Mademoiselle Pichon, she, accompanied by her and Monsieur Chaminade, her confessor, visited the Rue St. Jean, but without the slightest hint of her intention, till they were about to part in the evening, when she lighted them to the door and said simply "good night! I shall stay." Thus, from that period, the penitents were her children, their abode her home, and, except an occasional visit to Le Pian, she devoted her life to their service.

France never before so peculiarly needed such an asylum; as many of those poor outcasts were driven to the shameless courses they had pursued, by the awful scenes they had witnessed, and the complete overthrow of all religious belief even in its external forms, this, coupled with their unprotected state, caused them more frequently to continue in their lives of sin, than any attachment they felt towards the degraded condition in which they found themselves, and, consequently, they hailed as a bright star of hope and promise the refuge opened for them in the Rue St. Jean.

They came in numbers to request admittance, and poor Thérèse in the charity of her heart could not bear to turn them from the door, though at the time over-crowded; Mademoiselle slept in the midst of them, and, having no laundry, even accompanied them to the river where they were obliged to wash their clothes, and protected them from the insults offered by those who considered themselves degraded by contact with them.

The Reign of Terror raised saints as well as sinners, and an association was formed even at its worst period, amongst the faithful at Bourdeaux, who agreed to kneel every day at five o'clock, no matter where they might be, and offer up their prayers to the throne of mercy for the conversion of hardened sinners. This good work, undertaken by those charitable ladies Pichon and Lamourous, was considered by Monsieur Boyer, the vicar general of the diocese, and Monsieur Chaminade, as a favorable answer to the prayers of the people, and those two holy men united in raising a subscription among the pious ladies of the city in order to enable them to take a larger place, where they might extend their sphere of usefulness. Accordingly, on the eve of Ascension Day 1801, Mademoiselle de Lamourous, with thirty-five women, repaired to another dwelling in the Allées d'Albret.

This establishment took the name of La Miséricorde, and rules were drawn up for its management. Monsieur Chaminade blessed the black caps and kerchiefs which the women were to wear as symbols of penitence, and Mademoiselle de Lamourous was constituted head of the institution, where she was soon designated by the loving title of 'La bonne Mère.' A nun named Mademoiselle Adelaide, from a destroyed convent, came to assist, and on the Whit Sunday following they were solaced in their labours by one of the penitents who had been preparing from the previous February renewing her baptismal vows and receiving the Sacraments of Penance and Holy Communion.

This was, however, but one sweet drop in the cup of bitterness they had before them. Storms assailed them both from within and abroad; all sorts of false reports were circulated about them out of doors which deprived them of the support they would otherwise have obtained. This in itself would have been a sad trial, but the insubordination of the inmates, and the dread of their relapsing into their former errors, was far more grievous for the good sisters to be obliged to encounter; so fearful were the passions worked up by those wretched creatures in each other, that poor Thérèse almost sunk under the trial, and her health suffered so materially that she was ordered an entire change of scene, and had to withdraw for two whole months. Thus, was the charge of forty-two wild excitable beings from the very dregs of society, vitiated by intercourse with the worst amongst their class, left to one simple Nun, who during this fearful time underwent a species of martyrdom. Their conduct was so outrageous during this eventful period, that they lost all self-control, and their peals of merriment, which were frequently heard in the street, brought them into worse repute than ever.

Marie Thérèse, having regained strength, came back with unabated energy, and the disorders subsided through her influence, but not however until she had expelled seven of the most mischievous and incorrigible.

The fatal consequences, however, of their misdeeds, did not rest here; the public were disgusted, and withdrew their subscriptions, the funds were exhausted, and on the 15th of September, 1801, the committee decided on dismissing half the inmates for want of means.

Mademoiselle de Lamourous was summoned to the committee to be informed of those resolutions, and, being later than usual, the women gathered round her on her return exclaiming at her delay. "Alas! my children," she said, "it was you who caused my being so tardy. Never have you grieved me so much as to-day. The offences you have committed has brought down God's anger on us all. This very night you were to be driven from La Miséricorde, and I was deputed the painful task of expelling you!"

With a strange perversity, those wild and hitherto unmanageable creatures clung with desperation to the home which their own waywardness was near closing against them, and cries and sobs broke out in the hall, each entreating that the sentence might not fall on her. "What!" cried one, "just when I had heartily begun to work at my general confession? how could I finish it?"

"And I!" exclaimed another, "have I only learnt to abhor my past life that I may discover there is no more mercy for me?"

"I would not go," said a third, "they could not tear me away!"

Thus, these excitable creatures worked themselves into a complete phrenzy of despair at the bare idea of their leaving a home and a mother to whom they had become so fondly attached, and they pressed to know who were to have been the unfortunate outcasts.

Mademoiselle told them she could not have had the heart to decide, but would have left them in the hands of Providence by obliging them to draw lots.

"Lots!" cried one, "oh! I should most undoubtedly have the black lot! I have been unlucky all my life, here only may I hope for rest."

When they were calmed, Mademoiselle de Lamourous tried to explain how circumstances were, and that their only hope was in the mercy of that God whom they had outraged, even at the time he was blessing them ; she told them sweetly and earnestly that they must entreat for aid in the spirit of penitence, as their errors had caused the faithful to withhold all aid from them, and that if in the Divine Mercy they were spared, they should endure the most severe privations.

“ Bread and water ! ” cried the poor girls, “ we will live on bread and water, provided it is at La Miséricorde. ”

This panic had such an effect on them, that their hearts were completely changed, and the Almighty, who in his mercy works such wonders, thus wrought the conversion of those poor wild wayward beings, whom the very dread of expulsion made truly penitent.

The sincerity of their penitence was however to be more severely tested ; the whole funds were exhausted, the baker refused bread, and there was no firewood in the house, nor scarcely any food, though there were thirty-five to be fed, and some of them ill. Mademoiselle de Lamourous trusted still in Divine assistance. “ We have done all in our power, ” she would say. “ If this work be from God, He will not fail us ; and what desire have we but to do His Divine will ? Let us be at peace, then, and wait with patience, firmness, and cheerfulness until the end. ”

During the hour of recreation she remained in earnest prayer, and was much affected by seeing several of the poor women doing the same, though the last food in the house was being dressed at a fire made of vine clippings for want of firewood. There was a knock at the door, a cart-load of faggots had been sent in by the committee. Before the evening was over supplies of vegetables, wine, and money had arrived, and the danger was averted.

Though this crisis was past, the inmates of La Miséricorde were for many years struggling, their principal supplies being from washing and needle-work obtained through the exertions of Mademoiselle, who suffered many indignities whilst seeking for it ; accused by some with taking the bread out of honest people’s mouths, and treated with scorn by vulgar minded employers ; but she bore all with heroic and truly single-minded patience, and every small piece of work, or gift from without, was hailed as a fresh token of mercy. So frequently did relief come in at the moment most needed, that she felt as if the hand of Heaven was open to her, and recorded these answers to her prayers with a simplicity of faith and earnestness of thankfulness truly charming.

If Thérèse looked on these timely succours as so many interpositions of Providence on their behalf, which they undoubtedly were, how hallowed must have been the feelings of the poor inmates for whose sake God vouchsafed such blessings; and we find their confidence in prayer as sincere and ardent as the bonne mère could desire. With regard to her, her confidence in God was unbounded, and her love for and devotion to the Blessed Virgin was pure and fervent; she attributed very many of the benefits she received to her intercession, and offered frequent Novenas to St. Joseph and her own patroness St. Theresa.

The most serious evil consequent on their poverty was the want of an infirmary, which obliged them to send severe cases of illness to the public hospital. Here visitors had access to the patients, and unfortunately the good work was occasionally undone, and the poor patients returned to their evil courses. La Miséricorde was overlooked by the prisons, and perceiving that the prisoners hooted at her when she appeared and not at Mademoiselle Adelaide, she at once perceived that her nuns' dress was her protection, and accordingly adopted black as her future costume, and when other directresses joined (the first came in 1802, shortly before the death of Mademoiselle Adelaide) she thought it well they should wear it also. She objected to their wearing veils, lest been seen with them in the streets in the evening might bring the cloistered nuns into disrepute, and the huge cap which pervaded the whole establishment was their natural dress, and may be seen in portraits of the date of her youth, worn by young ladies as well as old. The crown is like Mambrino's helmet, and a broad frill with a wide hem acts as sides, border, trimming and all. The directresses wore it in white, the penitents in black, otherwise there was no distinction.

Every thing was made to turn to account, in this abode of thrift and economy, and Thérèse never failed to pick up the smallest rag she met in the street, and said she never felt so dishonest as in passing a rag merchant's; and at the beginning of each season her whole hoard was brought forth in order to dispense her stores as most required. Her gaiety of heart and lively sallies made the scene a perfect festival. Even in extreme old age, and when confined to bed, her half-yearly rag fair was one of the great events of La Miséricorde. Mademoiselle de Pichon Longueville, who had lived long enough to see the good seed blossom died in 1807, and her memory was revered at La Miséricorde as the first foundress. The institution had increased to such an extent that Thérèse was anxious to take a confiscated convent of the Annunciation in the Rue St. Eulalie which was put up for sale by government. She sent for Monsieur Chaminade to consult him, who, frightened at the expense attending it, asked her if she firmly believed it was the work of God?

"Yes, I firmly believe so," she answered.

"And do you likewise firmly believe that you are the person called to undertake it?"

"I do," she replied with a decision that struck him so forcibly that he said at once—

"Then buy it by all means, but buy the two lots at once, both house and church."

With great effort, and by mortgaging her beloved estate at Le Pian, Thérèse raised the first instalment, and was put into possession on the eve of Palm Sunday 1808: and fearing that the soldiers might intrude she left a sturdy portress at the gate with strict orders to hold no parley with any soldier that might present himself, but civilly to refuse him entrance. Maret, afterwards Duke of Bassano, minister to Napoleon, had come in his train to Bourdeaux, and accompanied by the mayor and a train of officials was visiting the public buildings; being attracted by the convent of St. Eulalie he knocked at the gate, but the old portress true to her trust refused either to let him in, or to call her mistress.

"I tell you," cried an official, "His Excellency wants to see Mademoiselle."

"I know nothing about Excellencies; my orders are not to leave my gate." They succeeded, however, in obtaining an interview; and in going over the house the minister was deeply touched by the evidences of poverty, and the noble self-devotion of the Superior, whose high-bred ease and charming simplicity of manner delighted his Excellency.

M. Maret, when respectfully taking leave, begged her to write down all she had been telling him, and send it in at once, as he was leaving town next day. After asking Monsieur Chaminade's advice on the matter, she complied with the Minister's request, who laid the paper before the Emperor, and on the 28th of April, only three weeks after her bold purchase, she received a letter from Maret informing her, that his Majesty, desiring to participate in her pious undertaking, made her a free grant of the convent without purchase; adding 12,000 francs for the necessary repairs; thus, was her confidence in God rewarded, and her beloved Le Pian released from mortgage.

In this ruinous old convent La Miséricorde took up its abode, re-consecrating the spot where the orgies of the Revolution had for nearly twenty years taken the place of the hymns of the sisterhood.

The additional space acquired by her removal, enabled Thérèse to receive new inmates, and she was induced to apply for an annual grant from government, which was refused; Napoleon's gift, though merely the land, building, and repairs, put a stop for a time to private charity, and their receipts were so trifling, that they could have scarcely subsisted had not Mademoiselle obtained permission that the inmates should be employed in rolling tobacco leaves into cigars for the imperial manufactory.

In 1809, a document of Mademoiselle de Lamourous states that there were ninety penitents, under five directresses besides herself, the Superior. Many others, after a thorough reformation, had been placed in respectable services; others had returned to their parents; some had married; and many more remained too much attached to La Miséricorde again to expose themselves to the perils of the world. More than forty had already died, blessing the refuge where they had been led back to the paths of eternal life.

A sad misfortune now however awaited them:—on the first day of the year 1813, they were deprived of their cigar work, on the pretext that this employment was needed by the poor. In vain did Mademoiselle de Lamourous represent to the authorities the awful responsibilities attending the wants of her poor, and the direful consequences of depriving them of their home; her plea was disregarded, and she had now the sad prospect of her hundred inmates living solely on her credit, as private charity had almost ceased. An appeal to the Central Board at Paris was now her only hope, and though near sixty, and in delicate health, she, with the untiring self-devotion that enabled her to labor thus far for those poor desolate ones, determined not to forsake them now, and on the 27th of February started for Paris on her mission of love. A few of her letters which have been luckily preserved, will be the best illustration of the buoyancy of spirit with which this happy old woman worked her noble cause ; carrying with her a perpetual spring of joy ever simple and playful.

LETTER I.

‘ I am at Paris at last, my good and very dear children ; I took the novice to her destination, and went myself to my rooms, which I share with a good nun. I am well off in every respect,—nowhere could I have so much freedom. I shall rest to-morrow, which will be Sunday, and on Monday I shall begin to stir in our affairs. You must not cease to pray that I may be obedient to the leadings of Divine grace.

‘ And how are you, dear children ? How are you all, not only my five assistants, but my three little ones, and all my dear daughters ? Do they follow their rules ? Are they loving ? Do they seek for opportunities of making offerings, as I advised them, thus to unite them to mine, and present them together to Him who alone can render them meritorious ? Everywhere I see La Miséricorde. Nothing can distract me from the sight. I am constantly occupied with my three classes. I am uneasy about some, but many more are a joy to me ; and I console myself by thinking perhaps the first will do equally well, and I may have notes which will make me quite happy. Do not fail to write to me, my dear fellow labourers, and direct with great exactness.

‘ I write to-day by M. L., who goes to-morrow. You will have this letter later than the one I post to-day, because I cannot bear to leave you anxious in order to save the postage. What shall I tell you of my journey, or what would not N—— tell you if she had been in my place ? Nothing could be more droll than the ladies who travelled with us. The two first did not lament their husbands long. They chattered from the first moment like magpies, night and day. Soon came another who was worse, then a fourth, who constantly censured the gossip of the others, while they complained of hers. To tell you all the debates over the opening and shutting of the coach windows, and about the rooms and beds when we stopped at night, would be too long, but very comical. Then came three gentlemen who had seats in the cabriolet ; and the gestures of all these people, their talk about fashions and fortunes, and the figure cut by the novice and myself dining among officers and generals, was amusing enough I can assure you. We did not put ourselves out of the way, on fit occasions, nor spare them one sign of the cross, and they were very civil to us, so that all went off easily, even our eggs on fast days. In the coach we pretended to sleep, and guess what your good mother was meanwhile thinking about ! I will tell you. Two nights ago, we went on the whole night, and I saw the moon constantly ; so when the hours came for your recreation and your going to bed, I said to myself, 'My daughters see the same thing as I do! Ah! if the moon could carry them all my wishes their sport would be blessed, their last waking thoughts would be holy! At sight of the moon, they would remember my exhortations, which I wish she could carry to them!' And so I came to the plan of appointing you all a rendezvous with me in the moon, and asking you to say to yourselves, 'I am gazing at what my good mother is gazing at.'

• Your good mother,

• M. TH. LAMOUROUS.

LETTER II.

'I wrote to you yesterday by M. l'Abbé L., but as the coach is slower than the post, I send you this letter lest you should be uneasy.

'Providence has found me just such a lodging as suits me, where I can see company or be alone, as I please. The lady with whom I am is very kind, and will I think be of great use in our business. She is very business-like, and seems to understand everything. She is an old sister of St. Clara, of a very strict order, very good and sensible, all which suits me so well that I ought to put up with the warbling of the dozen canary birds she keeps in her room, all tame and constantly singing. I shall be sure to grow use to them soon, and besides, I can get away from them in my own room.

'I am near the church of St. Sulpice, famous for its clergy and its good order. There is benediction there every day, but I was not there yesterday, though I mean to contrive to have that happiness as often as I can. This morning I was at mass there. I cannot tell you whether the church is fine, for I had not time to look at it, but I will tell you another time; this afternoon we go to vespers and a sermon. Nor can I tell you much of Paris. If I had no heart, I should think myself at Bourdeaux. Paris is beautiful, but I feel as if I had already been in all the buildings I have seen there. What pleases me best is the dome of the Invalides. The promenades do not strike me at all, they only remind me of what I have seen in perspectives, and especially in that of M. E. The streets are very like Bourdeaux, more lively, but very muddy. Women, young and old, generally dress as they do with us, and have the same air; my pelisse is not alone, and my cap finds companions. I shall go to all the grandees just as I am, and in fact I am like many others. My nun has promised to let me see the Pope, but I know not when or how.

'I was here in my letter when it was time to go to vespers, and I resume. I have been at St. Sulpice! Oh! how beautiful the services there are! How surprised I was to see the collegians in hoods! but I was still more astonished to find the good M. Thomas in the pulpit. He preached for an hour and a quarter with the simplicity you know so well. There were so many people that again I could not look at the church. We came home at six o'clock, for on common days, vespers and the other evening offices last till six, on great days much later. Imagine my amazement when just after we came in, my nun told me it was supper-time. It was necessary to make up one's mind to it, and by seven o'clock all was over, and we were going to bed, or at least as regards myself, pretending to do so, when there was a ring at the bell and in came M. R. I was very glad to see him. I told him my story, and my intention of making *quêtes in different districts, charging him with his own, where reside Madame Mère and Cardinal Fesch.† He promised his help, and we agreed that I should not go to him for two days, to give him time to see what he can do. He went away at half-past eight, when my nun went to bed, and I to finish my letter. Here I am, and since one must retire so early, you see I shall be able to do a good deal in the evening.

‘I hope, my dear children, that the good God will bless my journey; but after all, I fear nothing but myself, so pray that I may always act as He would have me, and that I may not be wretched enough to offend Him, and thus to check the stream of favours that He would shed upon you all.

‘Write to me when you get this letter. Write very small, as I do, so as to be able to tell me more. I will write in a week, and I hope the next will be gratis. How lucky you are: this is my fourth letter to you, and I shall have none for twelve more days, besides the eight slow—very slow ones since I left you, and judge! But let us respect our good Master’s will. Privations, if we use them right, become joys in eternity; and that reminds me that M. Thomas told us that not only must we flee from sloth, and work well, but that if we wish to be recompensed by the Lord, we must also do it for Him. ‘For,’ he said, ‘if a workman came to claim his hire, you would ask him for whom he had worked; and if it were for one of your neighbours, you would say,—‘Friend, ask your wages from him whom you serve.’’

‘I finish, embracing you all, my dear children, without reading over my letter. If there are follies or blunders in it, pass them over, or take what profit you can from them; but through them all, read the heart of your good mother.

‘February 14th, 1830.’

LETTER IV.

‘I want to write to the good M. Boyer, whom for twenty years I have loved with all my heart. I wish to tell him that the certificate of the archbishop is my great support, and procures me friends. At his name alone all the world is in extasies. Tell M. Boyer that I will soon write to him. I have so few moments to myself that I cannot perform all the projects of my heart. Every day there are accounts to send in, letters, memorials, and poor Marie Thérèse goes as Providence sends her, and sometimes Providence drives her rather hard.

‘To-morrow it is intended to write to a great duchess, to whom La Miséricorde has been mentioned. There is great piety in some of the ladies of that rank. How many good works they support at Paris! It is admirable; the old and new court vie with each other in zeal. I know ladies who dine on apples, and sup on dry bread, and give the rest to the poor. . . . I forgot to answer N.

* Expeditions in quest of alms.

that she might have the black cotton. All of you, children, beloved of your mother, freely take what belongs to her as your own. She is very poor, but all she has is at your disposal. Here, I am at no expense but coach hire. My dress is what you know,—nothing more. My caps have not the air that N. gives them, because I make them myself, and have long forgotten how; but at Paris, as at Bourdeaux, I can pass, and all goes on well. Nothing more is required in the most brilliant apartments. My provincial accent is more remarkable than my appearance. I am called the demoiselle from the south, and people do me the honor to ask if I am a Provençale. But nothing has prevented my meeting with kindness and interest, for our merciful God arranges all.

‘ You, dear children, must want many things, caps, shawls, stockings, &c. Provide these I beg of you, I will have it so. You know I told you it was to honor God and His providence, to do things that are needful, and then trust confidently to His tender foresight.’

LETTER V.

‘ Breakfast well to-morrow, the Good Shepherd’s day. Pray to Him well—thank Him well—bless His goodness. I shall write to all the old and new ones. My poor new ones have all written to me, and so have the old ones. Be good, and in all your doubts and temptations, the Holy Virgin will arrange your difficulties. Yes, soon we shall meet, I hope. In the mean time, patience, prudence, order, submission, humility, charity, watchfulness, cheerfulness. Ah! how your mother will be received, if you are in such good company. Courage, daughters, every one of you. No *poule mouillée in my house. Strive constantly. Pray always for your bonne mère. Take care to recommend her to our heavenly friends. Good-bye, again, old and new! I look at you all, and my heart rejoices in the hope that you work, and walk towards heaven. So be it.

‘ I received your parcel dated the 10th of May, and felt both joy and grief; joy at hearing of you, grief that we do not get on. I must resume the affair of the cigars. I have nothing more to tell you of my collection; latterly it has fallen off, since a new and excellent work has injured that of La Miséricorde, and purses are closed against the latter, so that I shall only bring home about a hundred pistoles, instead of three or four thousand francs which I had reckoned upon. But patience, our good God knows what we want better than we do. Providence invites me to make efforts of every kind, and in every quarter. When I return, we will make many things to sell—coverlets, rosaries, images, children’s toys, pincushions, scapularies, &c. But the best of all is, that a famous worker in chocolate is teaching me his business gratis, and letting me into all his secrets. I have been, for some days, working under him, and have no doubt that his recipes will bring us in a pretty gain; and besides, he is to give them to me in writing, to be kept carefully at La Miséricorde. Strong and vigorous arms! We want no more!

We will work, children, and I hope our merciful God will help us, and make our industry His means of supporting us. Since He is pleased to keep me at Paris, He permits me by remaining there, if I cannot get money, to learn how to earn it.

‘I am trying to do like you, and not lose all the fruit of the toils which the goodness and loving kindness of the merciful God ordains for me. The cross is a pledge of His love, dear children. Besides, when I think of the children He hath given me, so affectionate, so good, so excellent, so exactly what I wish, I think myself very happy; yes, even humanly speaking, I am happy, for you are my happiness. O children! what pleasure you give your poor mother, pleasure the sweeter, because our good Master is the Author of it; and doubtless is well pleased to behold the joys with which you constantly feed my heart. Let us be more and more faithful to Him, my dears, that the ties he forms between us on earth may be drawn closer in eternity. Alas! what are all attachments here below in comparison with the love in heaven? If here He is the author of our common love, there He will be our object and our all.

‘Dear children, when shall I speak to you again? When the good God pleases. I still hope it will be the week after Ascension Day. Keep up the hopes of our poor girls, tell them we shall soon be together again. Festivals delayed cause weariness, and you know that weariness is dangerous to the soul; so find some means of occupying them and all will be well. Tell me of the one at the hospital.

We thus see how ardently and zealously this good mother worked for her poor children; she was now advised to plead her own cause before the Central Board of Administration of Home Manufactures, and prayed earnestly for help as she stood awaiting the interview; when admitted to the presence of the statesmen, the simple eloquence with which she detailed her case won all hearts, particularly that of Chevalier Suchet, brother to the Marshal Duke of Albufera. So sincere and heart-felt was her appeal, that it was at once decided, that without lessening the number of cigars sent up by the rest of the Gironde, an additional quantity should be manufactured at La Miséricorde.

“Truly Mademoiselle,” said one of the members of the council, “you speak in such a way that one can refuse you nothing, there is no resisting you, you win at the first encounter.”

“I wonder why!” said Mademoiselle de Lamourous, merrily, “Is it my dress? No, it cannot be that. Or my fine language? No, no, people laugh at my southern tongue. It must be because I am a child of the woods and speak naturally. In the woods, trees grow freely as Dame Nature teaches them, but elsewhere, they are cut and trimmed by Art. You grow weary of the clipped and regular trees, all alike, but in the wild fresh greenwood, you go deeper and deeper without ever counting the moments, for the heart is never weary of Nature; and so my simple, untutored words are a change to you, after the fine language and set phrases you have every day. Love of the true and natural is in all our hearts, and is not one of the least blessings given by our Maker; and this is the cause of your extreme indulgence to me, and of your being kind enough to like my simple manners." This conquest by "her native wood notes wild" enabled her to write on the 23rd of May,—

'My dear children,—I hasten to tell you that our good God has restored our cigars in spite of all the opposition, even at Paris. M. Suchet has promised to let us have them, and those who were averse to it have ended by giving their consent. An order will be despatched to the manufactory of Bourdeaux to send to La Miséricorde 3000 kilograms of tobacco every year, and M. Suchet promises me that this order shall be made out quickly. I told him of my fears that this slender supply might yet be uncertain, and he answered, No, since it depended upon him. It is likely that, as soon as the order is received at the manufactory, they will send to La Miséricorde. Receive the deputy well, and tell him that I was glad to see the good account which the Bourdeaux gentleman had sent up to Paris of the work, and with what sincerity I told the Paris gentlemen of my gratitude and obligations to those at Bourdeaux. Begin the work as soon as you can. I hope all will go well, my dears, and that it will not again be the will of heaven to send me to Paris to fish for cigars.'

Her mission thus terminating so favorably, la bonne Mère was now about to return home; aware of the joy which this would occasion in her household, she tried wisely to repress too great an exuberance of feeling, and wrote frequently to the directresses warning them to moderate the joy which she knew it was natural they should feel on the occasion.

Highly, as at all times they valued her opinions, her advice on this matter was totally unavailing; so intensely beloved was la bonne Mère, and so protracted was her absence from that home, which her presence rendered a paradise to her grateful and repentant children, that they could not resist preparing a festival for her reception; and on the 20th of June, a deputation of two directresses and the oldest penitents set off to meet her where she was to land after crossing the Garonne by the ferry.

When the tidings arrived that she was in the Rue St. Eulalie, the whole community drew up in two rows in the garden, singing couplets, bidding the parlor door open, and warning it if it did not, that they would force its hinges to turn and let in their good mother, for they could live no longer without her. She at length arrived, but by the express orders of Monsieur Boyer, they stood still and silent; he feared their excitement might become tumultuous, as their feelings were wrought to the very highest pitch; she, therefore, only passed silently down the lines shaking hands and speaking kindly to, and smiling sweetly on each in turn, as she proceeded to the chapel. Her path was strewn with laurel wreaths, and garlands of flowers hung all round; the penitents, uniting round her as she passed, continued their song as they formed into procession, and followed her to the chapel. There all knelt in silent prayer and thanksgiving, and then rising, chanted together the psalm, "Laudate Dominum Omnes Gentes." She was then led back to the refectory, and seated beneath an arch of flowers and ever-greens, while fresh couplets were sung, and each of her flock came up in turn to present a flower, and was received by her with an affectionate embrace. Presently she observed one who had been ill almost the whole time of her absence, and who had just contrived to drag herself to the refectory to enjoy the sight, but was not strong enough to go forward; springing from her chair she cried, "You there, my poor Louise! are you not to have the pleasure of embracing your mother?" and she pressed her fondly in her arms. Next came the dinner, such a dinner as had never been tasted at La Miséricorde, and never was again, for a kind-hearted market woman had actually sent in a feast of poultry and peas, sufficient for the whole party, in honor of the return of the much beloved and honored Superior. A fresh and more novel entertainment, however, awaited Mademoiselle de Lamourous after the evening devotions, and which had been concerted during her absence; this was no other than an impersonation of each city on the way to Paris, being introduced by a legend and led up to offer her homage. The vivacious and playful impromptu couplets with which la bonne Mère responded to each compliment, were, as well might be expected, the most attractive part of the scene.

We must not, however, omit to mention a charming little incident which formed an interesting feature in this ovation of genuine heart homage. A present was brought from one of her nieces, a piece of white watered silk embroidered with the device of the "pelican in her piety," having the following motto underneath :—

" Even as the bird, herself unsparing, Thou, for thy brood, thy heart art tearing," all framed as a picture, and the couplet was sung as it was carried to her. This completely overcame her, and she burst into tears,—the only time she had been seen to weep since her mother's death,—and cried out, "O! children, how you pain me!" She kept the picture to the day of her death, but not with the personal motto; she caused this to be picked out, and another worked in its stead, which gave the pelican the truest and highest application, "Let my blood be your meat and drink, my beloved," and bearing this device it is still preserved in her room at La Miséricorde.

This was her first and last absence from her beloved home for any lengthened period; she paid an annual visit to Le Pian to gather in her vintage, and the Abbé Chaminade sent her to Agen to establish an institution similar to her own, of which he was the founder; but she did not remain longer than six weeks on that occasion, and was greeted on her return with various complimentary couplets, an innocent recreation which she never discouraged, as she wisely considered these compositions a safety valve through which the exuberance of the girls' feelings could get egress. So watchful was this good mother in providing little enjoyments for her poor children, that she established two festivals, which were to be kept with great state, that of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, and the Feast of St. Teresa, conscious that the preparations for, and anticipations of, the simple pleasures to be enjoyed on these Festivals would arrest many a roving fancy from straying to the free and mirthful licence of the grape gathering of sunny Bourdeaux.

It was only after her return from Paris that Mademoiselle de Lamourous drew up a regular system of rules for La Miséricorde; a regular method had of course been observed, but she had too much good sense to enforce stringent rules, till the experience of twelve years' government enabled her to do so without any apprehension of failure, and she accordingly arranged the regulations of the house for the guidance of future Superiors.

Her flock were composed of various grades and degrees of cultivation—some were of high descent, having the prefix of de to their names, some carefully trained in showy accomplishments; whilst others were taken from the degraded refuse of the city, and the equally ignorant peasantry. Such an admixture of classes required much care in their arrangement, as mutual association would do more harm than the closest surveillance of the directresses could counteract. To obviate this difficulty therefore, Mademoiselle de Lamourous divided her penitents into families six in number, and containing from nine to twelve members, under charge of a directress, who served as elder sister or mother. Each family had a separate garden, work-room, dormitory, and refectory; and was known as La Famille de St. Joseph, de St. Thérèse, des Anges, &c.—as the case might be; and in order to break off all old recollections, each new comer was obliged to assume a new name. One was Théologale, because the other penitents admitted her by acclamation, at a time when it was doubtful whether they could find bread for another day, la bonne Mère said they had exercised the three theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity.

They rose very early and sang a hymn of praise whilst dressing, and breakfasted on brown rye bread—there were only three great festivals in the year on which they were allowed white; then came their devotions in the chapel, after which they labored at the work on which their livelihood depended. At twelve, dinner of soup and bread; work and prayer again in the chapel; an early supper on cheese, bread, apples or other garden produce; and then bed. Such was the routine of their simple and regular lives. So potent did Mademoiselle de Lamourous consider labor, and so essential a quality for true conversion, that she refused the offer of an endowment, which would have secured daily food to the inmates, saying that a life of labor was one great means of conversion, and it would lose reality unless they felt the necessity of working for their living. She impressed upon them that their fare, dress, and habits were to be really penitential; and yet the lively sweetness she kept up, and the cheerful songs of praise that varied their toils, rendered it a happy and attractive home.

She entertained a great horror of greediness or love of dainties: the following little incident will show how far she went to put down all predilection for what she considered a grievous error.

There was a peach tree covered with fruit one summer; until an unlucky night when some inmates were forced to sit up to finish a piece of work, and in the morning it was found to have been stripped. She summoned the watchers of the previous evening and said—"I thought I had succeeded in establishing good order and subordination in this house, and I grieve to find myself mistaken. Disobedience reigns here still, and my strict orders are slighted. Some daughters of Eve amongst you have dared to eat of the forbidden fruit, and, like Eve, have sinned through disobedience and gluttony. I will not know who are the aggressors, in order that I may not have to punish such humiliating faults, but you shall all know that my commands are not to be infringed with impunity. The tree whose fruit tempted you, is accursed, and from this moment shall produce nothing!"

She caused boiling water to be brought, and herself watered the tree with it before their eyes till it died, and the withered remains served for a long time as a spectacle of warning and terror; but when she saw that it had produced the desired impression, she had it cut down and removed.

Discernment of character fitted la bonne mère in a peculiar manner for the high position to which God had called her; this she evinced on all occasions, but particularly on the reception of new penitents. Some she would tenderly embrace, and soothe like angels rejoicing over the returning sheep; some she would meet with rebukes and assurances that they were great sinners, in much need of penitence; but she scarcely ever erred in judgment as to the treatment which would best bind them to her. One day a penitent told her she was weary of the place and was going away.

'You are tired, daughter? I may well pardon you, for so am I.'

'You weary of the place, bonne mère?'

'Are you surprised? Do you think it pleasanter to me to live here than to you? the only difference is that you are weary of yourself alone, I am wearied for all of you! But what would you have? it is God's will. Take my hand, we will talk of it no more!'

She shook hands with the penitent, who thought no more of going. Another likewise, under a fit of weariness, bent on going home, was brought to her during an illness, seeing her very determined, la bonne mère asked where her home lay.

‘ Preygnac ! then we are neighbours ! I am of Barsac ; and she launched forth in praises of her birthplace, declaring she could not bear to part with one that came from it. Seeing however, that this had no effect, she added, ‘ Since you have come from Preygnac no doubt you can make cruchade ?’ the woman said yea. ‘ Oh how glad I am !’ cried Mademoiselle de Lamourous, ‘ make some for me I beg of you, I know you will not refuse a poor sick woman ? These Bourdeaux people don’t understand it.’ The woman was flattered, cooked the cruchade with all her heart, and was so thanked and praised, that in her sense of usefulness she lost all weariness and remained quite content at La Miséricorde. Thus, by sweet and innocent wiles did this noble and devoted woman win the froward and refractory to the love and practice of virtue.

La bonne mère became now very infirm from rheumatism and for the last sixteen years of her life was almost totally confined to her room, gradually losing the use of her limbs and suffering acutely from a complication of disorders. During the last few months of her life she was covered with sores and ulcers so that she could not be lifted without the greatest pain, all of which she endured with a holy joy. Her faculties were perfect as ever, and her interest in all around undiminished ; the care with which she was tended, was so much of heart homage, that she often expressed the unselfish fear that it was more from personal love, than that general charity which proceeds from the love of God that stimulated their attention.

Her end was now, however, approaching, and on the 4th of September, 1836, the last rites of her Church were administered to her ; and on the 13th of the same month, conscious that she was soon about to receive the last summons, she called the directresses to her, and after exhorting them to a faithful compliance with the duties committed to their charge, she enjoined them above all to have complete confidence in the Holy Virgin, to consult her in all difficulties, and to take her as their mother ; she then made them promise implicit obedience to her successor.

She lived, however, till the next day, and on the 14th of September resigned her pure spirit into the hands of her Maker, having to the last strengthened herself by those various “acts of devotion” which her Church provides for the union of the soul with the Creator ; thus she departed, in the eighty-second year of her heavenly life.

La bonne mère had earnestly desired to be simply buried, and her nephew, the curate of Le Pian, did all he could to comply with her wishes; but the clergy of Bourdeaux declared that it would displease the whole City if they were prevented from paying her remains due honor. The only concession made therefore in accordance with her desire, was, that she should not be removed from her own home; and there she lay with her face uncovered, numbers of persons coming, not alone to give a last look at her serene and celestial features, but even to touch her sacred remains with various articles, which thenceforward were considered relics.

Permission had been given by the local magistrates for her to be buried in her own church, but the people would not be satisfied till her remains, in her ordinary dress, had been carried round the town upon a bier supported by the directresses, assisted by the sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, preceded by the municipal guard on horseback, and followed by two of the magistrates, and by deputations from the various clerical and charitable establishments. This procession over, the coffin was placed in the chapel, and the requiem mass chaunted over it. After which it was placed in the vault by the loving hands of the directresses.

The spot is marked by a tablet of white marble thus inscribed :—

MARIE THERESE CHARLOTTE DE LAMOUROUS,
FIRST SUPERIOR AND FOUNDRRESS OF THE HOUSE OF LA MISERICORDE AT BOURDEAUX,
BORN ON THE 1ST OF NOVEMBER, 1754,
DIED THE 14TH OF SEPTEMBER, 1836.

Well may her loving daughters fondly keep a wreath of roses hung over her portrait.

The present Superior is the niece of Mademoiselle de Lamourous, who seems to have inherited many of her aunt's peculiar gifts. An English lady who visited it in 1854, describes the whole as nearly in the same condition as it was left by la bonne mère; with the valuable difference of a vast accession to the number of the inmates, who are now so numerous that fifty are obliged to be lodged in a country house.

The cigar work having been taken from them since 1832, they support themselves by washing, needlework, and making artificial flowers for the adornment of altars.

In 1852 there were 440 penitents, who are never left together without a directress or a surveillante, and their history is known to the Superior and confessor alone. They are free to come or go ; some have gone to service, others have returned to their families, some have married, but the greater number cling for life to La Miséricorde, and one has spent fifty years there. The mixture of cheerfulness and tender love, with strict toil and severe penance, seems to have been unusually effective in accomplishing that most difficult task which has become a problem to so many minds.

Thus concludes the history of a Christian heroine, and we have been tempted by the attractiveness of this little volume far beyond the limits we prescribed to ourselves in our resumé. We have placed before our readers a portion of the letters, and all the spirit of the translation before us. Truly! we are come upon good times ; when gifted minds can understand, and able pens portray the charms of virtue, irrespective of class, country, or creed. Nor is this an isolated case ; with what delight have we not pored over those charming volumes, the Legends of the Madonna, from the gifted and womanly pen of Mrs Jameson, and though we may, and do differ on some trifling points still, her simple little work on the Sister of Charity at Home and Abroad was read by us with deep interest. Nor can we be unmindful of a more recent pleasure experienced in the perusal of the letter from an English Protestant lady which appeared in the April Number of the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, where the simple record of facts is given with such graceful eloquence (for truth is ever eloquent) that we discover new traits of virtue even in those whose claims to our veneration were the household word of our childhood. With what truth therefore may we not exclaim, we have come upon good times !

ART VII.—ROBERT CANE—THE CELTIC UNION.

1. The Williamite and Jacobite Wars in Ireland. By Robert Cane, M.D. Dublin : W. M. Hennessy.
2. The Celt, Edited by a Committee of the Celtic Union. Dublin : John O'Daly.

The Bard of Erin has sung :—

“ 'Twas ever thus from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay,
I never loved a tree or flower,
But 'twas the first to fade away ;
I never reared a dear gazelle,
To glad me with its soft black eye,
But when it came to know me well,
And love me, it was sure to die !”

We can imagine the fair form of Hibernia stooping pensively over the graves of her children, and giving utterance to a similar moan of monody. Her fondest, most hopeful, and best beloved sons have been too often the first to die ere they had reached the noon of their day. Many of them have rarely caught more than a glimpse of their destiny, and died before they reached it. When Sir Cahir O'Dogherty rose, at the head of his clansmen to resist the wholesale confiscation of Ulster, an English bullet struck him down in the midst of his successes, and at the early age of three-and-twenty. The powerful career of “Silken Thomas,” (Lord Fitz-Gerald) was likewise brought to a close at the age of twenty-three. Intense anxiety for the cause struck Talbot Duke of Tyr Connell dead at the siege of Limerick in 1691. That formidable opponent of English rules, Sir Phelim O'Neil, was but thirty-six when he perished. St. Laurence O'Toole, Malachy, O'More, Sarsfield, and though he were but a Celt in heart—St. Ruth—all expired at the moment when Ireland's need was the sorest. It was also thus with Owen Roe O'Neill, who fell dead in Cloughouter Castle, by the foeman's poison ; but leaving a name behind which will live for ever in the hearts of the Irish people. Long have they sang that mournful keen for “Kingly Owen Rua” which bursts in its eighth verse into the truly eloquent lines,

Mo m'le léun ! zup téarṡad an cámla éruaib, cúirṡead an zall i rṡéin, 'ra fáolcuin réanta a nṡuaif;
a “m-beanna an b'aoṡaib,” zo r'naonṡad an zleo, zanduaif, a' r é cneac na nṡaodaib an t'éuz rin Eoṡaib Ruaib !

And which Erionnach thus translates :

My burning, bitter dolours that our hero young has died,
The Saxon hordes he shatter'd all, subdued their champions' pride—
In "barna bael"* did ~~we~~ e'er fail to lay the spoiler low?
Our country's doom, dear Erin's tomb, was the death of Owen Rua!

Temple Emmet, the boy orator, Lord Maguire, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Wolfe Tone, and Robert Emmet would have dignified and ornamented the land of their birth had they lived. Molyneux, Goldsmith, Sterne, Dermody, Lucas, Furlong, Stannard Barrett, Charles Wolfe, Maturin, Clarence Mangan, Bishop Doyle, Edward Walsh, Thomas Kennedy, William Maginn, Lalor Sheil, Thomas Davis, Thomas Mc'Nevin, W. Elliott Hudson, John Banim, Bishop Maginn, Father Mathew, Maurice O'Connell, Maurice Leyne, John Hogan, John O'Connell,—have all mouldered into the clay of the land they loved well ere they had achieved one fourth of the work which their energy, zeal and power could have so easily mastered. With such examples before him of the premature extinguishment of genius and worth, it is no wonder that Gerald Griffin who died at 36, should have penned in his youth, these touching lines.

In the time of my boyhood, I had a strange feeling
That I was to die ere the noon of my day—
Not quietly into the silent grave stealing
But torn, like the blasted oak, sudden away.

That even in the hour when enjoyment was keenest,
My lamp should quench suddenly hissing in gloom:
That even when mine honors were freshest and greenest,
A blight should rush over and scatter their bloom.

Good and gifted men come, "like angels' visits, few and far between;" and God knows Hibernia cannot afford to lose them. Yet poor Ireland seems somehow especially fated to see her best and noblest sons wither in their vigor, and maturity. And now when we could ill afford to lose him, Robert Cane, of Kilkenny, has been struck down in the prime of his manhood, in the zenith of his intellectual powers, his professional fame, and his domestic joy—in the midst of his generous labours and researches, his national hopes and projects, and his Samaritan career of wide dispensing charity! "Hope is over," wrote Mr. Kenealy on August 13, "the whole city of Kilkenny resounds with grief, and the prayers and sobs of the people might reach to his very bedside." "For some time past," observes Mr. A. M. Sullivan "he was conscious of the existence of the disease which, verifying his own never-failing professional prescience, has proved fatal at the last. About three weeks ago it made its first strong assault, which, however, was repulsed, as even he, himself, for a moment imagined successful. For a few days he was able to take his accustomed place, surrounded by the loved and loving ones of his household, at the head of the hospitable board, where oft he won the heart of friend and guest—where even then one friend and guest—the last thus honored—shared the happiness that shone around—the friend who now, with aching heart and blinding tears, sits down to trace these lines !” On Friday August 13, he sank hopelessly. Dr. Corrigan was promptly in attendance on his suffering friend ; but the deadly disease could not be arrested. On Sunday he made an artificial rally, and all was exultation in Kilkenny ; but on Monday the cold sweat of death obliterated every hope, and Robert Cane, a few hours later, was no more. During this terrible interval of suspense, the Kilkenny Journal said :—

“ With bursting heart we sit down to write that the last hope is gone, and the days of a good man are numbered. The death of Dr. Cane may be expected any hour. The universal public have hoped against hope, but all in vain.”

The Nation, in recording his death, feelingly observed :—

“ The first grass has scarcely rooted on the grave where but a few short months ago we mourned a glorious genius lost to Ireland and the world, when stunned and heart-stricken, in drear bewilderment and grief of soul, we stand beside the bier where, reft from us in the hour when our need was the sorest, lies the trusted and the gifted—the hope and the pride of a gallant cause. Dr. Cane of Kilkenny is no more !

“ The last hope on earth is over : the last rite has been read ; the requiem has been sung ; yet still the heart rejects this sudden reality of disaster ; we listen for one magic tone of that deep, sonorous voice ; we strain the eye for one sight of the kingliest form that ever trod the isle. But, oh ! the chill, the grief, of waking truth. That voice is hushed for ever ; that noble form is cold as clay. The proud, high dignity which throned upon that brow, threw a radiance o’er each feature ; the flashing glance, the giant energy, the glorious intellect, the noble heart—all, all is lost to us. Heaven, mysterious and inscrutable, has taken to itself a soul so pure, and left us to weep another chief struck down on the threshold of a grand career.”

The conservative papers, consigning political feuds to the grave with him, have also, with few exceptions, passed a generous eulogium upon his manly character, and high mental attainments; and all shades of the now unhappily divided liberal party have likewise, through their organs, co-operated to do full honour to his name and memory. The special correspondent of the Freeman's Journal writes, "You and I may truly say all Irishmen will regret to learn, that the patriotic, high-minded, and learned Doctor Cane, of this city, breathed his last about five o'clock this morning. He has left, I grieve to state, a family but indefinitely provided for. — The principal traders and shopkeepers of all denominations suspended business entirely during the day, as a token of their sorrow and the respect they held him in. He was attended in his last moments by Rev. Mr. Walsh and also by Rev. Mr. Kavanagh. Ireland has lost a true-hearted and patriotic son, society a social and polished ornament, and medical science a devoted follower."

The Telegraph calls him a good and a great man; and the Dundalk Democrat declares that "amongst those we have lost since the greatest man of the last thousand years breathed his last sigh in Genoa, none promised to produce, from the effects of his toil, more substantial good for Ireland than the lamented Dr. Cane."

"Alas for Ireland!" it adds, "one by one her great men are borne to exile or consigned to the narrow house of death. One by one they vanish from amongst us, just as we expect the force of their labours or the influence of their example to work a change in our destiny."

The Tipperary Free Press says:—

"With the stature and bearing of an Irish Chieftain of old—with the talent and wisdom of the statesman—with the graceful eloquence of the Tribune—with the ready pen of the litterateur, he combined a kindness of disposition and a gentleness of manner that insensibly attached to him those with whom he came in contact. In his native city he was first in every movement calculated to add to its honor—as ready to advance a good cause as to hurl back one that would not bear the test of rectitude, and in Kilkenny—aye, throughout Ireland—his demise will long be felt as a national calamity."

The Tipperary Advocate says:—"A pure and guileless spirit has been released from its earthly tabernacle. Robert Cane is no more. It is a sad, strange ordination of Divine Providence that those most worthy of love and confidence are sure to be claimed by the Angel of Death, when we are but just learning to treasure their virtues and their talents. With a mournful pleasure we strew this frail garland upon the green grave of one in whom we centered many a hope."

It may be said that in commencing with the melancholy death of Dr. Cane, and in indicating the various sources from whence the wail for his premature removal proceeded, we are yoking the car before the horse. We desire, however, that every reader should fully know from the beginning, who it is whose memoir follows. We never gaze with interest upon the portrait of a man unless we know who he is, and all about him; and now that the reader has learned the worth of Robert Cane, he will doubtless eagerly examine the picture of his life.

The family of Cane or Canne appears to have originally been one of those Norman septs who, emigrating to Ireland many centuries ago became more Irish than the Irish themselves. Those of the name who remained in England zealously embraced Anglicanism, and an account of John Canne the Puritan may be found in any biographical dictionary. The name became, in course of time, modernised to Cane, Kane, and Keane. That branch of the Sept (long settled in Waterford) who use the latter orthography, have been ennobled in two quarters by a Peerage and a Baronetage; while in Cork it is worthily represented by the present Catholic Bishop of Cloyne the Right Rev. Dr. Keane. In Lodge's Peerage (revised by Archdall, vol. vii, p. 180.) we find mention made of Hugh Cane, an able and honest representative in the Irish Parliament during the earlier portion of the last century. From this individual, Robert Cane of Kilkenny was, we believe, collaterally descended.

In 1807 the subject of this paper was born in Kilkenny. His mother's name had been Scott, and belonged to a family long settled, and very well known in that city. From the day of Robert Cane's birth until several years subsequently it was his lot to feel the pinching grip of penury. His mother had set her heart upon making him a medical practitioner; and her scanty resources were strained to the uttermost in endeavouring to give Robert the opportunities necessary for studying and attaining the object of their united ambition. In 1820 he was placed as an assistant in the Pharmaceutical establishment of Mr Prim of Kilkenny, uncle to John Augustus Prim Esq., now Editor of the Kilkenny Moderator, and Co-Hon. Secretary to the South-East of Ireland Archæological Society. Here he continued to handle the pestle and mortar for some years, when he proceeded to Dublin, and assiduously attended a course of lectures and anatomical studies, in Cecilia-street and the College of Surgeons. The terrible visitation of Asiatic Cholera now for the first time scourged and ravaged Dublin. Several Physicians shrunk from attending persons suffering from this novel and mysterious plague, but young Cane courted danger, and went the round of all the Cholera Hospitals accumulating valuable experience as he went. Having acquired some reputation by his dauntless bearing, and successful treatment of the decimating disease, Cane proceeded back to Kilkenny in the latter end of the year 1832 almost simultaneously with the advance of the Cholera southward. Immediately on arrival he was appointed over the Cholera Hospital of his native city, where for night and day he continued to devote the most untiring exertions to the sick and dying. From this date young Cane rose like a rocket.

Even thus early in life Cane evinced a political tendency by presiding as chairman at a democratic meeting of Medical Students, and alumni of Trinity College. Their resolutions, which were rather loud, appeared in the journals of the day with the signature of Robert Cane, and for a considerable period the present Sir Robert Kane, President of the Queen's College, Cork, got the credit with some, and the discredit with others, of having occupied the responsible post of chairman at the democratic meeting in Kildare-street.

Although John Banim and Robert Cane were boys together in the same town, (Cane of course his junior) they do not appear to have had any intercourse until a period long subsequent. On Banim's return to Kilkenny in 1835, prematurely crushed and prostrate from the effects of an overtasked brain, during his rapid literary career in London, and smitten by poverty from the necessity of relinquishing every mental effort, Robert Cane organised a brilliant reception in honor of Ireland's great Novelist. He wrote the following very complimentary address, and having engrossed it on satin, presented it to Banim in the name of the citizens of Kilkenny. But Robert Cane did not confine himself to paying empty glittering compliments. He served the poverty-stricken and broken down author substantially by taking an active part in the collection of a local subscription, which nearly reached, in a short time, one hundred sovereigns. These substantial stimulants to the poor author's spirits, and condition, having been placed in a massive silver snuff-box, containing a suitable inscription, the offering was presented to Banim, with Doctor Cane's well timed, and delicate address.

“ TO JOHN BANIM, ESQ.,
AUTHOR OF ‘ THE O’HARA TALES,’ &c.

SIR—Influenced by personal regard, and by that esteem which your talents have won, even in far distant lands, your fellow-citizens hail, with sincere pleasure, your arrival amongst them, though that pleasure is accompanied by the regret that your health is not such as the desires of your countrymen would have it; but they trust that native scenes and air shall tend to your restoration, and that, ere long, a fostering legislature shall extend to you that liberal aid which a good and wise government is ever ready to bestow upon distinguished literary worth.

Your fellow citizens have resolved to offer to you some testimony of that respect which native and well-directed talents ever merit—respect due from every Irishman who recollects that your writings have portrayed his country in the colours of truth—delineated, without concealment or exaggeration, its national character—sketched its peasantry as they really are, placing their virtues in relief, and tracing their misfortunes, and their crimes to the true sources whence both spring—showing this country to the sister kingdom as it really is and begetting there commiseration for its sufferings, and esteem for those social virtues and ennobling qualities, which centuries of wrong and bondage have shrouded, but not entombed.

As citizens of Kilkenny your claims come still more forcibly upon their esteem. Your pen has preserved many of the beautiful localities in and around this city—given new charms to most of its popular legends, and delineated, with truth and accuracy, many of its original characters, blending the charms of truth with the creations of a powerful fancy, and directing all to the noble purpose of elevating the national character, and vindicating a too long-neglected and oppressed land.

The citizens of Kilkenny, therefore, hope that you will accept of the token of your countrymen’s regard, which accompanies this address, and they venture to express their ardent wish that you may live to use it in an advanced and honourable old age, with bodily powers then as vigorous as is that intellect which has won you the proud distinction of fame, conferred an honour on Kilkenny, and an important benefit upon Ireland.

Signed, for their fellow-citizens, by
C. JAMES, Chairman,
R. CANE, M. R. C. S., Secretary.”

It is painful to contemplate the prostrate, and helpless condition of poor Banim, bodily, at this period. Doctor Cane, writing in The Celt, on August 1st 1857, observes:—

“As I was sitting in the Kilkenny citizens' club room, I was disturbed by a bustling movement; a heavy step was audible advancing up the stairs; it was John Banim's servant man carrying him from his carriage and bearing him up to the green baize-covered sofa allotted to him in the best corner of the room. Members pulled their chairs aside, the fire was raked up into a better blaze, and men pressed officiously to bid him welcome. He was in the servant's arms, half reclining, half sitting up, his arms round the man's neck so that his fingers were locked upon his shoulders, his legs hung down helplessly; and his emaciated frame told the sad story of paralytic wasting; his long and thin visage was made sadder still by the deep searing of small pock and by well defined traces of anxious and painful thoughts, but his eyes were most expressive, pale blue or gray, but large, prominent, broadly open, starting out of their sockets, they were full of meaning and spoke to you before his lips moved. There was an energy of manner, a fiery gesticulation about him when he warmed with his subject or became excited in narrating some anecdote or reciting some piece of his own poetry, which he did in a most impassioned manner, and so as to impress himself with great power upon his auditory. His voice was deep and solemn, and his emphasis peculiarly impressive. Upon this occasion I heard him recite with deep pathos “Sogarth Aroon,” and in a moment after heard him thunder out these lines written in reply to Wellington's threat, of reconquering Ireland, “The Brigand, let him come, let him come,” which he delivered with great power and with an impressive fervour that shook his attenuated frame like so many electric shocks. At its conclusion, when the plaudits of a crowded room answered him, his pale face became fiery red and his eyes actually sparkled.

It was upon that occasion that he narrated two anecdotes of his sojourn in France, which he visited just after the Revolution of 1830.

General Lafayette, then an old man, had waited upon him—the hero who had figured in three revolutions. Banim complimented him on that national guard in which he took such pride, and spoke of it as a grand new thought or suggestion to do away with standing armies and make every citizen a soldier. “Sir,” said Lafayette, “you as an Irishman, may well refer to it with pride. We had the idea from you; the first national guard the world ever saw was the Irish Volunteers.” “Oh,” exclaimed Banim when relating the anecdote to his fellow townsmen, “it was the highest compliment ever paid to me as an Irishman.” Then he told amongst other anecdotes of the three days' revolution, how an old Parisian friend of his had suspended in his parlour the musket he carried on that occasion, and with it a solitary cartridge remaining of the powder he had used at the barricades. “I asked him,” said Banim, “to give me of that powder, thirty-two grains.” “Thirty-two grains,” said the Frenchman, “for what?” “To sow one grain in every county in Ireland,” replied Banim. “My God! I would,” said the Frenchman, “if I thought they would grow!”

Robert Cane had previously been only a member of the Royal College of Surgeons; he now took out his degree as a practising physician and rose rapidly in his profession. The Marquis of Ormonde had from the first, a high opinion of his skill, and Cane became from the year 1836 his Lordship's family physician. Even of the animal man Cane was, at this time, a splendid specimen. The fair girls of Kilkenny were "to a man" dying in love with him. He slighted them all however in favour of the accomplished daughter of a deceased military officer who, accompanied by her mother, had come, from a remote county, to reside temporarily, in Kilkenny. The young lady was a Protestant; but in those days the ecclesiastical objection to mixed marriages was not so strongly enforced in Ireland as at present; and the obstacles to their union were soon surmounted. An issue of eight children has been the result of this felicitous alliance. The eldest son, Robert, passed through Trinity College, Dublin, with great eclat, and triumphantly underwent, within the last few months, the proverbially searching, and severe examination to which candidates for admission to the Royal Artillery are subjected at Woolwich. He is now with his Regiment in China.

Meanwhile Cane rose with electrical rapidity. His fellow citizens idolized him for his worth, urbanity, and Samaritan kindness to the poor. They respected him for his great talent, his erudition, his uncompromising political integrity, and his entire devotion to the cause of Ireland, its literature, and destiny. In every national movement he was a leading, and a valorous actor. Of every local effort to check injustice he was the animating, and the guiding spirit. To the claims of the oppressed, the houseless the orphan, or the struggling artist who had never known the stimulus of a patron's smile, the purse of Robert Cane was always open. In furtherance of every generous, patriotic, Celtic, or archæological object his pen sped with untiring zeal and power.

A highly cultivated intellect, says the Tipperary Free Press, had enabled him to overpass the narrow barrier that too often circumscribes the career of the professional man, and an ardent love of country taught him that a patriotism sincerely maintained seldom failed to win respect even from those most antagonistic to its dictates. So it was with him. Dr Cane was eminently an Irish nationalist—yet amongst the most aristocratic circles of Kilkenny was he found, no less the physician than the friend, esteemed as well for his ability in the one capacity as for his courtesy in the other.

Of O'Connell and his sagacious line of policy Doctor Cane was long a supporter. In 1840 a grand Banquet in honour of the Liberator and Repeal was organised in Kilkenny, mainly through Dr. Cane's exertions. He acted as steward on the occasion and delivered in the course of the evening a speech so redolent of nationality, good sense, and honesty that Kilkenny to this day remembers it with delight.

It is a fact tolerably significant of the estimation in which Dr. Cane's magisterial services were generally held, that whilst numbers of Catholic and Protestant gentlemen from Lord Ffrench to Smith O'Brien were visited with a supersedeas for cooperating with O'Connell in the Repeal struggle, Robert Cane was suffered to continue his judicial labours. He often left Kilkenny and his valuable professional practice at great personal sacrifice to thunder forth his vigorous volume of eloquence, and masculine sense on the platform of a monster meeting, or at the National council board on Burgh quay. In 1844 the citizens of Kilkenny marked their high appreciation of Dr. Cane's admirable qualities of head and heart by bestowing upon him the highest dignity which it was in their power to give. Dr. Cane was elected mayor of the "faire and antient cittie of Kilkenny;" and with the lofty generosity for which he has always been distinguished, he applied every farthing of his official salary, and emoluments to purposes of local public utility.

"When O'Connell, writes Mr. Kencaly, was released from prison in 1844, and when the corporations of Ireland tendered their congratulations and respectful homage to the illustrious Liberator, Robert Cane was chosen as the head of the deputation from Kilkenny; and those who saw his noble, gallant form that day, robed in the green uniform of the '82 Club, remember still the proud and princely bearing, the giant grace, the manly beauty, and sweet smile of the representative of Kilkenny. But that kingly form is now cold as the clod of the valley—that glowing heart whose every pulse beat for Ireland, is still for ever."

Mr. Cartan of the Dundalk Democrat observes: "The first and the only time we saw him was at the great Levee in the Rotundo, in May, 1845, when Ireland sent its trusted representatives to pay their homage to O'Connell and his fellow-martyrs, who had suffered incarcerations at the hands of a packed jury and from English injustice. He appeared there as Mayor of Kilkenny, decorated in his robes; and no one present wore a more dignified or commanding appearance. From that day till the week before his death he laboured zealously for Ireland."

From the earliest days of Dr. Cane's manhood his name was constantly and eagerly sought to dignify, and inspire local movements; and with them, when honestly based, he cordially cooperated. His name wielded a singular influence, and strange liberties were sometimes taken with it. We cull the following episode from the Report of the Proceedings of the Repeal Association on Monday, September 21st, 1846, a few weeks subsequent to the secession from its ranks of Messrs. O'Brien, Meagher, Mitchel, O'Gorman, Doheny, Lalor, Dillon, and O'Donoghue.

Mr. John O'Connell said that Mr. Ray had received a letter from Dr. Cane, of Kilkenny, which he would read out of respect to the writer.

" 8 William-street, Kilkenny,
Sept. 19, 1846.

"DEAR SIR—Feeling that I Cannot subscribe to the proceedings now Going forward in Conciliation Hall for Many reasons, of which a time will arrive for explanations (The present being a Period when men cannot enter it, or Trust themselves to deliver a cool opinion,) I will thank you to have my name Erased from its books.

" I have the honour to be your obedient servant.

" R. CANE, M. D. (ex-mayor,) Kilkenny.

" T. M. Ray, Esq., Secretary Repeal Association."

He was very sorry that that excellent gentleman called on the Association to erase his name from their books. It was unnecessary for him to praise Dr. Cane, of Kilkenny. His character was well-known, for his great abilities, varied attainments, and ardent patriotism, had made his name deservedly popular with the people of Ireland. Unfortunately Dr. Cane, thought proper to adopt the principles of the Young Ireland party, and now wished his name to be erased from the books of the Association. They were sincerely sorry to lose the assistance and co-operation of such an excellent man; but the cause of Ireland must be saved, no matter what the sacrifice; therefore it was with sincere regret—at the same time without the slightest hesitation—that he said they must accept Dr. Cane's resignation hoping that better times would come, when he would be enabled coolly to consider this matter, and come to the same conclusion that so many of their revered prelates, and so large a portion of their respected clergy, as well as the people at large, had come to—namely, that the moral force principle, if it were not the only safe one, ought to be adopted for its beauty and holiness. (Loud cheers.) He therefore moved that Dr. Cane's name be erased from the books of the Association.

Captain Broderick seconded the motion with much regret.

At the meeting in Conciliation Hall on the Monday following it appeared that the letter purporting to be from Dr. Cane was a forgery! John O'Connell, in the course of his speech observed.

As to the forgery, I must say this—I am acquainted with Doctor Cane's handwriting, and I was under the impression when I read the letter that it was genuine. (Hear hear.) Since then he has written to me on the subject, and on comparing the two documents together I perceived the forgery; but without the special comparison it would be almost impossible to detect it. (Cries of hear, hear.) Doctor Cane complains naturally enough that I should have taken a letter couched in bad English to be a production of his, knowing, as I do, his high intellectual attainments. Of course the bad English of the letter did confound me to a certain extent; but as I thought I could not mistake the evidence of my own eyes as to the handwriting, I therefore considered that the letter was genuine. It is not genuine. He has written a letter to us since, exposing his views on the recent discussion in this Hall—expressing his dissent from a great portion of our proceedings, and calling on us to get the Young Ireland party back again. With all due respect for him, I cannot consent to read his letter here. We can't consent to re-open in this Association (I give him the same answer that I have given to others) a discussion that has been closed for ever—a discussion on which the Irish people have pronounced—the discussion of whether moral force or physical force is the best means to achieve the independence of Ireland, Doctor Cane's letter was accordingly not read at the Meeting of the Association. Its suppression was an unwise proceeding; and many were the murmurs of disapprobation which this illadvised act drew forth. It may not be uninteresting now to print the entire correspondence which passed between Dr. Cane and Mr. T. M. Ray, the Secretary, at that period.

*Loyal National Repeal Association,
Corn Exchange Rooms,
Dublin, 22nd September, 1846.*

DEAR SIR—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th, requesting to have your name erased from the books of the Association, and to state that your request has been complied with.

I remain, dear sir,

Your faithful servant,

Robert Cane, Esq., M.D.,
(Ex Mayor,)
8, William-street, Kilkenny.

T. M. RAY, Sec.

Kilkenny, Tuesday Sept. 22nd 1846.

DEAR SIR—I perceive by the Evening Mail of last night that Mr. J. O'Connell had alluded in the Association to a letter purporting to be from me, and to have my signature.

That letter is a forgery, as I did not write any such to the member for Kilkenny or to the Association. May I request that you will permit me to see the letter, that I may be enabled to trace it. If you can, send it to me with its envelope or superscription—I may be able to discover the writer.

I would be glad to have it by return of post, as I mean to write in time for Monday's meeting, when it shall be returned to you.

Pray inform me has the committee, or the Association, acted upon it and removed my name.

Yours truly,

To T. M. Ray, Esq., &c.

ROBERT CANE.

*Loyal National Repeal Association,
Corn Exchange Rooms, Dublin, 23rd Sept., 1846.*

MY DEAR SIR—I acknowledge, with sincere satisfaction, your favor of yesterday, acquainting us that the letter read at the Association on Monday last, requiring your name to be erased from the books, is a forgery. I assure you we received with very deep regret that notification, which we are now delighted to find a malicious fabrication.

I enclose the letter as you desire, in the hope that you may be able to trace the author. The envelope has been thrown away.

I remain, my dear sir,

Most faithfully your sincere servant,

Robert Cane, Esq., M.D., Kilkenny.

T. M. RAY.

Kilkenny, September 26th, 1846.

MY DEAR SIR—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your two letters, the first announcing to me that my name had been erased from the books of the Association, the second enclosing me the forged letter, upon which, as if genuine, the Association had acted in so erasing my name.

I thank you for the courtesy of both communications; but cannot avoid expressing my surprise that the Association, where some of my letters might have been found, did without the trouble of inquiry or examination, consider as mine, and act upon as such, a note whose illiterate origin might have been traced in the facts that while it occupies but ten lines of note paper, it yet contains three grammatical errors, and no fewer than twelve misplaced capitals. Indeed, the note is such a one as no professional man could have written; and it is consoling to find that the individual who maliciously signed my name, and dared to jest with the solemn business of that Association, of which he has been himself a member, and towards which body his act has been a gross outrage, is a man whose education cannot be degraded by the cowardice of his concealment, the daring of his forgery, or the meanness of his lying.

I had intended to have been present at the Association early in October. I wished to press upon its consideration some matters which I consider of vital consequence to the cause of national independence ; but the occurrence of last Monday makes it imperative on me to hasten my purpose, and—as I am scarcely sure of my position whether on or off the books—to do it by letter.

The present aspect of Repeal is such as to fill with the saddest presages the hearts of many of its warmest advocates. The Repeal ranks filled with dissensions—dissensions arousing bitter passions between Repealer and Repealer—dissensions thinning the Association, reducing the rent, separating the leaders, and sowing doubt, distrust, and apathy amongst the people—dissensions which threaten to sever the noblest confederacy that ever struggled for liberty.

When I look at this distracting state of the public mind, and read the speeches of gentlemen in various localities, who speak as if there was no clashing of public opinion—as if the dissentients were but some dozen of young barristers, whose sentiments met with no responsive sympathy in the provinces—when I see division hushed up, suppressed, or so varnished over as to be nearly hidden, I ask myself, can it be that these men are in ignorance of the true state of the country? Are they so blind as not to see? Can they believe it is an idle murmur that will die away, and be replaced by the restoration of public confidence? If they do, it becomes the duty of every honest man who does see the danger to warn them of it.

It happens unfortunately that a vast number of those who are dissatisfied will not openly avow their dissatisfaction, though they are acting upon it, and quietly retiring from agitating the cause of the country. Their succession will not be known until the next year's muster-call, when their names and money will both be missing. Those men whisper their dissatisfaction and their doubts to one another, and resolve upon retirement. They were the silent and steady labourers of Repeal—ever ready for the work ; but neither speech-makers, nor lovers of wordy contentions, they shrink from the collision which the avowal of their opinions might create. Some of them are deterred by high influences—such as can trammel the expression, but not the freedom of thought. Amongst the gentry and the professions these dissentients constitute a large and an important class. They embrace, too, a large proportion of the bone and sinew of the land—the industrial classes, the productive trades—who, as a mass, warmly deplore the divisions which have taken place in Conciliation Hall. They are a noble and a high-minded race ; their calling places them beyond the corruptions of the state ; their sufferings have made them Repealers ; their intelligence and growing education have made them of immense consequence to the Irish League ; and the struggle for liberty cannot do without them. They were the marshalled men of the monster meetings—the object upon which the people looked with pride. They paid their subscriptions cheerfully—subscribed for their scarfs, their bands, and their banners from meagre means, and surrendered many a day's work to follow the idolised chieftain and the cause of their hearts. They had nothing to win by agitation unless it succeeded ; and even then but better pay for hard toil. Patronage and place entered not into their calculations ; and the sorrows and distrust which has now seized upon them are the better growth of disappointed hopes. To rally them now, as then, would be a work of giant labour.

These things may be unpleasant to be heard, and many who believe their truth may timidly question the wisdom of avowing our weakness, forgetting that the avowal may remedy the ill. Perchance their very truth may be questioned, and the statements I make considered as a needless raven-croak. If so, my answer is—I speak the truth, as I know it; I speak it fearlessly, because it is the truth; and I speak it energetically, as I would arouse men whose duty it is to avert the evil! And I am confident that the results of a few months shall prove I am right, when, Cassandra like, my prophecy may be believed with its fulfilment—"If a re-union of parties be not speedily achieved and confidence restored to the people, the present agitation for Repeal will cease."

This is a bold declaration, only to be smiled at, if it be false and groundless; but if it be true, it calls for the serious consideration of Irishmen everywhere, who, if they neglect their duty of truth to the country, to the Association, and to the Liberator, may live to lament that their political characters were buried in the ruins of the noble temple whose pillars they had torn away.

Men should ponder well over a responsibility like this; and the responsibility is great indeed upon those, if any there be, who would veil from O'Connell the disunion which is spreading through the ranks of the followers who love him.

A feature most melancholy in this lamentable division is, that it does not seem to have arisen upon any necessary movement—it has not sprung up, as required by the aspect of the times or the temper of the people, but brought out at a period of perfect quietude as the assertion of a speculative doctrine, to which every Repealer in the land was ready to subscribe, in the language and manner of the bishop and clergy of Derry. Their resolutions, thank God, have been recognised and entered at the Association; and in them can be found the materials for a re-union of honest men! They pledge themselves to a purely moral force agitation for Repeal, but they do not tie up men's opinions as to all contingencies, all times, and all people.

In the support, too, of these new rules, the committee of the Association have alarmed the public by an assertion of the power of removing members at its pleasure, without consulting the body at large, and of suppressing the correspondence of those men, who, differing from the rules, had written their dissent, thus keeping the opinions of such dissentients from the eyes of their fellow members. And this apparent annihilation of all opposing argument has been further carried out by the omission of such correspondence in all those papers circulated by the committee; while the paper which does publish them has been sedulously excluded from the national reading rooms. This may have been considered wise; but it is at variance with true liberty and freedom of discussion, and utterly subversive of what should be the characteristics of a democratic confederacy like the Repeal Association. The complainings upon this subject are loud and universal: with these are linked the language of impassioned sorrow for what is considered ingratitude to O'Brien, and injustice to THE NATION—a man and a paper whose truth and services the people warmly appreciate.

I tell these things as they are—I do not exaggerate them—and I tell them, because I fear that many, whose duty it would be to tell them to the Liberator and to the Association, are timidly, if not purposely silent. I tell them to awake the Association to a full sense of its danger. I tell them, because my heart is still pulsating for Ireland and Repeal; and I act with the warm hope that even I may be instrumental in reconciling the jarring elements of our party. If I be not so instrumental, I shall yet have the proud consciousness that “I did my duty.”

Having made this statement, I call upon the Association, of which I have been an early, a persistent, and an active member, to devise the means whereby the confidence of the public shall be restored, and the enthusiasm of the people re-animated. And the means I would suggest are, that a committee be formed under the guidance of the Liberator, and that this committee shall have for a duty the consideration of all those sources of discontent and division, and the suggesting of the means whereby, without compromise anywhere, and without disgrace or dishonor, or legal difficulty, the banished shall be recalled, the seceders restored, and unanimity perfectly re-established amongst the band of popular leaders who have hitherto stood around the chieftain O’Connell.

This committee will have an onerous duty; but if they love Ireland it will be performed cheerfully, earnestly, and successfully: and their names shall be written in the hearts of their countrymen as true lovers of peace, and benefactors of their kind.

Were I present, and at liberty so to do, I would move such a resolution; as I am not, is there one man desirous of his country’s welfare who will urge it forward? If there be, may God bless and speed his efforts, shall be the concluding words of one who in his prayers has never forgotten Ireland; and who in despite of all that has occurred to damp enthusiasm and chill the fervour of hope, yet trusts on—relying upon Heaven, and the ultimate predominance of right, that Ireland and Repeal shall triumph.

I remain, dear sir, yours truly,

ROBERT CANE.

T. M. Ray, Esq., &c., &c.’

John O’Connell, although possessing many of the essential qualities of a Tribune was deficient in political foresight. On September 29, 1846. we find him declaring—that the recent discussions and divisions between Old and Young Ireland had closed for ever, and that Dr. Cane’s letter would, if read, tend to re-open them. We need not remind the reader how widely John O’Connell was mistaken in his calculations. Robert Cane, on the other hand, evidenced considerable prophetic power in this letter. The retirement of Smith O’Brien from the ranks of the Association had now only a few weeks taken place; and Doctor Cane clearly saw the disastrous results with which that secession was fraught. His admirable letter, it will be seen, does not re-open the discussion on Physical Force; but simply deals with the practicability, and just necessity of a reconciliation. It is deeply to be regretted that the well-timed letter of Robert Cane was not read, and its advice adopted by the Repeal Association: and we are quite sure that if John O'Connell were now living, he would be the first to avow, with his characteristic manliness and frankness, the mistake into which he was betrayed by suppressing it.

Although Dr. Cane felt grievously pained and hurt, that his important and generously aimed letter should have been thrown aside, unread, by the Repeal Association; and albeit that his political views were much more in unison with those of Smith O'Brien, than of John O'Connell, he did not then relinquish his connection with that body, but remained linked to it in the hope that he might yet be instrumental in effecting a reunion of all classes of Repealers for the regeneration of their common country.

The Nation of October 3rd, 1846. in a leading article said: "There are men on whom verbal praise can confer no distinction—their character, and estimation among their people being written not in words, but in acts.—Dr. Cane is such a man. Through the gifted and cultivated South we know no man of higher intellectual, political, professional, or personal character."

It is easy to nod assent, or to utter ephemeral expressions of approval; but when substantial testimonials which touch the pocket—that test of sincerity—are lavishly thrown at a man's feet there must be some sterling worth in him. The journals of the day record that in September, 1846, a committee was appointed by the people of Kilkenny to conduct the getting up of a suitable Testimonial and address to Dr. Cane. Having assembled at the Tholsel at 2 o'clock, they proceeded from thence to his residence at William-street. That political or sectarian differences is no bar to the cordial union of Irishmen when met to do honor to a man of worth and honesty, was felicitously evidenced by the circumstance that the Protestant mayor and High Sheriff led the van of the deputation. Amongst those who swelled it were the Rev. Messrs. O'Flynn and Mulligan, Aldermen Potter, Banim, Town councillors Kelly, Kinchela, J. Potter, Burke, Dr. Lalor, Messrs. Alkenhead, Cullen, Lubey, Hart, Gaffney, Flynn, Menton, Morrison, Coffey, Dea, and others. "The Deputation," observes a journal of the day,

" Was received by Dr. Cane with the cordial grasp of friendship and genuine Irish hospitality, and having been ushered in, the Mayor, on behalf of the committee and of his fellow-citizens at large, proceeded to present the address :—

" DEAR AND ESTEEMED SIR—Be assured there is more of fervour than of formality in our visit to present a fellow-citizen, distinguished for private worth and public integrity, with a complimentary address, as a suitable accompaniment to a more substantial testimonial of public favor.

" Your highest title not only to our respect, but to that of your fellow-citizens at large, without regard to creed or to class, is that you are the architect of your own fame and fortune. By the application of superior talents to generous purpose, you have won for yourself the estimation of men of all parties and all classes, whose patriotism, like your own, is comprehensive, and, therefore, repudiates exact concurrence of opinion, political or religious, as the test of personal friendship or of personal respect.

" Your admirable discharge of the duties of chief magistrate, in which unaffected dignity of manner and high judicial qualities were happily combined ; and stern impartiality on the side of justice, and in the punishment of crime, relived by generous consideration for the victim of misfortune, have well and worthily established your title to the high office which received honor from your administration of its duties.

" Your marked attention to the improvements of the city, and generous appropriation of the salary and emoluments of your mayoralty to purposes of public usefulness, we regard as an enlargement of that kindliness of disposition, and goodness of heart, which have ever characterised your conduct as a private citizen.

" The intrinsic value of the accompanying gift is of slight consideration when contrasted with the circumstances which grace its bestowment. It is, sir, a gift redeemed from partisanship, inasmuch as it is the gift of men of all shades of political and religious opinion—of men who can elevate themselves above the atmosphere of prejudice and party, in admiration of those noble qualities of head and heart, which are purified from the base alloy of an interested opinion or excited feeling.

" Receive, then sir, this gift, or rather testimonial, as a symbol of that friendship which exalts itself in honoring you.

" May you live long to enjoy the luxury of a friendship so general, and so pure in motive ; and may your children's children be stimulated to imitate your virtues and rival your fame, by regarding the testimonial now presented to you as a symbol of that public esteem of which any man might justly be proud.

" Signed on behalf of the committee,

" JOSEPH HACKETT, Mayor."

Doctor Cane's reply was as follows :—

" MR. MAYOR AND GENTLEMEN—The poverty of the English language is proverbial ; but now I feel it, when I would convey to you how I appreciate, how I value, the distinguished honor and magnificent present you and my other fellow-citizens and friends have this day conferred upon me.

"Truly does your address say it is 'A SYMBOL OF PUBLIC ESTEEM OF WHICH ANY MAN MIGHT JUSTLY BE PROUD'—and I am proud of it to an extent that shall stimulate me, as far as in me lies, to preserve an esteem which is, I fear, beyond my deserts; yet, but equal to my wishes, and valued by me as one of earth's proudest gifts.

"And permit me to tell you that when I consider my own political position, so calculated to have left me within the limits of a party, I rejoice tenfold in this honor, because it tells me I have been successful in my efforts to act as a magistrate with that impartiality which was due to the dignity of the office you raised me to, and in the discharge of whose duties, truth and law only should be recognized—party, sect, and prejudice, ever forgotten.

"I experience such honest pride in this evidence of your approval, that were this day to close my career amongst you, I should feel that much, if not all, my hopes had dared to look at, what my heart had yearned after, was achieved. I had won upwards to the proudest place within this ancient city; I had entered upon the high office with an earnest aspiration to the Ruler of Men that He might enable me not to discredit it, or to be seduced by prejudice, pride, or interest, from the upright deportment due to it. I thank God I retired from it with the honest convictions of an approving conscience in my breast, and now I have the proud evidence, dearer to me than life itself, that I won your approval.

"The warmth of your eloquent address overpowers me, and your beautiful present has made me over-rich. Heretofore I had nothing of this earth's goods which I valued beyond their passing use, or would sorrow for, if fortune plundered them from me. Conscious of God's providence, full of self-reliance, I could stoop, without a tear, to labor in gathering them again. Now, for the first time, I do feel over-rich, because you have given into my charge a property, whose value to me is beyond the world's average of such things—an estate to pass to my children, and speak to them of me when I am no more, to teach them the value of self-reliance, the glory of truth, the reward which good men, even in this evil world, will give for the mere performance of a duty. Yes, with Heaven's blessing, this shall be a heritage to them, instilling bright and truthful principles into their hearts—shedding over their manhood the halo of hope, and making the eternal spirit triumphant over the earthly man.

"Broad acres or golden store could not do this. You have given a precept, taught a principle to my children, and to the youth who shall surround them, which is, and will be, virtue-creating.

"ROBERT CANE, M.D.,
Ex-Mayor of Kilkenny.

"William-street, Sept. 17, 1846."

The proceedings concluded with a splendid repast furnished by Dr. Cane for his guests.

Cane was the soul of hospitality. He rarely sat down to dinner without a little constellation of local worth and talent around him; while really eminent men of all creeds and parties, and from every quarter, were found, periodically sparkling at his board. The great Thomas Carlyle, Thomas Davis, and Charles Gavan Duffy, were not unfrequent guests. Every literary man passing through Kilkenny at once left his card on Doctor Cane; and his house in William-street was quite a little Derrynane of hospitality and good cheer. "The feast of reason, and the flow of soul" uniformly pervaded it. "In private life," says Mr. Keneally, "Dr. Cane had the good fortune to be as much admired and respected as in public. His bland and courteous manners, his pure and guileless nature, and his gallant, yet unostentatious, bearing captivated the hearts of all classes, and extorted the admiration of even those who did not sympathise with his views in either religion or politics. Outside his professional ability he was possessed of a high order of genius, which was felt and acknowledged in the society in which he moved—felt in public and private—on the bench and at the council board; a genius which, had his life been spared a little longer, would have stamped itself upon the literature of his country."

For years blatant patriotism had been a source of pecuniary speculation in Ireland. The unblushing pursuit of this venal traffic has too often caused the efforts of really virtuous and disinterested men to be viewed with distrust, and sometimes ridicule. But there is one infallible test, exceedingly easy of application which never fails to establish or impugn a patriot's "honesty." When we see a demagogue denouncing English misrule, and appealing to the prejudices or passions of the multitude, we generally suspect that, if needy he is seeking for a place to stop his mouth, and if not needy that he is endeavouring to woo and win the suffrages of a popular constituency with a view to his election as a member of Parliament. Doctor Cane was exempt from either imputation. He had attained a splendid professional success, and he had not a moment to call his own. It is no poetical flight of imagination to say that his minutes were worth guineas to him. Every hour that he gave up to the cause of Ireland cost him dearly. He loved the cause and the old land, its literature, people, and antiquities better than lucre; and of this the amplest evidence remains on record. He had nothing to gain by his life of consistent patriotism, and generous toil, but, on the contrary, everything to lose. His professions were not words, but uniformly substantiated by acts of serious personal sacrifice. Although he was in the receipt of a considerable income as a practising physician, he dispensed to the full as largely ; and it is with pain we have to announce that notwithstanding the brilliant professional success of Robert Cane, his premature demise has left an accomplished wife, and children comparatively unprovided for.

In truth Robert Cane was a prince in regard to money. Of the ruinously expensive experiment, to foster and stimulate the growth of a vigorous spirit of racy Nationality in Ireland which engrossed the time and thought of his last two years upon earth, we shall have occasion to speak fully hereafter.

The foresight which Dr. Cane's letter to the Repeal Association, in 1845, displayed, was triumphantly, but sadly verified, in the transactions of the two subsequent years. No one now doubts but that if a conciliatory instead of an acrimonious tone were adopted by the Conciliation Hall posterior to the secession, a hearty and irresistible political union of Irishmen would have resulted. The writer of this paper witnessed in October, 1846, the ignominious expulsion from the Repeal Association of a Remonstrance which had been drawn up by an influential segment of the Young Ireland Party ; but it is due to the Liberator to say that he was not present on this occasion. We heard the command given to kick it into the street, and we saw this document, engrossed in the handsomest style of caligraphy, expelled from the Hall, and trampled beneath horses' hoofs, cart wheels, and coal-porters' brogues on Burgh-quay. Soon after the Irish Confederation was formally inaugurated ; and if our memory serves us the first meeting of that powerful but somewhat unsteady body took place, with much eclat, in November, 1846. Next morning O'Connell refused to eat at breakfast. His chaplain the Rev. Mr.——, (to console him) observed that the large meeting the evening previous was gathered together "out of curiosity" to hear "the young orators." "You are mistaken, my friend," said the old statesman ; "it was a great meeting—they are a great party."

The frightful decimations in the ranks of our once lusty population by famine and plague, and the criminal apathy in which the English Government seemed sunk, spurred on the Young Confederation to a pitch of indignation which the dictates of discretion would otherwise have checked. Robert Cane was carried along with the popular feeling. He expressed his sentiments honestly, and boldly ; but however he may have felt, he had the good sense to abstain from uttering views which the laws of the land would visit with summary vengeance.

Lord Clarendon, however, having in July, 1848, applied to Parliament for extraordinary powers, the Habeas Corpus Act was promptly suspended, and among the many individuals who were arrested and cast into dungeons without trial or definite accusation was the Ex-Mayor of Kilkenny.

It has long been customary with both the conservative and the liberal party to view Dr. Cane as a most determined Young Ireland-man and ready to go quite as far as Mitchel, O'Brien, or Meagher. On the escape of John Mitchel from penal servitude in 1854 a deputation of fillibusters arrived in Ireland from America, and proceeded to feel the popular pulse of our thirty-two Counties. Ireland was garrisoned by a mere handful of militia. All the military and naval resources of England were draughted to the Crimea and the Baltic; and John Mitchell and his followers entertained considerable hopes that if the roar of their war trumpet received even a partial response from the Irish People, that an independent Republic might, without difficulty, be declared in Dublin Castle. The war deputation, as a preliminary, waited upon Charles Gavan Duffy, and asked him to take the chair at a banquet which they proposed to give in Kilkenny as a triumphant acknowledgment of the escape of Mitchel from Penal Exile. Mitchel, however, having attacked Duffy in his Gaol Journal, the latter declined to preside at the demonstration in his honor, but suggested Dr. Cane of Kilkenny as the man above all others best calculated to suit and serve the object which they had in view. "Oh my dear Sir," said the spokesman, "we do not consider Dr. Cane as at all possessing the confidence of the National Party. Surely you cannot be unaware that when the Kilkenny Deputation waited upon Dr. Cane in July, 1848, to ask him to head the clubs in attacking the town he completely evaded the invitation. We consider that Dr. Cane sold the pass upon that occasion." "Sir" replied Duffy, "you amaze me. Am I to understand that you heard Dr. Cane oppose and condemn the wishes of his fellow citizens?" "I was not present," continued the spokesman; "but I heard of the act from one who had been; and you are now in possession of the view which the followers of John Mitchel uniformly take of Dr. Cane's conduct at a very critical juncture in our History."

Setting the judgment of all other parties aside, the most determined Young Irelander cannot but applaud the sagacious course which Dr. Cane pursued in 1848. He saw that the projected Insurrection was a mere prismatic bubble, very pretty to look at superficially, but when tested in the scales of prudence found wanting. Shaping his conclusions from careful thought and inquiry he felt assured that the popular rising, from want of time to perfect and arm their organization, would be of the most diminutively partial character. He saw that any local hostile interference would render their anticipated Revolution a bloody chaos ending in nought but sadness, misery, and despair.

This view, however, did not save him from the angry grasp of Lord Clarendon's Government. The following paragraph appears in the Freeman's Journal of August 2, 1848. The correspondent dates from Kilkenny.

ARREST OF DR. CANE, J.P.

"Shortly after the arrival in this city of the 75th Regt., and two troops of the 8th Hussars, on Monday night, arrangements were made for the arrest of Dr. Cane, and at three o'clock on Tuesday morning, the learned doctor was visited by the County Inspector, and a Dublin detective, who informed him that they had a warrant for his apprehension. Their prisoner at once accompanied them to the county gaol, where he was safely lodged unknown to any of the citizens. The warrant states that the charge is grounded on information of "treasonable practices;" and the arrest was made under the Habeas Corpus suspension Act. No one, with the exception of his lady and children, are permitted to visit him, and all letters to, or from him, are opened, and read by the authorities. I am at a loss to know for what the Doctor has been arrested, for it is notorious that, no later than Saturday last, he exhorted the people not to go to Ballingarry.

"The deepest sympathy is felt for him. Troops continue to pour in up to the time I am writing."

The arrest of Dr. Cane was most despotic and unjust. On the night of the 29th July, 1848, a large crowd of people armed with pikes, pitchforks and other weapons, surrounded Dr. Cane's house and called upon him to come out and head them. The Doctor addressed the poor famine stricken desperados from his balcony, and exhorted them to return peacefully to their homes.

Great excitement prevailed. Blood was spilt at Ballingarry, and on August 3rd the county Inspector accompanied by Mr Winslow, J.P., having received information that Mr. Dillon had been privately conveyed wounded to Dr. Cane's house, accordingly proceeded to the Doctor's mansion in William street, and searched every possible nook and crevice for the bleeding rebel leader. The private information, however, which reached the Government proved groundless.

Dr. Cane often complained that the restrictions of the prison were exceedingly harsh, although the personal demeanour of Mr. Robins, the governor of the gaol, was as courteous as possible under the circumstances. Cane passed a hundred long autumn days drearily within its walls. Permission to see his dying son was haughtily denied him. He craved it anxiously and fervently—he represented to the government that he might be able to avert the disease which was killing his favourite son, if they allowed him to visit the prostrate boy even professionally; but all to no effect—Lord Clarendon was inexorable. The death of young Cane at last melted the heart of the persecutor, and the heart-broken father was liberated on bail by an order in council to perform the sad office of chief mourner at the funeral of his son. As a mark of governmental reprobation, the Lord Chancellor had first superseded Dr. Cane as a magistrate of the county; but at the funeral of his son the people and their municipal representatives resolved, as a beginning, to restore the object of their attachment to the commission of the peace, without the Lord Chancellor's leave—nay, more, to place him over the magisterial bench, by making him, for the second time within three years, mayor of his native city. That resolve they carried out on January 1st, 1849, in a manner that did infinite credit to themselves and the country.

“To-day,” said the Freeman “have, the citizens of Kilkenny added one more proof to the many on record of their sterling patriotism and enduring gratitude to all who suffer for devotion to fatherland.”

The pecuniary loss to himself and his family which the despotic incarceration of Dr. Cane caused was of the most serious character. He had been enjoying an eminently lucrative professional practice; and had hardly a moment's leisure during the day. But as if the whig minister's object was to bring ruin upon himself and family by depriving him of all professional advancement, they caused their underlings to discharge him from one or two medical offices connected with local public institutions, though his ability as a practitioner had been fully recognised, and frequently testified to by the heads of these establishments. This stroke of authority was not less mean than tyrannical; for Dr. Cane had provided for the attendance, during his incarceration at the hospitals with which he was connected, of other skilful physicians.

All this treatment he bore with dignity, and with that fortitude which men of great minds generally display in hours of trial; but to the last moment of his life he never forgot it.

The procession to the tomb was rapidly followed by a procession to the civic throne, and the government fetters gave place to the chain of magisterial office—the highest honor in the power of “faire Kilkenny” to bestow.

It is but justice to mention as indicative of the unanimity that prevailed on this subject that several highly respected citizens, including Michael Hyland, Esq., who had intended to offer themselves as candidates for the high municipal office, at once withdrew their claim, and gave Dr. Cane their cordial support when it was proposed that he should be the new Mayor. The respective friends, of Daniel Smithwick, Esq., and Richard Sullivan, Esq., would have put these gentlemen forward, only Dr. Cane allowed himself to be nominated.

A journal of the day records:—

“ One o'clock was the hour fixed for the inauguration. The street in front presented a most animated appearance, the people having gathered in thousands round the exterior of the Tholsel. The corporation, attired in their robes of office, and headed by the Mayor, Thomas Hart, Esq., J.P., left the Assembly Room in procession, and proceeded to the City Courthouse, a very fine band playing before them. The streets were densely crowded all along the route of the procession, and cheers loud and enthusiastic greeted Dr. Cane as he passed on. Every window, too, had its fair occupants, who waved their handkerchiefs to testify their delight at seeing their noble fellow-citizen once more in triumph. The interior of the courthouse was packed to the very ceiling with a dense mass of human beings; and when Dr. Cane appeared on the bench from which a short time before he had been summarily ejected by the Lord Chancellor, the enthusiasm of those within the building knew no bounds. Cheer succeeded cheer for several minutes, and for a considerable time the Town Clerk was unable to proceed with the reading of the oath required to be taken by chief magistrates of boroughs at their inauguration.”

The oath having been administered, the late Mayor stripped himself of the gold chain, &c., and invested Dr. Cane with the insignia of office amid vociferous applause. He said “ Dr. Cane, allow me to congratulate you on your appointment. Fellow-citizens, I likewise congratulate you on having made such an appointment—on having a second time placed Dr. Cane in a position which he before filled with honor to himself and satisfaction and benefit to his fellow-citizens.”

The Mayor of Kilkenny, Dr. Cane, then rose amidst the most deafening acclamations and said:—

“ Mr. ex-Mayor, brother members of the corporation of Kilkenny, and fellow-citizens, this is not a time, nor will those circumstances that surround me at all permit of my talking to you as I would wish to talk to you, but there are some things which I would be wanting in my duty to you, and wanting in my duty to myself, if I departed from this great assembly without making some remarks upon. Four years ago, on the the 1st of Jannary, as to-day, I stood where I now stand, a proud and an honoured man. Perhaps I do feel to-day proud beyond my deserts; because, believe me, that when I retired from this high position at the close of my former year of office, I never expected to be again placed in the honourable office to which your kindness has once more elevated me. That was my fixed feeling—that I never could anticipate such an honour again. I felt that if such an honour were to be twice enjoyed by any man, he should pause before he would take at the hands of the people the mayoralty a second time in a city like this, where there are so many good men capable of filling the civic chair with usefulness and dignity. But, my friends, within these four years passing events have put me in such a position as entirely to alter my feelings on this subject; and I will not conceal from you that I feel I now occupy a prouder position than any other that could be offered me on earth. I am after coming among you from nearly one hundred days' imprisonment (cheers.) I have returned to you degraded (tremendous shouts of no, no.) Was I not, my friends, degraded by the withdrawal of the commission of the peace? (renewed cries of no, no) Because it was intended to degrade me, perhaps, you have honoured me beyond my deserts, and I value this commission with which you have invested me more than the proudest appointment within the land (enthusiastic and prolonged cheering.) I was about, fellow-citizens, to give you some of the reasons why I accepted this honour at your hands. My imprisonment seemed calculated to deprive me of my professional practice. For nearly four months was I debarred from occupying myself for the benefit of my family. For nearly four months were my family and myself, consuming the bread of idleness, though the highest bail in the county was offered for me (loud cries of shame, shame.) And, my friends, though I had procured competent men to perform the duties of every public situation I held, I was even driven from these situations. I will not say—for it would not be right to begin the new year with unchristian accusation—that it was meant to beggar me by those proceedings; but they looked very like as if they had been adopted for that purpose (hear, hear.) Thus much as regards myself. Now, with regard to the city. I was rejoiced on my return to you to hear the testimony borne by your respected late Mayor to the peaceable state of this city; and to find that the few crimes that have been of late committed in Kilkenny, were chiefly the offences of strangers (hear, hear.) I am proud, my friends, to hear this; and I am perfectly satisfied, if God Almighty permit me, to come before you at the close of my year of office, that I too will be able to pay a similar compliment to the good men of Kilkenny, who have ever stood by me in what was right (hear, hear, and cheers.) Now, for myself. I promise that should days of pestilence and famine come before us, I will, with the aid of my fellow-citizens, leave nothing undone that shall be calculated to alleviate the wants with which the poor may be visited."

Town Councillor Hyland in an intrepid speech administered a "knock over the knuckles" to the Dublin Corporation. "What he asked had the corporation of Kilkenny being doing on that day? Why, it had been setting an example to all the other corporations of this country. The people of Kilkenny had not been crouching (hear, hear). They had not been terrified—they had not been cajoled (cheers)—they had not been put out of their duty (loud cheers). They had not been acting like that wretched paltry insignificant set—the corporation of Dublin (loud groans for the Dublin corporation). He would like to see the man in the Kilkenny corporation that would stand up and introduce a resolution proposing a vote of confidence in his Excellency (loud laughter, and cheers). Were they to be put down in the way some people supposed they were (no, no)? Was the country to be ruled by coercion? Was he to be told that Repeal was extinct (vociferous cries of no, no, and enthusiastic applause). Was he to be told that because coercion acts were passed and the Lord Lieutenant was invested with powers so extraordinary as to astonish even his Excellency himself, if his lordship had made use of the words attributed to him—because a man could be arrested without cause for his arrest being shown, patriotism should cease (no, no)? He had felt and did feel for Dr. Cane's sufferings—he felt for his afflictions (hear, hear). What had been Dr. Cane's crime? He loved Ireland sincerely, and for this he had been put into a prison—enclosed with felons and robbers. He had been deprived of the commission of the peace and of the situations he had held; but he had gained the position he now occupied, and that without the leave of his Excellency, or the old Kilcreene General (cheers and laughter)."

Alderman Smithwick said that "nothing could possibly be more gratifying to his feelings than to see his excellent friend, Alderman Cane, in the high position he now occupied. He was the more gratified that they had such a man as Dr. Cane for their Mayor, because he was sorry to say he looked on their prospects for the present year as anything but cheering; and he knew that the citizens, in case of distress, would have an able chief magistrate in his friend (loud cheers). Dr. Cane would, he knew, do all in his power to alleviate the wants of the people."

Town Councillor Burke having expressed similar congratulations, the corporation, headed by the new Mayor, then returned to the Assembly room in the same order as they had left it, surrounded by thousands who kept up a continued cheer for Dr. Cane.

When the members of the Town Council had taken their seats in their board-room, a very respectable deputation from the trades of Kilkenny presented the Mayor with the following address:—

“WORSHIPFUL SIR—The day that the corporation of our city decided on your appointment to the civic chair for '49, was one which brought unalloyed pleasure to the hearts of the citizens of Kilkenny, and to none more than the trades, and we are confident that never did a public body more truly reflect the popular will than when you were elected to perform again the important duties which but a few years since, you so admirably discharged.

“Sir, the principal consideration which impels us to pay you our respects is gratitude; for time cannot wear from our remembrance the many benefits you have conferred on us. You have for years deprived yourself of ease and enjoyment, snatching time from your laborious professional duties to elevate us in intelligence by your society—society capable of illumining any sphere of life. In you we have admired the practice of charity to all men, kindheartedness, forbearance, and every social virtue; and if the character of the trades of Kilkenny possess one trait of an ennobling kind, it is a faint imitation of some part of your public or private worth.

“Sir, too frequently has it been the lot of the good and great to be misunderstood in their endeavour to serve their fellow-men. Though actuated by the purest motives, they have been subject to the most unjust censure; but you have been most fortunate in always holding the good opinion of all who ever knew you. It could not be otherwise. All can understand your virtuous motives—to do good when possible; and as well may the mists of morning withstand the lustre of the rising day as a calumny on you Sir, bear the test of reason or of truth.

“Sir, we must all deplore the wretched state of this city, occasioned by the want of employment for the working classes. Notwithstanding the plenty and cheapness of food much distress prevails. From our knowledge of your heart we know you grieve also. We know whatever resources lie within the reach of your office shall be applied to ameliorate the condition of the people—that the various benevolent societies of our city, now relieving much distress, shall be the objects of your fostering care; and your fellow-citizens shall happily find that the wants you cannot redress shall share your deepest sympathy.

“Sir, we have only to wish that you may enjoy a long and happy life—that your children, as they grow to manhood, may possess the esteem of the people, which they will obtain by imitating you—that your amiable lady may be blest with health and happiness; and may all contribute to render your life as happy as it has been useful to your fellow-men.”

The Mayor made the following reply :—

“ GENTLEMEN—I receive your warm-hearted address with pride and gratitude.

“ I am proud of your friendship. I am grateful for the generous attachment which it breathes.

“ It is true I have been long a devoted labourer for the amelioration of the trade, and for the progressive education of the class which you represent. But such was my duty, as it is the duty of all ; and I have only to deplore how few have struggled, and how little they have attained for the regeneration of the lost trade of our hapless and fallen country. But we must not despond. God’s justice is great, and upon it we must rely, with the full confidence that if we merit we shall achieve.

“ It is true that calumnies reach everywhere — they are the ready weapons wherewith the envious and the selfish would strike down all who rise between them and their interest. I fear you tell me over-much, if you tell me I have not been an object for such. But, believe me, that while I despised I disregarded them ; conscious that the hour will speedily arrive when truth can be vindicated, and falsehood shall bow abashed before it. Finally, believe me that not merely my sympathy shall be with those who lack employment or want trade, but that my best exertions shall be given wherever means or opportunity present themselves for benefiting the tradesmen of Kilkenny, as well as forwarding everything that can tend to improve the city of our common birth and common love.”

The inauguration banquet took place in Dr. Cane’s mansion, William street, at six o’clock in the evening, when the Mayor entertained the corporation and other of his fellow-citizens in a style of princely hospitality.

When the cloth has been removed, the Mayor rose and proposed “The Queen,” which was drank with all honours. He then called on the company to fill a bumper. He was about to propose a toast that had been ever remembered at social meetings of the corporation of Kilkenny. He had lately been imprisoned ; but that imprisonment had not changed the opinions which he had for forty years entertained—namely, that a Repeal of the Union was absolutely essential for the prosperity of Ireland. Drank with nine times nine.

The next toast was “The People.”

His Worship remarked that the people had ever been regarded in civilized countries as the true source of legitimate power, and he hoped they should ever be so regarded in this country (cheers).

The ex-Mayor again rose, and in complimentary terms proposed the health of Dr. Cane.

The Mayor returned thanks. Early in life he had made a resolve never to deviate from his duty to his country. He knew this resolve was a question between his God and himself : and he thought he could now assert that he had never deviated from that aspiration—from that vow (cheers). Therefore, he hoped he could now promise them that nothing should ever tempt him to deviate from the course which he conceived to be conducive to the good of their common country, and the benefit and improvement of the city of Kilkenny. He did not know whether it would be the will of the Almighty to prolong his life to the ordinary age to which men might expect to arrive ; but, whether his existence were to be long or short, he trusted that his every exertion should be given to the cause of the land of his birth (enthusiastic applause).

Other toasts having been proposed including "the Press," "Mrs. Cane," and "The Burgesses of Kilkenny," various speeches were delivered, all of which expressed the utmost gratification at Dr. Cane's nomination to the Mayoralty. Those who differed strongly with the Doctor in politics were not less energetic than their neighbours.

"Counsellor O'Donnell expressed his delight at the election of Dr. Cane, and stated that though separated from his fellow citizens in political life, he had ever admired the distinguished gentleman who now filled the office of chief magistrate of their city ; and being a private friend of many of the leaders of the party to which Dr. Cane belonged, he could say that the learned doctor was warmly esteemed and respected by those gentlemen. He rejoiced that the corporation of Kilkenny had not disgraced and degraded themselves as other corporations had done (cheers.)"

Dr. Cane's second tenure of office was a great year for Kilkenny. It knit him with, if possible, additional links of fondness to the people. He toiled like a giant for their amelioration, and he saw them grow lusty and rich around him.

He laboured at the council board achieving in an hour the day's work of half a dozen ordinary corporators. Meanwhile private hospitality, or the natural tendencies which drew him fondly to the pursuit of fair science, or luxuriant literature, were not neglected. "Oh," writes one who knew Cane well, "to have seen him within that home where his truest nature shone ; where that warm and generous heart was best displayed ; where the civic chief laid down his sceptre and became the explorer of science or the devotee of literature, where the scholar and the statesman was enrobed in the simplicity and fondness of the parent, or the princely dignity and hospitality of the host !”

It is not saying too much to declare that few men ever possessed such impressive power as he did in his very appearance. His tall—almost towering—well proportioned figure ; his broad expanse of chest ; his portly, kingly bearing, seemed to stamp him as one “born to command.” His massive, lofty brow ; his handsome, manly face, was lit up by an eye which spoke the power of mind and depth of soul within : while his voice, deep toned and musical, could well give forth the passionate eloquence that was so peculiarly his own.

Deprivation of pen, ink, and paper, does not seem to have been, as in the case of Lord Cloncurry, among the bitters which were deemed essential to render the imprisonment of Robert Cane in 1848 irksome. This occupation he was permitted to indulge in, subject to the inquisitorial scrutiny of the proper authorities. Cane applied his mind to literary, rather than political themes ; and in eager pursuit of the former his pen sped briskly. Some of the ablest articles in the Dublin University Magazine during the hundred days’ imprisonment of Robert Cane were emanations from his active brain.

Robert Cane continued the life and policy we have sketched until October, 1853, when he attracted more than ordinary attention by issuing a document which called upon the country to co-operate with him in establishing a semi-political and semi-literary society known as the Celtic Union. This project he unfolded in a letter to Mr. C. G. Duffy, then M.P. for New Ross, who printed it in the Nation of October 22nd, 1853, with the following preface :—

A NATIONAL LITERATURE AND A NATIONAL UNION.

“ I invite attention to the subjoined letter from a man whom neither the engrossing labours, nor the serious interests, of a splendid professional success have been able to seduce from the cause of Ireland. If it attains the purpose he has in view, it will rise to the rank of a State Paper .—

Kilkenny, Oct. 10th, 1853.

MY DEAR DUFFY.—Surely it is time that some effort should be made once more to educate and train our people—to spread useful knowledge amongst them, and to give to the youth of Ireland that intellectual stimulus and discipline which, while it would make them better and more useful men, would make them happier men also.

It is noted by those who mix most with the people, that a desire to acquire information upon all debateable subjects, and a positive taste for reading, are springing up in new quarters and becoming universal. It is a matter of grave national consideration how this appetite is to be gratified. At present it feeds upon a cheap literature, some of which is good—much of which is bad ; while an entire section is utterly detestable. Books catering to the worst human passions—books attacking morals and religion—books misrepresenting the country, its people, and its faith—books cheaply got up, dashingly written, and with but one aim—to be sold : or, where there is a deeper one, it is to demoralise and to denationalise. Such, at present, is the popular literature that circulates in Ireland.

It is time to step between the people and this danger. Patriotism ought to avail itself of the growing taste, and direct it to wise purposes ; it ought to supply it with cheap, wholesome, and national books, and drive out the foul spirit of uncleanness by the pure spirit of nationality. It is a noble duty to train the youth and the young men who are to be one day the nation—to train them with this object kept steadily in view, so that their education, while it made them better men in all the relations of social life should make them better citizens also. It is almost a platitude to say that in proportion as individual man is made truly good and national, in the exact proportion will a nation of such men be happy, prosperous and free.

But who are to attempt this heavy task ? Where is the association or the men from whom we can expect it ?

Cane refers to the proud and exciting days of O'Connell's leadership.

We have no national organization ; and have you reflected that the next few years must determine for this generation, and perhaps for this century, whether there shall be even a national party in Ireland ? In the necessary attempt to secure daily bread to the people we run serious risk of forgetting the larger aims for which we strove before the famine. Then we laboured to make our people fit to contend on equal terms with other nations. Then we taught and fostered a spirit of inquiry into all the resources of Ireland, in order that they might develop and enjoy their national wealth ; then we endeavoured to kindle and strengthen that love of country which is the most powerful stimulus to the spirit of a people, not only in its ambition for glory and independence but even in its industry and enterprise.

But it is not to lament our destitution I have taken up my pen, but to endeavour to repair it. Can men be got to undertake this work so necessary in Ireland at present ? I do believe they can. A few zealous recruits may at least begin it. Greater things have had small beginnings, and fit men are yet plenty in Ireland. No doubt, they are dispersed and scattered, and need to be gathered in. But there are enough, I am convinced, who will enter earnestly on this task.

Dr. Cane paid a graceful tribute to Duffy, and especially to Davis—

“ Whose statue stands so appropriately in the centre of that Industrial Hall in the midst of those results, to which his genius, years before, had pointed as some of the things imperatively needed for Ireland.—He who was ever preaching the development of Irish resources, the awakening of industry, the creation of employment, the arousing of individual energy, and the teaching of self-reliance."

That Exhibition, evidence as it is of one man's persevering industry, full of the triumphs of art, science, and trade, speaks useful lessons to Ireland. Lessons not so much of what she has done, as of that which it shows her she has failed to do. What a lesson in those noble works of art and toil, and skill, which her neighbours have achieved—which the small Celtic State of Belgium, for example, has accomplished, while she has lain in a dreary and desponding lethargy.

Were it possible that the works of science and of handicraft could not stir up an honest emulation within her, surely her national pride should awaken with the memories of the past, called up by the busts, and pictures of her illustrious dead, and the remembrance of the struggles and triumphs in which they lived and moved. The groups of her volunteers, and the sight of her old Parliament House, and Grattan appealing for her liberties, in an Irish Senate, are things to stir her soul, if soul she has.

But I have digressed; I have been appealing, when I ought to have contented myself with a mere statement of the plan I would presume to suggest for an organization suited to the work contemplated.

It should be an organization, whose first duty would be to train and educate; and with this first duty it should content itself until it had grown, if it ever did grow, strong enough for larger things."

Dr. Cane went on to say that it might be called the Celtic Union, and address itself to the Irish race at home and abroad: to consist of members paying an annual subscription of one guinea; and those who would undertake to write and work to be its managing committee—the funds to be mainly applied to the expenses of publishing. And although Cane felt that the latter would, after a while, pay for itself, he recommended, in case of any risk in the first instance, that a guarantee fund should be ready to meet it.

"My idea of the publications is, that they ought to work out the field opened by the "Library of Ireland," and add to it in a more popular, exact, and available way, the class of information supplied in the valuable reports of the Parliamentary Committee of the Repeal Association. The biographies of our great men, for example, following scientific inquiries into the means of becoming a rich and prosperous people; and Essays on Workhouse Industry succeeded by national songs and poems. The publications to include penny papers, sixpenny books, and shilling books—the latter two classes to be illustrated with suitable plans, maps, and drawings, whenever such were needed. Every member should be entitled to copies of all the publications, and they should be on sale for the public generally, at appointed publishers, and in every town and village in Ireland.

One duty of the members would be to secure their universal diffusion.

These papers and books should be of so attractive a nature, so handsome, and yet so cheap, as to be seen in every shop, in every reading room, and upon every stall, and thus their way secured to make them hearthside companions and household words ; things to be sought after at home and abroad ; in the workshop, in the coffee room, and on the rail. The seed thus shown would in the end be gathered into a ripe and yellow harvest.

Whenever the funds of the society permitted of it, public lecturers and teachers to be employed for lecturing, at the society's expense, through all parts of the country, on chosen subjects.

The foregoing arrangements would, of course, be modified or changed by the views of the first meeting of the society, so that I have only ventured to indicate the kind of plan which has suggested itself to my own mind.

In the power of such a society, to do immense good, I have thorough faith. The mere performance of its first duties would tend to hold our people together for useful purposes—to train them for themselves and for the country—and would afford a wholesome and valuable substitute for idleness and intemperance, and for the blasphemous immoralities of Sue and Reynolds, and other secret corruptors of public morals. And when the society grew strong enough to assume its second duty, it would become the guide of sound public opinion, and aid powerfully in the achievement of Ireland's true greatness.

Into your hands I now confide the management of this affair, hoping it will meet your views and win your sanction."

"Dr. Cane's proposal," commented Mr. Duffy, "is not one to be accepted hastily. It is far too serious for that. The end he aims at is too high, the damage and discredit of failure would be too great, to allow of any ill-judged or premature assent. If we undertake this work we must do it at all hazards; and I am not prepared to promise my share of it until I have seen the recruits upon whom my friend reckons, and measured their strength and skill for the work. My experience of public affairs in this country all tends to this—that however many are pledged to an undertaking, it ultimately falls upon a few; and if you do not make sure of a certain number of capable and willing workers in the first instance, it falls upon one man or two and stifles them. There is no want of fit men, assuredly, and I believe no insurmountable difficulty in gathering them together; but we must take nothing for granted in a project like this. For myself I answer, that if Dr. Cane's hopes be well-founded, if workmen be forthcoming for the task he proposes, I am ready to take my full share in the labour and responsibility."

Gavan Duffy considered that Dr. Cane's scheme would tend to promote national pride and self-reliance, and he thought well of it for that reason. "The motive power," he often said, "the steam of all great enterprises, has been national pride. The English scattered the Armada, the French drove back allied Europe from her frontiers, America stretches her sheltering arm from the shores of Turkey to the coast of Australia, in the name and by the inspiration of national pride. You unman the people from whom you take it away. They are fit for nothing but the lowest offices of civilization."

Duffy was of opinion that three classes of members were wanting.

1. Members who could write the necessary books and papers in an adequate manner; or who, from their practical experience in business, or scientific knowledge of Irish resources, or their familiarity with the enterprise of other countries, could propose and explain new developments of industry. Of this last class America and Australia would, he hoped, send us useful auxiliaries.

2. Men who were willing to make a moderate outlay of money in trying any safe and well devised experiment in Irish industry on their own locality or elsewhere.

3. Young men who were ready to become the local executives, the active eyes and hands of the Union. Who would appoint its agents in their district, inspect its industrial schools or societies (when it has got them) and rejoice in spending their leisure and their sweat in the good cause. "But let the working members be men who mind their own business—no good comes of idlers or walking gentlemen; while an occasional hour from the energetic self-reliant man will leave sure results behind."

Among the recruits most indispensable is a man fit to be Honorary Secretary. He ought to have leisure, and capacity, and a passion for Ireland. He ought to be able and willing to superintend the publications, and stand like a sentinel over them, to exclude rigidly all nonsense and stupidity. He must hold in his hand the threads of many correspondences, and keep men who can seldom meet en rapport with each other. Where is this Minister of Public Instruction to be found?" * *

Gavan Duffy concluded a well digested article with these words:—

"Whoever is willing to help the work in any department ought to speak now. Our enemies affirm that the dazzling and the unreal alone fire our imagination, and that we kick impatiently in the harness of practical work. There are some men, I hope, ready to belie this imputation. Or, at least, who know nothing grander and more dazzling than work that will raise their country. If so, it is perfectly practicable to see on one hand the mass of the people, by degrees, engaged in industrial pursuits, the profits of which will go into their own pockets; and on the other, the youth of Ireland gradually reared in love and knowledge of their country—as the English boy is fed on the memories of Alfred and Elizabeth, and the French student becomes as familiar with the heroes of his national history on the walls of Versailles and in the public gardens and edifices of Paris, as with the faces round his father's hearth.

A Celtic Union that deserved the name would not stop in this Island. It would be welcomed by our kinsmen in England and America, and in the predestined empire of Australia; and some day perhaps, by the men of our blood, who have won or inherited power in the courts of Europe. But we must begin humbly and at the beginning. Whether we are to begin at all, indeed, depends upon the response Dr. Cane's generous appeal meets from the country."

The following number of the Nation announced the receipt of a considerable number of letters on Dr. Cane's proposal, containing suggestions for the practical management of it, and generous offers of aid. The recruits consisted of writers, monied men, and workers, and formed a good week's instalment towards the preliminary work. "The extent of our success," wrote Duffy, "will be exactly in proportion to the amount of mind that goes into the project."

One correspondent in the course of a long letter of suggestions went on to say:—

"I take it for granted that the working man is the special object of your solicitude—the mark at which you aim. Take good care then, that you do not shoot over his head. There are three ways by which you may shoot over his head—by writing above his present educational stature; by not hitting his interest in the selection of subjects; and by aiming at a pocket bigger than he has. It is not necessary that these three 'Irish bulls' stand together between the man and the mark, in order to miss it; any one of them will turn your literary quiver into a right angle, or rather a wrong one.

"Thus would I take up each subject in the order of requirement, and, as there is a feverish desire throughout the provinces for declamation, I would act promptly on Dr. Cane's suggestions of lectures and draw attention to the written by the oral. If Father Mathew spared his tongue and feet by substituting the pen and the press, would he be, in one year, would he be, even now, the Apostle of Temperance?"

A remarkably sagacious and experienced man put the whole project on so solid and business-like a basis that we cannot do better than quote him on this point:—

"There is one eminently practical suggestion in Dr. Cane's letter—that of the Guarantee Fund. It will make your success much more certain, without increasing your outlay by a penny. But let it be a fund, not a paper security. Let the money be lodged in bank before you take a single step. If you are content with "promises to pay," the publisher will consider them of no great value from the trouble and difficulty of collecting them; or if some of the founders of the Union, such as Dr Cane and yourself, become personally liable to him on the strength of them, you will find it an awkward task to get recompensed for any losses. I would rather have £100 in bank than the best possible guarantee for £200. And if £200. or any sum actually necessary, can not be got, then the country is not ripe for the proposal."

Another correspondent wrote:—

"The only difficulty is, who shall write the books? They will be bought and sold again and again, if they are only worthy of the character of the project. On this score, however, I am delighted that we are not tied down to weekly or monthly appearances; and if, before this day twelve months, the Celtic Union has published three or four volumes, as good as the best of the 'Library of Ireland,' with a dozen of Tracts and Lectures, well written on well chosen subjects, I should say it had done well, and that it would be sure to do better.

"I think that we ought to have, within that time, a volume on Irish agriculture—about which the people are in a megrim since the revolutionary action of the famine and the corn laws. Twenty years hence I feel confident that the farming race of Ireland will be as different from what it was before the famine as a meadow is from a bog.

"An Irish Farmer's Manual well done, as familiar as Cobbett's 'Cottage Economy,' for example, would be a godsend to the country believe me. You ought to publish an edition of Mangan in good time. But I think, to begin, that we should have an Almanack ready for the new year—the Almanack of the Celtic Union; with the dates of Irish births, battles, and events generally—bordered with national maxims and mottoes, and the thoughts of Irish Thinkers, and illustrated with perhaps half a dozen good woodcut likenesses."

A young journalist from a thriving provincial town, debated the necessity and feasibility of making fiction the chief feature in the proposed papers.

"I am convinced," he says, "that to make the project fully successful it will be necessary to unite fiction with fact. The general public seek only after what is called light reading, and cannot bring themselves to study history or science. For the one who reads the latter a hundred peruse the former. Therefore it is that this light reading from its vast circulation and influence, has the greatest power in forming the minds of a generation, and consequently presents an excellent medium for reforming or creating a public taste and spirit. Historical tales, laid in the most inspiring periods, and stories in which opinions and facts might be interwoven, would, in my opinion, do more to advance the good cause than pamphlets upon separate subjects could ever effect. In the first place, they would be certain of being read; and, in the second, the instructive portions would, from their connexion with the interest of the tales, be vividly impressed upon the memory. What has contributed more to the demoralisation of Paris or of London than its light literature? The most frightful immoralities are dressed up and disguised in so dazzling a garb, that nothing else is read by the people. The inference is evident."

A very different caste of man wrote :—

"It was with real and heartfelt pleasure that I read in THE NATION of last Saturday a letter from Dr. Cane. I beg to know if a mechanic, with no other recommendation than a heartfelt wish for the success of such an Union as the one suggested, would be eligible as a member? The want of such a 'Union' has been long felt. There has been created in this country, by the importation from England and France of that abominable and atheistical commodity called cheap literature, an insatiable thirst for reading, which if not gratified, through the medium of some such means as those suggested, will be the means eventually of destroying the goodness for which our people have been so justly celebrated."

An Englishman said :—

"The Celtic Union should, amongst its first duties, have a lecture delivered in each of the principal towns of England, the object of which should be to enlist the sympathies of the young men, out of whom a local committee should be formed to act in co-operation with the Union. I think reading rooms ought to be established for the support of which a small weekly donation of one or two pence per week should be paid by each member. In these rooms a lecture should be delivered once a week on some national subject, such as eras of our history, the lives of our great men, the natural products and material resources of the country, and perhaps a lecture on the duties of manhood would not be amiss. All these subjects should be handled, at least, not alone in their general aspects, but with a special reference to their connection with Ireland and her future."

The country seemed interested in an unusual degree, and adherents thronged forward through the medium of suggestive letters. A gentleman who had labored to organize past work, literary and political, sent some shrewd advice.

"To work the project successfully there are three primary wants—first, a publisher who would look after the business; secondly, a committee who would direct the taste, and supply the mind to the matter; and thirdly, a capital which would act as a sort of insurance or indemnity to the publisher. As for a publisher, no doubt Mr.

McGlashan or Mr. James Duffy would meet the necessity. As for the capital, five hundred pounds would be wanting in fifty ten pound shares. The shares to be paid as subscriptions, and all liability utterly avoided. The best price for the volumes would be sixpence, in order to undersell the shilling novels, and to give a stamp of variety to the publications. The Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge worked in this way. Charles Knight was the publisher; Lord Brougham and a few others were the mind of the movement; and Lord Denman and others, not forgetting the politics of their youth (a custom rather proverbial among successful men in Ireland) supplied the guarantee fund, some of them giving £500. Years ago they succeeded; while Mr. Bentley's last proclamation of a design to reduce to one-third the price of original books, shows that the progress of cheap literature in England is still onward, and it will be so until it meets the level of French and Belgian production."

A popular contributor to our periodical literature said:—

"I read with sincere pleasure Doctor Cane's proposal and your comments. It is a return to first principles, and resolves itself (if I am right) into a printing press, fed by sound heads and pure hearts, and worked by honest hands. In this I most fully concur. My subscription is ready, and whenever you fix the amount it shall be remitted. The Library of Ireland was left a great but unfinished project—a noble temple of scattered and incomplete columns now to be completed."

An Ulster friend, who has no broken faith to answer for, sent a long letter full of practical suggestions. His description of how the Scotch booksellers have contrived to create a market in Ulster is good:—

"An association, such as your friend proposes, lies under a difficulty from diversity and degrees of opinion to which the single Thinker is not open; he can correct, he can expunge, he can destroy. Now, who will do this for a Union?—who has time to do it? If a man had leisure and capacity, and devotedness to undertake this work, he would be the best "Union"—or two or three, if they had leisure; but such leisure implies fortune. They might do it if they had agreed on principles generally acceptable to the country, and acknowledged themselves obedient to the reasonable control of a dictator—your 'Minister of Public Instruction.'

"It is very painful, and I have felt it repeatedly, to find Germany, Scotland, England, America, and France, represented by originals or translations on every bookshelf and bookstall in this province, and scarcely one book written or printed in Ireland. Is it that the Irish publisher is not of the same genius as the Scotch Black and Chambers, or Routledge and Bohn of London? One day's journey in any part of Ulster would convince you that the Scotch publisher must succeed with the masses. His humble travelling agents radiate in every district. Under rain, snow, or summer heat, they march on, on—men of quiet age, decently dressed, civil, intelligent, soberly.

Nothing turns them aside from their appointed course. Question one of them, and he will tell you he circulates the excellent publications of Mr. Blackie or Mr. Fullarton of Glasgow. He has books for age and youth, for scientific men and humble artisans; poetry, travels, history, romance. He will talk to you for five minutes about his edition of Burns—our great poet, sir—and the land of Burns, and Tanahill, and Professor Wilson, and Scott, and Hogg. Why are our Moore, Drennan, Mangan, Griffin, Carleton, Banim, kept in the drawing-room, and denied the homage of a people's heart? Certainly, they own a wider sphere than they have yet found—the good sense and virtue to grace a cottage, sit by the bench and the loom, or by the poor seamstresses fireside. Your Irish publishers forbid it; they will not send persons like the Scotch salesman to introduce them to the homely farms of the country, or suffer them to go in any coarser dress than gilding and fine linen. Did not the 'Penny Magazine' and 'Dublin Penny Journal' go like wildfire? And why were not the volumes of the 'National Library' ten times more read? Because they had no such introduction as Mr. Blackie would have given them—no one to carry them to the villages and solitary farmhouses, and to tell even the roadside querist 'they are all about Ireland.' Mr. Fullarton would have made them be bought, read, and treasured, and talked about in every townland in Ulster before a month. The Scotch publisher meets difficulties—does not make them. Go to the country circulating library, and you will find the same want of everything about a nation which should be the first in her people's thoughts. A volume of Banim, a copy of Moore's poems, you may find, indeed, but not one syllable about our living celebrities. I have the catalogues of ten of these Societies before me, some of which I have advised in the formation; and unless by taking an active part in their control and management, for which I have neither leisure nor inclination, I could not effect the introduction of Irish books; being always met with complaints of the cost and difficulty of procuring them, and with the suspicion that their Nationality was assumed, as a cover for the introduction of sectarian opinions."

There is a sound and wise thought in this suggestion :—

"There is a class that no one has a kind word for—to whom one part of the project will be of incalculable advantage—the idle young men of the towns. My belief is, that not twenty in five hundred of them are wilfully idle. They are the victims of false pride, neglected education, careless parents, or proud, heartless, improvident relations. Would they not, being every day at wits' end to discover some means of escape from frost-bitten benevolence, hail the information and practical suggestions of the 'Union' with exultation, as a means of guiding them to the sweet bread of industry."

An interesting letter from the O'Donoghue of the Glens, now M.P. for Tipperary, also furnished some acceptable suggestive matter, as well as a substantial proof of the sincerity of his sympathy. The same remark applies to an able communication from the Rev. Mr. Gillouly, Professor of the Belles Lettres at the Collège d'Argentan in France.

Amongst the letters which passed between Dr. Cane and Mr. Duffy, M.P., at this period was the following :—

"MY DEAR DUFFY—I have carefully considered your wise and able commentary, and feel satisfied that your suggestions, for a lesser subscription than one guinea, and for smaller guarantees, are right. I therefore concur in recommending a 10s. subscription, and a guarantee from such as please to volunteer it, of five to twenty-five pounds. But, after all, these matters must be settled at the first meeting of the 'Union,' which I anticipate is not far distant.

I was of opinion we should assemble and organise as soon as we had a hundred adhesions ; already over half that number have pressed forward to aid us in the work, and within a few brief weeks, I trust to see the 'Celtic Union' fully embodied as a working staff.

I quite agree with you, it is not necessary to publish names as yet, or until the first meeting is over, and the title and rules of the Society adopted. Yet, looking at the names you have already received, and those which I now send you, I feel that we can no longer call it a 'forlorn hope.' It is an advance column, and when you look at the station, intellect, and moral and reputed worth and character of the men who approve of the move, they constitute a column of officers, and of working and able ones too.

The name has been objected to by some. I am for the present one ; but it will be a fair matter for discussion when the first meeting takes place.

Yours truly,

ROBERT CANE."

In another letter Dr. Cane observed :—

"Our first meeting ought to consist solely of those who, up to the date of holding, had sent in their adhesions. I would suggest that this meeting be held on Monday, the 21st inst., at the hour of one o'clock, so as to admit of such country members as might wish to attend it returning home by the evening trains.

"The first business of the meeting, having chosen a Chairman and Secretary for the day, ought to be to adopt resolutions declaratory of general principles, and then to resolve itself into a committee of organisation ; to sit from time to time to enrol members, collect necessary information ; to prepare a series of suggestions as to future work, and to call together a meeting of the Union so soon as the number of members amounted to FOUR HUNDRED, with a Guarantee Fund of £200, and an annual income of two hundred pounds. The "Union" will then be strong enough to commence its first work, and then—but not until then—it might elect its permanent secretary.

"Now, I do hold a very positive opinion on the nature of the duties of this office, and how it should be filled.

"It should not be an honorary office. The secretary should be a paid officer, and resident in Dublin. I quite concur with you in the great importance attachable to this office being well filled. A vast deal of our progress and success will depend upon him. He should be an able man, but one who would act under a local chairman and committee. He would have a large amount of labour arising out of correspondence and literary work. He should be a man capable of advising and suggesting upon these and all matters of working detail; but his actions should not be independent of the committee. There are two things he should be—an educated gentleman and a nationalist.

"We should be in no haste to choose this officer; first, because until we knew our strength in money, we could not fix his salary; secondly, because a couple of months will show us a larger field to choose from.

"Until the Union be fully installed, it would be better to have merely an honorary secretary of committee, allowing him the assistance of clerk, if needed. For similar reasons, it may not be necessary at first to take regular and permanent rooms for meeting.

"Since I last wrote I have received some valuable adhesions, with letters of useful hints and suggestions, which I will give in the next NATION.

"One of these adhesions is the able and honest editor of a well-known Liberal newspaper. The second is from a young and gifted poet and nationalist. The third is from a highly respected parish priest of Ossory. The fourth, a worthy curate of the same diocese. A fifth, is an active and talented town councillor, of a Munster town. And the sixth, from one whose deep love of Ireland has already cost him dearly. Each of them is an able man and fit to rally his own circle around him."

But perhaps the most judicious and clear-sighted piece of criticism in reference to the Celtic Union, and its prospects, was that expressed by the Kilkenny Journal.—

"THE NATION of Saturday has told us that ours was the only voice of objection raised against Dr. Cane's proposition. But therein our contemporary fell into a slight mistake. We conjured up no objections whatever—we simply recommended caution. And we do believe there is no man living who can appreciate the necessity of caution in public enterprises attempted in Ireland, better than Mr. Duffy himself. He knows that as a race we are only too ready to jump at conclusions, and that our performance is often miserably short of our programme. And it is solely because we possess a keen sensibility of this national failing, we did not at once become enthusiastic when last writing on this subject. We then saw lying in the way difficulties grave and many. We see them still; but we must acknowledge they have lost some of their sterner features. Yet, as genuine Celts, it would be quite natural for us to overlook these when ardently tending to a certain goal; and not observe a single obstacle until we blindly stumbled upon them, and fell prostrate amidst universal derision.

"There has been far too much of this; and, if common sense remain amongst us, there ought to be no more. We have been taught wisdom in what is commonly considered a good school—that of adversity.

"To give a new impetus and direction to Irish intellect—to strike once more the Horeb of the Celtic mind, and bid the waters gush forth in an abundant and refreshing stream—to unloose the icy bonds which defeat and disgust had flung around the founts of song, and bid them lavish again their boundless treasures of genius and imagination, this were truly an undertaking worthy of the loftiest ambition. But its merit must be measured by its success; and we know nothing of the characters of either Charles Gavan Duffy or Dr. Cane, if they be not content to have it decided by that test. Feeling thus, we have purposely leaned rather to the side of discouragement than of buoyant expectation; for we are well aware that in every project of this kind, for the one who will assume the disagreeable office of counselling caution and circumspection, there will be ten found to express the most unqualified approval. And experience has proved that the ten are not always the truer or safer guides."

Kilkenny, Nov. 16, 1853.

"MY DEAR DUFFY.— Your assent that we should meet on Monday next, for the formation of a 'committee of organization' for the 'Celtic Union,' expedites our progress, and will facilitate the enrolment of the number of members deemed necessary for a working commencement.

"As we are now upon the eve of meeting, it will be useful to enter somewhat into the detail of the work before us, and to make some attempt at an exposition of the duties entailed upon ourselves and upon those who undertake to be our fellow-labourers, and whose toil will thenceforward have commenced.

When that meeting assembles, if the opinion it expresses coincides with that already laid down, it will eventuate in a 'committee.' Upon that committee will then devolve the duties which for the past month were yours largely and mine partially. And if it enters upon those duties, as I feel confident it will, a brief period will enable it to announce its work completed, the requisite sums of money paid in, and the required number of members duly enrolled. With what heartfelt pleasure we shall hear that announcement. We shall hasten to meet again, to thank the committee for its able and efficient work, and thenceforth to start as 'The Celtic Union,' fully formed, well developed, and ready for the engagements made in its behalf.

"If the course now about to be acted upon on Monday next—and which is the one advised by many of our friends—be the one approved of and adopted, the first step taken by the meeting ought to be a resolution declaratory of the mental, social and political condition of the country, and the consequent necessity for such a Union.

"Then, a resolution, that we approve of the formation of such a union, and that we constitute ourselves into a committee for the purpose of organizing it.

"Next, that a chairman and honorary secretary of the committee be then chosen.

"That the annual subscription be 10s. for each member.

"That, in addition to annual subscriptions, it is considered necessary to commence with a fund, independent of subscriptions, to be called a Guarantee Fund, and which shall not be less than £200.

"Thus far as regards money and men. I know your eyes are anxiously watching for the heads that will think, and the hands that can wield pens, to write and work for the country. Some of those men are already around you. Even your limited knowledge shows me a goodly number of them, whose capacity I know and whose labours I build upon as material, which is already ours. But were it even otherwise—if we had not six men of capacity amongst us now—I would feel the fullest confidence that when our muster of 400 is complete, it will as surely furnish us with the necessary number of heads, as an enlistment of 400 men in France would have furnished its own officers in the days of the first Napoleon.

"It might be well if, out of the committee of organization, a sub-committee was formed who would have, as their sole duty, the arrangement of all suggestions thrown out in correspondences, or newspapers, or elsewhere, or made by the committee themselves, as to the works to be undertaken by the society, the order in which they should be undertaken, the prices at which they should be issued, the men who volunteered to write or who should be asked to write to them. These should be all carefully noted in a suitable book, together with all such hints and advices, or offers as to publication, terms, and costs thereof as come within the committee's reach. Such a book would form a valuable aid to the committee of the Union hereafter, and preserve for adoption all that is really good in the letters now pouring in upon us.

"There are two immediate duties before the committee of organization—to prepare a suitable member's card, and to get up a report or address upon the nature and objects of the Union, its organization, rules, and plans, and to have these distributed into all parts of the country—a kind of prospectus, to place in the hands of our friends in every town in Ireland, and to send into England, and Scotland, and across the Atlantic, in fine, wherever the committee considers it advisable to use them as instruments for the propagandism of our Nationality.

"Since I last communicated with you I have received several letters of advice, and some conveying valuable adhesions. One comes from the borders of our beautiful lakes, from a high-minded Nationalist, who still loves and hopes for the country which has long regarded him as a true patriot. Another from the same quarter, written by a member of the legal profession, who has been ever prominent in the cause of Ireland. A third comes from the City of the Violated Treaty, and bears the name of one well known to the country as the fearless advocate of truth and liberty. A fourth comes from the far North, and gives to us a member of the medical profession, whose National writing and lectures have made him long a public man. And a fifth from a young professional man, who, travelling much through the country, and loving it well, sees and appreciates the want we undertake to supply. Upon Monday these names will all be made public. Until then farewell.

Yours faithfully,

ROBERT CANE."

The members of the Celtic Union had a preliminary meeting on Monday, Nov. 21. It was well attended by the class who constitute the strength of a party, or an organization—young, cultivated, uncorrupted men. Several letters of adhesion were received from Nationalists of high social and personal distinction in the country—from members of parliament, clergymen, doctors, engineers, country gentlemen, journalists, civic authorities, merchants, traders, and artizans. The members on the books up to that day amounted to one hundred, and the subscriptions and donations to the Guarantee Fund, actually paid, to the sum of £75. As no canvassing of any kind had been employed, beyond the publication of the plan and of comments on it, this was regarded as a decided success. It encouraged the meeting to form a committee of organization, with instructions to issue a prospectus and appeal to the country for their final verdict on the proposal. The understanding seemed to be, that if four hundred members were enrolled and the Guarantee Fund filled up to the amount of £200 by the first of January, the Union might then be formally inaugurated and commence operations. But that, short of this substantial support, it should attempt nothing.

Charles Gavan Duffy occupied the chair, and made a sensible speech, in which he regretted that the supply of literary laborers ready for work was not in proportion to the extent of the ordinary adherents. He declared that his own labours, as a Member of the Legislature, and as Editor of the Nation, were too onerous to admit of his aiding the good work as he should wish. But he promised nevertheless to do something substantial. Mr. Duffy also expressed himself to the following effect.

“The nature of the publications would necessarily depend more or less on the system. If the Union operated chiefly through existing publishers, it might hope in time to have many classes of books, from a Primer to a Cyclopaedia, and embracing the magic circle of fiction and poetry, written in a national spirit, by creating and ensuring a market for them. If it published for itself exclusively, or as far as it does so, its books ought, if possible, to be worthy of the preliminary trouble which has heralded their birth. Some correspondents seem to ambition the creation of a petty literature such as abounds across the channel in *Family Herald*s and Home Circles. This is honest work for somebody to do, but it is by no means the task set before the Celtic Union. I conceive our duty is to secure good books by the most capable men of our race, each with a soul and purpose in it—each worth reading many times and publishing in many editions—each tending to some practical purpose, or planting some fruitful opinion, or, at lowest, raising up from the dust and ashes of an ignominious obscurity some man who has served Ireland. A few volumes of this kind is as many as any single year will produce ; but each of them might mark an epoch in opinion. They will not grow rapidly. In the three and twenty volumes of the 'Library of Ireland,' published in two years, there is a good deal of trash ; but there are half a dozen books which circulated more widely than any published in Ireland since the Union, and which have influenced the writings and speaking of all who write and speak in this island, more than any one not accustomed to note such phenomena could believe. It is books of this calibre, and higher when attainable, which we want.

Of 'Papers for the People' we may hope, perhaps, to have a dozen or two in the year ; each of them also aimed at a definite purpose. There is nothing necessarily incompatible with interest and amusement in this idea of a practical aim : MACAULAY made history as pleasant as a romance, and 'more popular at the Circulating Library than the last new novel ;' DICKENS has written about the driest subjects—about public markets, record offices, statistical tables and new inventions, and projects, for example, in a manner to compete successfully with his own fiction. But there is a higher and more generous interest to be awakened in the breast of man by bringing him face to face with the martyrs and conquerors of his race, and by projecting his imagination into its future, than any with which even genius can invest lower topics. If we can present the people with true pictures of the past of Ireland, and reliable guides to a better hereafter, we will not speak to an indifferent audience. It is my clear conviction, therefore that we must have no serials binding us to publish whether we are ready or not, and that our ambition ought to be, not so much to have many publications as to make them such that each will be memorable in Ireland."

Charles Gavan Duffy having vacated the chair William J. Fitzpatrick was called thereto on the motion of Dr. Cane.

In the Nation of the following week we find Mr. Duffy expressing, if possible more intelligibly and unmistakeably, the apprehensions which had begun to fill him in regard to the supply of men qualified to wield pens in the good work.

"On the supposition that the Union is to do everything for itself," he wrote, "and by itself, the supply is seriously deficient. There are not many men of the National Party trained writers or intellectual workers, and of that number some could not from their other engagements, and some would not from moral cowardice, enlist publicly in the ranks of the Union. Various correspondents have expressed an enthusiastic conviction that a host of writers would fly to our aid ; but I am dealing here, not with rhetoric, but with a matter of fact, in which I .

have some experience, and I affirm that the supply would be deficient. On the other hand, I believe it will be abundant, if we are content to suggest, to aid, and to facilitate whatever work we can get done indirectly; to turn to account whatever is well done already; and to attempt, on our own behalf, only what is not available in either of these ways."

Immediately after the meeting of the 21st November, Dr. Cane returned to Kilkenny, from whence he addressed on the following day, the following letter to Mr. John Cashel Hoey, now, of course, for the first time published.

" Kilkenny, November 22nd, 1853.

" MY DEAR MR. HOEY

" I send you annexed to this note, a bank order for eleven pounds, being my ten pounds to the guarantee fund, and ten shillings, my years subscription; the other ten shillings is the subscription of Rev. Patrick Power of Carrick-on-Suir.

" As Duffy proposes to lodge the money in bank in our joint names, I think the lodgments should be in a different form for each fund. Thus subscriptions will be lodged as a current account, and the guarantee monies as a lodgement to receive interest.

" I had to leave in such a hurry on yesterday, that I had not time to talk over with you all, some matters we ought to have spoken upon. Duffy is opposed to publishing names yet awhile, and I have such confidence in his sound judgment, I defer my opinion to his, though not fully satisfied in the reasons given. However, perhaps it might be well in your notice of the business to say that 90, or perhaps it may be, by Thursday, 100 names were enrolled—that amongst them were 2 Members of Parliament, 7 Priests, 6 Physicians, 2 Lawyers, 5 Solicitors, 8 Editors, 7 Merchants, as the numbers may really be.

" Would it not also be well to state the amount of money, and how much to guarantee fund and how much subscriptions were actually paid in?

" You and he ought also to arrange the secretaries names, which positively ought to be made public at once, and I take it, that a competent assistant secretary should be at once employed to make out books, accounts, &c., and to arrange correspondence.

" I have had a vision continually before me since my return of that able and earnest looking Kingstown democrat, who hits the bull's eye at 30 yards and thinks all men alike, because the rats eat a dead aristocrat's hip-bone as readily as a democrat's. Verily, we are a strange people, and still more strange as a reasoning people.

" Yours ever truly,

" ROBERT CANE.

" When you have the assistant secretary, get him to send me a list of the paid monies and the members' names."

On November 24, Dr. Cane writes to Mr. Hoey, in reply to a request that he would send the committee a draft of a Prospectus for general distribution:—

"MY DEAR MR. HOBY—I will of course obey the committee; but had hopes that Duffy's able pen would have done it. However, I know his time is terribly pressed upon.

"To do the prospectus it will be necessary to have the resolutions of Monday, of which I have no copy, also to have the list of members now enrolled; and the amount of money now paid in. The assistant secretary ought to be at once engaged. Will you direct copies of these matters to be sent to me next post, and release yourself from further work by getting the assistant secretary appointed. I will concur in whatever arrangement Duffy and you make, and I am sure so will the committee.

"I send you a post office order for £1, being the subscription of the Editor of the Kilkenny Journal, and John Carroll, Esq.

"I rejoice the almanack is decided on.

"Yours ever truly,

"ROBERT CANE."

The dearth of competent literary workmen continued to throw an occasional chill upon the ardour of Mr. Duffy's hopes in the success of the Celtic Union. "Where," he frequently observed, "shall we get men qualified to succeed those who planned and executed, with such consummate ability, the Library of Ireland?" We find among the unpublished papers of the Celtic Union, the following letter of suggestion, addressed by William John Fitzpatrick to Gavan Duffy, in reply to the observation of the latter.

"Benhedar, Monkstown,

November 24th, 1853.

Will you permit me to address a few observations to you in reference to the modus operandi of the proposed Celtic Union?

I conceive that one of our greatest difficulties at present is to enlist the services of experienced literary men whose duty it will be to write the books for the Celtic Union. Those men, I take it, will hardly be philanthropic enough to compile the books referred to without handsome pecuniary recompense. The Society is not by any means rich enough to pay—in the liberal manner that it ought—either authors for their labour or publishers for their trouble. We therefore should go to work as economically as possible, but at the same time in earnest and with the full consciousness of the importance of our mission.

I need not remind you of the high position which "Duffy's Library for Ireland," has held in the literary world, for the last eight years. Where would we get a set of books more pregnant of nationality, more soul-stirring in their appeals, more vivid in their delineations of alien misrule, or more eloquent in inculcating principles of self-reliance and self-respect? I fear it would be long ere the books published by the Celtic Union could think of competing with Duffy's Library for Ireland.

I would therefore venture to propose that the Celtic Unionists do purchase from Mr. James Duffy, the copyright and stereotype plates of that national and invaluable series of books, and then republish them at a moderate but remunerative price. It may be argued by some members of your committee that the Irish people are tired of the Library of Ireland—that they have the volumes off by heart already: but I can assure those gentlemen that so far from the multitude being familiar with them, they are, with comparatively few exceptions utterly unconconscious of their existence. The Library for Ireland never yet got into the hands of the people—it was published at too high a price for them, and the consequence was that the books instead of enlightening the poor people merely circulated in the drawingrooms and around the firesides of the rich.

Most of the men who wrote those books are either snatched away by death, or exiled from the dear old land of their birth. The contributors to the Library for Ireland have been scattered and disorganized, and in all probability, will never again fall back into their old and strong position. The flame of nationality is dying out, and we should lose no time in throwing fuel on the rapidly expiring embers. To search for authors to compose the books—to stipulate with them upon their terms—to cogitate over the subjects which ought to be selected to write upon, &c., would occupy entirely too much time. We ought earnestly to begin at once or not at all, and it appears to me that a very considerable delay, harassing of patience, and waste of money, would result from the publication of new and original works as proposed by the members of the Celtic Union. In the Library for Ireland we have the matter as it were, 'cut and dry' for us: and I think the sooner the copyright is purchased, and those admirable compositions republished for the million, the better it will be for Ireland and the Irish. Let each volume of the re-issue contain a new preface, racy of the soil—let the uniform price be only fourpence—and let the title and seal of the society be branded on the covers in order that its name may become a familiar 'Household Word' through the length and breadth of the land. Let agents who sympathise with the project and who will throw themselves heart and soul into it be appointed throughout every town in Ireland—let a staff of hawkers be retained whose duty it will be to diffuse the books through the quiet country parts—far away from towns and cities; and if those sub-agents of the Union only exert themselves half as energetically as the Bible readers do in their distribution of tracts our good work must prosper—and a signal success be as certain as the sun.

The books, ought, of course, to have a cover with a new national and historical design by some competent Irish artist, so that the popular eye may not only be attracted but educated.

I may observe in conclusion that new notes and appendices may of course be introduced with propriety. • • • • •

While the re-issue is appearing, new and more fascinating works may be in preparation. But certainly half the secret is to begin at once before the warm ardour of the country cools, or the present active spirit of sympathy weakens, from vexatious and disheartening delays.

We should begin economically though, and with caution. On that depends in a great measure our success. I have suggested an economical expedient, and trusting it may meet with your approbation, I remain, &c.

The President of the Celtic Union wrote to Mr. Fitzpatrick on the following day as follows :—

“ MY DEAR SIR—The contents of your letter to Mr. Duffy deserves serious consideration, and its suggestions must be preserved, with all the others, for the consideration of a future committee who will be organized so soon as the Celtic Union is properly in existence.

I am delighted to see the interest you take in the work before us, and wish we had a few more earnest men of the same stamp.

In reply to your remark I hope the committee will be able to issue the Prospectus by next week.

Yours faithfully,

ROBERT CANE.”

The want of a prospectus was greatly felt. Dr. Cane at length drew up one, and forwarded it to Mr. C. G. Duffy for his approval. Mr. Duffy, however, considering that it was too diffuse, and verbose, cancelled the manuscript, and wrote one de novo to the following effect.

“ For years the voice of Nationality has been dumb in Ireland. In the interval a poisonous foreign literature has circulated widely among our People, and a sordid utilitarianism, which offers itself as a rival and substitute for our national rights, has grown in pretension and influence. At length it is boasted that the native spirit of Ireland is dead.

It is time to face these dangers. A few men who desire to keep alive the flame of nationality ; who think the corrupting influence of immoral books will be best resisted by a literature which concerns itself with the struggles and triumphs of our race ; who know that the resources of a nation, which we still possess, can only be developed under the impulse of that national spirit which has ever been the stimulant and the safeguard of States, propose to found a Celtic Union.

They propose that by means of this Union the Nationalists of Ireland, without distinction of creed or class, shall renew their relations with each other ; that they shall employ their influence and example to give a national direction to the intellectual and industrial work done in the country ; that they shall publish and encourage the publication of books and tracts, dealing with historical, social, and industrial subjects, calculated to keep up the spirit, to stimulate the enterprise, and to inform the minds of our people.

They desire that the Union may become an extern teacher to perfect the education of our children, from which a knowledge of their own country is so habitually excluded ; that it may encourage that industrial training and social ambition, the absence of which has left Irishmen to toil in the lowest and worst-paid employments in the world, and that it may herald the way to that better future for which, we believe, Providence has destined our country."

The rejected prospectus was enclosed in the following letter of the Doctor's :—

"My dear Mr. Hoey. I send you the rough draft of the prospectus which I hope may please the committee. The resolutions I consider it right to publish with the prospectus.

I think Duffy's name ought to go in as chairman of one of the Committees.

It might be neatly printed as a small sheet or letter, or as a small pamphlet the size of this paper. I think a couple of thousand will be needed."

The growing importance of the Society was attested by a very deliberate, and most unnecessary public assault upon it from the pen of a Catholic priest more remarkable for the graceful fluency of his composition than for the strength and comprehensiveness of his judgment. "Save us from our friends, we know our enemies," is an old and trite aphorism. The Rev. Mr.—, if we remember rightly, compared Dr. Cane to Voltaire, seeking to impregnate the young mind of Ireland with godless ideas. Mr.— in his public letter complained that Dr. Cane had sent his son to a Protestant school; and this comprised, we believe, the head and front of his offending.

Mr. William J. Fitzpatrick considering that the Rev. gentleman's attack was materially calculated to injure the prospects of the Society, lost no time in apprising Dr. Cane of its appearance. Dr. Cane promptly acknowledged Mr. Fitzpatrick's vigilance.

Kilkenny, December 12th. 1853.

MY DEAR SIR—I am glad to see the interest you take in our Union, and to observe how watchful you are of our externals as well as internals. I had seen Mr.—'s letter, to which I attach, and the public will attach, little importance here: and if it affects the Union at all it will be to serve it, by giving it notoriety amongst a class; as yet knowing but little about it, while it must be obvious to all that a deep personal antagonism actuates the writer, against what he calls "the real head," i.e. Duffy and "the Kilkenny head," who sent his children to a Protestant school, i.e. myself. I have been looking out for some such attacks, and wondered they had not come sooner. Such will be necessary to our very existence, and I count Mr.—'s but a breeze to the storms of wrath through which I hope we will yet steer our gallant bark.

It is a question for sound and good council, whether Mr. —

should be yet answered, or waited for until he shews larger fire, which I apprehend he will. Mark you the Editor is silent on the subject though he is personally addressed.

Mr.—— has not a college; he has a small seminary at [——] and while he opposes in a school puff the Union five from amongst the very best of the secular clergy round him have joined us—men beside whose names his will look shy indeed.

I will communicate with Duffy about his letter, and not decide my course yet. In truth I hope for higher game, and would fain hold my powder and shot for them.

I am glad you are at work on Cloncurry and Emmet: it would need some family influence to get at Cloncurry's papers, &c., which I hope you have; if not, a new memoir of Emmet written with life and energy would take well, and the materials for that needs but a proper selection, and condensation, and to be written with fire.—I am always glad to hear from you.

Yours faithfully

ROBERT CANE.

P.S. Have you seen the Carlton Evening Post of last Saturday? It has an able leader in praise of the Celtic Union—more than a balance of Mr.——'s attack."

Mr. Gavan Duffy took the same view as Dr. Cane of this cruel assault upon a really excellent Institution. "Do not," he characteristically observed to Mr. Fitzpatrick, "do not be uneasy about Mr. S——'s enmity. He is one of these men whom it is pleasant to have upon the other side."

The project had by this time reached America, and was favorably received there by the Irish people. But because the object of the Celtic Union was neither revolutionary or rebellious, the hostility of John Mitchel, to it and to its promoters, knew no bounds, nor chivalrous courtesy. He wildly denounced it as a humbug; and his antagonism had the effect of turning many of the Irish in America from its standard. The Irish saints, including Columbkille, were ridiculed, and the slave system eulogised in the same breath by Mr. Mitchell. Dr. Cane, meanwhile, continued his correspondence with Mr. Cashel Hoey.

"MY DEAR MR. HOEY.—I enclose you the second halves of the £5 sent by Dr. Rourke for himself and nine other Enniscorthy men.

"Duffy's article in to-day's Nation, is a good and judicious one, but I am not yet satisfied about the non-publication of names, but a few weeks will shew whether I am in error. One thing is certain, that the officials' names ought to be published in the prospectus. Therefore the honorary secretaries and the assistant ought to be named at once. I think it would be well to have Duffy's name as Chairman of the committee of suggestion, with mine as that of the committee of organisation, so as to stamp a living air on the work. The secretaries should be named at once, and let me have the result by to-morrow morning at farthest, that I may forward the draft of the prospectus by to-morrow night's post in time for your committee on Monday.

"Would it not be well to have a brief programme of the "Celtic Union," in the almanac,* with official names also attached?

The next letter is addressed to Mr. William J. Fitzpatrick.

"Kilkenny, December 31, 1853.

"MY DEAR SIR—Thanks for the newspaper and your letter. It is evident your friend of the Journal is not quite friendly to the Celtic Union; but after all his paper being non-political, there is some excuse for his caution.

"I hope within a few days to send in some adhesions and some money to the Union.

"In writing the 'Cloncurry,' do not lose sight of the importance of making it brief, and forcible, and applicable to good, by pointing a moral for Irish aristocrats. I have no correspondence bearing upon it, and know no one here who has, else I should gladly aid you.

"ROBERT CANE."

It may here be observed, that Mr. Fitzpatrick found he could not, in justice to the subject of his memoir, comply with Dr. Cane's wish that it should be brief. The manuscript, therefore, when completed, was not offered to the Celtic Union for publication.

Mr. Duffy's prospectus having been approved and printed, it was extensively distributed by the assistant secretary, Mr. Hennessy. The good project met with a more cordial response, generally speaking, in England, than in many parts of this country. As the present seems a good opportunity for faithfully recording the rise and progress of an Irish literary society, which during its short career achieved some highly important bibliographical triumphs, we avail ourselves of it, having the singular advantages of unlimited access to the unpublished papers of the Celtic Union. To give an idea of the class of subscribers which thronged forward and their hearty tone of co-operation, we select at random from the archives of the Society a handfull of its correspondence.

* The Celtic Union Almanack was never published. The MS. was submitted to us at the time, and it certainly deserved to see the light. Every day in the year had its condensed record of an illustrious birth or death, or some stirring incident in Irish History, Literature, or Politics. Not a niche was vacant. The chronology was elaborate, and displayed a remarkable amount of learning and research.

“ C. GAVAN DUFFY, Esq.—SIR.—I hail with great pleasure the prospect of the establishment of the ‘ Celtic Union,’ being fully convinced, that under the auspices of those gentlemen named as the prime movers, it must succeed—and do much to teach the Irish people their true mission ; also tend very much to dissipate ‘ English prejudice,’ as regards the true character of the Celtic race.

“ I shall be glad to become an annual subscriber, and remain, &c.

MICHAEL BOWEN.

“ In addition to my own name, be pleased to add Mr. William Ellerker, of the same address, as an annual subscriber.”

SIR—I received the circular of the Celtic Union yesterday, and will make every exertion early this week to get in all the subscriptions I can to forward before next Saturday. I was out of town on business for some time ; and since I returned I have been so busy that I had not a moment to look after the interests of the Union. I regret very much to have to say that the apathy and distrust of a great number that I have spoken to, is most discouraging, at the same time a striking proof of the necessity of a confederation such as the Celtic Union is likely to constitute. In the meantime I beg you will accept my earnest sympathy for the success of the under-taking, and remain,

Your most obedient servant,

FRANCIS J. POWER.

MY DEAR SIR—Will you do me the honor of putting my name on the list as an annual subscriber to the Celtic Union. I will also give One Pound to the Guarantee Fund.

JAMES PLUNKETT, T.C.

C. G. Duffy, Esq., M.P.

Springfield, Tullamore.

MY DEAR DUFFY—You have wisely merged the proposal to create the Guarantee Fund, in an immediate subscription, and four hundred Ten Shilling Subscribers, before commencing operations. Inclosed is half a Five pound note, my subscription to the “ Celtic Union.” Should there be any difficulty in making up the Guarantee Fund of course I will cheerfully send a second subscription.

I cannot attend your meeting on Monday, which I regret ; but I am sure, when the proper time arises, you will exhibit the length, breadth, and strength of our beginning.

As to obtaining some subscribers, although a general disinclination exists to give money for public purposes, still I hope to be able to enlist a few. Allow me to remain,

J. O'FLANAGAN.

C. G. Duffy, Esq., M.P.

MY DEAR SIR—I send you my subscription to that excellent project, the Celtic Union. It is rightly started as a national object to be worked on business principles and rules, and hope it will not fall asunder by divisions and petty jealousies amongst the managers and contributors.

Do you ever hear from our friend Butler ?

Yours truly,

C. G. Duffy, M.P.

JAMES KIERNAN.

Gazette Office, Longford.

The Editor of the M. C. Gazette, will of course insert the Prospectus of the Celtic Union gratis.

The Gazette is entirely at the service of the Council of the Union.

If Mr. Hennessy have any reports, &c., he will much oblige by forwarding them to the Gazette Office.

"14, St. James's square, London, 12 Dec. 1853.

My Dear Mr. Duffy—You will oblige me by entering as subscribers of 10s. each to the Celtic Union, Miss E. French; Mrs. Burke; Mrs. Val. French; Miss M. Moore; Miss L. Burke; Baron Anthony French; Valentine French; Major French; making £4, which with a donation of one from myself, the enclosed order will cover. Wishing you every success,

"Believe me, yours sincerely,

"J. T. FRENCH.

Lieut. Colonel.

"C. G. Duffy, Esq., M.P."

"In token of the sincerity of my sympathy I beg to say that I am willing, at any time called upon, to contribute my mite of £5 towards setting the machinery in motion.

WILLIAM J. FITZPATRICK.

"Tuesday Evening.

"My Dear Friend—Enclosed is my subscription as one of the 400.

"When the rules are made out and it is agreed what sum each should pay to the Guarantee Fund my part will be forthcoming.

"I could write on the Natural History of Ireland, because I know it and have every bird and beast in its order, and it could be illustrated with cuts and views of Ireland as Jordan's.

Yours,

"T. A. UNDERWOOD."

"Cork, November 29.

"Dear Sir—A note was forwarded to me from Waterford this day signed I think by Mr. Murphy, stating that the first meeting of the Celtic Union would take place on Monday in Dublin, and requesting my attendance. I regret very much that some pressing matters of business must prevent me from being present at the inauguration of a matter in the success of which I take so deep an interest, I also regret that the lateness of the hour at which I arrived here this evening prevents me from procuring a Post-office order for the amount of my subscription; I will, however, on my return to Waterford, send it as well as my donation towards the Guarantee Fund, either to yourself or anyone else whom you may name.

"I think from 20 to 30 subscribers will be formed then at once, and if things go on well five times that number. Above all things let the books be well written at the beginning, even if you have to employ English writers; you must also have them attractive, as to induce our people to read what we want, we must commence if necessary to teach them childlike, from a painted Alphabet. Sincerely hoping that the meeting will be an auspicious one,

"Yours truly,

"Robert Cane, Esq., M.D."

" 69, South Mall, Cork.

" My Dear Mr. Duffy—I have received a note requesting my attendance at Monday's meeting, and directing me, if I could not attend, to forward you or Dr. Cane my subscription.

" I regret that I cannot attend ; but I enclose £1 10s. as my private subscription, and 10s. as President of the Cork Young Men's Society.

" If I can forward your views in any other way which will not involve any great expenditure of time, any considerable notoriety, or any particular capability, I shall be glad to do so, as well for your sake, as that of the good cause.

" JOHN GEORGE M'CARTHY.

" Wallstown, December 26, 1853.

" Gentlemen—Being desirous of becoming a member of your society—a society, which I consider to be one of the most important that could be established, to meet our present necessities—I would feel anxious to know if a work on agriculture would be acceptable.

" The work in contemplation would be written almost entirely on a new plan ; its grand object would be to unite theory with practice, and bring to the view of the agriculturist, within as small a compass as possible, the leading and most important principles connected with that invaluable science.

" The work in question would contain clear, yet brief explanations of the sciences of chemistry, geology, animal and vegetable physiology, botany, zoology, entomology, and farm architecture, with their relations to agriculture, the treatment of live stock, both in health and disease, horticulture, domestic economy in general, and hints not only to the effect of reforming the system of husbandry formerly pursued, but also the social and moral condition of the inhabitants. The work would also be interspersed with pieces of original poetry.

" From an extensive study of the most approved works on agricultural subjects, from practical knowledge, and from being a pupil at the agricultural establishment at Glasnevin, I consider I should feel competent as an author for such a work.

" Wishing the society success in its arduous undertaking.

" JAMES BYRNE."

" 30 Victoria-street, Manchester, Nov. 18th, 1853.

Dear Sir—Mr. Hennessy has done me the honor to invite me to your meeting on Monday. I regret it is not in my power to be present on an occasion so important and interesting ; but shall be happy to render such assistance to the projected "Union" as may be in my power.

I enclose a Post order for £2 2s., as my first annual subscription. Mr. O'Grady will, I suppose, write you from London. He has been hotly engaged lately in defending the company of which he is secretary. It has been most fiercely attacked by Reynolds and Jones.

THOMAS CLARK

C. G. Duffy, Esq., M.P."

" My dear Mr. Duffy—I enclose you a half-note—my friend Dr. O'Ryan sends you the other half—to pay our subscription to the Celtic Union.

There is no hope for our poor country but in giving a national education to the masses. Individuals must be upon whom it will be unsuccessful, as it is at the present unfortunately among the instructed classes of the present day. But do you suppose, were the people educated, that we would witness an entire community denying in practice that to which they were solemnly pledged by an address or by an unanimously adopted resolution? I should say not. At any rate let it be tried. Educate the masses—the old country is irretrievably lost if mental enlightenment fail.

May God strengthen and abet you I fervently pray.

“P. BYRNE, C.C.,
“Carrick-on-Suir.”

The Lutheran calumny which affixes to Roman Catholic Priests the stigma of being favorable to the principle of mental twilight, has so often been reiterated that it gives us pleasure whenever we find clergymen of the Church of Rome expressing opposite sentiments through the medium of letters never intended for the public eye. The slander, though as old as the Reformation from whence it sprang, and although it has been refuted as often as Lutheranism has given birth to novel sects and conflicting tenets, is nevertheless that above all others, even at the present day, most readily believed by Protestants. They totally lose sight of the historical fact, that successive acts of Parliament forbade, under pain of death, any Catholic parent, priest, tutor, or guardian, to instruct a child in even the rudiments of general knowledge, or the fear and love of God. At last Charter Schools—those undisguised nurseries of Proselytism—were conceded to us; but their foul abuses daily grew, and spread so widely, that a Parliamentary Commission was constrained to inquire into, and report upon them. The Charter School Institution became too loathsome even for the hands which formed it, and like Frankenstein, who fled in disgust from the monster he had himself created, the Government at length utterly denounced and repudiated it. To this the notorious Kildare Place system of education, after a time, gave place; but although pledged to diffuse the benefits of education among all, without interfering with the religious tenets of any, it was eventually convicted before the world of a systematic and organised attempt to proselytise by wholesale. The mask of hypocrisy having been torn from the brow of the Kildare Place Society, by Bishop Doyle and others, it was unanimously resolved by the Catholic parents, pastors, and guardians of youth, that all children under their control should be at once withdrawn from these insidious seminaries of proselytism. They refused all compromise; and at last the National System of Education was devised, and offered to our acceptance, by Lord Stanley. This was a vast and radical improvement on every former system of public education in Ireland; but nevertheless it is still liable to many weighty objections. Our National teachers do their best to denationalize the popular mind. Even their Book of Poetic Extracts shews it. Scott's beautiful lines, “Breathes there a man with soul so dead

Who never to himself hath said—
This is my own—my native land!”

escaped the vigilance of the original compiler, but though applying to no particular country it has been expunged from subsequent editions lest the youth of Ireland should imbibe a national thought. A friend of ours, in touring through the South of Ireland was requested by the Teacher, to “examine” the pupils of one of the National Schools. The boys had a “smathering” of Sir Isaac Newton, Sir Humphry Davy, and other English great guns; but the moment the gentleman alluded to some illustrious Irishmen of by-gone days, the master panic-stricken, interposed saying, “Oh, sir, you will get me into a scrape—we are not allowed to allude to those matters.” This fact is a melancholy one. Until we are taught self-respect, and self-reliance we will grow into a grovelling people. Sentiments of adoration for everything English, and Foreign are sedulously inculcated in the National School Books, while every sentence which could by possibility have a tendency to promote national pride, self-respect, or self-reliance, is carefully obliterated. Robert Cane felt this, and projected the Celtic Union accordingly. We resume some of the correspondence of the men who wished it well.

300 Regent street, London.

MY DEAR SIR—I beg you will excuse my troubling you with the enclosed contribution to the Guarantee Fund, 5l., and ten subscribers, one of whom I have not canvassed yet, £5 more. The reason why I don't say £10 to the Guarantee Fund, is that it might seem too forward of me; but if there is any necessity for it I shall send it with equal pleasure.

Clarke will write to you from somewhere in the country, where he is actively engaged against the powers of darkness, led on by G. W. M., I don't like writing his name, Reynolds.

Your efforts at Clonmel were most admirable, and God send they will prove successful. One of our people at Macclesfield gave me a small green neckerchief for you—which was especially worked for you. When “Reynolds” and a clique of low jealous rivals have done gibbetting us before the public as plunderers of the people's funds, I shall set to with a heart and a half in support of "The Celtic Union," which I am sure will prove eminently useful, successful, and a lasting honor to the founders.

Manchester, Dec. 21st, 1853.

SIR—I received the circulars of the Celtic Union last evening; but subsequent to a meeting which I called by circular containing on one side the address which I got from the Nation of Saturday.

I regret to say that out of fifty of the most likely persons to whom I addressed the circulars only eight attended. We however formed ourselves into a working committee with a highly respected clergyman (Rev. Mr. M'Cann) as chairman. We intend waiting personally on the parties most likely to subscribe to the Union. One thing I think I may safely promise, that the subscriptions of the committee and their immediate friends will not be far short of £30.

FRANCIS J. POWER.

Nation Office.

I have just called to say that I am willing to give a subscription, not very large of course, to the Guarantee Fund of the Celtic Union. I shall also become a subscriber. I will not cumber you with suggestions, for I have none original; I might, however, do a little work hereafter. I have come to say this, because I know that the certainty of help, no matter how small, is encouraging. As I regard the Celtic Union, it is a necessity I would labour for its success.

DEAR SIR—I regret that it will not be in my power to attend the meeting of the committee of the Celtic Union, to be held to-morrow in Dublin, and have the pleasure of enclosing you £1 my subscription. I am sorry that I have nothing additional to send from this neighbourhood; and that so far as I have influence or inquiry, I have not been able better to advance the work; but this is nothing otherwise than I had at all times expected in this district. As it would appear that you are likely to-morrow fully to inaugurate the plans of the Celtic Union, and place it in a position to commence its work, and as I don't see any means of supervision or assistance which I can be at this distance; I would trouble you, in your new arrangements, to withdraw my name from any permanent position, such as Treasurer or the like; but at the same time I am quite ready, to promote its objects in this locality, as far as lies within my reach.

" Carrick, Nov. 19, 1853.

" MY DEAR SIR—I did intend to be at the first meeting of the Celtic Society on Monday next, but I regret exceedingly to find, that it will not be in my power to attend, owing to professional engagements. I will send you on Monday my own subscription and those of a few others, who have already declared their intention of becoming members, viz. Rev. Patrick Byrne, C.C., Rev. Patrick Power, C.C., James M. Rivers, Esq., Thomas Daly, merchant.

" It is to be hoped that the society will be so constituted and directed as to win from all true Irishmen at home and abroad (without religious distinction) approbation and active support. Robert Cane, Esq., M.D.

When Keogh and Sadlier, and the other members of the so-called brigade, forgot their pledges and their principles, and accepted office under the Government of Lord Aberdeen, no one felt their political apostacy with more poignancy or humiliation than Robert Cane.

John Potter, Esq., Mayor, and nine other civic fathers of Kilkenny, having ascertained that the Viceroy, Lord St. Germans, would pass through their city on November 15th, 1854, en route homeward from a private visit to a personal friend, composed and presented an address to his Excellency, while the hissing engine was taking deep draughts of "the water without mud," for which the "faire cittie" is famed.

There was no necessity, strictly speaking, for addressing the Lord Lieutenant, as he did not think well of visiting Kilkenny in his official capacity: but the corporation thought otherwise, and in company with Smith O'Brien's old foe, General Macdonald, they bowed down in their robes before His Excellency, and presented him with an exceedingly fawning address, to which the Viceroy, according to the Nation of the day, "returned a cold and formal answer."

Dr. Cane pronounced a dignified protest against this unnecessary ebullition of affection towards Lord St. Germans.

"Dear Mr. Mayor" he wrote—"I find by a communication just received from your secretary, that you require me to attend a meeting of the Corporation at seven o'clock this evening, to consider the propriety of presenting an address to the Lord Lieutenant, when passing through on Tuesday next.

"I have not been very well for the past week, and have not for several days ventured out in the evening, therefore I cannot be present this evening; but were I present I certainly would not vote for an address to the Irish head of the Aberdeen government.

"I would object to such an address upon public grounds. Lord St. Germans is, I believe, an amiable man, but he represents in Ireland that Government, which, without referring to its intolerance of everything truly Irish, has inflicted, and continues to inflict, by the improper exercise of its patronage, the deepest curses upon Ireland that she has encountered since British ministers bought up her representatives in 1800.

"It is a government which has tolerated Irish Catholics only where it could purchase, debauch, or steal them away from the old country ; and I cannot, directly or indirectly, compliment such a government.

“ I cannot compromise principle and veracity by uttering false compliments to the corruptors of my countrymen.”

The following letter addressed to the author of the “ Life and Times of Cloncurry,” though unimportant, is interesting as evincing Dr. Cane’s literary taste, and his anxiety to see the Celtic Union work earnestly and energetically.

Kilkenny, February 28th, 1854.

MY DEAR SIR—I remember Dr. Madden sending me the letter you allude to. It was one from Lord Cloncurry describing a seal of Lord Edward Fitzgerald’s. It would give you no fact for the life of Cloncurry, and could be useful only as a note for a memoir of Lord Edward. But at all events my impression up to the receipt of your letter was, that I had returned it to Dr. Madden. If I have not done so it was a sad omission on my part, and only excusable in one who has vastly more to do than he has time for. I will, however, search over my letters, and if I have it I will return it to Dr. Madden, or to you if he desires you to get it. At all events I will write to tell you if I get it, and send you a copy of it, which the manner of Dr. Madden’s sending it to me will authorise me to do.

I regretted greatly to hear that you have been suffering from illness, but trust for the country’s sake, and all our sakes, you will overcome it. I hope to see you at the Celtic Union meeting some day next week, as I think our committee should soon assemble again, and get to work heartily and at once.

Yours faithfully,

ROBERT CANE.

P.S.—I could indeed have wished to have been with you on the day that Duffy dined with you.

The member’s card designed with true Celtic and national taste was now issued. Dr. Cane writing to the Assistant Secretary on July 23d, 1854, says :— “ Mr. Campion procured some adhesions by merely showing the members’ card you sent him.” Our author had now begun to prepare for the Press his History of the Williamite Wars, as a support to the Celtic Union. To render it peculiarly attractive he spared no expense in obtaining the illustrative aid of the best Irish artists of the day. His anxious letters to the Assistant Secretary at this period in relation to the progress of the engravings, and wood-cuts run in this wise : “ is Ginckle nearly done ? Has Grey Mr. Fitzpatrick’s drawing engraved ? I want wood for Grey and Oldham. I have drawings on the two pieces I hold. Are they to go to Hanlon ? Does Mr. Hoey know what is to be paid Watson for his design ? I am glad," he adds "that O'Keeffe is on the History of the Celts; he ought to illustrate it." The Assistant Secretary, Mr. Hennessy, had expressed a desire to commence as a publisher by bringing the books of the Celtic Union before the public. Dr. Cane amiably writes to him—"Mr. Fitzpatrick is about to publish his life of Cloncurry. I think he does not mean it to come in actual Celtic dress, but in aid of the Union as literary support. I write to you as it might be worth your while to publish it. It would be work to begin with as a publisher. Feel your way in it, if you think fit, but without mentioning me."

On August 6th, 1854, Dr. Cane writes to the same party.

MY DEAR SIR—I return you the engraving for Mr. Grey, with Mr. Fitzpatrick's note, which will explain to Mr. Grey the changes needed to be made according to Mr. Fitzpatrick's opinion.

Thanks for the coin—an Elizabeth Irish farthing, quite common, and struck to economize money being quite good enough for Ireland in days when there was no Swift to terrify our Saxon masters with "a Draper's letter."

I shall be glad to hear more fully from you about your publishing scheme. When do you commence? Where do you commence? Will you print yourself, or employ some man such as Gill, and who? Will your fount of type be Irish? Upon what terms would you undertake the Celtic Union books?

The next letter is to the author of the "Life and Times of Lord Cloncurry," who, in consequence of the sadly notorious fact that hardly one book published in Dublin pays, was constrained to follow the example of Mr. D'Alton, Mr. Gilbert, and other able historical writers, and to secure in advance as many subscribers to the work as possible. The "Life of Cloncurry" it may be observed, formed Mr. Fitzpatrick's debut in literature.

Kilkenny, August 15th, 1854.

MY DEAR MR. FITZPATRICK—I am glad to find you have been so energetically at work, and trust your book will be creditably brought out, and not only in a national spirit, but calculated to feed into fuller flame the feeble light of Irish nationality.

Did it strike you that it would be well to have a print of Cloncurry prefixed to your book, and perhaps a vignette of Hogan's fine piece of statuary? Hanlon or Grey would execute it.

Doyle's book, his letters, essays, and a good life would tell well. It would be sure of a large sale amongst the clerics, as well as some amongst the laymen.

I do not think you can calculate upon a large list of subscribers; but I should hope your book will merit, and have a large sale. But you must be older, and better known to command subscribers to an unknown book by an unknown author. Pardon the freedom of this remark, but I know the spirit of our friendship, though yet a young one, will permit me the observation ; but this will occur, I trust, only with your first book, which once successful paves the way, and makes smooth the road to after success. Will you please honor my name by putting it down for four copies. I do not expect or care for more subscribers to the Celtic Union. We have enough to begin, and I think we will then speedily grow. Indeed I am not anxious to have much done until Gavan Duffy is back, yet I feel satisfied that the fair promises with which we opened the year will display some good autumn fruit, palatable to Irish taste, and suited to nourish nationality, and give strength to young liberty.

Participating in your anxiety, and earnestly wishing you every success,

I remain your's truly,
ROBERT CANE.

Mr. Fitzpatrick, knowing that Dr. Cane was engaged upon "a History of the Williamite Wars," communicated to him an assertion of the Duke of Berwick's, not generally known, that the bravery attributed to William was rather fiction than fact, and that in the height of one of the battles between his army and that of James, he retired from his position as a Commander, and secreted his person in a ditch or some such undignified entrenchment. Mr. Fitzpatrick mentioned the allegation to Dr. Cane for "what it was worth." His reply displays the impartiality of an expansive and well-informed mind ; and it is worth subjoining because it quite upsets the belief, general among many, that Dr. Cane was a bigoted Partisan on the side which opposes "the Glorious, Pious, and Immortal Memory."

Kilkenny, Dec. 3rd, 1854.

MY DEAR SIR—"Not very well" must be my excuse for not sooner replying.

Thanks for the extract which you so kindly sent to me ; but I cannot credit William's having acted cowardly on Berwick's or any authority.

I am glad your book is near to hand. I promise myself a treat with it.

One of my copies is to be an ornamented one for my drawingroom ; the others plain to give to some book societies."

Cane's anxiety to see the books of the Celtic Union launched continued unabated, although his mind was full of important engagements at home, and he had not a minute to call his own. Writing to the Assistant Secretary, on January 19th, 1855, he says :—

"I have had no answer from you touching my last letter, and the final publishing arrangements which Mr. Duffy was to talk over with you. I have written to Mr. Duffy too and had no answer. Pray write, and stir him up. I send two drawings on wood, the head of Sarsfield, to go to Mr. Oldham, and the tail piece to Mr. Hanlon. I want impressions of the Tyrconnell.

A writer in the number of the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, for June, 1854, expressed himself somewhat ungenerously towards the Celtic Union of which the prospectus had just appeared. Misled by a stupid calumny which had found its way into a portion of the Provincial Press, the writer in question regarded this young organization as "a seed plot of sedition," and denounced it in unmeasured terms. Mitchel's Citizen on the other hand, speaking of the Irish People, on June 3, 1854, declared:—

"In God's name let them come out from amongst Celtic Unions, and such like pretentious quackeries, and do something worthy of their manhood. It is not night for owls to whoop in, but broad day, and the sun is in the zenith."

Dr. Cane, under the signature of "Celt," thus replied, through the medium of the Nation to the double assault which had been made upon his favorite scheme.

It is obvious that the Celtic Union, like too many other Irish projects, is to encounter that Irish antagonism which delights in fratricide, and that before a death-blow be aimed at it, it is to be tortured by a dilemma-dance between horns, one of which pokes at it from Grafton-street, at home, and the other from Spruce-street in the capital of New York. Poked in Dublin for being, by anticipation, "a seed plot of sedition and treason"—and poked at in the New World for being "a pretentious quackery," and far, very far from being capable of either sedition or treason enough.

Perhaps this results, in the present instance, very much from the circumstance that neither of the critics either sees or understands it aright—that both of them are premature in their pronouncements, and that, as an eclipsed planet is coloured by the medium glass used looking at it, the Celtic Union has been viewed in the one instance through a glass somewhat orange in its hue, and in the other through a glass far greener than is suited to the atmosphere now surrounding everything Irish.

That the Union is something more than a myth is deducible from the fact that even before it appears in proper person, its very shadow is struck at with an energy sufficient for the encounter of a giant.

Surely it is not a little strange that the Anglo-Irishman writing at home should consider the "Union" as a Young Ireland or treasonable society, while the Nationalist in America writes of it as a puerile and contemptible "quackery." For the one, it promises to be too national, while for the other, it falls far short of the amount of nationality he would stamp standard.

We would call attention to this difference of opinion in its regard, not for the purpose of an angry collision with either the Saxon or the Celt—neither with a view to out-argue either opponent. The first were unwise, because we cannot afford to quarrel further in Ireland than we have done—for Heaven knows we have already quarrelled over much and over bitterly; and, as to argument on the subject, it would be at either side but matter of opinion and statement, worth just the value of so many words until the period arrives when the execution of some of the work, which the Committee of the Celtic Union has mapped out for public view, shall be fairly seen and understood by all Irishmen whose love for the old land gives them interest in the inquiry; but that we think the inference plain: two views of so opposite a nature cannot be both right, and time, and work, or no work, will ere long show whether both or one, and which one, was singularly in error; while the members of the Celtic Union, who know their own business best, whose common heart and energies are devotedly given to the undertaking, will gather from this most contradictory antagonism how little they are or can be understood as yet, and how necessary it is to put on their armour and gird themselves for the work in hands—and thus show how earnestly, honestly, and heartfully, they have entered upon this new road, through the desert of Irish politics and a nationality almost dead! It is, indeed, a work of sorrow to struggle at all for Ireland; and that it is not a perfectly hopeless work, we best gather from the truth and honesty of the men who now rally under the Celtic Union banner, who will speedily be called upon to give evidence more than promise that they thought deeply and aimed well, achieving results far beyond their promises, but not higher than had been their earnest and silent aspirations—aspirations breathed to Heaven in the spirit of liberty, and with deep and earnest love for Ireland's true prosperity; tempered with caution, wisdom, and common sense: learning this lesson from the past, to talk little and labour much; to boast no more, and scarcely breathe hope over loudly, lest the enemy come in the night time and quench its young life; above all, feeling in the depths of their souls that the cause "should be baptised in the old holy well," and that literature, union, association, confederation, anything and everything henceforward to be done for Ireland, to win God's blessing and to win success, must have the cross of our fathers inscribed on its banner.

CELT.

This temperate and pleasingly written reply, having been pretty generally copied by the press, silenced further antagonism; and the little bark of the Celtic Union glided on calmly. Its progress was slow, but Cane did his best to stimulate it. Writing to the secretary on January 26, 1855, he says: "Would not April be a good month to begin publishing? Mr. Duffy's 'name of Essays,' and this adjustment of the publishing matter, is all that is now wanted to enable us to get the sanction of a committee and go to work. Were these two things settled, the publishing list might appear early in February ; and two or three essays out in April would set the machine going, and I have not a doubt of our then getting on fast." In a postscript he adds: " I see ample work before us, and both writers and subjects for a year's work at least."

From the first promulgation of the project, Dr. Cane devoted every leisure moment at his disposal to endeavouring to establish it on a firm basis. He wisely considered that one of the most indispensable steps in furtherance of this object was the immediate publication of some original work, of sufficient calibre and importance as to make a lasting name for itself, and the Society which gave it birth. Accordingly the close of each hard day's work of professional and civic labor found Cane in the midst of his books studying, collating, investigating, and inditing. And instead of gathering strength in refreshing sleep to enable him to resume with vigour the next day's toil, he spent his own stamina and substance with the midnight oil which gradually burned out before him.

In February, 1855, Dr. Cane enclosed to Mr. Hennessy, the assistant secretary and subsequent publisher to the Union, the manuscript of the first part of the " Williamite and Jacobite Wars in Ireland"—a work of great eloquence, research, and power.

The following letter speaks for itself. It may be premised that like Gibbon he quite miscalculated the actual extent of his manuscript :—

" William-street, Kilkenny, Feb. 28th, 1855.

My Dear Mr. Hennessy—No doubt I have acted very much as the traveller who gave a brick as the specimen of a piece of architecture, when I sent you the few pages you have got. But I cannot at present send you more. The fact is, the whole book is arranged as far as authorities, notes, and plan of work, and numerous passages written ; but just like the monthly novels, published in numbers, it must come out in numbers, and the second will be writing and polishing off while the first is printing. In this way the book will be completed with the summer, if the first number appears on the 1st of May.

Look at it thus. First number first of May—to consist of as many pages as you think ought to be given for one shilling ; do you decide the number of pages. I will supply the additional manuscript up to that mark. Remember in estimating a first number in sheet cover, that it will have a likeness of Tyrconnel, medallion heads of William and James, and two plans of Derry. The preface and introduction must accompany the first number. The preface is explanatory, and the introduction is virtually the first chapter, and essentially the first, say the virtual key, to the true history of that period. Tyrconnel being now first described as what he really was—a nationalist and a separatist.

I would use Fitzpatrick's design as cover, Watson's as title-page ; the letterpress to be suitable size ; and the selection of type I would feel inclined to leave to you, satisfied that you would, for society's, author's, and publisher's sake, select the most suitable type and paper.

You will, therefore, make up your mind as to size of page, and number of words for that page, the number of such pages to be given with each number at 1s ; then cast off what number of pages you have, and what you want for first number, and I will send it.

I think about five or six numbers will complete it. If it takes I would re-issue it bound as a volume, with some extra plates and plans, and at a cheaper rate. In so arranging it, say whether the edition is to be one or two or more thousand copies. I know this is not the business way—but Mr. Hennessy the secretary must arrange the difficulties with Mr. Hennessy the publisher, and make some allowance for all embarrassments.

Let me hear at once, for whatever we do, ought to be speedily notified to the public.

Yours faithfully,
ROBERT CANE."

Printers' whims and printers' blunders are amongst the plagues of a literary life ; and Cane, on the threshold of his literary career, was doomed to encounter some of these vexations.

" Kilkenny, March 15th, 1855.

My dear Mr. Hennessy—You are an able and dexterous arguer, but in some things I am a positive man, and so must adhere to the cover size for the numbers of my present book. In this I am fixed. My reasons, some of them at least, are, I like the size, I like the cover, and I won't listen to printers' objections, as you must do. Besides, it is little over, if not exactly the size of the Boyne, Water by Wilde, while it is rather under the size of O'Callaghan's Brigade, as well as that of the 'Tribes of Ireland' and the 'Ossianic Transactions,' both thin and neat books published by O'Daly. Besides, it will not be a thin book like a Bishop's Charge (I wish I were a Bishop to charge my own) but a thick book—for if the manuscript you have makes thirty-two pages, we must have either more than six numbers, or fifty or sixty pages in each number. Here again your printer may whisper you, 'It won't pay'—'and no publisher gives so much for a shilling of a new book.'" But you, as a young publisher anxious to spread your name, and make sales and extend business—and all of us as a new society, must give good value, and positively, in our first books at least, win the name of doing much for the public, and for the objects we have in view. Nay, I am satisfied that it is only by doing so you and we can succeed at the start. I would therefore say sixty-four pages for a shilling, of good clear type.

Morrison will not be able to keep the stone, I apprehend, after the 2000 copies of the maps. I have to get them drawn on transfer paper here, and then forwarded to him for lithographing.

Now as regards you and my bargain. I only want to have a definite arrangement between us, with a view to others more than to myself.

I am anxious, most anxious, the project should succeed—next to it I am anxious our publisher should succeed, and in no case suffer by us—indeed his suffering would be ours. For if he cannot make the books tell for himself, they will not tell for the authors or for the country. I want you therefore to say to me of that first edition, which is to be 2000, how much will be necessary to bear you harmless—what the residue will be beyond that mark, and then of that residue what proportion you will allocate to me, to re-imburse me for drawings, engravings, &c.

You see as far as I look, I am as anxious as if I were your partner that your share should be secure and the risk mine. In any case I think you will be safe, and I may lose if the book fails—but I have hopes it may tell, and do us both some credit.

Will you be specific on these points, like a good fellow, and let us have no more delays, and the book will be out on the day you name, namely, the first of May.

Please send me down the ten last pages, being the commencement of the first chapter. I will want them to string the first chapter carefully together.

You can return the introduction and notes until I write again, and I will take your hint about the French note, beneath which I will affix a translation in small type. But the French is indispensable as a sort of key-stone to the whole spirit of the book.

Your's truly,
ROBERT CANE."

Incessantly occupied as Cane was in professional practice outside, and in poring over and collating the musty tomes of his library within, he contrived to keep himself not only au courant with recent literature, but to be able to criticize and judge it. In a letter to Mr. W. J. Fitzpatrick, author of the Life, Times, and Contemporaries of Cloncurry, he writes, on July 2, 1855—"I like your book much. It has many merits, and some few faults. Some time I will take it up, and cruelly dot its few imperfections, and risk them nakedly to your own eyes.

"I am glad you met Banim. He likes you and your book; and so does C——, the poet, who writes under the soubriquets of "Kilkenny man" and Urbs Marmoin."

In April, 1855, the first part of Dr. Cane's Williamite and Jacobite Wars in Ireland, was published by Mr. Hennessey at No. 2 Crow Street. Men conversant with Irish Literature at once felt that this admirable work, would fill a great void in the history of this country. It treats of an era of which little authentic is known, save that the war in which Protestant Ireland and Catholic Ireland were engaged, resulted in the triumph of the former, and the defeat and discomfiture of the latter, at Derry, Aughrim, and the Boyne. This is not too much for Irishmen to know; yet how few know anything about the men or the means by which the freedom of a people was gained. How few know anything of Schomberg, DeGinckle, Tyrconnell, Hamilton, and the other chief generals and Statesmen of the time, save what tradition records to their praise or disadvantage. The histories which persons engaged in the transactions of the time left us are out of print, or bring so fabulous a price that they may be said to be inaccessible save to the wealthy. Story, Mackenzie, Clarke, and Walker fill gaps in private libraries or moulder on dusty shelves, while the mass of the people have no means of knowing the exact history of that remarkable struggle which ended by the third William ascending the British Throne. The labours of Dr. Cane are directed with marked success to this latter object. Eloquently and impartially written, the first part is illustrated with well executed wood cuts including maps of the principal scenes of action, medallion likenesses of the contending monarchs, and a finely executed portrait of Richard Talbot, Duke of Tyrconnell. Thirty-six pages of this number consist of an elaborate attempt to place the character of Tyrconnell in a different light from that in which it has lain for eight score years. There is also a chapter descriptive of the muster of the North, in which some very fine passages occur. The first part concludes shortly after the description of the closing of the gates of Derry, by the "Prentice boys," and reveals all the stirring incident and adventure of an agreeable romance. Among some new facts and documents produced are extracts from original proclamations in the author's possession, published by Tyrconnell for the disarmament of the Protestants before the arrival of James in Ireland. The only critical objection to which the work is, in our mind, liable consists in the title, for surely a narrative of the Williamite Wars in Ireland, would be sufficiently intelligible without adding the word "Jacobite".

The second part, which appeared some weeks later, creditably sustained the reputation of the first. It very effectively described in its fourth chapter, "how the Jacobite and Williamite armies met in the North," while the fifth was devoted to an exciting and singularly impartial narrative of "the Siege of Derry." Among its illustrations is a conspicuous portrait of George Walker, Rector of Donoughmore, Colonel of a regiment, and Governor and subsequently Bishop of Derry, while an accurate copy of Neville's map of the Siege of Londonderry in 1689 rendered the ease of sauntering through the narrative if possible more luxurious.

The portraits of Schonberg and Colonel Richard Grace, with their rich flowing hair and glittering armour, are executed in a style of finish which would do credit to the Art Journal, and proved that Dublin merely wanted the opportunity to compete with, and probably in some instances surpass, those brilliant efforts and specimens of the art which weekly emanate from the London press. The description of Schonberg's disastrous campaign, and the decimating plague which ravaged his army; King James's Parliament in Dublin, dignified by the wealth and strength of the land; the stern "No Surrender" of Crom Castle, the siege of Enniskillen, the deadly struggle to force the pass at Dunnough, the landing of William at Carrickfergus, the Battle of the Boyne, the siege of Athlone, the capture of Drogheda, and other important incidents, are all narrated in a graphic, eloquent, and exciting manner; while faithful copies from the ordnance maps prepared by Philips for Charles II. add materially to the general effect. Though instinct with the truest spirit of nationality, the work is quite free from all undue sectarian or political prejudice. The author treated parties and measures in an able and impartial manner; and that he possessed this as well as other essential qualifications for the historian, has been borne evidence to by even the critics of the Conservative press at home, and the Anglican and anti-Irish reviewers, including the Athenæum, abroad. We had hoped to have been able to quote some of the more memorable passages in Dr. Cane's work; but our limits warn us that the remainder of the materials in our hands must be used economically. A faithful narrative of the Jacobite and Williamite Wars in Ireland, was a book long and urgently wanted; for with the exception of the incomparable labors and achievements of John Cornelius O'Callaghan, no Irishman has undertaken to clear away the vast heap of misrepresentation and calumny which has so long obscured that important and interesting epoch in our history.

Meanwhile, Cane's anxiety to see the Celtic Union work without a pause, continued as freshly as when the first gush of his enthusiasm gave the project birth. In the Autumn of 1855 we find him stirring up those literary men of national tendencies who were qualified to render material assistance to the good work. He not only sought to enrol new recruits but to infuse ardour and activity into those who had already given their adhesion. In this spirit we find him requesting literary aid from Mr. MacMahon, M. P. Mr. O'Keefe, Mr. Supple, Mr. T. Irwin, Mr. Fitzpatrick, Mr. Cashel Hoey, and otherwise labouring to organize the little band, who professed to follow his colours. The Hon. Member for Wexford, placed in Dr. Cane's hands, the manuscript of an able Brochure entitled, "A Shilling's Worth of Common Sense about Ireland." Writing to Mr. W. J. Fitzpatrick, (Nov. 6, 1855,) he asks "what is your pen doing now? you ought to give us something for the Union." Mr. Fitzpatrick in reply, offered to write a series of memoirs of the Lord Lieutenants, and Lords Deputy of Ireland, with an account of the policy and administration of each. This obliging offer Dr. Cane thus acknowledged:—

MY DEAR MR. FITZPATRICK.—I should be very glad to see some of the traces of your able pen among our Celtic Union works; but I do not feel fully confident that the book you contemplate could be brought within the limits of the sized and priced books we must publish for a while at least. Indeed to bring it within such limits would cramp your powers of description, and the necessary details too much. I therefore greatly fear that subject would be too enlarged for us. However of this, we would be all better judges, when you elaborate your plan, and form some idea of what will be its compass.

The second annual subscription of ten shillings to the Celtic Union will be collected in forthwith to enable us to work another year.

Apropos I presume we may continue your name as Metropolitan Honorary Secretary?

If you conceive that the "Lord Lieutenants" would be too large for us, think of some subject that would make a nice volume like Supple's.

I was very glad to see your handwriting again; as not meeting you at our Dublin Meetings, I knew not what had become of you.

In a subsequent letter to the same party Dr. Cane observes:—

"I see you have worked for the Celtic Union, and procured some adhesions. You will continue, I hope, for I think the Union will have better claims on the country, than in past years. I read your "Irish Memories" with much pleasure. The tone of it is kind and healthful, and rebukes the public want of taste and feeling. I fear I am not only tedious in reply, but sometimes illigible, as racing against time, I truly write Currente Calamo.

With regard to the omission of the name and mark of the "Celtic Union" from the cover of my Williamite wars, it was left off by the Publisher, because Booksellers who dreaded the name, refused to sell the book if it was on—at least that was the reason assigned to me.

I am aware of the existence of the Williamite Document you refer to ; but it does not properly belong to the History of the three years in Ireland. You will see by the Cover of the W. wars, that the Celtic Union brings out three new books by January.

P.S.—Surely when “down South” you did not visit Kilkenny or you would have come to me.”

The work by Mr. Gerald Supple, to which Dr. Cane refers in the foregoing letter as one constituting quite a model of literary and national composition, was “The Anglo Norman Conquest of Ireland.” Its style is vigorous ; the language eloquent—in some parts perhaps too florid. The materials are selected and arranged with the judgment of an artist ; a skill is exhibited in revealing the historic picturesque which Thierry or Barante never surpassed ; while the erudition, and research displayed in the work proves the author to have been a laborious historical student. This book was followed by Mr. J. T. Campion’s “Traces of the Crusades in Ireland”—a pleasant multum in Parvo of learning, poetry and sound thought. But the incomparable Versicles of Thomas Irwin (T. I.) which formed the fourth volume of the series issued under the auspices of the Celtic Union being non-political, and totally free from all allusion to the by-gone triumphs, or oppressions of the Irish People, had a wider circulation than the other volumes, and was, without a doubt, more generally popular.

The four books to which we have referred were all forwarded by post, free, to each member of the Celtic Union as the equivalent for one year’s subscription. In fact when one adds the cost of delivery to the published price, the amount absolutely exceeded that of an annual subscription. “A fact,” wrote Dr. Cane, “which however satisfactory to Members, falls yet short of that satisfaction which Irishmen devoted to the country, its literature and advancement, must feel in the consciousness of having aided in an issue of books, which but for their efforts had never thus appeared, and which are in themselves so many evidences of Irish capacity, talent and truth, while the style in which they have been printed and illustrated, is highly creditable alike to publishers, printers, designers, drawers and engravers, all of whom are Irishmen ; shewing that if there was but an encouraging public, any book could be produced and any subject elucidated in this our too long neglected country.”

In March, 1856, Dr. Cane appealed to the country for aid to continue the good work so effectively commenced. He declared that the Council not only held some valuable MSS.

ready for the Press, but that several more were offered, and in preparation.

"They but await," he wrote, "a warm response to this call upon their Countrymen. A response such as they feel their past labours have merited, and which they desire solely with a view to be able to extend still further the sphere of their usefulness. That they may spread a sound and wholesome Irish Literature into Irish homes; elevating the tone of the national mind; filling it with the knowledge of home history, and fixing the Irish heart in deep love to the old land, and earnest watchfulness over everything that should be great and good within it. And while doing all this, to expel from the Irish fireside the foreign and other puerilities and immoralities which have been swarming over the land, and threatening to debase the manhood, weaken the morality, and antagonise the religion of the country. If there be yet a National heart remaining in Ireland; if Irishmen really desire that their countrymen shall have Irish taste; truthful Irish history; knowledge suited to the circumstances of the country—they will rally round the Celtic Union."

Charles Gavan Duffy had been engaged upon a History of the Popish Rebellion of 1641 with a view to its publication by the Celtic Union, when circumstances induced him to arrive at the sudden determination of emigrating to Australia. In a letter to W. J. Fitzpatrick at this period Dr. Cane says—"Duffy is a sad loss to Irish literature, and an irreparable one to Ireland, and to the circle of his friends, of which I believe you were one." He adds, "What think you of a cheap Irish periodical under the guidance of the Celtic Union? We contemplate it."

Mr. Fitzpatrick's reply was not encouraging. He reminded Dr. Cane of the grim fact, that of the three Irish Penny Magazines published within the last twenty years not one paid, though the last left off with a goodly circulation. Two of these publications are said to have ruined their publishers. Few are aware of the expense attending the publication of a periodical in Ireland. Mr. Marinus Kennedy, brother of the late Thomas Kennedy, who owned and edited the Irish Metropolitan Magazine, informs us that although it only reached twelve numbers £1800 was lost by the speculation. Dr. Gray, Mr. Torrens M'Culloch, and others, who established the Citizen in 1840, found themselves eventually out of pocket one thousand pounds by it. It is melancholy to look back upon the mass of brilliant but unsuccessful periodicals which rose and fell in Ireland like meteor lights.

How Dr. Cane contrived to make time to visit the poor daily, and prescribe for them at his own house, surprised and edified many. He not only declined to accept any pecuniary offering from the indigent, but frequently followed up his Samaritan kindness and attention towards them with presents of food and money. To literary men he also gave his professional services gratuitously, unless (what was rarely the case) the suffering scribe enjoyed affluent circumstances. Michael Banim, the accomplished collaborator in the O'Hara Tales, informs us that throughout a protracted illness under which he labored a few years since, Dr. Cane's attention to him night and day, was such that even if the Doctor had accepted recompense, Mr. Banim would, to the last hour of his life, remember him with the liveliest feelings of affection and gratitude. But although the unremitting attention he bestowed upon Banim, both as a surgical operator and as a kind friend smoothing the pillow of affliction, consumed very many of the minutes which were worth guineas to Cane, he resolutely refused to accept the smallest fee from Mr. Banim. This was no isolated case. Similar instances of disinterested generosity might abundantly be cited. The following trait has just been communicated to us in an interesting letter from Mr. N——

"A little anecdote of the late Dr. Cane, illustrative of his goodness of heart, was related to me yesterday by the party who had benefited by it. The Doctor had visited him professionally during a tedious illness, sometimes three times in one day, and frequently after midnight. Owing to this unremitting attention the patient at length recovered; and his trouble now was—how he was to pay the Doctor. So he managed to scrape together the sum of £3, and forthwith waited on Dr. Cane, introducing the subject with many fears as to his reception, owing to the manifest inadequacy of his offering: he at length ventured to lay it on the table—but the noble-minded man pushed it back, saying 'Put it in your pocket, Mr. O'Daly, I shall not charge anything for my services. Your thanks and good will have more than recompensed me.'"

The accomplished poet, "T. I.," has obligingly placed in our hands any correspondence which passed between him and Dr. Cane. The following letter is chronologically in place here :—

"Kilkenny, November 27th, 1855.

Dear Sir—I have received your letter enquiring on the subject of five pounds to be stopped or allowed in sale of 180 copies of your poems, between Publisher and Council of the Celtic Union.

The five pounds are to be so stopped, being the only way in which the Council could meet the expenditure to be incurred by those arrangements made at Dublin between author and publisher, and not contemplated in the original decision of the council. I mean the arrangement that the book should not be a one shilling volume, but should be a three and sixpenny volume, whereby a treble expenditure is entailed on the council in making their purchase for members.

Permit me to add, moreover, that the Council, though assenting to your, and the publisher's, arrangement to do this, do not feel quite satisfied that it is a wise move as regards popularising and cheapening books in Ireland ; but there is no use now in re-considering the matter, as the thing is done, and cannot be remedied ; but if the Celtic Union takes so large a number of a three-and-sixpenny book for its members, it is entitled to the consideration that in doing so it largely aids the work.

The pure literary merits of your book will, no doubt, secure its sale in the wealthier ranks ; but 3s. 6d. a-piece will prevent it being largely amongst the classes for which the Celtic Union is working ; and moreover makes it heavy on the funds of the Union, for though possessing high literary merit, and evincing true poetic genius, it is yet not strictly within the range of those teachings promised by the Celtic Union, whose business was rather to encourage national work, and education, and to do it cheaply.

I shall be happy to write when you require it, and hope I may one day have the honour of knowing you personally. Meanwhile believe me, yours truly,

ROBERT CANE.

Thomas Irwin, Esq."

Apathy on the part of some of the officials of the Union was not without effect in promoting the growth of vexatious difficulties which now beset it on more than one point. These Contre-temps afflicted Dr Cane at the time; he remembered them with pain, but he forgave the cause. Among the serious annoyances to which we have referred, the seizure of the Books of the Celtic Union, for some debt of the Publishers, was perhaps the most disheartening. On June 15th, 1856, Dr. Cane writes to a leading official of the Union.

"MY DEAR MR [——]—If I have not sooner answered your letter the delay arises neither from irritation, or desire to slight you ; for, whatever may have been the annoyances I have experienced, I am quite willing to view the whole affair as the result of inevitable misfortune rather than of fault, and to let bygones be bygones. The delay in this reply has arisen solely from professional pressure, creating want of time to write.

As regards the 1,000 parts of 1, 2, 3, 4, of the Williamite Wars, I doubt if I should make the 3d. a piece of them ; and I have already lost enough in the matter, and would rather feel inclined when publishing the remainder to limit myself to the number of what has been sold. I certainly would not speculate on these 1,000 unless I could get them under the mark you indicate.

Upon what terms could Mr. Campion get his "Crusades?"

I would be glad if you could make me out a list of the men you think likely, either in Dublin or elsewhere, to aid the Union."

In another letter written at this period, he says:—"Guide me with advice as to a Publisher for the Celtic Union. One likely to press the sale of the books, and deal honestly with us. Send me back the manuscript of the dedication, and preface to the Williamite Wars."

This valuable work never reached the fifth part. Ireland is proverbially apathetic in encouraging any native literary effort; and the reception Dr. Cane's work has met with at its hands sustains the not very enviable reputation to which we have alluded. A subscription should be at once raised to complete a book of which the Empire might be proud. The manuscript is ready for the compositor; and money to pay him should be also forthcoming. It proved an expensive book to the poor author, as the following letter shews.

"Kilkenny, June 26th, 1856.

MY DEAR MR. [———]—I could not write to you sooner, having not one leisure moment.

I know it will be a rash venture for me to become the purchaser of these 1,000 copies of each of the four parts of the Williamite Wars; but nevertheless I do not like to have them scattered. I will therefore enter into an arrangement to purchase them back at Three pence per part, passing you my bill at six months for thirty-pounds; and not being required to pay the other twenty-pounds until I have brought out the book in its entirety, and received proceeds for its sale, equivalent to that sum over cost of printing latter parts. Indeed I would feel inclined to publish only as much as would be equivalent to numbers already sold, and reserve the 1,000 for a sort of second edition; but on this I am not quite made up. One thing I do see, I will lose well by my part of the Celtic Union work. But n'importe, I still feel that good will come of it, to the project, if not to me.

P.S.—Irwin is well reviewed in the IRISH QUARTERLY, and the Athenæum. His character as a Poet is now stamped."

Misfortunes never come single; and the difficulties of the Celtic Union multiplied. On August 21st, 1856, we find Dr. Cane addressing the Publisher in the following letter. His uniform equanimity of temper pervades it.

"MY DEAR SIR—I regret to find you in these difficulties. I would fain see you out of them, and to shew you my desire to that effect, and my full confidence in you, despite all the ill-natured things some of your Dublin friends say of you, I enclose you the second bill for £15 accepted ; and thus entrusted to you before I get the other half of the value, and will you be surprised when I tell you, before I have had time to examine the half sent—taking your word for it that all the material for 1,000 parts of the Williamite Wars are in it—though you admit a deviation in them not being made up in parts : for I purchased them in parts.

You will please now send the 1,000 parts of 1 and 2 ; and so I can make the one job of examining all, at the earliest leisure day.

You will now write me a letter, assigning to me all your rights over those 1,000 parts ; and resigning all right to interfere with my mode of disposing of them as I please. as well as all control over first and all subsequent editions.

You will also see that Mr. O'Toole sends to me the wood cuts of Grace, Walker, and Schomberg, still in his custody ; and the wood-cut of Cover, the property of the Celtic Union, which I wish to take custody of.

On January 21st, 1857, writing to the same party he says : “ Thanks for your several letters which I had not until now a moment to answer. Where are my two bills for £15 ? They will be both due early next month. Are the copies at Webb's of Supple's Anglo Norman Invasion, all bound ? Will Webb take my bill at six months if I venture to buy them ? If I pass this bill to you will the remnant of the Williamite Wars, come to me in sheets or stitched, and when ? Please answer all this at once, ‘ and without mental reservation,’ as the witness oath saith.”

The books of the Celtic Union which Dr. Cane recovered, came to him in a bewildering mass of unfolded sheets. Here was a new vexation to a man who had hardly a minute to call his own ! On January 25, he writes to the late Publisher of the Celtic Union, “ What will be the cost, per 100 copies, for getting Supple, Irwin and Champion stitched and bound, and can I have the print or plate of the cover ? Could you send me any hints about a publisher for the Celtic Union ?”

Difficulties and vexations which would have utterly disgusted and disheartened any other man threw no chill upon the ardour of Dr. Cane's hopes and patriotism. He had long felt the want of a cheap periodic home literature—a literature whose price would not embarrass its circulation, and whose aim should be to have its pages suited to all classes, and its contents redolent of Nationality. A letter to Mr. Hennessy in January, 1856, discloses this new idea. “ I have written to James Duffy,” Cane writes, “ but no answer as yet. I feel satisfied a regular Publisher can still make money by us, and I feel satisfied that our penny periodical will tell. I have already great promises both of contributors and subscribers for it, and hope to make it a thing to be deserved."

In June 1856 the Prospectus of the Celt appeared. Dr. Cane promised that it would be, Irish, Celtic, Catholic, and Progressive. "Every Irishman," he exclaimed, "holding a fit pen shall be welcomed to its aid, but neither favor, affection, or fear, shall win a place in its columns for loose, mediocre, or valueless writing."

The "CELT" will have a wide field for its labours. In its pages will be found matter relating to the antiquities and traditions of the country, repeopling its old castles, stirring up the ashes of its raths and cairns, popularising its olden history, and making trite its past memories, wherever they are found worthy of record as deeds of virtue or examples for other times.

The "CELT" will labour to display the massive capabilities of the country for happiness, wealth, and independence, its vast mineral wealth, its fitness for extensive trade and great commerce. It shall contain information and statistics having reference to all those matters, and will take in philosophy, art, or science, wherever these have relation to the country, either as what it is or what it should be.

The "CELT" will have pages of a more light and graceful character—fiction, poetry, and verse will adorn its pages wherever they can be made subservient to virtue, patriotism and nationality. Gleamings from the writings of other men, the books of other lands, the deeds of other nations or races, will form some of its material—when suitable as subjects for imitation or reflection.

We have said it shall be "Irish, Celtic, Catholic, and Progressive." It shall be Irish in all its tendencies; Celtic in its proud memories of the past; Catholic in its deep respect and attachment to the old faith; Progressive as a guide into the future. Yet while pledged to be all these, Irish will not imply abuse of its antagonism, Celtic shall not mean attack on other races or countries, Catholic must not convey collision or controversy with other bodies of dissenting Irishmen, and progression is not to be vain boast or idle threat.

Its teaching shall be without wrath or anger, but nevertheless with an undeviating onward aim, which, if it succeeds, will have an important national result.

To do all this, the "CELT" must have a large support. The committee appeal for that support solely as Irishmen and Nationalists, for they have no pecuniary interest in the undertaking.

Dr. Cane had some correspondence with the inimitable Poet "T.I." at this period. He regretted that Irwin seemed fonder of depicting old St. James' Park, with its beaux and belles, or the "purpling clusters" of a Rhenish vineyard, than in tracing with a pen which dripped with molten gold, a rich Irish landscape, or thrilling Celtic incident.

"Kilkenny, February 5th, 1857.

Dear Mr. Irwin—I have received your letter. I should be most happy both for the Union's sake and for yours, to advance your views; but I think our hands are full for the present.

I could greatly wish that talent such as yours was tried on something Irish.

What would you think of looking over bye-gone Irish History, and impressed by some of its impassioned passages, immortalizing them in verse?

I would gladly press the Celtic Union, even under difficulties, to publish such a volume from your pen.

Now a small shilling volume of ballads, descriptive of the times and scenes when the North men came up in arms to plunder and prey upon the ceaths of the country.

Or the parting scene in some one of our old cloistered abbeys, when the youth of England were returning home full of the coming war in Ireland.

Or prince John, the "Dominus Hiberniæ," surrounded by the native princes, and insulting them in their own land.

Thousands of suggestive ideas would come upon you from a perusal of the 'Annals,' or some such book.

Pray forgive the familiar liberty of this letter. I would know you intimately enough to make such suggestions, were I near enough to know you intimately, but as I am not I can only sorrow that your muse turns eastward—anywhere but homeward.

I shall be glad to hear from you again and always."

On August, 1st 1857, the first number of the Celt, price one Penny, appeared. It opened with a leader from Cane, signed Tyrconnell, and headed "The Map of our Journey." Cane's style was his own. It reminds one of Thomas Carlyle, but although Cane always held an enthusiastic admiration for that author. he was no servile copyist.

"A committee of the Celtic Union," he writes, "have this day entered upon a seriously responsible mission, and taken upon their shoulders a truly onerous duty. And though that mission and its duties be to some of them a 'labour of love,' with others a pleasurable pastime; yet all feel the seriousness of their position in relation to the work before them, the country for whom that work has been undertaken, and the chances which may bring failure to annihilate, or success to crown their ardent and honest hopes. * * * The intention of its editors is, that every page, every article, every extract, shall all tend to a definite end, the common good of our common country, to make Irishmen love Ireland better, cling to their old faith closer, value truth, virtue, honor, more and more venerating the past, acquiring knowledge and power into the future, burying old feuds and animosities in oblivion, and substituting in their place brotherly love and manly union.

animated was the manly form that, even in its physical construction, won admiration from those who knew not the warm generous heart that throbbed beneath it. And as we talked of the future, and discussed a scheme of organization (all but developed through his instrumentality) by which Irishmen would be again invoked to struggle for their country, we felt that no more fitting pioneer could lead the way in such a movement than Robert Cane."

His funeral was a public one, and attended by thousands. A universal gloom overspread the the city of St. Canice. Every shop was closed and all business suspended. All classes were represented on the sad occasion ; and even the aristocracy and gentry of the county assembled in large numbers to manifest their respect for the unsullied honour, the unblemished integrity, and the distinguished abilities of the deceased.

While the crowds were assembling in High street and William street, the members of the Corporation and Trades' Societies, held a meeting in the Assembly Rooms to make preparations for marching in procession at the funeral. The Trades' Societies wished that the procession should take a longer line of route than was intended ; but after considerable discussion, the Trades' Societies yielded, on its being stated to them that the wish of Dr. Cane was, that his body should be borne to the grave without any show or ostentation, and by the shortest route. At half past one o'clock, the black plumes of the hearse of the Leinster Union, were seen waving above the crowd in William street, and shortly afterwards all that was mortal of Robert Cane, enclosed in an oaken coffin, was placed upon it. The Reverend Edward Walsh, Adm., who had attended the deceased, as Spiritual Director, during his last illness, having recited the prayers for the dead, the multitude, Catholic and Protestant, priest and parson, remaining uncovered during the solemn ceremony, the hearse of the Trades' Society was raised on the shoulders of eight persons, who were relieved at intervals during its progress to the grave. Immediately after the coffin followed two sons of the deceased, Richard and James, Robert, the eldest, being in China with his regiment ; and then followed the other friends of the family. The funeral was headed by the Trades' Societies (of which Dr. Cane was the Patron and President) wearing white scarfs and hat-bands ; after them the members of the medical profession ; and next in succession, and immediately in front of the coffin, came the Catholic clergy; next the members of the Corporation, in deep mourning; and then followed the myriads who had come from far and near to pay this last tribute to the worth and memory of a patriotic and distinguished Irishman. At half past two, the coffin entered the grave-yard of St. John's Catholic Church, Maudlin-street, where it was received by the clergy of that parish, who, with the other priests present, chaunted the office for the dead, and the remains of Dr. Cane were soon after consigned to their mother earth, amidst the prayers and blessings of the Catholic Church, and the supplications and sorrows of the poor.

On the following Thursday, an Office and High Mass was celebrated in St. Mary's Cathedral, for the eternal repose of his soul. A large concourse of priests were in attendance.

"To-day," said the Kilkenny Journal, "we shall not attempt to write his epitaph—we have neither time, nor spirit, for the dreary task. And, were we to write it properly, we should search out the many acts of his overflowing charity, in this city; for his truest and best epitaph is written on the hearts of the poor. Dr. Cane has now passed from amongst us, and Kilkenny may well feel proud of his memory, for never was there a purer soul than his—never a nobler nature. Far away from this ancient city his lamented death will bring gloom and sadness to many a heart. Far away by the Lee and Shannon, by the Foyle and the Liffey, true hearts will mourn the death of Dr. Cane. Far away, in the busy towns of England and Scotland, where Irishmen still live who have hope in a glorious destiny for the poor old country, there will be warm tears to the memory, and a prayer for the soul, of another of Ireland's lost patriots. Far away beyond the Atlantic, when the shadow of his death reaches the Western Continents, deep gloom will spread like a pall over the exiled Celtic heart, for another great Irishman is gone.

The Dundalk Democrat said:—

"Another calamity has befallen Ireland. A great and good man is no more. . . . May his spirit enjoy eternal bliss, and may his great virtues be long remembered. As we can no more expect his assistance to regenerate our outraged country, let us at least endeavour to profit by his example. Let our intentions be pure as his were; and no matter what may be the difficulties in our way, let us resolve, as he did, to surmount them—having faith in the ultimate triumph of justice and in the success of the cause of our native land.

The Tipperary Free Press observed:—

"It is a sad duty we have to-day to discharge—a task approached with sorrow deep and sincere. We have to announce the death, in the prime of life, of Dr. Robert Cane, who, as a patriot, citizen, husband and father, maintained a reputation sans peur et sans reproche. He died as became a Christian, fortified with the sacraments of the church."

Four weeks after the demise of Robert Cane, his friend Mr. Kenealy wrote :—

“ On yesterday evening a visitor to Maudlin street churchyard might have observed a newly-made grave. It was considerably longer than the tombs around ; and, were it not for the fresh traces of the gravedigger’s hand, it might be regarded as the last resting place of some great chieftain of the shadowy past. Two beech trees drooped over it, and sighed in the evening winds—softly as the Spirit of Death. Beautiful trees ; they will sigh in summer, and weep in winter, over the brave heart that moulders in that sad and silent supulchre. ‘ I love the drop of the wetted trees,’ said Thomas Davis, in anticipation of his death ; and he who of all Irishmen most resembled Thomas Davis in his heart and soul—in his nobility of nature, and liberality of sentiment—in the gentleness of his disposition, and the frankness of his manners—in his statesman-like wisdom, his genius, and deathless devotion to Ireland ; he who most resembled him sleeps under the drip of the wetted trees, in the ideal grave of the poet.

“ It was so silent you would think the dead was already forgotten. The churchyard looked lone and deserted : and no voice of mourning broke the stillness of the scene, or paid a tribute to the memory of Ireland’s lost patriot. The beechen trees still swayed and sighed in the evening winds ; and it would seem as if nature alone were the only mourner above the grave of Robert Cane. But, as you approach a little nearer, you discover traces of a recent visitor. Up through the red clay of that newly made grave shines a bunch of beautiful flowers, crowning the cold pillow of the dead. The air around was sweet with fragrance, as if the virtues of the deceased were giving forth their balm upon the breath of Heaven. And there were footprints upon the soft clay—the footprints of the recent visitor who had laid this pure and simple offering upon the grave of Robert Cane. Who could it be ? Who was this angel of the sepulchre ? Alas ! it was a faithful heart ; a disconsolate mourner ; a fair, young, gentle girl—the angel daughter of the Dead ! It was poor Annie !

“ Hard by, was the grave of Ireland’s greatest novelist ; and there, side by side, in that silent churchyard, lie the two great Kilkenny men of our generation—John Banim and Robert Cane.”

APPENDIX.

MR. SMITH O'BRIEN'S LETTER TO MR. A. M. SULLIVAN.

Sept. 4, 1858.

MY DEAR SIR—I have learnt with much concern that the family of Dr. Cane have, by his premature death, been left in circumstances of great difficulty. The extract which I inclose from a private letter written by a gentleman who lives at Kilkenny, will prove to you that they must suffer extreme privation, unless something be done to secure for them a provision. It appears that several of his personal friends, with whom he was connected by professional and social relations rather than by political sympathies, have set on foot a subscription, and have shown their anxiety for its success by liberal donations.

There is reason to believe that the circumstances of Dr. Cane's family would have been very different if he had applied for their benefit the money which he expended in endeavouring to promote the welfare of his country. It is, therefore, peculiarly incumbent on those who shared his sentiments in regard of political questions, to co-operate in an effort to shield his family from misfortune.

As no one could appreciate more fully than you the high qualities of our departed friend, it is unnecessary for me to enlarge upon his exalted patriotism, his generosity of heart, his intellectual power, his social virtues. We have only to consider what is the best mode of evoking and giving effect to the desire which will be felt by his political friends to offer a tribute to his memory in the form which will be most useful to his children. I feel assured that this desire will not be confined to Ireland, but that in America and Australia many will gladly participate in this good work, provided a satisfactory mode of co-operation be organised. I am reluctant to offer any suggestions on the subject; but as every proposal must have a commencement, I will venture to ask you to recommend, through the columns of The Nation, that a central committee should be formed in Dublin for the purpose of collecting subscriptions, and that local committees should be formed, not only in the provincial towns of Ireland, but also in the principal cities of England, of the United States, of Canada, and of the Australian provinces.

Immediately on the appearance of Mr. O'Brien's touching letter, steps were taken to carry out the object for which it was written. It was found that it was not easy to discover how to achieve this, without trenching upon feelings which Dr. Cane was known to have held so determinedly as to render it almost sacrilege towards his memory to violate them. Although he was ever found amongst the generous who responded to calls for aid for the families of public men; although his was amongst the first of the subscriptions raised in Kilkenny for John O'Connell's children—he was known to entertain views the most opposite to public appeals for subscriptions on the ground of political feeling. The embarrassment of those who felt it incumbent upon them to guard with scrupulous reverence and affectionate fidelity the wishes and the principles of the dead, yet were necessitated to face the resourceless position of the living—has happily been set at rest by an act which while it will respect the one will relieve the other, and supply in itself a prouder testimony to the worth, the purity, and the unsectional patriotism of Dr. Cane, than an overflowing treasury raised by subscription on party or political appeals. The admirers of his genius as a scholar, his goodness as a citizen, his benevolence to his native city as a Chief Magistrate and a Corporator—though owning, most of them, no alliance with him in politics, yet, all of them, admiring his pure and self-sacrificing devotion to his country's cause—have felt themselves free to inaugurate, as a testimony to his worth and their sorrow for his loss, a movement in aid of the young and helpless members of his family. This, without any treason to his principles, can be, and will be, cordially joined in by those who, to all those grounds of attachment to him, add the bonds of political faith. “We are not going,” adds the Nation, “to make an appeal to our readers what it is desirable that it should not be—a call for subscriptions on sectional grounds; but we do call for aid—instant, earnest, and liberal—for a movement so enlarged in its basis, and so honourable to the memory of Dr. Cane. The subscription list opened at Kilkenny already amounts to nearly six hundred pounds; trustees have been appointed, and in our next issue we will be able to report the appointments for Dublin, Belfast, Cork, Limerick, &c. The young children of a man who through life was of large means, yet was of a larger heart—a man of noble soul, of lofty genius, of gallant patriotism—a man who, had he but been more circumscribed in his generosity, would have left those children proudly independent of such help to-day—call upon Irishmen for aid.”

THE CANE SUBSCRIPTION.

(From the Cork Examiner.)

“Few men, who entertain any attachment to Ireland as the country of their birth, could have heard without emotion of the death of Dr. Robert Cane, of Kilkenny. His name has been so long identified with every movement that would tend to raise her dignity amongst the nations, whether it were in the freedom of her people, in the preservation of her historic records, in the loving study of her antiquities, or in the jealous guardianship of her treasures of archæology, that his loss must be looked upon as a serious blow to the very nationality of Ireland. The sorrow felt for the untimely end of a man such as he, cut off at the age of fifty-five years, at the moment when his hopes for his country were most ardent, and his exertions most energetic, will receive additional poignancy from the fact, which we now learn for the first time, that he has left his family in circumstances of pecuniary embarrassment. Generosity such as his, patriotism such as that associated with his name, caused him to sacrifice his own interests to the succour of his fellows and the cause of his country; and the abruptness with which he was hurried from the sphere of his mortal labours, forbade him the opportunity of making an adequate provision for those most dear to him. We are sure it will be heard with extreme sorrow that the circumstances of his wife and children are such as to threaten the necessity of parting with his library, the accumulation of years of literary labour and study ; his paintings, the numismatic and archaeological collections, which he toiled to amass, in order to illustrate Irish history, and that even the honourable testimony to his worth and talents—the service of plate presented to him by his fellow-citizens of all creeds and classes, at the conclusion of his year of office of Mayor of his native city, runs the risk of being brought under the hammer of the auctioneer. An effort has been made, however, to arrest a spoliation, which for the honour of our country, we hope would be looked upon with shame. Some generous men have come forward—many of them widely separated in religion and politics from Dr. Cane, but admirers simply of his high character and the genuineness of his national feelings—and inaugurated a subscription intended to prevent the sacrifice. Men of true hearts and honest love of fatherland are not so numerous amongst us that we can afford to slight the memory of one who was emphatically a true and an able patriot. Let us in the case of Dr. Cane, at least, not have to bear the reproach of ingratitude, which so often dims the lustre that the country ought, but for its own neglect, derive from the memory of its great men. Let all who desire to show that Irish patriotism is not a dead thing, but a spirit which can wake a sympathetic chord in Irish bosoms, co-operate with those who have commenced a national tribute to the fame and the virtues of Robert Cane of Kilkenny.

The subscription, unfortunately, was not organized in time to save Dr. Cane's splendid library. Three weeks ago it was dispersed by the auctioneer's hammer through the length and breadth of the land.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE CORPORATION OF KILKENNY.

“ Resolved that it is our duty, our painful duty, to take this early opportunity, to express our heartfelt sorrow, as one unanimous body, for the untimely death of Dr. Robert Cane.

“ We regret him as one as the dearest and best-beloved of our council, pure, straightforward, and honorable in his advocacy of every measure calculated to reflect credit upon us as a liberal corporate community, and possessed of a rare and zealous talent which he always used with the greatest modesty and best effect.

“ That we regret him and will ever preserve his memory with warm regard, because he ever and always exhibited the most anxious jealousy to protect and defend the honour of this Corporation both civilly and politically, and because of his own great personal worth as a Councillor and a citizen.

“ That we regret him because he always aimed to sway our deliberations and differences with gentleness and wisdom, and because his friendship was a boon that any of his fellow-citizens and every member of this corporation must ever feel proud of having once possessed.

“ That we regret him, because that in and out of this council, though he may have had some who differed from him in politics or religion, no man was his actual foe—no man was his private enemy.

“ That we regret him because rich and poor regret him, and because that both ardently join with us in this expression of condolence, firstly, on our own parts, then on the part of Ireland, on the part of his native city which his bright genius adorned, and on the part of his afflicted family whose irreparable loss nothing can supply."

Mr. Potter rose to second the adoption of the resolution, and paid a handsome tribute to the memory of the deceased. Passed unanimously.

The Mayor—It is unnecessary for me to say that I also fully agree with it.

Even the poet's pen has been at work in praise of poor Cane. Mr. John O'Donnell, of Limerick, has published a monody, from which we select a stanza or two :—

THE GRAVE OF DR. CANE.

Pace we along the brown old road
To the fair city of the south,
While freshly mist the pleasant airs
From morning's mouth,
Take down thine olden elder stave,
Bind asphodels around thy head,
To-day we hold communion high
Even with the dead.

And while we journey slowly on Let our still hearts rich utterance give
That tho' thou keep'st their dust, Oh ! Earth,
Still, still, they live.

Live ! and for aye the blast and storm
Which shake earth's battlements sublime
Is but the trumpet voice which tells
Their names to time.
Holy it is to sleep beneath
The cloister's melancholy walls,
Where teems the spiritual dew
And sunshine falls.
Emblems of resurrection they,
One from the wells of ether driven
To fountain up the wastes of earth,
Then soar to Heaven.

Most musical the beechen trees
Wail for the dead in voiceless sighs,
Like death-bells mellowed by the breeze
Of Paradise.
Ever they move in measured sway
Swooning the dusk with their low toll,
Uplifting an "Excelsior"
Even to his soul !

From another Dirge, signed Conaciensis, we cull a few verses :—

'Tis the third season of the rounded year,
Autumn, so bland, so golden, and so mild,
Yet doth it seem dead Winter even now
To me. Alas ! alas ! this scalding tear,

And worst of griefs, and bitter, bitter woe,
 For a bright flower of chivalry laid low
 In charnel gloom, had made my poor heart wild;
 Yet one dear joy remains—'twas not the frown
 Of English foes had power to strike our chieftain down!

Oh destiny! thine is indeed a might O'ershadowing all. To-day our glory lies
 Voiceless and cold in death's unlovely night,
 Whilst Echos bear our wailings to the skies,
 And hills and caves repeat our gloomy sighs;
 Yet one dear joy remains—'twas not the frown
 Of English foes had power to strike him down!

He must not sleep unsung
 In the cold grave, oh no! oh no!
 Justice would murmur long if this were so.
 Let him be throned among
 Our wisest and our bravest.

As the admirers of Dr. Cane will ever regard any of his unpublished letters, as so many interesting relics, we place in the appendix one which has just reached us—not of importance certainly, but interesting as exhibiting his anxiety for the welfare of the Celtic Union, at an incipient stage of its progress.

“Kilkenny, April 24th, 1854.

MY DEAR MR. HENNESSY—I return the design for a member's card. It is chaste and beautiful, and of course the committee will adopt it. I send a plan with it, which if the committee approve of, would make it a receipt as well as card, and so save trouble.

I should like the blocks to be about the size of the paper on which I have suggested the alteration of the card, and get Mr. Hanlon to send me three of them. I will have one speedily drawn for my book, and send it up for his estimate that it may be engraved; and if the price be fair and reasonable, I will want some eight or ten of them.

With reference to Mr. Duffy's desire to have one of the covers smaller than the other, so as to suit small octavoes or twelves, I have no argument to urge against such a plan—save that I fear either may be damaged in bringing it down to a smaller size, and perhaps Mr. Watson, who draws minutely with great elegance, could reduce, without injuring his chaste design. I do not think Mr. Fitzpatrick could do so with his: but Mr. Duffy, who is on the spot, will use his judgment in the matter, and decide and direct it before he goes to London.

When sending me down the block for Fitzpatrick to draw his sketch on, send me Mr. Duffy's hints, and also Mr. O'Keefe's for changes of figures of Irish soldiers at top of it.

THE SEPT OF CANE, KANE, OR O'CANE.

A document preserved in the State paper office, dated Sept.

23rd, 1612, enumerates the names of certain prisoners unfavourable to the Protestant regime of James the First, who were then detained in the Tower of London. SIR DONAL O'CANE appears in "good companie," viz:—The lady Arabella Stuart, Sir Cormack O'Neile, brother to Hugh, Earl of Tyrone, Sir Neal Garvey, Nectan O'Donnell, William Baldwin Jesuite, Lord Sobhame, Sir Walter Raleigh, Earl of Northumberland, Countess of Shrewsbury, and Lord Grey.

The Canes are repeatedly mentioned in the Rotuli Hundredorum drawn up so far back as the Reign of Henry II.

THE JACOBITE AND WILLIAMITE WARS.

(p. 1076, ante)

We cull one passage from the critique of the Athenæum.

Dr. Cane is more liberal and less insular in his appreciation of the English politics of that time than the Young Irelanders, while his sympathies as a Catholic are also more active. He wishes to tell the truth; and he has the generosity to appreciate the heroism and virtue in the cause to which his traditional prejudices are opposed. In his style he is clear and eloquent.

Dr. Cane's literary labours seem to have been very cordially appreciated in England. The clever Editor of the Hull Advertiser writing to Willian J. Fitzpatrick on June 25, 1856, observes—

Is there no man in Ireland to edit a popular edition of the works of Sir Jonah Barrington, including his history of the Irish Union? We are yet without a standard history of Ireland with the names of all the old chiefs and kings translated, and a key to the proper pronunciation of them. A series of the old divines of Ireland after the form of the Parker Society, would be most useful. Try and put life into some Irish publisher. As to Irish subjects not being popular—that is all mere moonshine. Let the man of genius and of enterprise appear, and all the world will attend to him. Dr. Cane of Kilkenny is the only person I can refer to whom, judging from his history of the Williamite Wars in Ireland, I regard as gifted with the requisite ability to produce a really good history of Ireland. My bookseller here sent me four numbers, and I am highly charmed and delighted with them. I only wish that he would write a comprehensive history of Ireland in ten or twelve monthly volumes. We want also a series of good county histories of Ireland, such as abound in this country. Let me suggest a grand subject—the history of the Established Church in Ireland, with all the suffering which it inflicted upon the plundered priesthood and people.

FAMILY INTERESTS.

To the Editor of the Irish Quarterly Review.

Dear Sir,

I believe the simple history of my experience will best effect the object I have in view in writing you this letter.

I gave you in my former letters proof of the necessity of having some certain employment secured for the girls who should be ready to leave reformatories. I cannot cease to impress this all-important point, as otherwise the hope of perseverance must be faint indeed.

It is true all agree as to this being essential; but yet it is discouraging to find that many seem to think the industrial part an after thought that can wait its time: this I believe a fatal error, as it will be no longer time to begin to establish what can only succeed after a long trial and unwearied labour. Above all, the secret of the reformed girl must be kept, and yet how do so, if the period of commencing Industrial Establishments be deferred until the children now about to be adopted for reform be ready to leave their blessed homes of shelter.

We have been so long aware of this want, and so sure that it would be recognised, that in spite of difficulty and debt, we have kept on our industrial school; and now it has taken a new phase.

While our laundry was in operation I had occasion to ask a benevolent Guardian of the South Dublin Union for an introduction to the Matron in order to take out some girls to work. His answer is still ringing in my ear: "I will give you one certainly, but I would not advise you to take any of the inmates, as they are all bad." He did not say it unkindly—but he thought it only fair to warn me, as he knew I had innocent girls at work in St. Joseph's, and feared to spoil them, and expose me to lose property which should be confided to their charge, if I received them into the Institution. I accepted his letter, but instead of going to the South Dublin Union, I drove to the North, as I was acquainted with the Roman Catholic Chaplain, and thought he would only be too glad to select some good girls for me. On my arrival, I told him why I came to him, at the same time expressed my horror at what I had then learned, for the first time, that all poor girls entering the Union might give up the hope of bearing a respectable character afterwards. He said, "I am not surprised at what has been said to you, although I think it a harsh judgment to spread abroad; but when you remember that these girls are in daily contact with the most depraved, can you be surprised that suspicion and distrust will attach itself to their own characters; however, come with me and I will shew you a number of children whose innocence I can vouch for. As children, they are as yet safe from the contamination that awaits them in the women's ward." I accompanied him: several girls from 11 to 16 years of age were at once called out; all looked eager and anxious when told I had come to select a few workers; but how sad it was to be obliged to refuse all, as none were strong enough for the work then to be done. I went to the women's ward, and there got one girl whom he said he could recommend. I was afraid to take more from that unclassified division.

Having given up the laundry for the reasons stated in a former letter, and provided places for our reformatory girls and other interns, we removed our extern industrial children to a house convenient to the principal patronesses, and could not resist making an effort to save some of these poor children of the Union. We have brought out seven of them, and have engaged a matron; they are now ten weeks with us, and are beginning to earn something towards their support by making shirts for a house of business. They are, as you will perceive by our report in your advertising columns, taught household work, and trained to earn their bread.

For the means of carrying on this work, we are entirely dependent on the charity of the public, and as the institution is not sufficiently known, we are now in debt nearly sixty pounds to the treasurer. Surely some benefactors will come to our aid.

Now I believe that we belong to the Reformatory associates, and to claim partnership with them, is to declare a right to companionship with all that is good and noble. It behoves us therefore to make our title clear, for we deeply value the glorious connection. There are no drones in Reformatory Societies: all are helpers; no mere good wishes and good will is accepted; acts are the only title deeds recognised; no honorary sleeping partners are admitted; the spirit of devotedness in which the work was founded has stamped itself on all who cooperate, and each in his own measure has given thought or pen or act to the work, and this is why it has suddenly startled the world by the catholicity of the sympathy it has called forth.

And yet there are a few amongst the "esprits forts" who ridicule the work and its missionaries: flat jokes, and sallies of attempted wit, are said to have been repeated as coming from those whose hearts are kind and whose talents are acknowledged. How can reflecting and enlightened gentlemen forget the weight attached to their opinion. Nay, incredible as it may seem, the really good and kind have so far forgotten their nature as to sneer at those who have reached a hand to the penitent! How unaccountable is the world in its inconsistency!

Let us make one bargain with those who are so ready to condemn and sneer at the efforts to reclaim the criminals; let no one dissent, unless he or she has given proof of being engaged in helping and saving the innocent. It will be generally found that those who thus find fault, are not foremost in any charitable undertaking; for how could charity act in contradiction to itself by speaking so directly contrary to the spirit of the teachings of the Author of all charity.

But I am wandering from my object, which is to show how essential it is to support the Industrial schools. Some time since, we got a large order for work, too large for our own institution, as want of means has forced us to part with a number of our good workers. Refuse the order, I could not, as I well knew how many would be served by it. So I got help in various quarters, and engaged many other Industrial Establishments in the south of Ireland to take part of my order; holding myself responsible for the whole. I did not wish to leave the prisoners out in the good work, but went to Newgate, and engaged some very good workers. The matron very kindly did all she could to promote my wishes. She had but five inmates who were capable, as it was very nice plain work that I wanted to get done. The time approached for the completion of the whole order, and when I went to hasten the Newgate branch, the matron said all would have been ready sooner, had not the best worker sulked, and consequently caused a delay, but she eventually finished her task. After having paid for the work, I found that the prisoners would not get any remuneration; I then asked to be permitted to see the girl who had finished my work so nicely, and perceiving she had little pictures in her cell, I asked and obtained permission to present her with a few, and also with a prayer book. Soon after, I gave a second more hurried order, and to my agreeable surprise, it was at once finished by the girl, who is most difficult to manage, she having been several times condemned to the worst punishment, viz., solitary confinement.

I asked to see her again to thank her, and when I expressed surprise at her finishing her work so quickly, she said she wished to please me in doing so, and had worked until two o'clock in the morning to have it done sooner. It was some very fine knitting, and when I asked her how she had light, she shewed me that a gas lamp was near her barred door, and that by thrusting her arms through the bars she was able to have light on the knitting, and so worked away! This poor girl was one of the very worst tempers in Newgate; a few weeks after when I enquired for her, I was told she had become utterly unmanageable, and was several times since in the dark cell. Surely had reformatories been in her day she would never have continued so long unreclaimed!

I also visited two others who had worked for me, and whom I had rewarded in like manner. They told me their history. They had come from the South Union, and were confined for attempting to burn it. One said she had been years in the Union, and had first been confined to prison for a month for having cut down a line in the union to make a skipping rope! The other was also sent to prison for a like period. She had broken the leg of a stool, and said that she was with others for insubordination, and since then had gradually become hardened. Were not these two cases for Reformatories, had they been in operation?

Thank God, though many have been lost, no time will now be permitted to elapse before the saving remedy is applied to our poor young defaulters. I visited some others in the prison the same day, and promised them if they became really good and penitent, I would be ready to give them work when the time came for their leaving the prison.

Now then, I do ask all and each of the Patrons and Benefactresses of Reformatories to help St. Joseph's Industrial Institute. It is the hope of the prisoner, and the salvation of the Union orphan. Those we now have were nearly all from nine to fourteen years in the Union. There they should have died or come out to cause death or infamy to many perhaps ; for we know that the sad fate offered them cannot be confined to themselves :—they are sent out to scourge those that will not help. Surely I have made my case clear?

I will not distrust your kindness by apologizing for the length of this letter. It was impossible to abridge the facts. The fate of Industrial training in Dublin is now in the hands of your readers, who will, I hope, help us. A few years of support will enable such establishments to become valuable even in the eyes of traders, and keep us at least in existence until Ragged and Industrial Schools are aided by government grants as they are in Scotland, and as I have no doubt they will soon be here. You will then hear no more from

ART. I.—EATING AND FEEDING—LIVING AND EXISTING.

1. Comments on Corpulency, Lineaments of Leanness, Memoirs on Dietetics. By William Wadd, Esq., F.L.S., Surgeon Extraordinary to the King. London: Ebers and Co., 1829.
2. The Original. By Thomas Walker, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge, Barrister at Law; and one of the Police Magistrates of the Metropolis. Third Edition. London: Renshaw, 1836.
3. The Cook's Oracle, Containing Receipts for Plain Cookery, on the Most Economical Plan, for Private Families: Containing also a Complete System of Cookery for Catholic Families. Being the Result of Actual Experiments Instituted in the Kitchen of William Kitchiner, M.D. A New Edition. Edinburgh: Cadell, 1843.

Many years ago, years when short-waisted coats, and flower-pot hats were in vogue, we read a book, then popular, upon the good things and the bad things of the table. We bought the book, and it lies before us now, with many a mark of hurried thumbing, and of rough and ready reference, about its old familiar covers and pages.

This volume consists of a short Latin poem, which is little more than a very elegant versification of a common French bill of fare, and a copious body of notes, in which the antiquities of most of the dishes commended in the text are fully and satisfactorily explained. The quantity of information conveyed in this last part of the work is really quite astonishing; and we are sure Gourmand, Gourmet, and Glutton, must be equally grateful to the author. The first note, or rather dissertation, is occupied with some sketches of the Roman luxury of the kitchen ; after which the writer passes into the following judicious remarks :—

“ However extravagant and foolish the whims of those rich personages of ancient Rome may appear to a sober and sensible mind, we must, in justice to their taste, cursorily observe, that there exists a material difference between a gormand and a glutton. The first seeks for peculiar delicacy and distinct flavour in the various dishes presented to the judgment and enjoyment of his discerning palate ; while the other lays aside nearly all that relates to the rational pleasure of creating or stimulating an appetite by the excellent quality of the cates, and looks merely to quantity. This has his stomach in view, and tries how heavily it may be laden without endangering his health. The gormand never loses sight of the exquisite organs of taste so admirably disposed by Providence in the crimson chamber where sits the discriminating judge, the human tongue. The glutton is anathematized in the scripture with those brutes quorum deus venter est. The other appears guilty of no other sin than of too great and too minute an attention to refinement in commensal sensuality.

“ We find besides a curious shade between the French appellations gourmand and gourmet. In the idiom of that nation, so famous for indulging in the worship of Comus, the word gourmand means, as we stated above, a man who, by having accidentally been able to study the different tastes of eatables, does accordingly select the best food, and the most pleasing to his palate. His character is that of a practitioner, and answers to the appellation of an epicure in the full sense of the word, as we use it in English. The gourmet on the other hand considers the theoretical part of Gastronomy ; he speculates more than he practices ; and eminently prides himself in discerning the nicest degrees and most evanescent shades of goodness and perfection in the different subjects proposed to him. In fact, the word gourmet has long been used to designate a man who, by sipping a few drops out of the silver cup of the vintner, can instantly tell from what country the wine comes, and its age. This denomination has lately acquired a greater latitude of signification, and not improperly, since it expresses what the two other words could not mean.

“ From the foregoing observations we must conclude that the glutton practices without any regard to theory ; and we call him Gastrophile. The gourmand unites theory with practice, and may be denominated Gastronomer. The gourmet is merely theoretical, cares little about practising, and deserves the higher appellation of Gastrologer.”

He then descends to the cook, whose history through Egypt, Greece, and Rome, down to the Palais Royal, and other celebrated eating places of modern day, is very accurately described. After listening to the high and judicious praises he bestows on the expert practitioner of the cooking art, it is melancholy to find, that according to the authority of a certain great French author, “ Cooks, half-stewed, and half-roasted when unable to work any longer, generally retire to some unknown corner and die in forlornness and want." But it is added most emphatically, that "Corneille, le grand Corneille, had no better fate, since he also died in obscurity and distress, a similarity which ought to contribute to their consolation." Among other curious particulars relative to the history of the cook, we find, that in the time of the first Roman emperors, his salary was very commonly about £1,000 per annum—that Mark Anthony once presented a cook with the unexpected gift of a whole corporate town, or municipium, solely because he had dressed a pudding to the satisfaction of Cleopatra—and lastly, that the French, in all things ungrateful, have derived from this profession their names for a rascallion, Coquin.

As for the dishes themselves, the soups are of course first of the first. Sorbilla, the Latin name, means nothing more than that which may be swallowed; but that which may be most easily swallowed, came not unnaturally to be always understood by it. The author's definition is complete secundum regulas. "A secretion or dissolution of the various juices contained in the muscles and fat of animals, as bullocks, calves, sheep, chickens, &c. in a menstruum of boiling water." "The soup," says a gastronomic author, "may be called the portal of the edifice of a French dinner, whether plain or sumptuous." It is indeed the sine quâ non with that ingenious people. Upon it the whole fabric of the repast reposes, as earth does on the bosom of ocean. It is the great substratum destined to support, with the association of the natural gastric acids, the whole mysterious work of digestion. "C'est la soupe," says one of the best of proverbs, "qui fait le soldat." It is the soup that makes the soldier." Excellent as our troops are in the field, there cannot be a more unquestionable fact, than their immense inferiority to the French in the business of cooking. The English soldier lays his piece of ration beef at once on the coals, by which means the one and the better half is lost, and the other burnt to a cinder. Whereas six French troopers fling their messes into the same pot, and extract a delicious soup ten times more nutritious than the simple roti could ever be. It would seem, by the way, as if anciently leeks had been the principal ingredient in soups, for porridge is evidently derived from porrum. The love of the Romans for that vegetable is well known—hence Nero's nickname of the leek-eater, or Porrophagus.

Under this head of leek soups, our author says,

“ Rabelais, the humorous vicar of Meudon, distinguishes, in his jocose way, two sorts of soups. Soupe de Prime, Prime-soup ; and soupe de levriers, soup good for hounds, the meaning of which stands as follows : The first designates that premature delibation of broth, which the young monks in the convent used to steal when they could from the hour of “ Prime,” a service performed at about seven or eight in the morning, when the porridge-pot, with all its ingredients had been boiling for the space of one or two hours, (the dinner was served at eleven) and when the broth, full of eyes swimming gently on the golden surface, had already obtained an interesting appearance and taste. It was a sort of beef tea, the lusciousness of which was enhanced by the pleasing idea of its being stolen—nitimur in vititum semper. On the contrary, Soupe de levriers, greyhound's soup, means that portion of the porridge which was served to the novices after an ample presumption in favour of the Magnates of the monastery. This was good for nothing, and monks of inferior ranks were ready to throw it to the dogs. The French call rain “ soupe de chien.” The egg-broth of the miser, who fed his valet with the water in which eggs had been boiled, comes under the denomination of the said “ soupe de chien,” harrier's broth.”

From leeks he proceeds to cabbages—of which he says—

“ Cabbages of all species, playing a principal part in the porridge and other dishes, and holding eminent situations among the Dramatis Personæ, from the first act to the catastrophe, in the interesting entertainment of a good dinner, deserve to be particularly mentioned.

“ The Romans are said to have brought into Gallia the use of the green and red ones which they had received from Egypt. But, upon looking more intimately into the case, it appears that the white brassica migrated from the northern region to Italy. Indeed the horticultural art of obtaining that round and close form, which distinguishes some species of this useful plant, does not seem to date farther than the age of Charlemagne. The bigness and rotundity of that head gave origin to the name. Cabus from Caput and Cabbage evidently from Cabus, with the Italian augmentative, accio or aggio—cabbaggio.

“ Chrysippus, a famous physician of Cnidos, wrote upon the multifarious qualities of this Olus, not a single chapter, but a large volume. Galenus and Matthiolus have been very loud in its praise. Pliny, in reckoning the various kinds of cabbage, gives a long account of its virtues, but says little upon its use in cookery, as a noted plant among the esculent ones. Cato is very lavish in his encomiums upon this cruciferous vegetable ; and, with Pythagoras, holds it as a general remedy for all diseases.

“ The red cabbage stewed in veal broth is accounted, upon the continent, a specific cure against pulmonary complaints, and what is called here consumption. Pistachios and calf's lights are added to it. For this purpose red cabbage is especially cultivated in French kitchen-gardens. This reminds us of an anecdote which passed current at the time we heard it :—A young clergyman, rector of a country parish, was called upon to preach a sermon upon a grand solemnity, at which the bishop of the diocese, who was a cardinal, appeared in the Roman purple, surrounded by his clergy in their white surplices. The preacher performed his task to the approbation of every one. After the ceremony, his eminence, meeting him, seemed to wonder at his not having been abashed when in the presence of a cardinal in the full blaze of his red paraphernalia. The simple and honest clergyman replied: "Yoar eminence will cease to wonder, when you know that I learnt my discourse by heart in my garden, and used to practice declamation before a plot of white cabbages, in the centre of which stood a red one."—A preferment was the reward of this answer.

"Were we to attend scrupulously to the Greek adage often quoted and never rightly understood, Δίς κράμβη θάνατος "Twice cabbage brings death," we might be afraid of using it freely in soups and other dishes; but after hunting most strenuously the sense of this saying through the intricate meanders of the Delphini and variorum notes, and other commentators, concerning the following line of Juvenal, Sat. vii. 154.

"Occidit miseros crambe repetita magistros," we must confess that we see no harm in it, and would boldly advise the whole fraternity of snips to go on, undauntedly as they do in their daily and furious onset upon this, their most favourite, mess.

"The signification of the adage remains still unennuciated. Our opinion is that, in the numerous Greek schools erected at Rome the first declension of substantives was κράμβη, ης, η; crambe, crambes rambé, as we have here musa, musæ, musæ, a song, of a song, to a song, as a specimen. The daily repetition of this noun by the hesitating, stammering, simpering schoolboys, must have been exceedingly tiresome, and enough to kill the disgusted masters—experto credo Roberto. Gifford, in his translation of Juvenal, eludes, or rather misunderstands the sense; for he says:

'Like hashed cabbage served for each repast,

The repetition kills the wretch at last;'

however, Juvenal, who points at the Greek proverb, does not explain it."

Innumerable varieties of the soup species are subsequently introduced, amongst which the turtle is not forgotten.

Callipash hinc gustum languentem provocat; indé
Novum ministrat appetitum Callipee.

Potages à la Reine, à l'Ecossaise, à la Xavier, à l'œil de perdrix, &c. &c. &c. all follow in due order, but on these we must not enter. Of all these, beef is, or ought to be, the ground-work—and so no wonder that our author should favour us with a dozen pages all about BEEF. He hints that the ox was worshipped in the proud temples of Memphis, under the name of Apis, solely or chiefly on account of the excellence of the dishes which are formed at his expense—and exhibits a great deal more learning of the same sort. He also appears to have some feelings of regret, in observing how many animals, not unworthy of sharing in those bovine honours, are altogether excluded, in consequence of the foolish prejudices of John Bull. Young ASSES,* he informs us, were served upon the table of Mæcenas himself, when he entertained Augustus and Horace. The Roman epicures, however, certainly delighted, according to the testimony of Pliny, (book 29, chap. 24.) in the flavour of young and well-fattened puppies—which dainty, by the way, still continues to be in vogue among the Chinese and the Esquimaux. Plump and well roasted bats are, at this day, laid on a bed of olives, and served up, to the joy of the Gourmands of the Levant; and Scaliger remarks, that their flavour is sweeter than that of the finest chickens. Frenchmen, we all know, say the same thing of frogs. Hedgehogs were fricasseed in Greece. Hamster rats are fricasseed in Brandenburg; and Laplanders feed on fried squirrels. We ourselves once betted five shillings, that a certain dear friend of ours† would not eat a mouse-pie—and lost. In short, chacun a son gout.

It is a sad mistake in the arrangement of British dinners, that certain of the most precious dishes are invariably introduced at a period when no gastrologer, who does not unite something of the practical powers of the Gourmand with his own theoretical skill, can do them anything like justice. Among these, game of all sorts may be mentioned—and with reverence be it spoken—a roasted goose, although his claim may be dubious to be classed among game. They manage these things better in France. There the goose after his kind, and the partridge after his kind, are sure to make their appearance at a more early stage of the procession—but there the roasted goose, amidst his flood of apple sauce, never appears. The thighs and liver of the goose, however, are learnedly made into pies, and properly truffled, “patés a foies”

* Quere—Whether, had they lived in these days, they would not have been satisfied with cutting up young Whigs or Tories?

† He got through the the task with great ease, and offered, when the pie was done, to eat a mouse roasted in the fur with butter, and oat cake-crumbs, for the same sum—but we declined indulging in any more such experiments.

gras," are reckoned a most delicate article, well worthy of entering almost at the threshold of the feast. Shocking stories are told of the means resorted to by the French gourmets, for the production of that enormous size of liver in which the chief charm of this dish is supposed to consist. But indeed, we need not go so far from home—for we were very well acquainted, not long ago, with a humane gentleman in the west of Scotland, whose kitchen constantly exhibited a shelf of geese, nailed to the wood by the webs of their feet—quite close to the fire. In that situation, there is no doubt they had almost as fair a chance for the liver complaint as the master of the house himself. Spallanzani, as we all know, made a series of experiments to discover how many pins and bullets, &c., a hen could swallow. We think he and our west-country friend ought to have been both of them subjected to some little touches of the LEX TALIONIS. Had Dante known of them, there can be no doubt he would have lodged them together by the side of the main oven of the infernals—the one nailed to a shelf, that his liver might swell—the other devouring corkscrews and metal tooth-picks, ad infinitum.

We have no intention of going regularly through the long string of topics embraced by the annotatory plan of our author. Let our readers be satisfied with a few of the crumbs that fall from his table, such as the following. Talking of pheasants, he says,

"The beauty of the bird when alive, the flavour and quality of his flesh when properly dressed, are too well known to claim a long description in this note. Gastronomers, who have any sort of aversion to a peculiar taste in game properly kept, had better abstain from this bird—since it is worse than a common fowl, if not waited for till it acquires the 'fumet' it ought to have. Whole republics of maggots have often been found rioting under the wings of pheasants; but being radically dispersed, and the birds properly washed with vinegar, every thing went right, and every guest, unconscious of the culinary ablutions, enjoyed the excellent flavour of the Phasian birds."

Of the Tetrax, Tetras, or Cocq de bruyère.

"Heath-cock, is the real name of the moor-cock, and the rest of the black game so well known in the hyperborean parts of Great Britain. Several naturalists of easy credulity have believed and propagated as probable, if not indisputable, that the great Tetrao, or Tetras, the monarch of the wood, perched on the branch of a tree, calls to him his wandering hens; and that, after having dropped some mysterious liquid from his beak, he sends them away properly fit to propagate his royal breed. This bird is also called Gor-cock, red or black game. The following lines allude to the fable hinted in the poem :

Where smooth, unruffled by the northern blast,
The crystal lakes, in Alpine rocks enshrin'd,
Reflect the verdant scene, and gently bathe
With silver waves around the grass-grown feet
Of woody hills : there to his cackling dames,
On blooming heaths and secret lawns dispers'd,
The Gor-cock calls, the sultan of the grove—
On eager wings they fly——

Of herrings he remarks, that when fresh, the French always serve them up with melted butter and plenty of mustard in it—a hint worth attending to.

He then goes on thus about mustard.

“The etymology of mustard ought to be recorded here. In 1382, Philip the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, going to march against his revolted neighbours, and Dijon having furnished for that expedition its quantum of 1000 armed men, the duke, in kind acknowledgment, granted to the town, among other privileges, the permission of bearing his armorial ensigns with this motto, moult me tarde, ‘I long, I wish ardently.’ In consequence of this mark of princely condescension, the Dijonese municipality ordered the arms and motto to be beautifully sculptured over the principal gate of the city, which was done accordingly. But time, tempus edax, and that incessant drop of water which causes the destruction of the hardest stone, non vi sed sæpe cadendo, or some particular accident, having obliterated the middle word me, the remaining ones, moult, tarde, gave occasion to the name in the following manner. For a long lapse of time, the merchants of Dijon have been, and still are, great dealers in sénévé, or, sinapi, (mustard seed) ; and have a method of grinding it with salt, vinegar, and other ingredients, in order to preserve it, and send it to all parts of the world. On their sénévé pots they used to paste a label, ensigned with the Duke of Burgundy’s arms and the motto as it accidentally remained then over the gate of the city, moult-tarde ; hence the name which the sinapi composition has preserved to this day. It might be observed, that the natural pungency of this little seed, expressed in Latin by multum ardet, and in old French by moulte arde, ‘it burns much,’ might be taken as the real thema of the word. But it does not appear that the Dijonese were ever scholars enough as to borrow from the tongue of Cicero a denomination for the object of their trade. However, in latter times, an eminent mustard-manufacturer of that place proved himself somewhat acquainted with Latin, since he wrote jocosely over his shop door, Multum tardat, Divio rixam ; that is, Moult-tarde. Dijonnoise ; ‘Dijon-mustard.’ Pliny pretends that mustard is an antidote against venomous mushrooms. B. xix. ch. 8. & 22.”

Of oysters he says—

"The Athenians held oysters in great esteem. They were not common at Rome, and consequently fetched there a very high price ; yet Macrobius assures us, that the Roman Pontiffs never missed to have them every day on their tables. From the fourth century to the reign of Louis XIV. they were nearly forgotten ; but they soon came again into vogue, and from that time have kept up their reputation. Gastronomers, we know, can swallow three or four dozen before dinner, and then sit down to eat heartily and perhaps better than if they had abstained from them. They clear the stomach of accidental phlegm, increase the gastric juices, and, by their natural coolness, condense the air which may be fixed in the organs of digestion. When good, they are wholesome, but poisonous when bad."

Of lobsters.—

"This crustaceous fish, which, when in season, is delightful for the taste, purity, and firmness of its flesh, grows to a large size, if concealed in the rocky caverns of the deep, it can avoid the rapacity of its enemies, among whom the fisherman is not the least dangerous. Lobsters sometimes measure two feet and upwards ; but Olaus Magnus, Hist. L. 21, c. 34, and Gesner de Piscibus, L. 4, pretend, that in the Indian seas, and on the shores of Norway, lobsters have been found twelve feet long, and six broad, seizing mariners with their gigantic claws, and dragging them along into the deep to devour them ! ! The French proverb says, 'a beau mentir qui vient de loin.'"

The pike he styles "the tyrant, the terror, the destroyer of the fish-pond," and then proceeds :

"The poet represents him dressed, as the French style it, 'au bleu.' Boiled in wine, with onions, carrots, parsley, pepper, and salt, he is allowed to get cold ; and then, laid on a napkin in stateliness, supported by a tray, he takes his situation on the table. It is deservedly reckoned by all Gastronomers very excellent eating. The flesh is white, firm, and tasteful, and the bones (which the French, in all fishes, properly call arrête, from 'arreter,' to stop, because they stop the voracity of the eater) are, in a large subject, so slender, so pliant, that they can easily be put aside, or if accidentally swallowed do no harm. Pikes grow to an astonishing size. The skeleton of one, which weighed 350 pounds, has long been preserved at Mannheim. Thrown in a pond by the Emperor Barbarossa, with a brass elastic collar, he was taken up in 1497, at the surprising age of 267 years. On the collar was engraved the following inscription in Greek :

'I am the first fish which was put into this lake by the hands of the governor of the universe, Frederic II. the 5th of October, 1280.'

Lacépède (Hist des Poissons) pretends that the existence and bulk of fishes and amphibious animals may increase to an incalculable extent."

Next comes asparagus, or sparrow-grass, or, as it is sometimes called for brevity's sake, grass.

“ This vegetable possesses great volatility of parts, and peculiar diuretic powers. The name is of Greek origin, and alludes to its sprouting entirely naked from the ground; that is without cotyledons or leaves.

“ It reminds us of a curious trick which a wag played once upon a countryman, who had no knowledge whatsoever of the existence of such a production as asparagus. They were travelling together, and arrived, on a Friday, at an inn in a small town near Arras, in France, intending to sup and sleep there. The wag asked the landlord what he had to give them? There was nothing in the house but plenty of asparagus and eggs. ‘ Well, then, let us have first an omelet, and whilst we are eating it, boil us some of your best asparagus.’ It was done accordingly: the omelet was served up in a few minutes.—‘ If I cut it in two,’ said the knowing one, ‘ you will draw your share to your plate, and I the other half to mine.’ The countryman bowed assent, the omelet was divided, and declared exceedingly good. Then comes the asparagus. ‘ I do not remember to have ever seen these sorts of things before,’ said the countryman, ‘ how curious they look—are they peculiar to this part of the world?’—Without answering this preliminary question, ‘ We will do,’ said the wag, ‘ as we did before ;’ and he severed the whole bunch in two. By an unperceived whirling of the dish, the white part became the lot of the peasant, who, beginning to tear and chew and masticate to no purpose, declared, with a solemn oath, that as this was the first, it should be also the last time he would attempt to make a meal of asparagus. The wag, of course, enjoyed the whole of the verdant and tender heads of the vegetable.”

From a whole treatise about eggs, we extract a few hints which, we think, may be useful.

“ Sometimes eggs are positively roasted. In countries where wood-fire is constantly used, the cottager half buries his eggs in an upright position in hot ashes upon the hearth; and when a clear dew-drop oozes on the top of the shell, the eggs are fit to be eaten. Ovid was not ignorant of this practice, for he says, Met. viii. 667.

Ovaque, non acri leviter versata favilla.

—New-laid eggs, with Baucis' busy care,
Turn'd by a gentle fire and roasted rare.

DAYDEN.

Gastrologers are of opinion, that, done in this way, eggs have a much better flavour than when boiled. Fancy goes far in matters of taste.

“ After all, the most extraordinary manner of cooking eggs is, as it stands recorded, to turn them round in a sling till they appear slightly boiled. This was, we are told, an Egyptian custom. A more credible assertion is, that long eggs contain a male sperm, but this we also doubt; although Horace declares that the same opinion was indisputably held by the epicurean ‘ bon-vivants’ in his time. However, the Schola Salernitana gives a good precept as to the choice of eggs:—

Si sumas ovum molle sit atque novum.

If thou takest an egg, let it be soft and new.

"The surest mode of trying an egg is to apply the tip of the tongue to the blunt end ; if it feels warm, and the acute end cold, it is a proof that no fermentation has yet taken place."

There is a very entertaining little appendix on the subject of wine, which sets out with observing, that the words, wine, English, wein, German, vin, French, vinum, Latin, and οἶνος, Greek, are all sprung from the Hebrew יין. He says—

"Before, and even since the introduction of 'Gascoygne' wine into this island, vineyards were well cultivated and thriving in several parts of the kingdom ; for we find, that a certain quantity of wine is ordered to be paid instead of rent to the chief lord of a vineyard—Vinagæium, i. e. Tributum a vino. Mon. Angl. 2 Tom. 980. But, in course of time, Bacchus courteously gave room for the pursuits of Ceres, and the golden harvest of corn superseded the purple produce of the vintage.

"It is an erroneous idea to suppose that white wine is exclusively the produce of white grapes. Fermentation alone determines the colour. The juice contained in both the white and red grape is nearly as colourless as water ; except in one peculiar species, which is called the dyer, 'raisin teinturier,' the liquor of which is of a purple hue, as deep as that of the mulberry. It is used as an auxiliary to deepen the tint of red wine. If the juice of the grapes, which have been gently pressed by the feet of men in the tub at the vineyard, is drawn off in casks, and allowed to ferment without the skin, the seeds, and the stalks, which contain the colouring elements, the wine will certainly be white. On the contrary, if the liquor is left to ferment with them, the wine must be red. If the fermentation of the white liquid is stopt in proper time, the wine becomes brisk and sparkling, on account of the quantity of fixed air which is confined within it : if this air, a sort of gas, is permitted to evaporate, the wine becomes still and quiet ; in this with a few practical exceptions, consists the whole mystery. Wines require more or less time to ripen in the casks, in order to let the lees settle at the bottom ; and the art principally lies in the knowledge of the proper time to bottle the wine. A thick crust does not always show that the wine is good, but often that it has been bottled too soon. White wines produce no crust ; a proof that the grossest parts are lodged in the skin, seeds, and stalks of the grapes.

"The practice of clarifying wine before it is bottled off by means of whites of eggs, was known to the ancients. But Horace, though a practical gourmet, was not well acquainted with the theory of the art, for he mistakes, Sat. 2. 4. the yolk for the white as used for this purpose.

"Several authors of tried knowledge have, in other countries as well as in this, written scientific and interesting dissertations upon the wines of the ancients, to which we refer the Gastronomer reader, confining ourselves to the names of some of those which are particularly esteemed in our days.

“As to the product of the grapes, it can not be denied, that France has long borne the palm in the contest; and the wines of that fruitful kingdom may be classed under three principal heads, Burgundy, Champagne, and Languedoc, or Meridional wines, which may be also subdivided into three species, mousseux, tranquille, and sucre ;* brisk, still, and sweet.

“So great was the repute of some of these wines, that in 1652 a public Thesis was held at the Faculty of Medicine, to decide the mighty question, which of the two was best, ‘Bourgogne, or Champagne.’ As for the ‘Vins de Gascogne, Bordeaux, Provence,’ &c., the quantity which is exported has always been so considerable, that according to Froissart, as early as 1372, upwards of 200 ships were annually and exclusively freighted with this commodity.

“Besides these, several ‘vins de liqueurs’ are imported from France; as Ciotat, St. Laurent, Lunel, Frontignac, &c. Spain, Portugal, and the island of Madeira, offer us a considerable supply; and the banks of the Rhine and the Moselle enliven, with their produce, the tables of the Gastronomers of all polite nations.”

So much for this very clever little work, which the extracts we have made cannot fail to recommend in particular to our classical and travelled readers. We have seldom met a greater display of elegance and ingenuity than the versification of the poem itself exhibits, nor with a more easy vein of amusement than in the notes. The book appears to have been written a long while ago, and is anonymous. But we dare say the author must be well known at one or other of the universities.

Of all the sensitive beings that people this earth, man, unquestionably, experiences most suffering.

Nature originally doomed him to suffer by the nakedness and delicacy of his skin, the form of his feet, and by the instinct of war and destruction, which accompanies the human race wherever it has been found.

The brute creation has not been visited by this malediction ; and but for a few exceptions, arising from the instinct of reproduction, pain in the state of nature would be absolutely unknown to the greater part of the species, whereas man, who can only experience a temporary pleasure, and that by a very few organs, is liable, at all times, and in every part of his body, to suffer the most excruciating torture.

This decree of fate is still aggravated by a number of diseases which have sprung from the habits of the people, so that the most exquisite pleasure can never, either in intensity, or duration, compensate for the great suffering which accompanies some disorders, such as gout, tooth-ache and rheumatic pains, strangury, and that which is caused by the severe system of punishment in use amongst some nations.

It is this very dread of pain that causes man, without his perceiving it, to throw himself blindly into the opposite extreme, and makes him passionately cling to the few pleasures which nature has placed within his reach.

It is for this same reason that he wishes to increase them, that he forms them and indulges in them—in a word, that he adores them, since during the reign of idolatry, and for many centuries, all pleasures were looked upon as minor deities, presided over by superior gods.

The severity of new forms of religion did away with this patronage ; Bacchus, Cupid, Comus and Diana are no longer but poetical souvenirs ; yet the custom still prevails, for under the most serious forms of our belief we see marriages, baptisms, and even funerals made the scenes of festivity.

Repasts, according to our interpretation of the word, commenced with the second age of the human race, that is when it discontinued to live on fruit. The preparation and distribution of food obliged the family to assemble ; the father distributed to his children the produce of the chase, and the children rendered the same service to the father when old.

Those meetings, at first confined to members of the same family, were extended by degrees to neighbours and friends.

Afterwards, when the human race had extended, the weary traveller was entertained at these primitive repasts, and related what he knew of distant countries. Thus originated hospitality with its rites, which are reputed sacred by all nations; for there is no people, no matter how barbarous, or uncivilised, who do not consider themselves bound to protect the stranger with whom they consent to share their bread and salt.

It was the repast that must have originated or perfected language, either because it is an opportunity for assembling, constantly occurring; or because the leisure which accompanies and follows the repast begets confidence, and disposes us to talk.

Such, by the nature of things, must have been the elements of the pleasures of the table, so that we should carefully distinguish them from the pleasure of eating which necessarily preceded them.

The pleasure of eating is that direct and actual sensation of a want which is being satisfied.

The pleasure of the table is a reflected sensation, which is produced by the different circumstances of occurrences, places, things and persons connected with the repast.

The pleasure of eating is common to us with the brute; it merely implies hunger, and what is necessary to appease it.

The pleasure of the table is peculiar to the human species: it implies a certain amount of care and attention in the preparation of the repast, in the selection of the place, and the assembling of the guests.

The pleasure of eating requires, if not to be hungry, at least to have an appetite; and the pleasure of the table is often independent of both one and the other.

These two states may be observed at our repasts.

At the first course everybody eats greedily, without speaking, or paying any attention to what may be said; and whatever rank in society the individual may occupy, he forgets everything but to take part in the great work of the moment. But when hunger begins to be satisfied, reflection dawns, conversation is commenced, a new order of things takes place; and he who before did nothing but eat, becomes more or less an agreeable guest, according as the great Dispenser of all things has given him the means.

The pleasure of the table does not permit rapturous transports of joy and ecstasy, but it gains in duration what it loses in intensity, and it is particularly remarkable for the privilege it enjoys of disposing us for all the others, or at least consoling us for their loss.

For we observe that after a good and well-regulated repast, both mind and body are particularly at ease.

Physically, for as soon as the brain is refreshed, the whole countenance brightens up, the colour is heightened, the eyes become brighter, and a gentle warmth is diffused through the entire body.

Morally, wit is sharpened by it, the imagination is kindled, and good things are said and circulated; and if La Fare and Saint Aulaire, are transmitted to posterity with the reputation of clever writers, they owe it to the fact of their being agreeable guests.

Besides, we often see united at the same table every variety which hospitality, in its broadest sense, has introduced amongst us,—love, friendship, business, speculation, power, solicitation, patronage, ambition, intrigues: this is why the festive board comprises everything, and that it produces fruit of every flavor.

Industrial accessories.—It is a necessary consequence of these antecedents, that all human industry has been brought to bear on increasing the intensity and duration of the pleasure of the table.

Poets complained that the neck being too short was an obstacle to the pleasure of eating and drinking; others regretted that the stomach was too small; and man has succeeded in delivering this organ from the duty of digesting the first repast, to have the pleasure of enjoying a second.

This was the final experiment to perfect the pleasure of taste; but if, on the one hand, we have not been able to pass the bounds placed by nature, we have had recourse to accessories which, at least, admitted of more latitude.

Vases and cups were ornamented with flowers; the guests were even crowned with them. Banquets were held under the canopy of heaven, in gardens and groves, in presence of the wonders of nature.

To the pleasures of the table were added the charms of music and the sounds of instruments. Thus, while the court of the King of Phœnice were at table, Pheonius sang the praises and the achievements of the warriors of past ages.

Frequently, too, dancers, jugglers, and mimics, of both sexes, and of every costume, amused the eye without diminishing the enjoyments of taste; the most exquisite perfumes filled the air; they even went so far as to have unveiled beauty introduced at those banquets, so that the whole of the senses were invited to take part in an enjoyment which had become universal.

We have adopted, more or less, according to circumstances, those various ways of contributing to our pleasures, and we have also added those supplied us by new discoveries.

No doubt, our refined manners could not tolerate the custom of vomiting, practised by the Romans; but we have done better, and we have arrived at the same end by a system sanctioned by good taste.

Dishes have been invented, so delicate and enticing, that they constantly create an appetite; they are, at the same time, so light that they are most agreeable to the taste, without overloading the stomach. Seneca would have said, Nubes esculentas.

Such is the extent to which we now carry our social enjoyments that if the necessity of business did not compel us to rise from table, or if the want of sleep did not interpose, there would be almost no end to our repasts, and we should have no fixed rule by which to determine the time that might elapse between the first glass of Madeira and the last glass of punch.

However, we must not believe that all those accessories are indispensable to constitute the pleasures of the table. We enjoy those pleasures in almost their entire extent, whenever we are able to unite the four following conditions:—meat, at least passable, good wine, agreeable guests, and sufficient time.

It is thus that we have often wished we had been able to assist at the repast which Horace intended for his neighbour whom he had invited, or for the traveller, who might have been compelled by bad weather to take shelter in his house, namely, a good fowl, a kid (very fat, no doubt), and, for dessert, grapes, figs, and nuts, with some of the wine made under the consulship of Manlius, (nata mecum consule Manlio), with these, and the conversation of this genuine poet, we think our supper would be a most agreeable one:—

“ At mihi cum longum post tempus veneret hospes,
Sive operum vacuo, longum conviva per imbrem
Vicius, benè erat, non piscibus urbe petitis,

Sed pullo atque hædo, tum pensilis uva secundas
Et nux ornabat mensas, cum duplice ficu."*

It is even thus that six friends would regale themselves at the present day, on a boiled leg of mutton and a kidney, washed down with good clear orleans or madoc wine, in France, or genuine port, in England, or glorious whiskey in Ireland; and after spending the evening in free and pleasing conversation, they would forget that there were rarer dishes or better cooks in the world.

On the contrary, no matter how exquisite the meats may be, or how sumptuous the accessories, there is no real pleasure if the drink be bad, the guests indiscriminately selected, with melancholy faces, and the dinner eaten in a hurry.

Next to eating, that prince of eaters, Sancho, thought SLEEP the best of human goods, as witness his "God bless the man that first invented sleep."

Although there are some men so constituted that we might say they never sleep, it is, however, certain that sleep is as necessary as it is to gratify hunger or thirst. The sentinels on the advanced posts of an army have been known to fall asleep while throwing snuff in their eyes to keep awake; and Pichegru, when pursued by the detectives of Buonaparte, gave 80,000 francs for one night's sleep, during which, however, he was betrayed and arrested.

Sleep is that state of torpor or supineness, in which man, when removed from exterior objects by the forced inactivity of the senses, lives but mechanically.

Sleep, like night, is preceded and followed by two twilights; the first of which leads to absolute inertia, the second brings us back again to active life.

We shall endeavour to account for those two phenomena.

At the moment when we are attacked by sleep, the organs of the senses, by degrees, cease to act; first the taste; then sight and smell; the sense of hearing is still awake, and the touch always; for it serves to warn us, by the sensation of pain, of the danger to which the body may be exposed.

Sleep is always preceded by a sensation more or less pleasing; the body yields to it readily with the certainty of being soon refreshed, and the soul abandons itself to it with confidence, in the hope of being relieved from toil and activity.

* The dessert is accurately denominated and alluded to by the adverb tum, and by the words, secundas mensas.

It is from not having properly understood this sensation, that the most learned men have compared sleep to death, which all living creatures resist by every means in their power, and which is accompanied by such peculiar symptoms as to terrify even the brute creation.

Like all pleasures, sleep becomes a passion, for some are known to sleep the three-fourths of their lives; and then, like all other passions, it produces but fatal effects, such as laziness, indolence, debility, stupidity, and even death.

The school of St. Salerno only allowed seven hours' sleep, without distinction of age or sex; this is too severe, for allowance should be made for children, as a matter of necessity, and for females, from a consideration of what is due to their sex; but it may be taken as granted that to spend more than ten hours in bed is to indulge in sleep to excess.

In the first moments of sleep our will is still free—we might awake—and thought has not yet lost all its power. Non omnibus dormio, said Mæcenas, a state of which many a husband has had unpleasant experience. Some ideas still occur to us, but they are of an incoherent nature; we experience uncertain glimmerings, and we see floating around ill-formed objects. But this state does not last long, all soon disappears, all confusion is at an end, and we fall into a sound sleep.

What is the soul doing all this time? It lives within itself; it is like the pilot during a calm, like a mirror in the dark, like a lute which is not being played on,—it is ready for fresh excitement,

However, some physiologists, and, amongst others, the count de Redern, assert that the soul is never inactive, and the latter gives as a proof that a man who is suddenly roused from his first sleep feels the sensation of a person who is interrupted in an operation in which he was seriously occupied.

This observation is well founded, and deserves our serious attention.

However, this state of absolute prostration does not last long (it rarely exceeds five or six hours); the body gradually recovers its strength, an undefined sensation of existence begins to dawn, and the sleeper passes into the region of dreams.

Dreams are those impressions which the soul experiences without the assistance of exterior objects.

These phenomena, which are so common, and at the same time so extraordinary, are, however, but little understood.

The fault lies at the door of the learned, who have not sufficiently explained them. This, no doubt, will be done in the course of time, and the two-fold nature of man shall be better understood.

In the actual state of science it is admitted that there exists a fluid as insinuating as it is powerful, which imparts to the brain the impressions received by the senses, and that it is from the excitement produced by these impressions that we have our ideas.

Absolute sleep is caused by the deperdition and inertia of this fluid.

We may suppose that the operation of digestion and assimilation, which continues during our sleep, provides against this loss, so that there is a time when man, though he have all that is necessary for action, is not yet influenced by exterior objects.

Then the nervous fluid, insinuating by its nature, is transmitted to the brain by means of the nervous tubes; it flows into the same place, and by the same tracks, since it arrives by the same way; it must, therefore, produce the same effects, but with, however, less intensity.

The cause of this difference seems to us easily accounted for. When man awake is affected by an exterior object, the sensation is clear, sudden, and necessary; the entire organ is in motion. On the contrary, when the same impression is transmitted to him during sleep, it is only the exterior portion of the nerves that is affected; the sensation must, therefore, be less intense, less determined.

In plainer words, while man is awake the entire organ is affected, but when asleep, it is only that part which is next the brain that is acted upon.

When the nervous fluid is thus carried to the brain, it flows to it through those channels destined for the exercise of some of our senses; this is the reason why it produces there certain sensations, or a series of ideas, sooner than others. Thus we fancy that we see, when the optic nerve is affected, that we hear when it is the auditory nerve, &c.; and it may be noticed as a singular fact, that it is at least very rare that the sensations we experience when dreaming have any relation to either taste or smell; for instance, when we dream about a parterre, or a meadow, we see the flowers without perceiving the perfume ; and if we imagine ourselves assisting at a banquet, we see the meats, but we do not enjoy the taste.

It would be a study worthy of the most learned to examine why it is that there are two of our senses which do not affect the soul during sleep, whilst the others act nearly as when awake. We know of no physiological work on this subject.

It may also be remarked that the more those sensations which we experience in sleep affect us internally, the stronger they are. Thus the most sensual ideas are nothing when compared with the grief we feel when we dream of having lost a favourite child, or that we are going to be hanged. In such cases we awake either covered with sweat, or bathed in tears.

However extravagant or capricious be those ideas which occur to us in sleep, we shall see, on examining them closely, that they are but remembrances, or a combination of remembrances. We are inclined to say that dreams are but the memory of the senses.

The strangeness of dreams, then, merely consists in the unnatural association of ideas, which has no regard to dates, time, or place ; we never dream of anything of which we have not some previous knowledge.

We would not be so much surprised at the strange nature of our dreams if we reflected that when man is awake he has four senses reciprocally watching over, and directing each other, the sight, hearing, the touch, and memory ; whereas, when he is asleep, each of the senses is left to its own resources.

We might compare these two states of the brain to a piano, at which a musician is seated, who, throwing his fingers carelessly along the notes, plays an air from memory, which he could render perfectly harmonious if he used all his efforts. This comparison might be further extended by adding, that reflection is to the ideas what harmony is to sound, and some ideas produce others, just as one principal sound contains others of minor importance.

In allowing ourselves to be thus imperceptibly carried away by a subject interesting in itself, we find ourselves touching on the system of Gall, who taught and maintained that the organs of the brain are of a multiform nature.

We must not go any farther with this subject, or transgress our limits ; but we may here note two observations, given to us by a very learned French savant, now no more :—

About the year 1790, there lived in a village called Gevrin, in the district of Belley, a trader, a remarkably sharp fellow, named Landot, who had acquired a considerable fortune. He was suddenly attacked by such a fit of paralysis that he appeared to be dead. The faculty took him in hands, and he recovered, but not entirely, for he had lost nearly all his intellectual faculties, particularly his memory.

However, he was able to crawl along, and as he had recovered his appetite, he continued to manage his own affairs.

As soon as he was known to be in this state those who formerly had dealings with him thought the time had arrived to be avenged; and with the pretext of coming to keep him company, they came from all directions, to propose bargains by purchasing, selling or exchanging, and such other matters as had been up to that time the subject of their usual trade. But those besiegers soon found themselves mistaken, and that it was necessary to reduce their terms.

The cunning old man had lost none of his commercial skill, and the same man who did not recognise his servants, and sometimes, even forgot his own name, knew the current prices of the day, and the value of every perch of meadow, vineyard or forest, within three leagues round.

On those subjects his judgment was unimpaired, which, as it was but little suspected, the greater number of those who were endeavouring to entrap the feeble old merchant, were themselves taken in the snares they had prepared for him.

Second Case.

There lived at Belley a M. Chirol, who had served a long time in the life guards, both under Louis xv. and Louis xvi.

His intelligence was equal to the services he had had to perform all his life; but he was particularly remarkable for his skill in gambling, to which he was passionately addicted, so that he was not only master of all the old games, such as ombre, piquet, and whist, but when a new one was introduced, he thoroughly understood it after the third round.

This M. Chirol was also attacked by a fit of paralysis, and in such a manner that he fell into a state of almost complete insensibility; however, two of his faculties were spared, for he could both eat and play.

He regularly visited every day a house in which he had been accustomed to play for twenty years, and seating himself in a corner, remained motionless, and apparently half asleep, without noticing what was passing around him.

As soon as the game was introduced he was invited to form one of the party, which he invariably did, as he struggled towards the table, and then it might be seen that though he was deprived, by paralysis, of nearly all his faculties, he never on that account lost one point of the game. Shortly before his death M. Chirol gave a convincing proof of his skill at play.

When at Belley, I received a visit from a M. Delins, if I remember well, a banker from Paris. He was the bearer of several letters of introduction, and being a stranger and from Paris, was more than sufficient, in a small village, to make everyone most anxious to be as agreeable to him as possible,

M. Delins was both a gambler and fond of the pleasures of the table. With regard to the latter he had nothing to complain of, for he was entertained regularly for five or six hours at table ; but it was more difficult to amuse him at play. He was passionately fond of piquet, and proposed playing for five or six francs a fish, which was considerably higher than what we were accustomed to play for.

To surmount this difficulty, a society was formed, in which each took an interest according as he expected to win or lose ; some asserted that the Parisians were more skilful players than the provincials ; others on the contrary maintained that the inhabitants of Paris were simple stupid fellows. However, the society was formed ; and who was charged to organise it, and watch over the common interest ? M. Chirol.

When the Parisian banker saw the tall, pale and sickly figure approach, walking on one side, and taking his seat opposite him, he first considered it a joke, but when he observed the masterly way in which the spectre handled and shuffled the cards, he began to think that he might formerly have been an adversary worthy of him

He did not long remain under this mistake, for, not only in this game but in several others which followed, M. Delins was beaten, overpowered and fleeced, in such a manner, that before he left, he had to pay down more than six hundred francs, which were carefully divided amongst the members of the society.

Before leaving M. Delins came to thank me for the kind reception he had met with, but he frequently alluded to the decrepid state of his opponent, and he assured me he could never forgive himself for having been so shamefully beaten by a dead man.

The consequence of those two observations may be easily deduced : It appears to me quite evident that the paralytic stroke, which in those two instances, had affected or deranged the brain, left unimpaired the portion of that organ which had been so long devoted to the combination of business and gambling ; and no doubt that portion had resisted only because it had derived more strength from constant exercise, or still more, because it was more powerfully affected by the same impressions having been so frequently repeated.

Age has a decided effect on the nature of dreams.

In our childhood we dream of toys, gardens, flowers, verdure, and other pleasing objects ; later, of pleasures, love intrigues, battles, marriages ; later, of settling ourselves, travels, favours from princes or their representatives ; and later still, we dream of business, difficulties, wealth, past pleasures, and long-deceased friends.

Sleep and dreams are sometimes accompanied by strange phenomena, the examination of which may tend to advance the study of anthroponomy ; and it is on this account that I will insert here the result of three observations, which I have selected from many others, which I have had occasion to make on myself, during a long life, in the silence of night.

I dreamt, one night, that I had the secret of freeing myself from the laws of gravitation, so that I could either ascend or descend at pleasure.

It was a delightful sensation ; and perhaps many persons have had similar dreams. But what I think most remarkable is, that I remember to have perfectly understood (so it appeared to me at least), the means by which I arrived at this result, which seemed to me so simple, that I was only surprised they were not sooner discovered.

On awaking, I had quite forgotten the solution, but the conclusion remained ; and from that time I found it impossible to dissuade myself that sooner or later, some more enlightened genius will make the discovery ; at all hazard I have taken a note of the circumstance.

Second Observation—It is only a month since I experienced, while asleep, a most peculiar sensation of pleasure. It consisted of a delicious tremor in every part of my body. It was a kind of delightful stinging sensation, which, beginning in the epidermis, from the feet to the head, affected me even in the marrow of my bones.

I fancied I saw a violet flame playing round my head.

‘ Lambere flamma, comas, et circum tempora pasci. ’

I am of opinion that this condition, which I very sensibly felt, lasted about thirty seconds, and I awoke in a state of astonishment, bordering on terror.

From this sensation, which is yet quite fresh in my memory, coupled with other observations which have been made on ecstasies and nervous people, I have come to the conclusion, that the limits of pleasure are neither known, or fixed, and that we do not yet know to what a degree the human body may be beatified. I hope that, some centuries hence, physiologists will take up these extraordinary sensations, and will procure them at pleasure, in the same manner as we invite sleep by opium, and that by these means our posterity will be compensated for the frightful sufferings we are sometimes subject to.

The proposition which I have just put forward, is somewhat supported by analogy ; for I have already observed that the power of harmony, which affords such intense pleasure, so pure, and evidently so much sought after, was entirely unknown to the Romans ; it is a discovery which is not more than five hundred years old.

Having gone to bed, one night, in the year 1800, without having experienced anything remarkable during the day, I awoke about one o'clock in the morning, the usual time for my first sleep ; I found myself in a state of cerebral excitement, altogether extraordinary. My conceptions were strong, and my ideas profound ; the sphere of my intelligence seemed to have been extended. I sat up in the bed, and my eyes were affected by the sensation of a pale, hazy and undefined light, which in no way assisted in distinguishing the surrounding objects.

From the number of ideas which rapidly succeeded each other, I should think that this state lasted several hours, but, according to my time-piece, I am certain it only continued for half an hour, or a little longer. I was rescued from it by an incident, exterior, and independent of my will ; my attention was drawn to the things of this earth.

Immediately, the luminous sensation disappeared, I felt myself sinking, the limits of my intelligence became contracted, in a word,

I was myself again. But as I was quite awake, my memory, although feebly, retained a portion of the ideas which crossed my mind.

The first related to time. It seemed to me that the past, present, and future were one, and met at the same point, so that it could be just as easy to foresee the future, as to remember the past. This is all that I retained of this first vision, which was partly effaced by what followed.

My attention was afterwards directed to the senses, which I classified in the order of their perfection; and having come to the conclusion, that we should have as many internally as externally, I set about finding them.

I had already found three, and almost four, when I fell on the earth, namely,

1st. Compassion, which is a sensation we experience when we witness the sufferings of another.

2nd. Predilection, which is a preference, not only for a particular object, but for everything belonging to that object, or which reminds us of it.

3rd. Sympathy, which is also a feeling of preference which draws two objects together.

It may be said, on a first consideration, that those two sentiments are but one and the same thing; but what does not admit of their being confounded is, that predilection is not always reciprocal, whereas sympathy is necessarily so.

Finally, when considering compassion, I was led to an induction, which I believe to be very correct, and which, at another time, I should not have thought of, which is, that it is from compassion we derive this fine theorem, the principal basis of all our laws.

‘Ne fais pas aux autres ce que tu ne voudrais pas qu'on te fit.’

Do as you would be done by.

Alteri ne facias quod tibi fieri non vis.

Such is the idea I retained of the state I was in, and of the sensation I experienced on the occasion, that I would willingly give, if it were possible, all the time I have to live, for one month of such existence.

I will be more easily understood by the learned than by others; for there are few who have not more or less, experienced something similar.

When warm in bed, in a horizontal position, the head well covered, we are thinking of the work we have in hands, the imagination becomes heated, ideas abound, expressions follow, and as we must get up to write, we dress, throw aside our night-cap, and place ourselves at the desk.

But suddenly we are no longer the same, the imagination gets cold again, the thread of our ideas is broken, language fails us, and we have difficulty in finding what before appeared so easy, and it very often happens that we are obliged to put off the work for a more propitious moment.

All this admits of an easy explanation, considering the effect the change of position and temperature has on the brain; and here we have again a proof of the influence the state of the body has on the mind.

Man, whether he is reposing, sleeping, or dreaming, is constantly under the influence of the laws of nutrition, and never leaves the dominion of gastronomy.

Theory and experience combine in proving that the quantity and the quality of food have a powerful effect on labour, repose, sleep, and dreams.

The man who is badly fed cannot long endure the fatigue of constant labour; his body is saturated with sweat, his strength soon forsakes him; and for him repose is merely an incapacity for labour.

In the case of mental labour, the ideas present themselves without vigour or precision, and we want both reflection and judgment to analyse them: the brain is exhausted by vain efforts, and we fall asleep in the struggle.

We have been always of opinion that the suppers of Auteuil, as well as those of the Hotels de Rambouillet and Soissons, must have been of great service to the writers of the age of Louis XIV.; and the clever Geoffroy, (if it were true) was not so much mistaken when he ridiculed the poets of the end of the eighteenth century, on their sugar and water, which he considered to be their favorite drink.

On those principles we have examined the works of some authors whom we have known to be poor and in want, and we certainly never found their works to possess any energy, except when they appeared to be stimulated by the consciousness of their habitual suffering, or by want, often but ill-disguised.

On the contrary, he who lives well, and who renews his lost strength with prudence and discretion, can endure an amount of fatigue which no other living creature can bear.

Napoleon, the evening before his departure for Boulogne, had laboured for thirty hours, both with his council of state, or his minister, without any other refreshment, but two short repasts and a few cups of coffee.

Browne makes mention of a clerk in the English Admiralty who, having lost by accident some state papers at which he alone could be employed, spent fifty-two consecutive hours in re-drawing them out. He could never, without an appropriate system, have been able to resist such fatigue. The following is the system he adopted:—first he drank water, then he took some light food, then wine, jellies, and soup, and finally opium.

We one day met a courier whom we had known in Algeria, and who had just returned from Spain, when he had been sent with a despatch by the Government (curreo ganando horas). He had accomplished the journey in ten days, having only remained in Madrid for four hours, and all he had taken during this continued jolting, and want of sleep, was a few glasses of wine, and some soup: he added, that if he taken more substantial food he could not possibly get to the end of his journey.

Diet has not a less influence on sleep and dreams.

He who is hungry cannot sleep; the pangs of the stomach keep him in a painful waking state, and if, through weakness or exhaustion, he falls asleep, it is light, disturbed and interrupted.

He, on the contrary, who in his repast, has indulged immoderately, immediately falls into a sound sleep; if he dreams he has no recollection of it, because the nervous fluid meets in every point in the sensitive organs. For the same reason, he awakes suddenly, and with difficulty returns to social life; and long after sleep is gone, he still suffers from indigestion.

It may then be laid down as a general maxim, that coffee dissipates sleep. Custom lessens, and even entirely does away with this inconvenience. But this is always the case with Europeans when first they begin to take it. Some kinds of food, on the other hand, are mild incentives to sleep, such as those in which milk is the principal ingredient, the entire family of lettuces, fowl, puerolian, orange flower, and especially apples when eaten just before going to bed.

Experience, founded on thousands of observations, teaches that diet determines our dreams.

In general all kinds of food that are in any way stimulant cause us to dream; such are dark coloured meats, as pigeons, ducks, wild fowl, and particularly hare.

Asparagus, celery, truffles, perfumed sweetmeats, and especially vanilla, are known to possess this quality.

It would be a great error to suppose that we should banish from our table all those somniferous substances; for the dreams which they produce are in general of a light and agreeable nature, and they prolong our existence, even when it appears to be interrupted.

There are some persons for whom sleep is a kind of other existence, a sort of protracted romance; that is to say, their dreams have a continuation, and they finish in the second night what they commenced the night before, and they see in their sleep certain faces which they remember to have seen before, and which, however, they never met.

To the genuine gourmet, sugar, coffee, and chocolate, are indispensable.

By the progress which science has made up to the present day, we understand sugar to be a sweet substance, capable of being crystallized, and which, by the process of fermentation, becomes an alcohol, and a carbonic acid.

Formerly sugar meant only that thick, crystallized substance produced by the cane (arundo saccharifera).

This plant is a native of India; however, it is certain that sugar was not in common use among Romans; nor did they know anything of its crystallized nature.

We are led to infer from some works of the ancients, that certain plants were known to produce a sweet extractive matter. We read in Lucan—

Quique bibunt tenera dulces ab arundine succos.

But there is great difference between water sweetened by sugar and the cane, and sugar such as we now produce it.

It is in the colonies of the New World that sugar was first discovered, and there it thrives. The sweet juice which was observed to flow from the cane was soon turned to account, and, after various experiments, we have succeeded in extracting from it wine, syrup, brown sugar, molasses, and white sugar of different qualities.

The cultivation of the sugar cane has become an object of the greatest importance; for it is a source of wealth for those who grow it, as well as those who trade in its produce; to the refiner, and even to the government, which derives vast revenue from the duty imposed upon it.

It was the opinion for a long time that sugar could only be produced in tropical climates: but in the year 1740, Margraff discovered it in some plants of the temperate zones, amongst others, the beetroot; and this was afterwards demonstrated by the experiments which Professor Achard made at Berlin.

In the beginning of the nineteenth century, owing to peculiar circumstances, sugar having become scarce, and consequently dear, in France, government instituted an inquiry into its nature and qualities.

The result was complete success: it was found that sugar existed in abundance in the entire vegetable kingdom; it was discovered in the grape, in the chestnut, in the potatoe, and especially in the beetroot.

This last plant soon became extensively cultivated, and the object of numerous experiments, which proved that, in this respect, the old world could dispense with the new. France was soon covered with manufactories which worked with different success, and the art of producing sugar soon became natural to the soil ; a new science which circumstances may one day revive more fully.

Amongst those manufactories, the most remarkable was one which M. Benjamin Delessert established at Passy, near Paris, a respectable citizen whose name was always associated with everything good and useful.

After various skilful operations, he succeeded in overcoming all difficulties, made no mystery of his discoveries, even to those who might be induced to become his rivals ; he was visited by the head of the government, and got an order to supply the Palace of the Tuileries.

Strange circumstances, the restoration and the establishment of peace, having considerably reduced the price of sugar in the colonies, the manufacture of sugar from the beetroot lost a good deal of its importance. However, there were several establishments still doing a good trade ; and M. Benjamin Delessert some years manufactured some thousand tons without loss, which gave him the means of adhering to a system that it might be one day necessary to have recourse to.*

When beetroot sugar was an article of commerce, interested parties, the vulgar and uneducated, found that it had a disagreeable taste, not good for sweetening ; some even went so far as to say that it was unwholesome.

But observations and experiments have proved the contrary ; and the Count Chaptal has given us the result in his valuable work, Chemistry applied to Agriculture, tom 11, p. 13, 1st ed.

“The sugar which we obtain from those different plants,” says this distinguished chemist, “are exactly the same, and differ in no respect when they are brought by the process of refining to the same degree of purity. The taste, the crystallization, the colour, and weight, are altogether identical, and we might defy the most experienced to distinguish one from the other."

* We may here remark that, at its general meeting, the society for promoting national industry presented a gold medal to M. Respel, a manufacturer of Arras, who manufactures upwards of one hundred and fifty thousand kilogrammes of beetroot sugar yearly, in which he carries on a successful trade, even when the price of cane sugar is as low as 2f., 20c. the kilogramme ; the husks which remain after the spirit has been extracted, are used to feed cattle.

We will have a striking example of the effect of prejudice, and of the difficulty we always experience in establishing a truth, when we are told that out of a hundred persons in Great Britain, taken indiscriminately, there are not ten who believe that sugar is produced from beetroot.

Sugar has been introduced into the world by apothecaries. It was destined to play an important part there. It was customary, when speaking of a person who wanted something very essential, to say, "He is an apothecary without sugar."

This was sufficient to make its use popular; some pretended that it excited; others, that it attacked the chest; some, that it predisposed us for apoplexy. But calumny was soon obliged to give way to truth, and it is not more than eighty years since this memorable maxim was given:—Sugar does no harm but to the purse.

Under this impenetrable ægis sugar became daily more in use, and there is no alimentary substance which has undergone so many changes and transformations.

Many persons like to eat raw sugar, and in some cases, the greater part hopeless, the Faculty recommend it in this form, as a remedy which at least has nothing in it repulsive.

Mixed with water it makes a refreshing, wholesome, and agreeable drink, and oftentimes useful as a cure.

When mixed in greater proportion with water, and concentrated by fire, it forms a syrup which admits of all perfumes, and produces in us a cooling effect, always pleasing from its variety.

Mixed with water from which, by the aid of science, we extract the caloric, an Italian discovery, it forms ice, for the introduction of which we are indebted to Catherine de Médicis.

Mixed with wine it gives a cordial, a restorative so prized that in some countries they pour it over the roast joints intended for the table of a new married couple on the wedding day, the same as in Persia they serve up, on like occasions, sheep's trotters in vinegar.

Mixed with eggs and flour it makes biscuits, macaroons, fillips, and that variety of light pastry which constitutes the comparatively new science of the pastry cook.

Mixed with milk it makes creams, blancmanges, and other delicacies which so agreeably terminate the second course, in substituting for the desire of substantial food a fine and sweet perfume.

Mixed with coffee it draws out its aromatic qualities.

Mixed with milk and coffee it affords us a light and agreeable nourishment, easy to be procured. It is admirably adapted to those who are obliged to study immediately after breakfast. Milk and coffee, café au lait, is also much in vogue with the ladies; but the far-seeing eye of science has discovered that its too frequent use would be injurious to them in what they hold most dear.

Mixed with fruit and flowers it produces sweetmeats, marmalade, preserves, patés and candy, a method for preserving, by which we are enabled to enjoy the perfume of those flowers and fruits long after the time nature intended them to last.

Viewed in this last light, perhaps it might be used with advantage in embalming, a practice but yet little known amongst us.

In fine, sugar mixed with alcohol produces spirituous liquors, invented, as we know, to comfort Louis XIV. in his old age; and which, flattering the palate by their strength, and the scent by their fragrance, constitute at this moment the ne plus ultra of the pleasures of taste.

But this is not all. Sugar may be used as a seasoning for everything; it spoils nothing. Some persons use it with meats, sometimes with vegetables, and often with fruit. It is indispensable in those drinks which are most fashionable (à la mode), such as punch, negus, syllabub, and others of exotic origin. It is infinite in its applications, which are modified to suit the taste of nations and individuals.

Such is this substance of which the French of the time of Louis XIII. scarcely knew the name, and which for those of the nineteenth century is become a matter of first necessity; for there is no woman, particularly if she be in easy circumstances, that does not expend more money on her sugar than on her bread.

M. Delacroix, a writer as amiable as he was learned, once complained at Versailles of the high price of sugar, which was then more than 5f. a pound. "Ah!" said he, in a soft and pitiful accent, "if ever sugar is sold again for 30 sous, I shall never drink water without its being sweetened." His prayer was heard; he lived till lately, and we hope he kept his word.

Coffee was first discovered in Arabia, and notwithstanding, the various transplantations which this plant has undergone, it is still from that country the best coffee is procured.

An old tradition says that coffee was first discovered by a shepherd, who observed his flocks to be unusually excited and playful whenever they browsed on the coffee berry.

Whatever credit we may be disposed to give this old story, it is certain the observing shepherd is entitled to but half the honour of the discovery; the other half undoubtedly belongs to the man who first thought of roasting the berry.

A decoction of raw coffee is, in point of fact, an insignificant drink, but carbonization develops in it an aromatic quality, and produces an oil which distinguishes the coffee such as we have it, and which would never be known but for the intervention of heat.

The Turks, who are our masters in this respect, never use the mill to bruise coffee; they pound it in mortars with pestles made of wood, and when these instruments have been long in use, they become precious and are sold at a high price.

We once had several reasons for ascertaining, if in reality there was any difference between those two methods, and which was preferable.

We therefore toasted with the greatest care a pound of the best mocha.

We divided it into two equal parts, one of which we ground, and the other we bruised after the manner of the Turks.

We made coffee of both those powders. We took an equal weight of each, and poured over it an equal weight of boiling water, treating both portions alike in every respect.

We tasted this coffee, and had it tried by the greatest connoisseurs. The unanimous opinion was that the result of the bruised powder was far superior to the other.

Any one may satisfy himself by the experiment. In the meantime we may give a remarkable example of the effect which either of those methods is likely to produce.

“Sir,” said Napoleon, one day to the Senator Laplace, “how is it that a glass of water, in which I put a bit of sugar, appears to me much more agreeable than one in which I put an equal quantity of bruised sugar?” “Sire,” replied the philosopher, “there are three substances whose principles are exactly the same; namely, sugar, gum and starch; they only differ on some conditions which nature has yet kept secret: and I believe it is possible that by means of the collision produced by the pestle some portions of the sugar pass from the state of gum or starch, which causes the difference you have observed."

This circumstance obtained considerable notoriety, and subsequent observations have pronounced in favour of the first method.

Some years ago the best method of making coffee seemed to be an object of general study in France; and this is accounted for by the fact, which was not then generally known, that the head of the state indulged in it to excess.

It was proposed first to make a cold infusion without either toasting, or reducing it to powder, to boil it for three quarters of an hour and then strain it, &c.

We tried all those methods, and even those that have been proposed up to the present time, and from experience we have come to the conclusion that that which is called à la Dubelloy, is the best, which consists in pouring boiling water over the coffee, which we have put into a china or silver vase, perforated with very small holes. We take the first decoction, heat it to boiling point, strain it a second time, and we have as clear and good coffee as we need desire.

Amongst other methods of making coffee we tried that of putting it into a boiling kettle under high pressure; but we were able to obtain a little extract, only fit to scrape the throat of a Cossack.

Doctors have given different opinions concerning the sanitary qualities of coffee, and have not always agreed amongst themselves. We will pass over this difference of opinion, and will only occupy ourselves with what is of more importance, namely, its influence on the organs of thought.

There is no doubt but coffee has a powerful effect on the cerebral organs; and a man who drinks it for the first time, is sure to be deprived of his sleep.

Sometimes this effect is lessened and modified by habit; but there are many who are thus excited by it, and consequently obliged to discontinue its use.

We have stated that this effect was modified by habit, but this does not prevent its affecting us in another way; for we have observed that those who sleep well at night after coffee, required it to keep them awake during the day, and are sure to fall asleep during the evening, if they have not taken coffee after dinner.

There are also many others who are drowsy during the day if they have not taken their cup of coffee since morning.

Voltaire and Buffon were very fond of coffee, and it is possible they are indebted to it, the former for that admirable clearness and perspicuity which characterize his works; the latter for that exalted harmony which we find in his style. It is plain that many pages of the essays on Man, on the Dog, on the Tiger, the Lion, and the Horse, were written in a state of great cerebral excitement.

The want of sleep caused by coffee is not an unpleasant sensation; our ideas are very clear, and we have no desire for sleep. We do not feel so restless or unhappy as when it is produced by some other cause; but it is very probable that this unseasonable and unnatural excitement will be fatal in the long run.

Formerly none but adults took coffee, now every body takes it; and perhaps it is the injurious effect which it has on the mind which hurries on that immense crowd which every day fills the avenues leading to Olympus and the temple of memory.

The shoemaker who was the author of the tragedy, the Queen of Palmyra, and which all Paris was running after, was passionately fond of coffee; he raised himself far above the carpenter of Nevers, who never took exciting drinks.

Coffee is a much stronger drink than is generally believed. A healthy man might live to a good age, drinking two bottles of wine daily, the same man would not live near so long by taking an equal amount of coffee; he would become a lunatic, or would die of consumption.

We saw lately at Leicester square in London, a man who by using coffee to excess, became a cripple; he did not appear to suffer, and was resigned to his condition, having limited himself to five or six cups a day.

It is the imperative duty of all parents strictly to prohibit the use of coffee to their children, if they do not wish to have them become mere withered little machines, stunted in their growth, and old men at twenty.

This advice is particularly applicable to the people of Dublin, whose children are not always as strong and healthy as if they were born in the country, in Tipperary for instance.

We are of those who have been obliged to renounce the use of coffee: and we shall conclude this paragraph in relating a circumstance which particularly brought us under its influence.

Having been required by the head of a department to prepare a certain document, which we wished to do with the greatest care; and having got but very short notice, for he should have it the next day; we determined to sit up all night. In order to provide ourselves against sleep we strengthened our dinner with two large cups of strong and fragrant coffee.

We returned home about seven o'clock to receive the necessary instructions, and instead of the papers we expected we received a letter informing us that in consequence of some, we know not what, red-tape formality, we could not receive them before the following day.

Thus disappointed in the fullest sense of the word, we returned to the house where we had dined, and played a game of piquet without perceiving any of that inattention or absence of mind for which we were remarkable. We were indebted to the strong coffee for this, but in deriving this temporary advantage from it we could not but feel uneasy as to how we were to spend the night.

However, we went to bed at the usual hour, thinking that if we had not a good night's rest at least we might have four or five hours' sleep, which would bring us comfortably enough to the next day. We were much deceived—we were already two hours in bed, and were farther from sleep than ever, in a state of very strong mental excitement, and we compared our brain to a mill whose machinery is in motion, but having nothing to grind.

We felt that we ought to turn this disposition to some account by doing something to invite sleep; and we immediately set about putting into verse a short tale which we had lately read in a French work.

We soon concluded it, and as we were not yet more disposed to sleep than before, we commenced a second tale, but in vain. A dozen lines exhausted our poetical fancy, and we were obliged to give it up.

We therefore passed the night without sleep, not even dozing for a moment. We rose, and spent the day in the same state, without deriving the least relief either from meals or occupation. In a word, when we went to bed again at the usual time we found that we had been forty hours without sleep.

Those who first landed in America were driven there by their thirst for gold. At that time nothing was thought of any value but what was produced from the mines ; agriculture and commerce were in their infancy, and political economy was a thing not yet born.

The discovery of precious metals was of little use then to the Spaniards, since they are depreciated as they multiply, and we have within our reach better resources and surer means of increasing our wealth.

But America, where every variety of climate renders the soil extremely fertile, has been found peculiarly well adapted for the cultivation of the sugar cane, coffee, potatoes, indigo, vanilla, cocoa, &c., and these are the only treasures.

If those discoveries have taken place in spite of the opposition of jealous nations, we may reasonably suppose that they will be increased tenfold in succeeding ages, and that the researches of the learned men of Europe in all unexplored countries, will enrich the three kingdoms with a variety of substances, capable of producing in us sensations like the vanilla, or will increase our elementary resources as cocoa.

Scientific men have agreed to call a mixture produced by the kernal of the cocoa tree roasted, with sugar and cinnamon, chocolate : such is the classical definition of chocolate. Sugar is an indispensable component part of chocolate ; for with cocoa alone we could only produce cocoa-paste and not chocolate. When we add the delicious odour of the aroma to the sugar, cocoa and cinnamon, we have the ne plus ultra of perfection to which this preparation can be brought.

Such are the few substances which taste and experience have substituted for the numerous ingredients which formerly composed chocolate, such as pepper, all-spice, aniseed, ginger, and many others which were often mixed with cocoa.

The cocoa-tree is a native of South America ; but it is also found in the islands and on the continent ; but it is now agreed that the trees which produce the best fruit grow on the banks of the Maracaibo, in the valleys of the Caracas, and in the fertile province of Sokomusco. The kernel is much larger there, the sugar less tart, and the aroma most exquisite.

Since we became more familiar with those countries, we are enabled to make daily experiments, and experienced judges can no longer be deceived.

The Spanish ladies of the New World are passionately fond of chocolate, to such a degree that, not content with taking it several times in the day, they sometimes have themselves supplied with it in church. This love of indulgence has often brought upon them the censure of the Bishops, but they never paid it the slightest attention, and a Theologian, whose metaphysics were as refined as his morality, was an obliging sort of man, and formally declared that chocolate might be taken while fasting, provided it were made on water; thus applying in favour of his fair penitents the old adage, Liquidum non frangit jejunium.

Chocolate was introduced into Spain about the seventeenth century, and soon became very popular in consequence of the decided preference given this agreeable beverage by the ladies, and also by the monks. The habits of the people have not changed in that respect; and even now throughout the Peninsula, it is customary to introduce chocolate, whenever the occasion presents itself and that politeness require, the offer of refreshments.

Chocolate crossed the mountains with Anne of Austria, daughter of Philip II., and wife of Louis XIII. The monks also contributed to introduce it by the presents which they made to their brothers in France. The ambassadors of Spain also assisted in making it popular; and at the beginning of the Regency, it was more generally used than coffee, because then it was taken as an agreeable nourishment, whereas coffee was taken as a drink of luxury, and through a spirit of curiosity.

We are aware that Linnæus calls the cocoa-nut tree theobroma, (the drink of the gods). That he should find this extraordinary quality in chocolate, is a question that was often asked; some attributed it to the fact that the Doctor was passionately fond of it himself; others again attributed it to his gallantry, because it was a queen who first introduced it.

Chocolate has been the subject of many learned discussions, the object of which was to determine its nature and properties, and to place it in the list of our warm, cold, or frugal daily food; and we must confess, however, that those learned researches have done but little for the advancement of science.

But it remains for time and experience, these two great masters, to prove that chocolate, prepared with care, constitutes an element of food as wholesome as it is agreeable; that it is nourishing, and easily digested; that it is not so injurious to beauty as coffee, on the contrary, it improves it; that it is admirably suited to those whose minds are occupied with intense application in the study of the pulpit or the bar, and particularly to travellers; that, in a word, it agrees with the most delicate stomachs; that it has been used with success in chronic diseases; and that it is prescribed as a last resource in diseases of the pylorus.

For these different qualities chocolate is indebted to the fact of its being nothing but an eleosaccharum (an essential oil); there are few substances that contain in equal portions more alimentary particles, which accounts for its being so strengthening.

During the war cocoa was very scarce, and, consequently, dear: it was then it was thought to substitute something else for it, but to no purpose, and one of the blessings of peace was to rid us of all those different mixtures, of which we were obliged to partake to avoid giving pain, and which were no more chocolate than an infusion of chicory is Mocha coffee.

Some complain of not being able to digest chocolate; others, on the contrary, that there is no nourishment in it, and is too soon digested.

It is very possible that the former have only to blame themselves, and that the chocolate which they use is of an inferior quality, and badly manufactured; for good and well made chocolate will always be digested, even by the most delicate stomach.

As to the latter, the remedy is an easy one; let them take at breakfast a small savoury pie, a cutlet, or a kidney à la brochette; let them pour over this a bowl of Sokomusco, and let them thank God for having given them a stomach with such digestive powers.

This gives us an opportunity of offering a suggestion which will be found most useful, and may be received with confidence.

If, when we have well and copiously breakfasted, we immediately take a large cup of chocolate, we are sure to digest perfectly in three hours' time, and we could even dine. We induced several ladies to try this experiment, they having assured us that they suffered much from indigestion. They always found the greatest relief, and were lavish in their praise of our prescription.

Those who use chocolate are found to enjoy the most perfect and constant good health, and are less subject to those diseases which, though trifling, often interfere with our happiness. Their embonpoint is also more stationary, which any one may prove in the society of those with whose habits of living he is familiar. And here we may note the properties of amber chocolate, properties which we have verified by a great number of experiments, the results of which enable us to say:—Let those who have drunk too deep the cup of luxury; let those who may have passed in study a considerable portion of the time which should be given to sleep; let the man of genius, who feels his intellect impaired; let him who finds the air moist, time weigh heavily upon him, and the atmosphere difficult to support; let him who may be suffering from some fixed idea, which prevents his directing his thoughts to any other subject: let all those, we repeat, take about half-a-quart of amber chocolate, with from sixty to seventy-two grains of amber to a pound of chocolate, and then, they may depend upon it, they shall see all but a miracle performed.

Very good chocolate is made in Spain; but its importation into England and France had soon to be discontinued, because as those who were employed in preparing it for use were not all equally skilled, whenever the chocolate was of inferior quality it had to be consumed as it was received.

The Italian chocolate is not adapted to the French; in general they roast the cocoa too much, which makes the chocolate bitter and weak, because a portion of the shell is reduced to a state of charcoal.

Chocolate being much used in France, everybody set about making it, but few were able to bring it to perfection, owing to the difficulty of manufacturing it.

We must first be able to distinguish good cocoa, and use it in all its purity, for in every box, no matter how carefully selected, there is always some of inferior quality, and not properly understanding our own interest, we receive inferior cocoa, which, in all honesty, we should reject.

The toasting of cocoa is a very delicate operation; it requires an amount of tact approaching almost inspiration. There are some who have it by nature, and are rarely deceived.

There is also a particular talent required to determine the quantity of sugar necessary; it should not be invariable, or uniform, but regulated in proportion to the amount of aroma intended to be used in the manufacture of chocolate, and the degree of toasting to which it is intended to subject it.

The pounding and mixing require also equal care and attention, inasmuch as the chocolate will be more or less digestible, according as this operation is perfectly or imperfectly performed.

Other considerations should guide us in the selection and quantity of aromatics, which should not be the same in chocolate intended for food as in that which is to be used as sweetmeats and dainties.

This selection and quantity of aromatics should be also regulated according to the amount of vanilla necessary.

For some time machines have been used in the manufacture of chocolate: we are not of opinion that it is better on that account, but it lessens considerably manual labour, and those who manufacture chocolate by machinery can afford to sell it cheapest. Nevertheless, they sell it sometimes dearer, which goes to prove that the true commercial spirit has not yet taken root in France; for certainly the advantage gained by machinery should be equally profitable to the merchant and the public.

Being an amateur of chocolate, we have gone the round of all the manufactories, and have selected that sold as Chocolate Masson, at 28 Rue de Richelieu.

We must not be surprised at this, for Mr. Masson has brought to his aid, in the manufacture of chocolate, vast information.

The chocolate manufactured by Mr. Masson owes its superiority to a good selection of materials, and a fixed resolution to permit nothing inferior to leave his establishment; while he himself superintends with a masterly eye all the details of the work.

Adhering to a wise doctrine, and by a judicious system, he has also succeeded in producing agreeable remedies for those of his numerous customers who may have a tendency to disease.

Thus, for those who are thin and delicate he has provided a strengthening chocolate, au salep; for those suffering from nervous disease, an antispasmodic chocolate, à la fleur d'orange; for those of an irritable temper, a chocolate of the oil of almonds; to which he will, no doubt, add the chocolate of the afflicted, perfumed and portioned, secundum artem.

But his chief merit is, that he has given us, at a low price, an excellent chocolate for daily use, which affords us a substantial breakfast; and which, when mixed with cream, is so pleasant at dinner, and refreshes us in the evening in ices, croquettes, and other dainties of the drawingroom, not to mention the charming, fun-provoking pastilles and lozenges with or without mottoes.

Here our paper ends, but if it have made the reader smile, surely it has also instructed him in that very important point of "knowing and being," namely, how to enjoy life, and how to render his very repast a medicine. We say to him, or to her, in conclusion, as Sir William Temple says in his essay on Health and Long Life,—"Thus have I traced whatever has fallen in my way or thoughts to observe concerning life and health, and which I conceived might be of any public use to be known and considered: and it may at least pass like a Derbyshire charm, which is used among sick cattle, with these words,—'IF IT DOES THEE NO GOOD, IT WILL DO THEE NO HARM.'"

ART. II.—ABOUT SCULPTURE.

Guide to the Crystal Palace and its Park and Gardens. By Samuel Phillips. A newly arranged and entirely revised Edition. By F. K. J. Shenstone. London: Bradbury and Evans, 1858.

One day, last October, we were standing in the National Gallery, before Murillo's St. John and the Lamb, wondering that one who could create such marvellous effects of chiaroscuro, of coloring and of texture, and yet could, in the Saviour's friend, make us see only a peasant boy. Any Christian can understand what the picture means; it has been wood-cutted, and engraved over and over again; around us were glorious pictures, but pictures for the full enjoyment of which some knowledge of history or of art was necessary. As we stood before the Murillo, there came to "look at" it, a man about forty years of age, and his little son about five or six years old. They had all that half-wandering, half-stupified expression so common amongst the mass of visitors to our public museums, the class who are at home at Madame Tussaud's. The little boy said, pointing to the picture, "What is that, Pa?" Pa reads the name on the frame and says, "St. John and Lamb;" and after a second or two, lost in his case, in looking at the picture, says, "should you like a cut of lamb, dear," and so they go on to view the Venuses and Susannahs with perhaps Hollywell-street eyes.

This man was but the type of eighty per cent. of those who visit our public galleries. The mutilated statues of the Crystal Palace, the putty additions, the scribbled comments in the alcoves, all prove how coarse the popular mind yet remains; but the national system of exclusivism, and the national system which has made the possession of shillings, not the possession of taste, the test of admission to all great art exhibitions, are alone to blame.

Iguorance of some of the most important and interesting facts connected with art, particularly sculpture, is as common amongst the would-be learned as are a deficiency of taste and want of appreciation amongst the unlearned, and possibly there are reasons for this state of things.

Considering the excellence which the ancients attained in the fine arts, it is astonishing how little has been transmitted to posterity respecting the works and methods of their most distinguished artists ; of the methods of their sculptors we literally know nothing ; indeed we believe that many a learned fellow imagines that Phidias and Praxiteles actually worked with the chisel and mallet in their hands, hewing out the statue within the block, with no other guide or model than the idea in their own minds. We recollect to have read somewhere, that Michael Angelo laboured with such enthusiastic fury to get his statues extricated from the encasing rubbish, that it was quite marvellous to see him ! Nothing, however, can be more ridiculous than the supposition of this species of the Cæsarian operation in sculpture ; an art which requires the utmost patience and minute carefulness, and in which the merit of the artist consists in preparing the clay model. It is the artizan who fashions the marble ; an humble species of mechanical industry scarcely removed from the toil of the common stone-cutter—the task of the labourers in the workshops of a Canova and a Gibson.

But what renders the methods of the ancient sculptors still more curious as an object of inquiry, is, that, without tools of steel or tempered iron, they should have been able to work with so much felicity not only in marble, but even in the harder substance of the precious stones. Their dexterity appears still more extraordinary when we reflect that it is necessary to employ the magnifying glass to inspect the minute beauty of many of their gems, cameos, intaglios, and medals. It is almost inconceivable how such works could have been produced without the aid of spectacles or the magnifying lens. That they possessed the magnifying mirror is extremely probable, for their looking-glasses being made of metal, it was almost a necessary result that they should discover the magnifying power of a polished concave surface. By some reflex application of the concave mirror their gem engravers may have been assisted ; and we think it would not be difficult still to ascertain in what manner this was done. It has been supposed that in some instances they employed a drop of pellucid water in the perforation of a piece of metal ; but we cannot, however, form any very distinct notion of the manner in which this magnifying power could be rendered useful to an engraver. But a pretty discovery of an ingenious savant, and which we would recommend to the attention of our opticians, has suggested a better idea. He has discovered, that by nicely perforating a bit of paper, or any superficial substance, a plate of metal serving the best of all for the purpose,—that in proportion to the size of the hole, a very considerable magnifying power is obtained over objects closely under the eye, and that distant objects are brought apparently nearer, and seen much more distinctly than by the unaided sight. It is therefore possible, that the ancient gem engravers may have made use of some contrivance of this nature.

Our information with respect to the methods of the painters of antiquity is also almost a blank. Their excellence both in drawing and in colouring cannot be questioned; for with such evidence as we possess of their attainments in sculpture, it is almost impossible, without a denial of the force of ocular demonstration, to refuse our acknowledgments to their superiority. We are told, indeed, that Zeuxis formed the composition of his Juno* from the peculiar beauties of all the most beautiful women in Agrigentum; and that Apelles made use of burnt ivory mixed with varnish to augment the effect of his colours, and to defend them from the action of the air.† But with the exception of these two solitary facts, the one in the art of design, and the other in that of colouring, we possess no practical information respecting the methods of the ancient painters. The use of the black or burnt ivory by Apelles has been questioned by many writers on the fine arts as an improbable misconception; but Mr. West did, we know, employ it with so much success, that the colouring of his later pictures, compared with that of his earlier, does not appear to have been produced by the same hand. It serves to tune, if the expression may be allowed, the various tones of colouring into one consistent frame of harmony.

Historians differ about the birth place of sculpture. But the art was undoubtedly early cherished in Asia. Laban, we are informed, adored idols‡ abominated by Jacob. Some, however, are of opinion, that the Ethiopians were the first who employed visible symbols as objects of adoration,§ and that of course they were the inventors of sculpture. Others ascribe the invention to the Chaldeans, and refer, in proof of their hypothesis, to the statue erected by Ninus in honour of his father. But the Greek philosophers considered Egypt as the cradle of the arts; and Plato says, that works of painting and sculpture may be found in Egypt executed ten thousand years ago. Pausanias thought that at first the priests exhibited a stone, or the trunk of a tree, as the emblems of their gods. Herodotus, the father of profane history, says, that the ancient Egyptians were accustomed to carve the one end of a stick into the form of a head, and, with scarcely more art, to trace a few imperfect lines on the other into a resemblance of feet. In this state they transmitted the art of sculpture to Greece. Pausanias mentions, that there was an ancient statue at Pygolia, which served to illustrate the history of the arts, the feet and hands of which were closely joined to the body, similar, no doubt, to the Egyptian statues in the British Museum. The first attempts in sculpture were no doubt with flexible materials, such as clay or wax. The next were probably with wood, and then marble;—metal, as requiring the aid of another art, was perhaps the last material employed by the genius of sculpture.

The earliest among the Greeks who wrought in marble, were the sons of Dædalus, Dipœnus and Scyllis,* who lived in the first Olympiad, that is, about 576 years before Christ. Phidias, who flourished about 120 years later, carried the art to its utmost perfection. It has certainly not since approached the same degree of excellence, if we admit the Athenian marbles in the British Museum to be his works; and if they were not his works, as there is some reason to believe, we have still but an imperfect conception of the improvements of which the art is susceptible.

On one occasion, when a party of artists were dining with Sir Joshua Reynolds, while Burke and Dr. Johnson were present, the conversation turned on this very subject. Sir Joshua observed, that it was impossible to understand what was meant among the Greeks, by their saying that the art of sculpture was in its decline in the days of Alexander the Great—the Apollo Belvidere and the Venus de Medicis being considered as the productions of that illustrious epoch; and neither the ingenuity of Burke, nor the erudition of Johnson, could solve the enigma. But the merits of the sculptures of the Parthenon were then unknown; we mean the Elgin or more properly the Athenian marbles; and it should be borne in mind, that even they were placed in the exterior of the edifice, merely for the purpose of decoration. The statue of the Goddess by Phidias was in the interior of the temple.

It might be objected to as a paradox, to say that none of the master-pieces of the sculptors of antiquity have yet been acquired by the moderns, but it is certain that none of those, which we consider as such, were particularly famous amongst the ancients. It is at least doubtful if the Apollo Belvidere is the same statue of which Pliny speaks in such terms of admiration as the work of Scopias.—The Venus by this artist was one of the ornaments of ancient Rome—but it is now unknown. He was the architect of the mausoleum which Artimisia raised to the memory of her husband — one of the wonders of the world. The Standard by Ptolemy is lost—a statue in which all the most beautiful proportions of the human figure were so admirably preserved, that it was constantly referred to by artists as a model, and thus acquired the name of the Standard. The Media of Eutycrates is also no longer known to exist. The critics in the time of Praxiteles were divided in their opinion with respect to his two Venuses and his Phryne; but he himself preferred his Satyr, and particularly his Cupid, to all his works, and they also are no more. The story of Pygmalion is of itself a striking comment on the excellence of the lost statues of antiquity; and that of the Colossus of Rhodes shows how far superior in the magnificence of the art the ancients were to the moderns. Glycones of Athens, who produced the Farnesian Hercules, doubtless left other works, which, if not in the same degree, were probably in the same high style of art, but they have all perished. At Agrigentum we saw the foot of a colossal Juno, belonging to the late Mr. Fagan, in point of execution, and greatness of style, equal to anything that ever adorned the Louvre. But although the utmost diligence was employed to find the remainder of the statue, the search was fruitless. At Syracuse, a headless Venus was discovered, which, in the opinion of many good judges, is superior to the Venus de Medicis.

The Jews have never been considered as entitled to any merit as artists, and it has been supposed that the prohibition in the Commandments has been the cause of their deficiency in the arts. But the prohibition only referred to idols of adoration, for Moses himself, the oracle of the command, made the brazen serpent; and Solomon, their wisest king, dealt largely in sculptured pomegranates, to say nothing of the twelve oxen which supported the brazen sea, or of the golden lions that adorned the steps of his throne. As for the cherubim, of which we read so much, we beg for the information of our churchyard sculptors to mention, that "a learned student of recondite lore" has assured us that the cherubim were not human figures with wings, but circles representing the signs of the zodiac.

The Romans were tardy in their cultivation of the art of sculpture, which was perhaps owing also to the influence of that ancient law of Numa, noticed by St. Augustine* in the controversy respecting the introduction of images, particularly of God the Father, into the churches. In fact, the ancient Romans are not considered as having made any great degree of proficiency in the fine arts, notwithstanding the magnitude of their architectural remains; and even in architecture they were far inferior to the Greeks, who distinctively settled the embellishments of the several orders, by which their buildings obtained that appropriateness of character that at once declared the use for which they were erected, and rendered them models to all succeeding ages. The Romans, in the best epoch of their taste, followed the Greeks, but deviating from their chaste models, adopted that false principle which supposes a beauty in ornament independent of propriety of application or of fitness of place. The fragments of this corruption of taste, our own architects for a long period were in the practice of imitating, but as we shall have an opportunity on some other occasion of noticing more particularly the progress and state of the arts in this country, we refrain for the present from adverting to this branch of the subject. It may, however, be so far requisite in the meantime, to explain, that the effect of this false principle of taste in architecture, is equivalent to that uninteresting beauty which we sometimes meet with in historical pictures;—where, though every figure is in correct proportion, well drawn, and with drapery elegantly folded, yet not being employed appropriately to the subject, the general composition is but a mere academical compilation, unadorned with the impress of that mental conception which constitutes the highest quality of refined art.

But if the ancient Romans are not entitled to rank high as artists, the painters and sculptors of modern Rome have acquired a pre-eminence far above those of any other nation. The Moses of Michael Angelo, for example, in appropriateness of character, is one of the most perfect creations that ever rose from beneath the chisel; and it has been said, that in this respect it may be classed with the Minerva and the Jupiter of Phidias. It has indeed fixed, as it were, an unalterable standard, by which every subsequent attempt to embody the form of the Jewish Lawgiver will not only be estimated, but must also, in some degree, resemble in air, features, and expression. Michael Angelo, however, was not always uniformly successful. His statue of the Saviour, the companion of the Moses, is a complete failure. The benevolent character of Jesus was a subject not suited to his vehement genius; and the statue is scarcely one degree above a common academical figure—framed according to rule, and faultless without merit. In his sublime work on the Day of Judgment, the same inconsistency may be observed. The single figures are without any appropriate character, without any expression applicable to their tremendous situation; but the groups are composed with admirable skill. Still, however, even as single figures, they have great merit; and although they are but the ingenious adaptation of legs, arms, and heads, to the celebrated Torso, which bears his name, and which served as the model to most of his figures, they are nevertheless the productions of a masterly hand.

The first modern artist who understood the principle of giving to his figures the peculiar expression belonging to their situation and character, was Leonardo da Vinci, and he carried it to the highest point of excellence in his picture of the Last Supper. The appropriate character which he has given to the Apostles in that great composition, the significance of expression in their several faces, all show that the point of time before the artist is when our Saviour said, “There is one amongst you who shall betray me.” But he failed in the head of the Saviour. He had exhausted his powers of characteristic discrimination in the heads of the apostles; and in his attempt to blend meekness and dignity in the figure of Christ, he produced only insipience. He had the prudence, however, to leave the face unfinished, that the imagination of the beholder might not be disappointed by an unworthy image, but form in his own mind one more accordant to his feelings and the subject. Pleasing as the works of Leonardo da Vinci are in general, had he not produced The Last Supper, and the cartoon of The Combatants for the Standard, he would scarcely have emerged above the level of mediocrity, for his pictures, generally speaking, are more remarkable for laborious finishing than for the impress of intellectual power.

When the works of Michael Angelo, Leonardo da Vinci, and Bartholomeo de St Marco, were attracting the admiration of all the judges of refined art, Raphael, having attained his adult age, came to Florence. The sensibility of his mind was like the softened wax, which makes more visible and distinct the form of the engraving with which it is impressed. Blest with this happy natural endowment, he became at once heir, as it were, to the treasures and experience of all his predecessors; and availing himself of the examples afforded by the discoveries of the Grecian relics, he combined, by the tuition of his own genius, and a well practised hand, a power to unfold his conceptions. In the exercise of his power, he has attained unrivalled excellence. But the peculiar merits and defects of the productions of this extraordinary young man are of too high and various a kind to be discussed in the present paper. The fine arts as they have appeared in different ages, constitute the visible history of the human mind, and those who regard painting and sculpture merely as contributing to the embellishment of our social pleasures, look only at the surface of the subject. It is necessary, however, to take care that we do not refine overmuch, and yield the metaphysical suggestions of the imagination, a credence and authority which history refuses to confirm.

Amongst the ancients, and in the middle ages, the products of statuary art were innumerable; the cities of Greece counted them by hundreds; Delphos,* Olympia, and Rome, were almost peopled with statues.†

The conqueror of the Etolians, Marcus Fulvius, had 287 statues in bronze and 230 in marble erected to his honor. Ptolemaeus Evergetes, conqueror of the King of Syria, carried away with him 2,500 statues. The theatre of Scaurus contained 3,000. According to Winkelmann, there had been recovered from the ruins of Adrian's Villa, after 250 years, statues, which enriched all the cabinets of Europe, and there remain yet more, according to the same authority, to be discovered by posterity. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, wrote, that in his time, the statues in Rome were innumerable, and Sidonius Apollinaris, records that in certain cities, the vast number of statues which encumbered the public places, facilitated the means of concealment for malefactors. Rhodes contained, it is affirmed, 30,000. After various disasters endured by Rome, Cassiodorus wrote to Theodoric, that the number of statues which this city contained, almost equalled that of the inhabitants.

* Amongst others were statues in gold of the Rhetorician Gorgias, of Phryne, and that of a female Lydian slave, the gift of Cræsus.

† Demetrius of Phalerus, had erected in his honor no fewer than 360. The Greeks were so prompt in rendering this species of homage to those who had done them a service, that in Eubæa they preferred raising a statue to Demosthenes, to paying him a talent for one of his orations.

We know how great a profusion of sculpture was employed during the middle ages, to ornament both the exterior and interior of churches; those of Chartres and of Rheims prove this; the dome of Milan contained 3,500 statues, the tomb of St. Augustin at Pavia, of the XIVth century, had 480 figures, without reckoning those of animals.

Amongst the Indians and the Chinese there was a like profusion. Mendez Pinto, relates that in the single temple of Pocassar, dedicated to Tauhinaret, in China, he counted 1,200 statues, besides 24 serpents in bronze, so enormous in size, that each bore a statue of a woman seated on its back, and under a canopy supported by a dozen pillars of Camphire wood, might be seen a bed on which reclined a large silver statue, named Abican Nilano, which signified health of kings, and surrounding this statue were 34 idols representing children of five and six years, ranged in two files kneeling in adoration.

There are few substances capable of being worked and of receiving a shape that the ancients have not used in the formation of statues. Clay and wood were at first employed. Varron records that the plastic was anciently much cultivated in Italy, particularly in Etruria: that Tarquin the Ancient, wishing to dedicate an image to Jupiter in the Capitol, came to terms with Turianus, and had it brought from Fregellae. This Jupiter was of earth; it was in consequence of this earthen material, that the custom of coloring them in vermilion was resorted to; this artist sculptured the Hercules that existed during the time of Pliny in the city of Rome, and which, because it was composed of earth, retained the name of Hercules fictilis. Such was the material in use for a long period to form the most exquisite statues to the gods: and Rome, according to Pliny, had no reason to blush for the memory of those who adored such gods, and who had not a sufficiency of gold or silver to form their divinities.

These ancient idols are to be seen in various places, dating from the time of Pliny ; the most highly ornamented were at Rome, and in the municipal towns ; their chasing was admirable : the merit of their execution combined with their antiquity rendered them far more valuable than if executed in gold.*

The statue of the Olympian Jupiter, by Phidias, had a face of gold and ivory, but the body was plaster and terra cotta ; the war between the Athenians and the Megarians, hindered its completion.

In the time of Pausanias, several of the divinities placed in the temples, were composed of clay. Statues of terra cotta have been discovered at Pompeii ; they painted statues in red at this period, such as the Jupiter at Phigalia, and those of the god Pan.

Bas-reliefs in terra cotta, were employed in the friezes of the temples. Vitruvius and Pliny have informed us that Cæsar having dispatched a colony to Corinth, to restore this unfortunate city from its ruins, commanded them to dig amongst the rubbish of its crumbling edifices, and to extricate from the debris, the works in bronze as well as those in terra cotta. Vitruvius speaks of statues in pottery by which the pediments of the temples Aræstyles were surmounted. "They were," said he, "a fashion taken from the Tuscans." The temples of Ceres and of Hercules, at Pompeii, are decorated in this manner.†

Statues of terra cotta were also used in the middle ages, particularly in the Cathedral of Seville, where they have perfectly resisted all changes of atmosphere. Masks for the theatre, in use at Rome, were made of plaster or of clay. Some of those masks have been discovered at Herculaneum with the moulds in which they were cast. The cretea persona, of which Lucretius speaks (lib. iv., v. 297) is nothing more than one of those plaster masks. During the time of Pausanias statues of wood might be also seen in the most renowned places in Greece ; such, amongst others, were the figures found at

* Pliny, Natural History, Book xxxv.

† The most curious Etruscan monuments in preservation of this species are the bas-relief of Leucothoe holding the infant Bacchus on his knees, and that which represents soldiers going to sacrifice. They are both at Rome. The former, with his drapery tight, ranged in equal plaits and falling perpendicularly, is altogether in the æginetic style.

Megalopolis in Arcadia, of a Juno, an Apollo, and the Muses, a Venus and a Mercury from the chisel of Damophonius, one of the most antient artists. The statue of Apollo of Delphos, sent as a present by the Cretans, was of wood, and formed of a single trunk of a tree. At Argas, Pausanias saw in the temple of Castor and Pollux the statues of the two brothers, and of Hilaira and of Phœbe, their women and the horses of these demi-gods, the whole in ebony and ivory.

The philosopher Diagoras has been placed by Clement of Alexandria amongst the greatest and wisest philosophers of antiquity, because, being one day in want of wood, he kindled his kitchen fire with a statue of Hercules.

Herodotus tells of colossal statues in wood which existed in Egypt. Luxury, before disdaining the use of wood in sculpture, tried to adorn it by gilding, as we perceive by some of the Egyptian statues. Pausanias saw at Corinth two figures of Bacchus of gilt wood, with the exception of the faces, which were painted in red with minium; the statue of Pallas at Aricia was in wood and gilt.

Statues have been formed of box-wood,—of cedar; this served frequently to form a mould for statues in gold and ivory; of oak,—of cypress,—of ebony; the ancient Greek statues were made of this wood; of maple,—of the fig-tree,—of beech, of yew,—of cork; Antonio Filrete made a crucifix for the church Degli Ermini at Florence in this wood, which was borne in processions at the time of Vasari;—of lotus, of myrtle; the statue of Minerva Polias at Athens was formed of this wood; of the olive tree, of willow, and of osiers; we have mention of an Æsculapius of Sparta, and a Juno of Samos made of osier. It was with the branches of these two trees that they formed the colossal statues which they cast every year into the Tiber. The immense colossal figures in which the Germans burned their prisoners in honor of their god, Teutates, was also woven in osier; of palm, of the peach tree, of poplar, of pine, of the wild pear tree; the Juno of Mycenæ was composed of this, as was also that of Samos; of the fir-tree, of lime, of the vine, above all the wild vine, and that of Cyprus; according to some authors the Diana of Ephesus was of this wood; it has been also used for a Bacchus and a Priapus. Much later it was employed in making the gates of the baptistry at Ravenna.

They have preserved a crucifix at Ravenna of very ancient wood, covered artistically with very fine linen so fashioned as to imitate the human skin.

At Saint Cernin in Toulouse there is a Christ in wood larger than life, sculptured in the twelfth century ; the face is made of a plate of silver wrought from behind.

All known metals have been used for statuary. The Greeks made their statues in gold and silver ; Pausanias saw some specimens in one of the temples at Athens. At the triumph of Pompey and of Lucullus, they bore gold and silver statues of Mithridates and of Pharnaces ; the former was six feet in height, and the latter was surrounded with figures in gold and silver cars.

Diodorus of Sicily wrote a description of the car which, after the death of Alexander, carried the remains of this prince from Babylon to Alexandria. "At each angle of the roof which covered this car they had, wrote he, a golden Victory bearing a trophy ; at the opening of the roof were placed golden lions who watched those who entered ; between each couple of columns was a golden acanthus which wound insensibly even around the capitals. The extremity of the axles of this car were of gold, and represented the head of a lion bearing between his teeth an iron lance."*

Statues entirely formed of gold and silver carried to Rome by victorious generals were very soon imitated. The first mentioned by historians is the equestrian statue in gold erected in the most elevated place in the Capitol bearing the inscriptions, To Cornelius Sylla the fortunate Emperor. The first silver statue was erected in honor of Augustus. Much later Augustus caused all the statues that had been raised in this metal to be melted down and converted into money, the products of which he devoted to the porticos of the Palatine Apollo. The Emperor Claudius had a silver statue erected to him which weighed a thousand livres ; it was placed on a column near the tribune from which they harangued ; and one of gold ten feet in height at the Capitol facing the Temple of Jupiter. Titus wished to have a silver statue of Britannicus in his palace. The

* This car, the most magnificent of those which the Greeks called Harmamaza, was constructed by Hieronymus, by which, according to Athenaeus, he acquired a just celebrity. It has been re-modelled after the description of Diodorus, by J. Chrétien Ginzoff, inspector royal of the construction of carriages in Bavaria. It is represented in his work Sur les Chars et Chariots des Grecs et des Romains, Munich, 1817.

senate voted a golden statue to Marcus Aurelius; Faustina, his wife, had a silver one erected to her in the Temple of Venus.

A golden statue was decreed to Aurelian after his death, and several silver ones. The statue in silver erected to Theodosius was placed on a column facing Saint Sophia.*

This species of luxury was imitated in the middle ages, but was used principally in representing sacred subjects, such as God, the Holy Virgin or the Saints. Aimoin, however, relates that Richard II. was desirous of bestowing his statue in silver to the monks of Saint Germain-des-Prés; they, however, refused it on the plea that it would savour of paganism.†

In the Church of Cluny may be seen the Blessed Virgin and the twelve apostles in silver, life size. An inventory of Clairvaux, of 1517, mentions two statues of Our Lady and Saint Bernard, silver gilt, enriched with precious stones, and four feet high.

It was a custom of the City of Paris to present rich gifts to the Kings of France at their coronation.

One of the most remarkable specimens of exquisite workmanship represented a triumphal car supported by four Dolphins, and drawn by lions, in which the municipal body of Paris did homage to Charles IX. on the day of his formal entry, in 1571; the principal group ornamented by devices and bas-reliefs, were surmounted by two columns bearing a statue of the King supported on a pedestal presenting representations of various battles; "the entire, according to the chroniclers of the time, was composed of the purest silver gilt, of standard gold, chased and engraven so perfectly, that the workmanship surpassed the material." The statue presented by the same city to Charles the Fifth is also worthy of notice. It was a massive silver Hercules covered with a lion's skin in gold, seven feet in height, and weighing 100 Marcs. These proportions, if accurately reported, infer an exquisite delicacy of execution. It required doubtless a very perfect knowledge of art to produce a figure seven feet high, of gold and silver, weighing only fifty livres.‡

The Cathedral at Milan possesses two statues of a life size in

* Very pure gold passed several times through the fire was called obrizum. The electrum was a natural or skilful mixture of a fifth of gold, with four fifths of silver.

silver, representing Saint Charles Borromeo, and St. Ambrose, dressed in their pontifical robes, and ornamented with precious stones. The border of the cope worn by Saint Ambrose is decorated by small detached oval compartments, in which are represented some interesting details of his life. At the top of his pastoral staff are six small niches containing each a figure executed by Charles Grossi, whilst the entire figure of the Saint is from the hammer of the artificer Policarpe Sparoletto; it is supposed to weigh 2,000 ounces; on the base may be read an inscription stating that the City of Milan presented this statue to the Cathedral in 1698. The statue of Charles of Borromeo is a gift from the artificers presented in 1610.

Before the house of Our Lady of Loretto might be seen two angels in silver presented by the Duke D'Epernon,—an infant in gold, representing the birth of Louis XIV., borne by a silver angel, which weighs 700 marcs, and the child 48. This was a gift from Anne of Austria. The statue in silver of the great Condé was given by himself. In the Jesuits' Church in Rome, under the grand Altar, is the tomb of Saint Ignatius, composed of bronze gilt. His statue is of massy silver, in part gilt, ornamented with precious stones, and reposing on a sheet equally adorned.

The most ancient statues in bronze may be seen at Samos; they comprise three figures each six cubits, kneeling, and supporting a large vase. Herodotus informs us that the Samiens devoted to the construction of this monument the tithe of the emoluments which they derived from their maritime commerce at Tartessus. It was after the death of Pisistratus that the Athenians placed in the Temple of Pallas the first pyramid in bronze, nevertheless Romulus caused his statue to be erected crowned by Victory in a car drawn by four horses, all in brass; the car and the horses were a prize taken from the City of Camerinum, as recorded by Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

Pliny writes, in the thirty-fourth book of his Natural History—"Formerly bronze was made up of a mixture of copper and gold and some other precious material; the price of working it was variable."

The model of perfection in this species was doubtless the Corinthian bronze; this metal was of three kinds, namely, the white, which approached nearer to silver by its brightness, and in the mixture of which, silver predominated; the vermilion, in the blending of which gold was the prevailing mixture; and a third, in which gold, silver, and copper were in equal proportions. There was also a fourth in which the relative portions could not be justly assigned. This fourth bronze was called hepatizon in place of its old name, Corinthian bronze; it was liver color, in fact it was being of this shade of color that rendered it at all valuable. It was, however, in much less favor than the Corinthian bronze; but in higher estimation than the Ægean bronze, or than the bronze of Delos, which for a long period was in great vogue.

After the bronze of Delos, the Ægean bronze was in most request. It was named thus from the Isle of Aegae, which did not produce a single atom of copper, but the art of combining this metal in the casting rendered it justly celebrated.

Myron always used the bronze of Aegae, and Polycletoes that of Delos. Coming forth from the same school, they were rivals in the same art; and even the material employed in this art excited their emulation.

The bronze of Cyprus has been also distinguished, that of Tartessus in Boætia, of Cordus or of Marius, of Salluste, which had been found in the Alps; of Livy, that was taken from the Gauls.

L'Aurichalcum was an alloy of copper and of gold esteemed for its brilliancy and hardness; it prevented bronze from changing and imparted to it a beautiful color; they rubbed it with the juice of the olive (amurca), or with bitumen.

Pewter or tin is cited by Homer amongst the metals used in the shield of Achilles.

The statue of Mamurrius at Rome was of lead.

The Sculptor Aristonidas, wishing to represent Athamas repentant and reclaimed from his frenzy after having precipitated his son Learchus, mixed copper with iron, in order to express by the ruddiness of the metal the shame and confusion of the person he meant to portray. This statue was in existence in the time of Pliny at Thebes. In the same city and at the same period might be seen the iron Hercules of the statuary Alconius; these materials were regarded as symbols of the constancy of heroes in surmounting difficulties; and at Rome, were two iron cups dedicated in the temple of Mars the avenger.*

They made also, it has been said, a magnet statue, exhibiting doubtless the power of love even in iron, representing a Venus who attracted an iron statue of Mars.*

* See Pliny's Natural History, book xxxiv.

The Greeks worked in ivory from the most remote period of antiquity; Homer speaks of hilts of swords, and various ornaments formed in this material; the thrones of kings and the state chairs of the Roman Magistrates were of ivory. In Greece more than a hundred statues of ivory and gold might be seen, the greater number fabricated in the most remote period of the arts, and the highest of nature. The Minerva of the Parthenon was thirty-eight feet in height. The body of this statue and the head of the Medusa were ivory, the tunic was of gold.

A small town in Arcadia, possessed a fine Æsculapius in ivory, and a temple built on the route of Pellene in Achaia enclosed a Pallas in the same material.†

At Cyzicus in the Propontis, there was a temple the joints of which were ornamented with mouldings of gold, and the interior of which was decorated by a Jupiter in ivory, crowned by an Apollo in marble. There was also a Venus in ivory, in a state of nudity, executed by Pygmalion of Cyprus; the same as the statue of Minerva seen at Rome in the forum of Augustus, and that of Jupiter in the temple of Metellus; an ivory statue of Hercules may be seen at Tivoli, and some very ancient statues in the same material representing victories may be seen in the island of Malta.‡

They had at Cyzicus in Arcadia, a Cybele in gold, the face of which was made of the teeth of the hippopotamus.

Bones have been also used for this purpose, particularly those of the camel. The palladium has been even supposed to have been formed from the bones of Pelops.

The Romans employed ivory for all manner of purposes. Of their monuments in this material, the greater number that have descended to our time, are the dyptiques.

* This recalls to mind the pretty story of Frederick Langbein, in which an image of Saint Ursula exercises over a little iron saint, her neighbour, the same loving power which the statue of Venus exercised over that of Mars.

† To work in ivory, they softened it by the vapour of boiling water. According to Dioscorides it became pliable as wax when it had been made to boil during six hours with the roots of the mandrake.

‡ One of the last specimens of chryselephantine sculpture is the statuette of Leda, executed by Pradier for the artists' lottery.

We must consider the monstrous emeralds so frequently spoken of in various histories, as works in glass. The emerald column in the temple of Hercules at Tyre is mentioned both by Herodotus and Pliny ; the colossal statue of the god Serapis, nine cubits high, made of a single emerald, and which Appian affirms to have been in existence in his time in the labyrinth of Egypt ; the statue composed of a single emerald four cubits in height, executed by Dipoenus and Scyllis, was said by Cedrenus to have been at Constantinople in the reign of Theodosius. Independent of this, he was reported to have been in possession of an antique bas-relief in glass, three feet long, representing a bull fight.

The ancients also made statues in amber, exceedingly small, but of great price ; they were sometimes called electrum. Augustus had a statue dedicated to him in this material. There was a statue of Sylla composed of incense, aromatics, and gum, which was burned at his obsequies. Empedocles, a conqueror in the Olympic games, distributed amongst the people, an ox made of myrrh. There was a statue of Hercules, formed by Dedalus, made of pitch.

It is a matter of question amongst the ancient authors that large figures have been formed in dough, in hay, and in wool ; they were used occasionally for a species of sorcery or legerdemain ; those were named Neuropastes and Oscilles, and were moved by means of a cord or thread like our Marionnettes ; they also put them in motion with quicksilver.*

Jacopo della Quercia, commissioned by the Siennois to erect an equestrian statue of Giovanni Ubaldini elevated on a wooden pyramid, to assist at the funeral solemnities with which they desired to honor him, conceived the idea of forming the skeleton of a horse and cavalier of bits of wood carefully joined and encircled with layers of hay and tow bound together with hempen bands, and covered by a cement composed of earth, size, dough, and of wadding, the entire covered by various coats of paint.

Beccafumi, on the first arrival of Charles the Fifth in Italy, prepared to honor his entrance into Sienna, an equestrian statue of the emperor in Cartoon, supported by a group of three conquered provinces extended under the horse's feet. This group was put in motion by the assistance of wheels pushed by men concealed in the pedestal and following the cortege ; it was never used but on his return from Tunis.

We must not omit to mention the lion moulded in butter, which Canova made when a child, to be served at the table of the Seigneur Falieri, the highest personage in Passagno, the native town of the great sculptor. A German biographer has written, without jesting, that this lion of butter, made by Canova, is an incontestable proof of the softness and smoothness for which the compositions of this eminent sculptor were remarkable.

Of the statues in the immense hall at Genoa dedicated to men who had deserved well of the republic, the last erected by the senate, was to the Duke of Richelieu, and is thus described by Voltaire :

Je la verrai, cette statue
Que Gène élève justement
Au héros qui l'a défendue.

These patriotic statues were broken by the demagogues of 1797 ; they were replaced by provisional statues still standing, and representing the sciences and the virtues ; these statues are of straw, covered with fine linen, improvised at the ball given by the city to Napoleon during the gorgeous fêtes which accompanied the loss of Genoese liberty. It was a pity that under those circumstances the Italians did not preserve their usual custom of getting living persons to represent statues, as was practised during the ceremonies of the coronation of Leo X., where a nymph might be seen delivering from her niche a poem in his honor.*

Wax was one of the first materials employed by sculptors ; the ancients had the portraits of their ancestors represented in this material.

Under the reign of the Medicis at Florence, the art of making figures in wax become developed.†

* See Valery, Voyage en Italie, iii. 382.

† Amongst the collection of objects of art presented by the painter Widar to the city of Lisle, was discovered a bust in wax ; the exquisite beauty of its proportions caused some to attribute the execution of it to Raphael.

Guided by the painter Andrea Verocchio, Orsino introduced considerable improvements. When Lorenzo de Medicis had been wounded at Santa Maria de Fiore, his friends and relatives had his image erected in various places, to return thanks to God who had preserved him from the tragical end of his brother Julien. Orsini, under the direction of Andrea, made three figures in wax of a natural size; he formed the bodies of pieces of wood interlaced with split osiers, and covered over with draperies waxed and moulded with such art, that nothing could approach nearer to nature. The head, the hands, the feet, made of the thickest wax, were hollow and painted in oil; the hair, the eye-brows, the beard, were arranged in such a manner, that you imagined you beheld not figures in wax, but real living men; one of these figures dressed in the same habiliments as Lorenzo when wounded in the throat and shown to the people, was preserved in the church of the religious of Chiarito. Another was placed before the Madonna of Santa Maria degli Angeli, at Assisium.

In 1655, Madame de Thianges gave as a new year's gift to the Duke du Maine, a chamber gilt over, and as large as a moderate sized table; above the door was written in large letters, chambre du sublime; and inside the chamber was a bed, and a balluster, with a large arm chair in which was seated M. le Duc du Maine made of wax, and a striking likeness; near him, M. de Larocheaufauld, to whom he was giving some verses for examination; around the chair were M. de Marcillac and Bossuet; at the other end of the alcove Madame de Thianges and Madame de Lafayette reading poetry together. Beyond the balluster, Despréaux, armed with a pitchfork, preventing seven or eight bad poets from approaching. Racine was near Despréaux, and a little farther off Lafontaine, to whom he made signs to advance; all these figures were in wax, and perfect likenesses, as each had sat to the modeler.

Finally they made statues in snow. Pietro de Medicis employed Michael Angelo during a winter forming statues in snow.

A statue of this description was raised in a thoroughfare in Paris during a severe winter in the reign of Louis XIII. with this quatrain appended:—

Passants, qui par ici passez,
 Sonvenez-vous des trépassés
 Et priez Dieu qu'il gèle fort,
 Car s'il dégèle, je suis mort.

During the inclement winter of 1789, monuments of snow multiplied in Paris. A statue of a young girl bore this inscription :

Fille à marier avant le dégel.

In the severe winter of 1784, Louis XVI having written to the comptroller general to give the necessary assistance in assuaging the misery of the people, the Parisians erected to him, as a christmas gift, a statue of snow, at the corner of the Rue du Coq. The pedestal bore amongst other inscriptions the following :

Louis, les indigents, que ta bonté protégé,
Ne peuvent t'élever qu'un monument de neige,
Mais il plait davantage à ton cœur généreux
Que le marbre payé du pain des malheureux.

M. Collier, in his Voyage en Asie Mineure et en Arabie, tells of bas-reliefs which he saw near Beyroth, and which appeared to be souvenirs of the conquest of these countries by Sesostris and by the Persians. The inscriptions on them are in cuneiform characters. These monuments are doubtless those mentioned by Herodotus a-propos of the conquests of Sesostris in Asia ; he tells of having himself seen images of this King, sculptured in the rock, in Phœnicia and elsewhere. Our own traveller Bonomi had positively recognised on these sculptured rocks the cartouche of the great Ramses (Sesostris) and M. Raoul Rochette, vouches, as undeniable, the identity of the bas-reliefs discovered by M. Collier and those mentioned by Herodotus.*

M. Ch. Texier, found in Asia Minor near Tavium, on the bank of the Halys, a monument of the same kind.

"It ought," wrote he to M. Dureau de la Malle, "to be placed in the first rank of ancient monuments known. It is," added he, "an enclosure of natural rocks smoothed by art, and on the sides of which was sculptured a scene of the highest importance in the history of those people. It comprised sixty figures, some of colossal dimensions. The scene represented a conference between two Kings who were reciprocally interchanging presents."

Colossal statues, which Pliny designates as monsters of art, were multiplied amongst the ancients. At first monuments of this species were only dedicated to the gods of the first class, in the idea of marking their superior power, a practice of which Lucian makes a jest, saying that Jupiter could not assist at the council of the gods, because when seated he occupied so much space that he left room for no one else.

Among the immense works raised at Thebes by Memnon, the ancients cite with especial admiration the colossal statues of this prince, not less remarkable for their enormous proportions than for their great antiquity; but one of them presented a most strange and inexplicable phenomenon; at certain hours in the morning a loud sonorous noise proceeded from this statue, which did not fail to awaken much superstitious curiosity.

Some artists amused themselves in forming microscopic sculpture. Amongst the Greeks, Theodorus made the labyrinth of Lemnos, and introduced his own statue in copper, a work as remarkable for its great resemblance to the original as for the delicate beauty of its execution. In his right hand he held a file, and with the left guided with three fingers only a little car drawn by four horses; so delicate and exquisite was this workmanship, that a simple fly equally artificial covered the team with its wings.

Jerome Faba, a Calabrian priest, sculptured in wood, every piece requisite to represent the mysteries of the Passion, in so small a space as to be easily contained in a nut shell.

Holbein executed for Henry the VIII. a chaplet on which were represented all the mysteries of the life of Jesus Christ.

Gibbons, the English sculptor, who died in 1721, sculptured flowers in wood that vibrated when a carriage was passing; he also sculptured a pen, which could not possibly be distinguished from a natural pen.

Octavius Janelli carved four small pieces on boxwood, which represented very distinctly, with natural grace, and true perspective, a hunt in a forest; a lover carrying a large shell from the sea, and Juno descending from Heaven on a car drawn by peacocks; a Christ scourged and arraigned before Pilate: the dimensions of all those united subjects was less than might be contained in a nut shell. The latter subject was particularly fine, being equal in style to some of Raphael's arabesques. The artificer of these chefs-d'œuvre died at the age of twenty-five, in the year 1660.*

Vitruvius relates (in the preface to his second book) that

* See Valery, Voyage en Italie, vol 2. page 418.

Dinocrates, the Macedonian Architect, made use of a stratagem in order to approach Alexander, and being perceived by him was immediately interrogated by the king as to his name and position, to which he replied : " I am Dinocrates of Macedon who brings to Alexander thoughts and designs worthy of his greatness. I have made Mount Athos in the form of a man who holds in his left hand a large city, and in his right a cup which receives the waters of all the streams that run from this mountain down to the sea." Alexander did not reject the overtures of one so capable of assisting him in his projects, and Dinocrates was, at a later period, employed in building Alexandria.

Julius the Second, conqueror of Bologna, ordered Michael Angelo to erect a colossal statue of him in bronze, at the gates of San-Petro ; seated, this statue was about nine feet high, and standing nearly seventeen. The Pope, before re-entering Rome, saw the model nearly completed, the right hand was raised and held forward, the second was not yet finished. To the artist who proposed placing in his hand a book, Julius replied : " place in it a sword, I am not a man of letters." Perceiving that the right hand was raised boldly : " he asked if it bestowed benedictions or maledictions." " Holy father," replied Michael Angelo, " it menaces Bologna to be faithful to you." At a later period this statue of the warrior pontiff was overturned by his enemies, conquerors in their turn ; portions of it, which had been sold to the Duke Alphonso of Ferrara, were cast into a piece of artillery, which they called, The Julius.

Thirty years after the death of St. Charles of Borromeo, a statue was erected to him by Cerani, at the expense of the people, of Milan, at his native place near Arona. It was of bronze sixty-six feet high, on a pedestal of granite forty-six feet ; the total elevation was consequently one hundred and twelve feet. The head, the hands, and the feet were cast, all the rest was worked in the forge. Saint Charles is represented as giving his benediction ; the expression of the countenance is sweet and melancholy ; the attitude simple, and beautiful, the proportions so just, that the colossal size of this figure could not be perceived when comparing it with other objects. The interior contains solid masonry which reaches to the neck, and which supports the exterior casing, by means of cramps or braces of iron. To reach a species of platform raised on the summit, it was necessary to mount a stairs formed in one of the folds of the saint's dress, by which you were introduced into the interior of the statue, and enabled to ascend; with the assistance of the iron bars which supported it, you could reach the highest point. Arrived at the summit, it is lighted by a small window placed behind the head; the nose is sufficiently large to permit a comfortable seat.

Monuments, erected through national gratitude, were, for a long period, of very rare occurrence in France.

Millin describes a monument raised to Joan of Arc, on the bridge of Orleans, by Charles the Second in 1458.*

"It was placed on the old bridge beside the city, and was re-erected from the wood work in the year 1745, to prevent its falling to decay. The Protestants at the time of the second disturbances, in 1567, had the figures broken, with the exception of that of the king, though Du Haillain wrote that they were destroyed by a chance shot. They were re-constructed on the ninth of October, three years later, at the expense of the city, by one Hector Lescot, according to Jacquinet, and replaced on their bases the fifteenth of March, the following year, 1571.† All the members of these figures formed a separate jet, and it was thought to have been the second of the kind cast in France."

This monument, supported on a stone pedestal nine feet high, and of equal width, was composed of four figures in bronze, a little larger than life size, and a cross of the same metal. The Blessed Virgin is seated at the foot of the cross, on a Calvary made of lead, which re-unites all the figures; she supports, extended on her knees, the body of her Divine Son; beneath the head of the Saviour, at some distance, is a cushion on which rests the crown of thorns; to the right is the statue of Charles the Seventh, and at the left that of Joan of Arc; both are kneeling on cushions which were added to this new monument. These two figures, which have their hands united, are armed at all points, with the exception of helmets, which are placed before them, at their feet; that of the King is surmounted by a crown; the shield of the arms of France is on a rock between them without any other support, having no crown or any other ornament. The spear of the Pucelle is extended cross-wise on the monument. This celebrated maiden is dressed in male attire, and may be distinguished only by the arrangement of her hair, which is attached by a piece of ribbon, and falls below her waist. Behind the cross is a pelican, which appears to nourish her brood with her blood; they are enclosed in a nest or basket, and were formerly as high as the cross, at the foot of which was later added a serpent holding an apple.

* See Millin's, Antiquités Nationales.

† La Fontaine, who saw the monument re-built, wrote of it thus in a letter to his wife, August the 30th 1660: "I saw La Pucelle; but ma foy it was without pleasure; I could perceive neither the air, nor the height, nor the countenance of an Amazon. The infant Gradafilé is worth ten like her; she is on her knees before a crucifix, and King Charles in the same position opposite to her. The entire thing is wretched and mean in appearance. It is a monument that betrays the poverty of the age."

The pedestal which forms the base is surrounded by scrolls and marble tables.

The horse of bronze which bore the statue of Louis XIII., and which may be seen at the Place Royale, at Paris, was cast by Daniel de Volt re, in a single founding. It was intended for the statue of Henry II., but the artist had not time to finish this work.

The inscriptions on the statue raised to Louis XIV. by Lafenillade, on the Place des Victoires, gave rise to the following satirical inscription, directed against the artist as well as against the monarch:—

“ Quand Louis, autrefois toujours victorieux, Domptait ses ennemis,   toute heure, en tous lieux,
L’illustre D’Aubusson, pour le combler de gloire,
De ses faits   l’airan confia la m moire;
Il mit la renomm e au des de ce guerrier,
Qui semble le vouloir couronner de laurier.
L’attitude ambigu  o  l’ouvrier l’a mise,
Convient bien maintenant   la France soumise;
Car   voir le couronne, on ne peut deviner,
Si la d esse l’ te, on veut le lui donner.”

Nescis an tollat an ponat,

An equestrian statue of Louis XIV. having arrived at a town in one of the provinces, the mayor harangued the statue, whilst the aldermen held forth to the horse.

Anthony Coysevox, after having honorably remunerated his physician for having cured him of a dangerous malady, said to him: “ You have restored my life in your way, I wish to immortalize you in mine, by making your bust in marble.” This portrait was one of the finest he ever made: he called it the bust of friendship.

The sculptor Valerio made for the Duke of Florence a marble statue of the dwarf Morgante, and those who examined it declared they had never seen any thing more like than the portrait of this little monster. He also executed one of the Barbino dwarfs.

There is at Naples a very burlesque statue by Canova, representing Ferdinand the First, as Minerva; nothing could be more grotesque than this figure of an old man, with his large Bourbon nose, dressed in the helmet and tunic of Pallas. A bas-relief of the seventeenth century, in lead, represented Louis de Marillac, marshal of France, in the costume of the same goddess.

We know the strange effect of Louis XIV. in a wig, with the Roman costume. We have heard of some good men who cried, on seeing this absurdity :—"It must have been intended to represent a very ancient period, for in those times no shoes were worn." The ladies of England having, by subscription, raised a statue to Wellington "as Achilles," so styled, that is to say altogether naked, for some time there was discovered every morning hanging near the statue a breeches with this invitation, "Put those on!"

Celebrated statues of animals have been made at various periods. Thus Moses caused the statue of the brazen serpent to be erected. At Corinth they had the statue of the mare Phidoles. While in the race, having at the commencement thrown her rider, she continued her course, and arrived first at the winning point. The Ambracians had a statue erected to an ass, which, finding itself by chance in the midst of an ambush that the Molassians had raised for the purpose of entrapping them, began to bray after a she ass; this aroused the citizens, and thereby throwing their enemies into a fright, caused their defeat.

Pliny mentions also the famous bull of Perillus; no one spoke of Perillus with eulogy. More cruel than the tyrant Phelaris himself, he presented to him this brazen bull, which was constructed with such artifice as to enclose a man within it, and by enkindling a brazier underneath, the bull commenced to bellow. Phelaris, cruel at all times, was for once just in his cruelty, and made the first trial on Perillus himself. Thus was punished an artist who abused a noble art, and one consecrated to render just homage to gods and men.

Augustus going from his tent to visit the ships, the night previous to the battle of Actium, met a peasant with his ass. Interrogating him, the peasant said his own name was Fortune, and that of his ass Victorinus. This, seeming to Octavius a presage of victory, he caused statues in bronze both of the ass and of the ass driver to be erected at Nicopolis.

In modern times, the Florentines imitated the practice of the ancients ; they placed at the bottom of the portico which formed the ground floor of the Pitti Palace, the statue of a mule which, according to the distich that might be read on its base, served with as much courage as assiduity in the construction of this palace, refusing no service on which it was employed.

Various opinions have been, from time to time, expressed and violently urged within the last five years upon the question of color, or no color, of statues. Some have strongly insisted that color added to the beauty of the statue, whilst others have contended that it reduced the statue to the condition of a barber's block. What the ancients thought and did, in this matter, we shall now endeavour to shew :—Amongst the Egyptians, the Greeks and the Romans they incrustated the eyes with different matters, some of the eyes were of silver, and others were composed of fine precious stones to imitate the color of the Iris, like that of the Pallas of Phidias, and those of the goddess in the temple of Vulcan at Athens which had blue eyes. Amongst the bronzes of Velitrae there is the head of a female with alabaster eyes, and a small Hercules with eyes of silver.

The marble lion placed near the tomb of the King Hermias, in the isle of Cyprus had emerald eyes. The colossal head of Antinous, near Frescati, exhibited a peculiar species of these eyes ; the apple or eye-ball is made of Palombino marble, and under the edge of the eye-lids at the point of the lachrymal might be seen the outline of a silver plate, very small, by which to all appearance the eye-ball was entirely covered ; this plate of silver is cut all round from the eye-ball to the circle of the iris. In the centre of this colored portion of the eye, there is an orifice much deeper to mark the iris than that which indicates the eye-ball ; those are made with two different precious stones, in order to represent the different colors of the eyes. A statue of the Muses, larger than life size, preserved at Rome, displays the same art.

At the museum of the Vatican like those of Degli Nfizi at Florence, and Degli Studi at Naples, may be seen, among the antiquities, a great number of statues, and of busts more numerous still, where the eye-balls are figured. There are many others at Rome, such as the head of Minerva, and an admirable Bacchante, which has eyes imitating not only marble but enamel, like the stuffed animals. Let it be remembered that those who put eye-balls in their statues were the great sculptors Michael Angelo, Donatello, and other famous masters.

They gave to some statues hair and beards in gold. We know that a great sculptor had the beard of Esculapius taken away, saying that he could not consent to his wearing it, his father, Apollo, not having any.

There was found in the Capitol a bust of Lucilla, wife of the Emperor Lucius, of which the hair, in black marble, was adapted to the head in such a manner, as that it might be easily detached.

Caylus mentioned, amongst the statues of Pompeii, a Pallas and a Venus, each from seven to eight inches in height. The nails of the hands and feet, the buckles of the helmet, and the edge of the garment of Minerva, are inlaid with silver; the Venus has golden bracelets on her arms, and on her legs fillets of the same precious metal; also the statue of a priest; all these are engraved in his collection of antiquities.

Pausanias mentions a statue with nails of silver; Herodes Atticus had a triumphal car erected at Corinth borne by steeds richly gilt, and having shoes of ivory.

The cavities of the eyes of Antinous contained precious stones cased in wires of metal, by means of which might be perceived traces of the higher and lower eyelashes.

There has been discovered at Spon a monumental inscription to Rapius Serapio, whose trade was the making of eyes for statues.

The bust of Nero, in the Louvre, exhibits square and oval cavities below the rays of the crown, which shew that precious stones were formerly inserted there.

Cicero spoke in his oration against Verres, De Signis, of a statue of Apollo which had engraven on its thigh the name of the sculptor Myron in small silver type.

The ancients clothed their gods in rich habiliments on festival days. At Rome, the statue of Hercules was attired as a Conqueror, during the triumphal ceremonies. Pausanias cites a Juno-Lucina as covered with a light veil, through which you perceived only her face, her hands, and her feet, which were of marble.

Dionysius of Syracuse stripped the statue of Jupiter of a rich mantle, estimated to be worth eighty-five golden talents, which Hieron had borne away from Carthage, and gave in its place a mantle of wool, saying that the other was too heavy for summer and too cold for winter, and was consequently an inconvenience to the god. The Minerva of Phidias was stripped in a like manner of her golden mantle.

The custom of adorning the statues of the gods, was derived from the habit of painting the garments of marble statues.

A remarkable instance of this usage has been proved by a statue found in Herculaneum, in 1760. This statue, which appeared to Winkelmann to date from a very remote period of art, had light hair; the tunic was white as was also the robe, at the bottom of which were three bands encircling it; the lower band was narrow, and the colour of gold; the second, a little larger, was purple, and ornamented with festoons of whitish flowers; the third like. The statue which Virgil's Corydon wished to erect to Diana was to be of marble, with red buskins. The hair of the Venus de Medicis was gilt, as was also that of the head of an Apollo of the Capitol.

The beautiful marble Pallas, large as life, recovered from Herculaneum, was gilt, and the gold was so thickly laid on that it was easy to remove it. Amongst the Romans they painted the face of Jupiter red on festival days; and in the time of Pliny the censors were especially employed in watching this operation. The Ethiopians reserved this colour exclusively for the gods.*

Amongst the ancient Greeks the Aegæan school was the school of tradition; the great museum of Munich possessed the famous marbles of the temple of Jupiter, discovered in 1811 near the temple, a few feet in the ground. Minerva holds a shield in one hand and a spear in the other; the head of the goddess is covered with a helmet, resting on her hair, the little curls of which are arranged in rolls; her robe is symmetrically draped in straight folds, similar to the style adopted in decorating the most ancient statues in wood; her eyes are open, of an almond shape, but slightly elevated at the corners, like those of the other statues in the same temple; this art is said to have been borrowed from the Chinese.

On the lips, the segments of which are thin and harsh, and equally elevated at the extremities, hovers a smile which seems cast on the figures around ; finally, like the others, the chin is straight and pointed.

History, says Vitruvius,* furnished to the architect the greater portion of those ideas developed in the embellishment of architecture. For example, if, under the cornices, instead of columns they placed marble statues representing irreproachable vestals, which they denominated cariatides, it will be necessary to enlighten the ignorant as to the meaning of this usage. It originated thus :—The inhabitants of Caria, which is a city of the Peloponnesus, being formerly united with the Persians who made war against the other people of Greece, the Greeks, having by their glorious victories put an end to this war, declared against the Carians, that their city having been taken and destroyed, and all their men put to the sword, the women were led captives, and in order to treat them with more ignominy, they would not permit ladies of quality to discontinue their accustomed robes, nor any of their ornaments ; not only were they led thus once in triumph, but they had to undergo the humiliation also of appearing in the same state as they did on the day of victory, on all occasions of public ceremonial ; thus were they obliged to bear their portion of the penalty incurred by their fated city. The architects of that period also placed, instead of columns, this kind of statue to the public edifices, in order to leave lasting monuments of the duration of the punishment inflicted on the Carians, and to teach posterity how they had been chastised.

The Lacedæmonians acted in the same manner after the battle of Plataea ; they despoiled them of their plunder, and spoliated a gallery from their enemies which they called after the conquered, in which statues representing the Persian captives attired in their ordinary garments supported the roof ; finally they punished this nation by an opprobrium which their pride merited, and left to posterity a monument of the virtue and victories of the Lacedæmonians. Thus they rendered their valour formidable to their enemies, and excited the people in defence of their liberty by the example of their fellow citizens.

This idea of thus representing captives was cruelly imitated at the Bastille. They set up on the front of the building, which separated the Grand Court from the Court de Puits, a clock which has become celebrated. This clock had a beautiful dial that worked to perfection ; but how bizarre were the ornaments by which it was decorated !

* B. I. c. I.

Formed of iron exquisitely sculptured, it had for support two figures chained by the neck, by the hands, by the feet, and by the centre of the body; the two extremities of this ingenious wreath after encircling the clock, met in the front, and were fastened by an enormous knot, to show that they menaced equally the two ages; the artist, guided either by the spirit of the time, or it may be under especial orders, took care to model one man in the flower of his age, and the other bending under the weight of years.*

Andrea Brustolini, towards the middle of the seventeenth century, represented at Venice in the sculptures of the library which adjoin the church of Saints John and Paul, the triumph of Catholicism, placed to support the flying buttresses of the hall; they were colossal figures of twenty-four of the most famous heresiarchs, completely sculptured in chessnut wood. These were Luther, Erasmus, Melancton, Beza, Pomponatius, Calvin, Ochin, Dubourg, and others of less note. They were covered with tatters, loaded with chains, and their countenances expressing remorse and despair.†

We must not omit to mention a colossal statue of Saint Christopher, twenty-eight feet in height, which was placed at Notre Dame near the gate. It was erected in consequence of a vow made by Antoine des Essarts in the fourteenth century, and was intact and perfect till 1784.

The Jupiter Fluvius which John of Bologna sculptured about 1570, for the villa Pratolino near Florence, and which may yet be seen, is one of the most remarkable colossus wrought by modern art. A clump of rock placed at the extremity of a semi-circular piece of water forms the base. The god is seated leaning forward, and supported by one hand on the head of a monster from which gushes all the pressure of a vast sheet of water. The other hand clings to the rock, and both in consequence of this favourable arrangement serve as flying buttresses. The calculated bulk of this colossus is in proportion about twenty-one metres. In the interior are several rooms, and the head is a belvidere for which the two eyes serve as windows. The pupils of John of Bologna spoiled the hand in sculpturing this colossus. When they came to the workshop, they preserved for some time the habit of exaggerating the form and the size of the muscles.

* The figures of the men to placed were called Atlantides.

† See Montfaucon, Diarium Italicum, p. 50

Two statues were erected in Rome ; one to Pythagoras and another to Alcibiades, in obedience to an oracle of Apollo. He commanded the Romans who consulted him on the occasion of the war with the Samnites, to erect in a public place one statue to the bravest Greek and another to the wisest.*

The Greeks, and after their example the Romans, sometimes made the gates of their temples in bronze. The temple of Jupiter, and of Olympia furnish us with proofs of this fact.

These gates engraven or sculptured, represented, according to Pausanias, the hunt of the wild boar of Erymanthus, and the exploits of Hercules against Diomedes, King of Thrace, and against Geryon. Hercules is also represented assisting Atlas and cleansing the Augean stables. On the inside of the gates Hercules is represented performing his other well known labours.

Cicero speaks in his oration against Verres, De Signes, of gates of the temple of Pallas, at Syracuse, engraven in gold and in ivory which surpassed all the works of this kind known.

The most ancient gates of bronze at present in existence, are those of the Church of Atreni near Amalfi. They date from 1017.

Seronx d'Agincourt has left us a description of the gate of Saint Paul outside the walls, "it was constructed in wood," wrote he, "close beside the entrance hall, and was entirely covered with plates or leaves of bronze three feet in thickness, and encompassing it around; the entire of its surface is divided into six equal parts in width and nine in height; which forms fifty-four compartments or panels lightly indented and comprising subjects of figures and inscriptions." These figures are not in relief; they are merely sketches of the outline, and of the features engraven and moulded in the depth of the bronze, and completed with a setting of silver, which time and cupidity have in a great measure destroyed. The type of the legends, in the Greek language, inscribed on each panel to explain the subject, are executed in the same manner. This work is supposed to have been wrought at Constantinople about the eleventh century.

mode of torture, and his death. Twelve panels representing the prophets; there was else to be seen two inscriptions, two crosses and two eagles.

The principal gate of the Church of Saint Sabina, on Mount Aventine, at Rome, is a work of the thirteenth century. The surface is divided into thirty-two panels, each ornamented by a bas-relief, sculptured in wood, and representing subjects from the Old and New Testament.

Anastatius, in the Life of Pope Honorius I., informs us that this pontiff had the principal gate of the Basilica of Saint Peter cased in silver. The Saracens, in one of their incursions in 846, having ruined and despoiled these gates, Leo IV. had them repaired and covered anew with plates of silver, sculptured in relief. Finally, long after, these gates were altered and almost destroyed by the rapacity of the time. Eugenius IV., in 1445, substituted for them the bronze gates which we admire at the present day; the bas-reliefs represent the union of the Greek and Roman Churches, which have been executed by Antonius Filaretos, and Simon, brother of Donatello, the Florentine sculptor.

Andreas worked twenty-two years on the gates of the Baptistry of Saint John the Baptist at Florence, and Lorenzo Ghiberti took forty years to execute those which Michael Angelo declared worthy to be the gates of Paradise.

At Castello Nuovo, at Naples, may be seen a cannon ball fixed in the bronze gates of the Arch of Triumph, erected to Alphonso I.

Time has now happily preserved a sufficient number of gates in bronze, of the middle ages. It would be easy to enumerate a hundred in the different countries of Europe—in France, in Germany, in Spain, in Italy, in Russia. England alone possesses no monument of this species worthy of notice.

What are most rarely to be met with are gates of wood, ornamented with rich sculptures. One of the most remarkable of this kind is that which is to be seen at the parish church of Santa Maria, of the Capitol at Cologne. It is placed at the circular extremity of the southern transept of the church. Each entire panel or fold of the gate contains thirty panels, representing subjects, sculptured in relief, and taken from the New Testament.

The reader will have perceived that we have not, from first to last, in this paper, written, or attempted to write, a treatise upon sculpture ; the title of our paper, " About Sculpture," explains just the kind of matter we intended to place before him.

In a future number of this REVIEW we shall venture upon a paper of the like class, devoted to painting and mosaics ; and although that paper and this paper will not make a reader a Vasari, yet they may set a reader, with the means and the time, to the study of books which will enable him to judge truly of art, in its varied phases ; or they will enable the uninformed man to look upon pictures and statues with eyes very different from those belonging to him, who, seeing nothing but a slice of lamb, in Murillo's " St. John and the Lamb," suggested this paper.

ART. III.—BEGIN AT THE BEGINNING.

In the middle of our belauded nineteenth century, after all that has been done by legislative enactments, organised associations, and extraordinary individual exertions for the reformation of offenders, juvenile and adult, it is rather startling to find that crime is increasing in England, not alone in proportion to the increase of population, but far in excess of that. The Criminal Returns for 1857 show this, and also prove sufficiently the significant and most painful fact, that the committals and re-committals of women become annually more and more numerous.

Where, we naturally ask, do the criminals come from? Are they manufactured periodically, assorted, labelled, and forwarded to order? Or, is there some huge hot-bed in which the vicious growth is nourished, and forced to premature deformity? Where do they come from indeed?—

From the gross, ignorant, half-heathen under current of the population:—from the class of thousands who in “moral England” are left at large to the rule of evil, without education, humane care, or religious teaching:—from the hundreds of thousands who in “merrie England” have all decency and self respect destroyed, and whose untutored natures ripen into deadly maturity of vice, in the dismal, hopeless wards of the Union Workhouse! Six hundred thousand free born men, women and children, are, in those monstrous schools of evil, constantly undergoing a regular, systematic training for the gaol. The secrets of vice are laid open to them in the dire teaching of corrupting association: idleness is infused into the marrow of their bones by a system which ignores industrial training, and forbids remunerative or encouraging employment : wrathful discontent is engendered in their hearts through the odious display of injustice, by which the aged and decrepid, the unemployed artizan, the stricken widow, and the homeless girl are starved, degraded, and used like dogs, as if to be poor were the one damnable crime in England.

"The work-house is a depot of every kind of human misfortune. We must try and reduce its miseries to some sort of classification, and to remedy them piece-meal, by methods suitable to each separate class. It is horrible to huddle them all together into one hopeless conglomeration, where, in walking down the long wards, we see the beds of the domestic servant, the former prostitute, the peasant's wife, the invalid governess, and a dozen other victims of different distress, ranged sadly side by side, while able-bodied men and women exemplify that 'Satan find some mischief still for idle hands to do;' and we are told that 'it is a fearful and significant fact, that many of the most hopeless and hardened inmates of work-houses are girls, who have been brought up in the pauper schools.'"

"Turn to the police reports in our newspapers, or only watch for yourselves the boys and girls who join in the disorders of this metropolis, and fill our prisons—no longer prisons to them—and you will see how imperative it is that something should be done to rescue them. They are mainly the produce of the work-house and the work-house schools. Over them society has no hold, because society has cast them out from all that is humane. They have been taught to feel that they have nothing in common with their fellow-men. Their experience is not of a home, or of parents, but of a work-house and a governor—of a prison, and a gaoler, as hard and as rigid as either."†

Now at last we have come to the source of the whole mischief. We take no heed of the "perishing" and "dangerous" classes, until, through cruel neglect, they become vengeful and ferocious—they turn and rend us. The cause of the Convict has been fought out; justice and humanity have conquered there. The offender, after his course of penal servitude, shall not be returned to society weakened in body, and confirmed in evil practices; he shall go forth with power in his hand, and knowledge in his head, to enable him henceforth to earn and to eat honest bread. The poor child in years, whom cruel circumstances and fatal ignorance seduced into a first fault, is not for that shut out of the pale of salvation; he shall be taught better things. Good men hope and work for other triumphs of reform. But, into the profound abyss of that workhouse abomination no helpful hand has yet been stretched: at most some pitying eye has opened in wonder at the mystery of evil there revealed, and fast closed again in horror and despair.

There is hope, however. Enquiry is awake. If the evil still remain, at least it shall no longer be ignored. Those who do no work by halves are now on the track. Mrs. Jameson, all honor to her! struck a chord, the vibration of which shall long be felt. That chapter on workhouses in her beautiful book, "The Communion of Labour," was the first loud note of alarm—it may be of deliverance also. Those whom such powerful, tender words struck to the quick, will not rest until thought takes life in action:—

At the first meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, held in Birmingham in October, 1857, the condition of workhouses was brought under the notice of the department of Social Economy. A sub-committee was appointed to investigate the subject, and the result of various meetings was the formation of a Workhouse Visiting Society,* which “would lead the minds of various persons to the subject, whilst it would form a centre of communication for all those who are at present working singly amidst great discouragements.” Among the committee we find the names

* At a Meeting of the Committee of the Social Economy Department of the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE, held at the Office of the Association, 8 Waterloo, Place, Pall Mall, on Monday, June 7th, 1858, the report of the Sub-Committee on Work-houses having been read—

1. Resolved, that the Report be received
2. That it is desirable to obtain a more efficient superintendence over the internal management of work-houses than now exists in the great majority of these establishments.
3. That the inmates of work-houses ought to be far more carefully classified than at present, as to sex, age, and character, and that children especially, should always be entirely separated from adult paupers.
4. That industrial training and occupation should be more extensively introduced.
5. That a system of inspection by unpaid, and especially Lady visitors, sanctioned by the Guardians, would be calculated to improve the internal condition of work-houses.
6. That for the furtherance of the views expressed above, the Committee of this department will sanction the establishment of a WORKHOUSE VISITING SOCIETY.

of some well known men, and some distinguished women. The work is now fairly begun. We may look for more startling, hideous revelations—some remedy speedily applied. Public opinion must sooner or later be impressed by such a method. Make known the evil first—and then the remedy.

The Church of England Review, and the Englishwoman's Journal are strong allies, and bring powerful help to the association. With how just a satire a clever writer in the last named valuable publication handles the subject we are dwelling on :—

“ It has occurred to us that stereoscopic slides of work-house interiors might be now distributed with greater efficiency than tracts at a penny, or pamphlets at a shilling; and the same wonderful art which is employed to trace and identify the criminal in the eye of the law, might be used to bring Lazarus under the notice of forgetful Dives—the miserable sufferer upon a work-house bed, under the sympathy of the lady, who, in the very next street, lies hour by hour upon her luxurious couch. p. 381.

“ The one hope, we were told, for St. Martin's Work-house lay in the National Gallery! public philanthropy and private rate-payers will not give it a new and well-arranged building; but it was hoped that the ground on which it stands would be wanted for the enlarged gallery which was in contemplation—when the better housing of our Raphaels and Turners would contribute indirectly to the better housing of our poor.” p. 384.

Workhouses and Women's Work is as wise a pamphlet as we have seen for many a day. It is clear and methodic, with a certain suppressed fire, very admirable when the question is of abuses and injustice to make one's hair stand on end. Such a tone gives confidence at once in the writer's power and sincerity. Without giving an outline of the whole, we shall just extract, almost at random, a few paragraphs. Here is the secret of the pauper's preference for the prison :—

“ In the first place, whatever the management of Workhouses may be, it is stated to be a fact, that they are less comfortable than prisons, and that the latter are preferred as places of abode by the lower classes. Magistrates and chaplains and visitors to prisons acknowledge this to be the case. The preference is openly avowed by men and women, especially the latter. What does it matter to them if the degradation of the prison is greater than the Workhouse, if indeed there be much difference between the two in this respect ?”

The prison offers a clean and comfortable lodging, food far superior, to the usual fare of the criminal, and to that of the Workhouses: kind and attentive officers of a grade above those provided for the non-criminal poor. Such treatment as is too commonly received even from the porter at the workhouse gate, would not be suffered in prison establishments, which are governed by a bench of magistrates, gentlemen by character and position, who regularly visit and inspect the buildings. With them rests the appointment of a governor, a gentleman of education and intelligence, who has the supreme command over the establishment, and, generally speaking, this important office is filled with discretion and zeal. The chaplain's is an important and conspicuous post, and lady visitors have long since been permitted to visit the female inmates.

The Report of the Visiting Justices of the Westminster House of Correction shows that the number of commitments from workhouses to that prison in the year 1856 was 273, and to the Coldbath Fields prison 221. With regard especially to the boys and girls thus committed, the magistrates speak as follows;—'Your committee cannot but believe, if more attention were paid in Workhouses to classification and other improvements of a reformatory character, there would be much less necessity for sending so many of the inmates to prison; and the visiting justices are strengthened in this belief from the fact of the very great difference in the numbers that are sent from some of the workhouses in comparison with others.' They believe that 'an increase in the criminal population must arise from familiarising so many destitute persons with the interior of the prison;' and they further suggest, 'that offences against workhouse rules should be punished by other means than imprisonment in a criminal prison; and that greater facilities should be offered to the poor and destitute, as well as to discharged prisoners, to prevent their committing offences in order to obtain an asylum.' Surely if there is no other argument in favour of an amended administration of our Workhouses, this alone would be sufficient. Either our prisons for criminals must be made less comfortable and attractive, or our workhouses, for the non-criminal poor, more so." p. p. 7. 8.

Very true, say we. And we add, that it were doubly well that reform in this case should for once begin at the right end, and that instead of seeking to pull down what is good, an been asked why they did not apply for it at the Workhouse? They have actually replied—'They did not like the disgrace of doing so.' Yet they would commit an offence against the laws, and enter a prison, without feeling that they had contracted any degradation! We are strongly inclined to believe that it is the general management of prisons being felt superior to that of Workhouses, that raises them in the estimation of the lower classes, who, even the worst among them, are keenly alive to justice and fair treatment. One of the most refractory female prisoners in a large prison told the magistrates, 'She knew she would receive justice from them.'" effort should be made to raise up to the just standard, what is now defective and bad. All that we have been doing of late only results in this, that the current of evil is stopped occasionally ; the course changed here and there, with infinite labour, and at ruinous expense. But the great body of the stream flows on as of old—turbulent, destructive, ever increasing. We must begin at the beginning. And, adopting the sentiment as our own, with the gifted writer of the pamphlet just quoted, “we trust that a better day has begun to dawn upon the dreary night of workhouse management, and that our non-criminal poor may ere long receive a share of that benevolent zeal and interest which is now so largely bestowed upon the criminal portion of our population.”

Sometimes when we are given to “romancing,” as our old nurse would say, we begin to hope that the Workhouse Visiting Society may come to spend the summer vacation in Ireland. If the society should not have much light thrown on their labours, by investigations at this side of the channel, perhaps at least they might succeed in showing up to some purpose our own national apathy on the subject. At any rate it would be no discouragement to them to find, that while pursuing their own noble path at home, they may do us good service also—saving at once two kingdoms from destruction and disgrace. We hope they may come. To get a glimpse of our “interiors” would not oblige a member to half an hour’s digression from any pleasure route in the kingdom.

On all the high roads of Ireland, whether we steam or ride, the first intimation of approach to any town or district of consideration, is the appearance on a rising ground of the Tudor gables and lattice windows of the Union Workhouse—or Poor-house, as we shall call the edifice in Ireland. To unaccustomed eyes the building presents the bearing of a respectable national institution not ashamed to hold up its head. But, as Mrs. Jameson says, it is “an institution peculiar to ourselves,” which cannot be spoken of “without a mingled feeling of shame and fear”—an institution, let us add, a parallel with which cannot be found in “despotic” Austria, or “ill-governed” Spain. To experienced eyes, therefore, the tawny edifice, for all its style and neatness, is nothing but a whited sepulchre. What we know to have occurred within those walls, it would not answer to refer to here. History when calm shall by and by write the narrative ; and writers of fiction, when they want to arouse and shock lethargic readers, will choose such a subject, and will find that to have the story credit-worthy they must pare down the truth, making it more probable by making it less true. We value the ennobling power of art too much to make it the medium of conveying frightening and sickening impressions. But the stereoscopic method might we think be adapted to illustrate certain transactions, constantly occurring to vary the monotony of poor-house life—normal conditions, which, wisely considered, point a moral very sharply. For example:—

Groups of poor-house-reared girls, surly, audacious, with no work to do, no wish for any; lounging through the prison-like wards with the shadow of the place upon them; power for mischief clearly developed in their faces; the master's step, too evidently, the only rule of conduct to them—a sight, on the whole, in comparison with which a herd of raving idiots suggests more cheerful reflection.—

Play ground of poorhouse children, whom society disowns, and whom "justice" and "charity" have taken to their own, stunted little creatures neither child-like, nor human-like; they are at play, sitting close packed against the wall, or gathered into knots, dull and stupified on their nursery floor; no ghost of a ball, or hoop, or pegging-top to mind them of a child's nature; pauper boys must be taught to do without these things.—

Behind the scenes: precocious youths applying deleterious substances to their eyes to simulate ophthalmia; happily succeeding, though with infinite pain, they may be sent to hospital, where no lessons are said, and where young paupers, if diseased, get good bread to eat.—

Conspiracy brewing among adult paupers to tear away the brick work and "murther the master"; not under the excusable pretext of inflicting injury on the said officer, but with the understood, avowed intention of being sent to gaol.—

Boys in the act of setting fire to their bedding, in the hope of burning down the whole establishment, and so putting an end to it all.—

Paupers attending divine service on Sunday: several card parties in full operation in convenient corners of the apartment devoted to public worship.—

But enough. People know little about these things. They care little, just because they know little. The press might utter a cry strong enough to be heard from one end of the island to the other ; but the press sometimes forgets its high vocation, and instead of leading and commanding opinion, is content passively to reflect the temper of the times. The press in Ireland, with a few honorable exceptions, reflects in this case very accurately—the apathy of opinion. People when forced by accident to give the matter a thought, have a vague notion that the poor laws are the destruction of the country, and content themselves with cursing the poor laws. Cursing the poor laws ! as if that legislative measure were not meant for good ; were not capable of good ; a recognition indeed of a vital first principle, that the rich should be taxed for the support of the destitute, and that beggars should no longer be quartered on paupers. If cursing were an accredited remedy, one might suggest the propriety of letting malediction fall in the proper quarter ; on the heads, namely, of the negligent, ignorant, factious administrators of the law. It does certainly strike one forcibly, that if a body of legislators sat down with cool heads to devise a method by which a whole race might be demoralized and physically debased, they could not hit upon a better plan than to enact a just law, and abandon the administration of it, according to the approved representative system, to a class of men not competent for the trust ; a class of middlemen who grind the faces of the poor, and to whom “ keep down the rates ! ” is the first and last commandment.

We should like, of all things to hear of the appointment of a parliamentary commission to enquire into the common-sense qualifications, and educational status of our “ guardians of the poor.” An instructive, perhaps amusing, blue book might be compiled, furnishing such tables as the following :—

A return of the number of Guardians who are familiar with the interior of the Houses they make rules for on Board days.

A return of those who only attend when a job is to be carried, a priest snubbed, or a parson put down.

A return of the Boards which do not appear to rejoice in the possession of one supreme bully, who, when a true gentleman and honest christian comes in to remonstrate, and say a word for the dumb suffering poor, hounds on his brood of brawlers, and silences the voice of humanity, and affrights its advocate by the apparition of this dragon at the door.

A return of the number of Guardians, who, on strict examination, appear to have ever once reflected that every penny they “ save the country ” by refusing to classify, industriously train, and properly feed mere paupers, is carried over at once to the prison account, and levied with ruinous interest for the maintenance of branded convicts. Lastly, and though we might have a column or too, it would not much increase the printer's bill—

A return of Guardians who do act according to right principles, and stand by their post; and though defeated, and left in scandalous minority, still protest, and raise a voice for humanity and justice.

A chapter on blue-book literature would not be the worst subject for a clever essayist. We have tragedy, comedy, farce, non-descript interludes, and finales of fire and brimstone in the Reports of many Royal Commissioners. The Reports of the Poor-law Commissioners have a style of their own, and a very remarkable one too. Official dignity is admirably preserved, and it is really a study to observe with what imperturbable calmness the guardians are recommended to adopt alleviative measures when disease appears; to attend unfailingly to the physician's opinion; to provide vegetables, and vary the diet of the paupers. With grave earnestness, advice is given to educate children, so that they may be enabled to leave the union, and obtain employment—for the carrying out of which object it is intimated, that it is necessary to employ persons fully competent to instruct in the schools, and also expedient to pay them sufficiently. Patiently and perseveringly the guardians are reminded, that the care of orphans is an onerous charge, involving moral obligations not a few—that the workhouse is a sorry substitute for a home to these deserted children—that still it is above all things important to keep them in health, care them, and train them industriously. The commonest truisms are detailed in a way to make them level with the comprehension of the most thick-headed guardian; and we can fancy how much art was called into exercise to preserve this tone, and how often the Commissioners, instead of recommending, advising, representing, and suggesting, must have longed for powers to command, compel, threaten, and denounce. The crowning point of all is the recorded fact, that in one year, thirty-two Boards of Guardians were dissolved, and paid officers appointed to do their duty. This, at all events, is significant. When “troublesome times” arrived, the “system of self-government,” and “the great principle of popular representation,” as developed in the constitution of Boards of Guardians, failed to work except in the dead-letter way, and two or three paid officers were found an efficient and satisfactory substitute for a score of duly elected guardians.

It is exceedingly strange how often men, even of average worth and talent, are spoiled, or rendered useless, when they come in contact with the working of this Poorhouse system. Many a man, who in his drawing room, is a frank, kindly gentleman—in his household, a good master—and in business or professional relations, “an honourable man,” fails in sense, and courage, and charity, when he takes his place at a Board of Guardians. His very goodness, if we may say so, is a stumbling block ; he seeks conciliation ; adopts soothing methods ; accepts instalments of good as he thinks ; gathers up shreds and patches of orders and resolutions to comfort himself withal—and succeeds, after all his trouble, just in plastering up abuses, and temporarily concealing offensive sores. But the direct road to reform in this particular case would be a sadly long way. It will take another age, and the operation of a yet undeveloped system of middle class education to produce a generation of true “guardians of the poor.” The appeal for the present lies elsewhere.

The subject of poor-house mismanagement is so vast, that we dare not even glance at its extent and ramifications in so cursory a way. Leaving everything else aside for the present, we shall give our parting word for the children who are brought up in the poorhouse. We say it boldly—the greatest evil lies here. Thousands of orphans and deserted children are crammed into the poorhouse ; the neglect they endure is fatal ; the very care, in some instances, bestowed on them, is vain or injudicious. What we are about to say now, regards the female children more particularly. The boys suffer in their measure ; but there are here and there outlets of escape for them ; sometimes they are trained usefully ; and at any rate the injury done to them and to society by poorhouse rearing is not so terrible, and so quickly avenged, as in the case of the girls.

In some Unions it would appear that the children are well taken care of. They are kept apart from the adults ; are well grounded in religious doctrine by the chaplains ; have masters and mistresses trained by the Board of Education ; and get in fact whatever a mechanical national school education can give them—but no more. They are taught no work by which they could earn their bread in the world. It is sometimes asserted that they are made to do the work of the house; that they wash clothes, clean out wards, and so on. Let no one be imposed on by that. The washing of the pauper uniform does not go far towards initiating them into the mysteries of "making up linen;" and the sweeping out of dreary monotonous wards does not exactly qualify for housemaid's duty. To speak plain truth, after undergoing poorhouse training from infancy or childhood, they are found at fifteen or sixteen years of age perfectly useless for all practical purposes.*

Moreover there is no way of disposing of them even if they were able to earn their bread. Here again one is sometimes put down by the assurance, that numbers of people come to the Union looking for servants, and that a great many girls are taken out in that way. Shall we tell what this means? We can speak with authority, though we are no guardian—thank Heaven! and for all our bitter speaking have never eaten the bread of affliction within the walls of the Union. But we shall tell how it is. The people who come to take out poorhouse children, are low struggling roomkeepers who cannot pay servant's wages, and want a little drudge, who for "her bit," no better generally than pauper's fare, is expected to slave, and trudge, and scrub with the power and energy of full-grown, skilled labour; or they are tradespeople who offering to teach the children their business, get them bound to them, and then use them for common messengers and runners. The treatment the unfortunate children meet with, is the kind

* "I was in a very large parish union, where there were about four hundred children, nearly an equal number of boys and girls; and schools for both. The boys had an excellent master for reading and writing, and had masters, besides, to teach them various trades. There was a tailor, a carpenter, a shoemaker, a hairdresser, a plumber, who at wages from 25s. to 35s. a week, were employed to instruct the boys in their respective trades. The girls were taught reading, writing, and sewing; some of them under the pauper menials, helped to scour and scrub. The over-tasked, anxious mistress seemed to do her best; but there was not sufficient assistance. The whole system was defective and depressing, and could not by any possibility turn out efficient domestic servants, or well-disciplined, religious-minded, cheerful-tempered girls. I was informed that, of the boys sent out of this house, about 2 per cent. returned to the parish in want or unserviceable; while of the girls they reckoned that about 50 per cent. were returned to them ruined and depraved."

one would expect to be given by people who think nothing too bad for a child who is "only a pauper, whom nobody owns." The bad example witnessed in these "homes," the spectacle of vice never dreamt of in the children's ward, is often so shocking that the young servant or apprentice runs back frightened, begging with tears to be taken into the Union again. Even in rare instances where fair play and indulgence might be given, obstacles of the most provoking kind, arise from the unbearable ignorance of the children themselves.* The very timidity of creatures so long housed up from intercourse with the world, to whom a run down the street is an adventure, and carrying a message, a service of difficulty and danger, causes them to commit awkwardnesses to no end.

The general result is that the children are turned off, or run-away; stray about the streets or roads for a while; meet bad company; and are next heard of in gaol;† or seeking refuge again in the Union, are admitted—but not this time among the children. A woman's suit is put on them—they are sent to the woman's ward—and hope is done with them. Their childhood was safe with children; they had one glimpse of the great world, which did not use them well; now they shall have full knowledge of what is meant by a hell upon earth. Suffice it to say, that the very worst characters resort to the poor-house, just for the purpose of tempting out such ready-reared victims; and as there is no separation of character

* See our "Record" of the current number for "St. Joseph's Industrial School, with special reference to its intern class of Work-house Orphans."

† This important official statement (Report of Poor Law Commissioners) reveals the melancholy admission that 35 per 1000 of these young persons are either so depraved, or the discipline of the workhouses is so conducted, that of the entire number put in prison, from 9 to 15 years of age, 64 per cent., and of those from 15 to 21 years of age, 61 per cent., were for offences committed in the workhouses, so that their antecedent criminality, even including under this head the larger fraction of vagrancy, has been only about half as active in familiarising them with the debasement of a prison as the very workhouses to which they resorted as an asylum. The outbursts in Cork and Waterford Unions, by which the windows were broken, the workhouses wrecked, the officers injured, and police and military interference required, were not only witnessed, but were shared in by the school children, and by many who had been reared in those institutions.—See IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, No. 15, September, 1854.

or class, no protection for the innocent, no corner of shelter in all the desolate, dreary wards, in which the modest girl can be out of ear-shot of the blasphemous talk, and ribald songs of the degraded and shameless herd, evil speedily has its way. Children born and bred in the vilest lane of a crowded city, and surrounded by idle, vicious neighbours, have better chance of escape, better opportunity of knowing right from wrong, greater power of choosing and resisting, than those poor orphans.

If by rare chance, some few of those who return to the poorhouse, escape the last degradation to which we have alluded, they are sure to fall into another pit. The atmosphere of the place soon tells upon them—lessens, and deadens, and finally destroys all energy of body and mind. The want of work, or the forced work without profit, or reward,* or healthy stimulant, has the inevitable result. After perhaps an effort or two to get and keep a situation, they finally return of their own free will to the Union, to lead a life, we cannot say of animal enjoyment, but of brutish inaction. The poorhouse stamp is on their coarse garments a badge of degradation—the poorhouse stamp is on their whole moral being, a warning that none need hope much good from them.

The worst cases in a convict prison are the insolent ungovernable subjects from the poorhouse. In their untameable audacity, and unconquerable obstinacy they form a strong contrast with the poor girls who are sent up from the country parts of Ireland under sentence of penal servitude. The latter, generally speaking, after holding out for a while, fall gradually into the routine of discipline, become gentle and docile, take instruction gratefully, and are almost sure to leave the prison better girls than they entered, not unfrequently thanking God that they were brought there. But the former, coming in, too often, of their own accord, and not for purposes of self-improvement, are capable of any enormity, and are the despair of matrons and officers.

Amongst the unfortunate inmates of the Magdalen Asylums,

* In a paper read at the Social Science meeting at Birmingham, 1857, Mrs. De Morgan suggests the practicability of slightly remunerative employment, and especially urges industrial training for the young, so that "workhouses, from being the lowest step on the downward ladder, might form the first of an ascending scale, and arrest the idle and vicious in their certain course to prison."

the most thoroughly depraved are of the same class. They have to be watched with most vigilant care, lest the spirit of evil and insubordination so strong within them, should break out anew, and contaminate those, who, in comparison with them, are innocent. The source of all their wickedness and misery they trace to the evil influence of unrestricted intercourse with the worst classes in the poorhouse ; and when it is sometimes thoughtlessly suggested to them, that on leaving the asylum, if all fail, they can go to the Union, the answer is quick and to the point—" it were better to go back to the old trade than do that !"

Our lunatic asylums are not without their poorhouse cases, of a kind to baffle the ingenuity of experienced physicians, who find it frequently impossible to decide whether the patients from the poorhouse are really lunatics, or only make-believe mad. As for hospital experience—we leave that to be inferred.

Turn where we may, in every asylum and refuge for the unfortunate ; in every place of detention and punishment for the criminal ; wherever vice, and misery, and cruel suffering have their abode, the poorhouse and its iniquitous system rise up before the mind. Poorhouse-reared girls throug the streets, or spend their lives on the tramp from one "institution" to another, trying which is the most comfortable, or which answers best the need or the whim of the moment. Truly, our system of dealing with the poor, in spite of all its niggard parsimony, is not an economic one.

Want of classification, and want of industrial training, are not the only evils. There remains another grievous wrong. The children in the poorhouse are not properly fed. It is of no use to say that they would have no better food at home if they had a home. They would have better than that ; they would have full liberty of spirit and limb, and fresh air in copious draughts. Irish children, when at large, are known to be hardy, healthy, straight-limbed and well grown. In the Union they are stunted, and deformed, have weak eyes, swollen jaws, and are subject to diseases which permanently vitiate the blood. So that at a time when emigration is carrying off our labouring population, and we begin to fear that we may soon be in want of hewers of wood and drawers of water, we are actually rearing from 15,000, to 20,000 boys and girls in such a way, that if they survive childhood, they can only propagate disease and perpetuate deformity. A congress of slave-drivers would be too wise for this; they would see the absurdity of destroying the breed of the human cattle which is to do the rough work of life for themselves and their children.*

There must be an end put to this stronghold of perdition, no matter what it cost. We state the plain fact, and show how things are. Let political economists, and christian philanthropists, and good men and women who take common sense views of things look to it. We know that some have already set their thoughts in this direction, and are groping for a remedy. To these we say:—Take heart; be not discouraged; if you can do no more, stand even like watchmen on the tower and give notice of the danger; you shall not always be alone! A few earnest men can utter words more full of power than the roar of multitudes. All good work, in our time, is done in this way:—a few true hearts think out honestly their thought; they gain disciples; opinion grows; and soon, suddenly as it seems, a voice is heard which dare not be gainsayed.

Why not turn the children's classes into regular industrial schools? It would cost too much to get masters and mistresses, and working tools—and the guardians would never consent! But, we persist, after a few years' training, they would be fit to leave the Union, and could earn their bread ever after. Is it a wonderful saving to keep them all their lives, and instead of training them for the world, only rear them for the gaol?

* "With respect to some workhouses in Ireland, it has been alleged that the diet for the children is sufficient. In others, as in the North Dublin Union, the mortality of infant children is excessive. Some ten years ago, the mortality there rose to such a height that it became matter of public investigation. What it is at present I do not know, but a remark of a guardian at a recent meeting was significant of his opinion on this point. When a question arose as to the religion in which two deserted children should be brought up, Mr. Roper said, 'I think it a thousand pities to lose so much time about a matter of no consequence, because every man knows that from the system of the house, not one of these children will be alive this day twelve months.' How guardians, with such convictions on their minds, can be found to be the instruments for enforcing the rule, that no child shall receive relief except in the workhouse, it is not easy to understand."—The Workhouse as a mode of Relief for Widows and Orphans. By W. Neilson Hancock, LL.D. Read at the Meeting of the Dublin Statistical Society, 29th January, 1855.

Why not, as Dr. Hancock suggested three years ago,* give out-door relief to widows in such a way, that their destitution need not compel them to enter the poorhouse with their children, and condemn the orphans, as a first step towards their education, to a severance from all ties of home and kindred? Why not, as that clear-headed man recommends, make the allowance contingent on the children's attendance at some school in the neighbourhood, and so arrange matters that "the calamity of the father's early death need not have produced the further calamity of breaking-up a human family?"

Or, better still, instead of crushing them into poorhouses, why not charge the rates with their support in extern industrial schools—such as the Aberdeen Feeding Schools for example? What has been effected in that town and in Glasgow by the operation of these schools, furnishes an example which Ireland might very well follow. Sheriff Watson, tired of committing vagrant children to prison for petty offences, thought of a remedy; and having enlisted the sympathy of a few zealous friends, a school was opened in Aberdeen, in 1841. It was notified that children of the lowest description would be received, and in addition to the ordinary school training, would be given work and food; would be kept all day, and would be sent home at night, that family ties might not be interfered with. Children flocked in without further persuasion; their appearance changed rapidly; and the police soon reported a perceptible diminution in the number of juvenile offenders. Here is a telling fact:—The number of boys committed to prison in Aberdeen in the year 1851 had suddenly increased to four times the number of the previous year, and in 1854 quadrupled again; while during the same period the committals of girls never exceeded two in the year. This discrepancy was not to be accounted for until it became known, that owing to a temporary depression of trade, the subscriptions to the schools fell off; the gentlemen who managed the boys' schools were obliged to restrict the admissions, while the committee of ladies who managed the girl's schools, being more fruitful in resources, contrived to keep going as usual.

* We refer to the paper quoted in the note above. There could not be a better proof given of the want of interest among the public in this vitally important subject, than the fact of the little notice this most able paper attracted. It gives the essence of whole chapters in a few short paragraphs, and ought to have been a textbook for the "leaders" of our daily press.

Subsequently an Act of Parliament was obtained, known as Dunlop's Act, by which Sheriffs and Magistrates are empowered to send children found begging, or wandering about without proper guardianship, to these schools, when duly certified by the Secretary of State, to be kept there as long as is necessary for their training. The parish may be rated for their maintenance.

The effect of the operation of these schools has been, that the towns in which they are established are almost cleared of juvenile criminals; the demand of employers for the children exceeds the supply; and in the schools the attendance has lessened owing to the exhaustion of the class from which they came. The cost, including rent, salaries, and other expenses averages from £7 to £11 per head per annum.*

The only sign of life which Ireland has given, is in the establishment of the Cork Benevolent Apprenticing Society, and in the existence of St. Joseph's Industrial Institute in the neighbourhood of Dublin. Both works are in their infancy. In Cork a number of gentlemen lately formed themselves into a Society for the purpose of taking boys out of the poorhouse, at the moment when they should be sent, by the rules of the Union, among the unclassed adults. They not only apprentice them to trades-people in the city, but continue to watch over their conduct with great vigilance, settling disputes between master and apprentice, and acting the part of a well organised patronage society. They have already provided for twenty-one boys, whose conduct since they have been placed out has been unexceptionable. These gentlemen with scarcely an exception are guardians, who finding they could not carry reform into the system of poorhouse management, were not content with remonstrating at the Board, but remembering they were not only poor-law guardians, but likewise christian gentlemen who could not let evil pass without an effort to stay it, began to work in their private capacity, and soon set an example worth following. They have since appealed to the ladies of Cork to go and do likewise, and help the poorhouse girls, and we believe not without effect. The managers of St. Joseph's Industrial Institute, have taken out of one of the Dublin Unions seven orphan girls, "a sort of first instalment" as they say. It is a small beginning, but involves the assertion of a great principle.

* 'Train up a child in the way he should go.' A paper on the Industrial schools of Scotland, and Dunlop's Act, Communicated to the British meeting of the National Reformatory Union in 1856. By Alfred Hill, Barrister-at-Law.

No time is to be lost. Reason suggests, prudence dictates, expediency demands that the present state of things should be put an end to. A child in a Reformatory costs £20 a year at the lowest estimation: a grown offender in a common gaol more than £23: and a convict prisoner above £33. A word to the wise is sufficient. Such facts and figures strike in the wedge very bravely. We keep fifteen or twenty thousand children in our Irish Poor-houses, and we think we are excellent managers and do our duty by society and the orphans. Heaven help us!

There is a very precious benediction bestowed on those who "lead others unto justice," and doing the Saviour's work, "bring back strayed sheep to the fold." Let those who give their hearts to the Reformatory cause be comforted with that. There is a grievous malediction pronounced by the same Lord and Master himself, against those who "scandalise those little ones." Let our guardians, and our rate-payers, and our inert public look to it.

At the conclusion of our paper entitled The Hair, and printed in the twenty-seventh number of this REVIEW, we promised to return to the subject then opened, and to write of Beards and Wigs. In our present paper we shall consider the subject, BEARDS AND WHISKERS.

It may be safely argued, as a general physiological principle, that whatever evinces a free and natural development of any part of the body is by necessity beautiful. Deprive the lion of his mane, the cock of its comb, the peacock of the emerald plumage of its tail, the ram and deer of their horns, and they not only become displeasing to the eye, but lose much of their power and vigor. And it is easy to apply this reasoning to the hairy ornaments of a man's face. The caprice of fashion alone forces the Englishman to shave off those appendages which give to the male countenance that true masculine character indicative of energy, bold daring, and decision.

The presence or absence of the beard as an addition to the face, is the most marked and distinctive peculiarity between the countenance of the two sexes. Who can hesitate to admire the noble countenance of the Osmanli Turk of Constantinople, with his un-Mongolian length of beard? Ask any of the fair sex whether they will not approve and admire the noble countenance of Mehemet Ali, Major Herbert Edwardes, the hero of the Punjab, Sir Charles Napier, and others, as set off by the beard?—We may ask with Beatrice—

Is his head worth a hat, or his chin worth a beard?”

We have noticed the whiskers and beards of many of our most eminent physicians and merchants encroaching upon their former narrow boundaries, while it is well known that not a few of our divines have been long convinced of the folly of disobeying one of nature's fixed laws; but hitherto, their unwillingness to shock the prejudice of their congregations, have prevented them from giving effect to their convictions. The London Methodist Quarterly Review recently took up the subject, and the following is an extract from it:—

“It may surprise not a few when we say that the bronchitic affections under which ministers of the gospel so frequently labour, are often due to the violation of a hygienic law. The fact that the Creator planted a beard upon the face of the human male, thus making it a law of his physical being, indicates, in a mode not to be misunderstood, that the distinctive appendage was bestowed for the purpose of being worn. Moreover, physiologically considered, those views are corroborated by experience; for diseases of the throat have, in many instances, been traced directly to the shaving of the beard, the liability disappearing with its growth, and vice versâ. Let, then, all our ministers of religion wear beards, for the Bible and nature are in favour of it; nor is the great head of the Church, Christ himself, ever seen in a painting without a beard; and it was said by the early Christian father, Tertullian, that to shave the beard, is ‘blasphemy against the face.’”

Dr. Dixon, a leading physician of New York, in his influential publication, The Scalpel, strongly advocates the wearing of the beard, and some able letters have recently appeared on the subject in the Montreal Herald, a commercial daily journal of Canada.

A recent decree of the Emperor of Austria forbids his civil functionaries, of whatever grade, to wear beards. “Genteel” whiskers and properly trimmed moustaches may still be worn. The new regulation is any thing but popular with those whose chins have not been familiar with cold steel since the year of grace 1811.

The mode in which young men wear their beards is the one solemn question of the Neapolitan government at the present time (April, 1853). A little more or less hair on the chin of a pale dandy, makes the State tremble. However absurd this may appear to Englishmen, it is no joke for the Neapolitans, who are dragged daily into the barbers' shops by the police, and their beards trimmed according to the political creed of the authorities, who just now believe, that nature grows rebellious on the lip. The police wanted a decree to appear, prohibiting men from wearing hair on their chins, but His Majesty is said to have declined his signature to the document, so that the inspectors are obliged to act without official authority.

Lorenzo Benoni gives some passages in the life of an Italian, which portray this system of merciless persecution.

"I am now twenty-one, and a thick circlet of hairs has grown under my chin. I should also have a pair of beautiful moustaches—the object of my ambition as a child—if moustaches were not unmercifully proscribed. I have made several attempts towards wearing them, but they were all frustrated. One day, a long, long time ago, M. Merlini, meeting me in the peristyle of the University, with a show of down upon my lip, protested, with sundry indescribable nods, jerks, and grimaces, that he had taken me for a pioneer. I understood the hint, and my budding moustaches fell under the razor. Twelve months later, the moustaches having reappeared thicker than ever, the Director of Police had the kindness to send me word through my father, that if I did not shave them off of my own accord, he would have them cut off for me; a very simple ceremony, not at all unprecedented. Two Carabineers would take you by each arm, force you into a barber's shop, and stand present during the operation."

In a general order issued from the Adjutant General's office, at Washington, to the American army, it is laid down that the beard is to be worn at the pleasure of the individual, provided it be kept short, and neatly trimmed. The reason given for the permission being that "the human beard is equally valuable as a protection against the cold blast of the north, and the scorching suns of the south." In our navy, on the contrary, the Admiralty has made it incumbent on all commanders of stations, to issue orders that no officer or man is to be allowed to wear "unseemly tufts of hair under the chin;" and the moustache is, in like manner, strictly prohibited.

M. Jourdan states, that when the long hair worn by the soldiers in the revolutionary war was cut off in all the regiments, many complained of headaches of several weeks' continuance. Persons in the habits of wearing long beards, have often been afflicted with rheumatic pains in the face, or with sore throat, upon shaving them off. In several cases of frequently recurring, or of chronic, sore throat, Dr. Copland (Dict. of Pract. Medicine), tells us wearing the beard under the chin and upon the throat, has prevented a return of this complaint.

The annals of the beard are rather interesting. Within the range of modern history, it has gone out and come into fashion about a dozen times. At the present moment, it is gradually creeping into favor, and in the course of a few years it may, probably, approach the zenith of its glory, again to be cried down as "vulgar," and shorn of all its pristine charms.

Many of our readers have no doubt seen the portraits of such men as Drake, Raleigh, Francis Bacon, Vandyke, and all the remarkable men of the times of Elizabeth and the two Charles's. Compare those faces, set off by magnificent beards, with the portraits of our closely shaved moderns, in their high, stiff-starched shirt collars; the eye at once acknowledges the superiority of the former in the picture; why does it not extend its judgment to the living pictures?—The reason is—Fashion deters.

———"By Jupiter,
Were I the wearer of Antonius' beard,
I would not shave to-day."

Beards never flourished in England so universally as previous to the Norman conquest, and as the Normans only wore whiskers, they were thought by the English spies to be an army of priests.

Beards were worn in the reigns of Mary, Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I., but not generally.

A correspondent in the late Douglas Jerrold's Weekly News, some six years since, urged the subject with much force and justice :

"Why," said he, "should men cut off what nature has given them for use, comfort, and ornament, and as a distinguishing characteristic of their sex! Is shaving a pleasing operation? If the choice lay between two evils, something might be urged in favour of the custom of shaving; but I do most strenuously contend that the beard is a positive good. It is useful, for it affords naturally what we are forced to supply artificially—warmth and protection to the throat. If the fashion of wearing beards was to come in, we should have no more sore throats. It is ornamental—if you doubt it, look at Cardinal Benbo's picture—at the portraits of Titian, Shakspeare, Fletcher, Spencer, Chaucer, Alfred, Plato,—I could name a great man who wore a beard, for every hair which I painfully shaved off this morning. It sets off the face as in a frame; it gives dignity, and conveys the idea of strength, decision, manliness, depth of intellect, solidity,—in short, everything may be said in its favour—nothing against it. 'What!' I hear a fair friend exclaim, 'would the wretch have our husbands, our brothers, our sons and our nephews, wear nasty beard's and look like Frenchmen?' Certainly not, Madam; and one reason why we should not look like Frenchmen is that our beards would not be nasty. If we ceased to shave, we should not cease to use soap and water, and I will venture to say that the English beard would be the cleanest, glossiest, handsomest thing in the world. Besides, the beard which I advocate, is the beard given us by nature, in the form in which she caused it to grow. I would not have it touched by the razor; let the scissors curtail and shape it when too exuberant, but my cry is 'a bas the razor!' You very seldom see a foreigner with the beard, the whole beard, and nothing but the beard. He shaves off his whiskers or moustache, or in some way or other manages to disfigure himself. Now what I want is, the whole or none. Once admit that the use of the razor may be advantageous to some extent, and I am as far off my end as ever. Dear Madam, you know not the pains of shaving, and the beauties of the beard."

The poet Campbell is said to have calculated that a man who shaves himself every day, and lives to the age of three score and ten, expends during his life as much time in the act of shaving as would have sufficed for learning seven languages. Southey in his "The Doctor" (vol. 5), states that he tested this assertion by timing himself, and he found that he occupied ordinarily nine minutes; but if he had to strop his razor, another minute or two would have been lost.

"Now (he goes on to state) as to my beard, it is not such a beard as that of Domenico d'Ancona, which was delle barbe la corona, that is to say the crown of beards, or rather in English idiom, the king.

"Una barba la più singulare Che mai fosse discripta in verso o'u prosa."

A beard the most unparallel'd

That ever was yet described in prose or rhyme.

And of which Berni says, that the barber ought to have felt less reluctance in cutting the said Domenico's throat, than in cutting off so incomparable a beard. Neither do I think that mine, even by possibility, could vie with that of Futteh Ali Shah, King of Persia at this day; nay, I doubt whether Macassar oil, bear's grease, elephant's marrow, or the approved receipt of sour milk with which the Persians cultivate their beards, could ever bring mine to the far inferior growth of his son's, Prince Abbas Mirza. Indeed no Mussulman would ever look upon it, as they did upon Mungo Park's, with envious eyes, and think that it was too good a beard for a Christian. But for a Christian, and moreover an Englishman, it is a sufficient beard; and for the individual a desirable one: nihil me pœnitel hujus barbæ; desirable I say, inasmuch as it is in thickness and rate of growth rather below the average standard of beards. Nine minutes therefore will be about the average time required for shaving, by a Zebedeean—one who shaves himself. A professional operator makes quicker work; but he cannot be always exactly to the time, and at the year's end, as much may have been lost in waiting for the barber, as is gained by his celerity of hand.

Assuming then the moderate average of nine minutes, nine minutes per day amount to an hour and three minutes per week; an hour and three minutes per week are fifty-four hours thirty-six minutes per year. We will suppose that our shaver begins to operate every day when he has completed his twentieth year; many, if not most men, begin earlier; they will do so if they are ambitious of obtaining whiskers; they must do so if their beards are black, or carrotty, or of strong growth. There are then fifty years of daily shaving to be completed, and in that time he will have completed two thousand seven hundred and thirty hours in the act of shaving himself. Dividing this number by seven, we have three hundred and ninety hours for learning each language; three hundred and ninety lessons of an hour long,—wherein it is evident that any person of common capacity might with common diligence learn to read, speak and write, sufficiently well for all ordinary purposes any European language."

On the other side it is urged, if beards are to be worn, some care and, consequently, some time must be bestowed upon them. The beard must be trimmed occasionally if you would have it as ragged as an old Jew clothes-man's: it must also be kept clean, if you would not have it inhabited like the emperor Julian's; and if you desire to have it like Arron's, you would oil it. Therefore it is probable that a Zebedeean who is cleanly in his habits, would not save any time by letting his beard grow.

"I myself (observes Southey), if I wore a beard, should cherish it, as the Cid Campeador did, for my pleasure. I should regale it on a summer's day with rose water; and without making it an idol, I should sometimes offer incense to it, with a pastille, or with lavender and sugar. My children, when they were young enough for such blandishments, would have delighted to stroke and comb and curl it, and my grandchildren in their turn would have succeeded to the same course of mutual endearment."

"The practice of cutting the hair of the head and the beard is attended with a prodigious increase of the secretion of the matter of the hair. It is ascertained that a man of fifty years of age will have cut from his head above thirteen feet, or twice his own length of hairs; and of his beard, in the last twenty-five years of the same period—above eight feet. The hair likewise, besides this enormous length, will be thicker than if it had been left uncut, and must lose most of its juices by evaporation, from having its tube and the ends of its fibres always exposed.

The custom of shaving the beard and cutting the hair of the head has, we believe, been justly deprecated by some physiologists. The latter has been supposed, and with much apparent reason, to weaken the understanding, by diverting the blood from the brain to the surface of the head. The connection which exists between the beard and the muscular strength of the individual, would seem to render it improper to interfere with its natural mode of growth. Bichat attributes the superior strength of the ancients to the custom of wearing their beards: and those men who do not shave at present are distinguished for vigor and hardihood."

We cannot agree with all these assertions and speculations, especially the assumption that clipping the hair is calculated to weaken the understanding.

When the Russian soldiers were first compelled to part with their beards, that they might look like other European troops, they complained that the cold struck into their jaws and gave them the tooth-ache. The sudden deprivation of a warm covering might have occasioned this and other local affections. But they are not said to have complained that they had lost their wits. On the contrary, in the days of Peter the Great they are reported to have made a ready use of them in relation to this very subject. Other arguments had been used in vain for persuading them to part with that comfortable covering which nature had provided for their cheeks and chins, when one of their priests represented to them that their good Czar had given orders for them to be shaved only from the most religious motives, and a special consideration of what concerned them most nearly. They were about to march against the Turks. The Turks, as they well know, wore beards, and it was of the utmost importance that they should distinguish themselves from the misbelievers by this visible mark, for otherwise their protector, St. Nicholas, in whom they trusted, would not know his own people. This was so cogent a reason that the whole army assented to it, and a general shaving took place. But when the campaign against the Turks was over, and the same troops were ordered to march against the Swedes, the soldiers called for the priest, and told him they must now let their beards grow again—for the Swedes shaved, and they must take care St. Nicholas might know his friends from his foes.

Beatrice (in "Much Ado about Nothing") says—"I could not endure a husband with a beard on his face;" and yet she subsequently admits that "he that hath no beard is less than a man."

A correspondent in the Globe, (Aug. 28, 1852) states that he spent nine years of his life in Russia, where the frost was so excessive, that the thermometer fell sometimes (by our scale) to 35 degs. below zero, and yet he never saw a common Russian, with any covering round his neck except that provided by nature, which effectually protects his chin and the glands of his throat. They travel in their sledges at almost railroad speed, and are therefore exposed to the utmost severity of the frost, from which, thus protected, they never suffer any inconvenience.

Sir Francis Head, in his recent work, A Faggot of French Sticks, after speaking of a French railway guard with an unusually long and thick black beard, says—"It occurred to me at the moment that our railway directors in England might for the same service recommend the adoption of this fashion. In regions of intense cold it is invariably found necessary to cover a shaved chin, and there is no cheaper or warmer protection than that which nature has granted to the lower half of a man's face; it would be especially economical and convenient to railway guards, who, when travelling at thirty or forty miles an hour, through cold air, itself flying in an opposite direction, say from forty to sixty miles an hour, are exposed—to say nothing of rain, sleet, snow, hail and sunshine—to very trying vicissitudes of temperature and climate."

In an article in the Edinburgh News, the masons in that city were recommended, on the score of health, to wear the moustache and beard as a preventative to breathing the fine dust which so much injures the working mason, and shortens his life. The recommendation was given by a grave professor at Edinburgh—Dr. Alison, who would be the last, it is said, to countenance anything like puppyism—or continentalism shall we call it—on the part of our operatives. The consequence is, that nearly all the masons in Scotland, in the north of England, and even, we understand, in certain districts of Ireland, have begun to cultivate moustaches! Other trades, such as millers, cabinet makers, steel grinders, and the like, are rapidly following this example. The practice of wearing the moustache, and even the imperial, is an old British one, as every one knows; but it is really from knowing its beneficial influence in lengthening the lives and protecting the health of German, French, and other continental stone cutters and masons, that its revival in this country is advised ; and the recommendation is now being carried out by the Glasgow masons.

It is a notorious fact that cavalry regiments suffer less than regiments of the line from consumption. Their beards and moustaches act like a respirator ; and the same line of reasoning applies with greater force to stone-masons and other trades where impalpable fine dust is breathed into the lungs. In the south of Germany—in Bavaria and Wurtemberg, for example—where freestone is extensively worked, and where the masons are fine-looking, muscular fellows with large beards, such a disease as phthisis is never heard of.

Tait's Magazine for November, 1852, had a pleasant article under the heading of "A few words upon Beards," from which I shall take an extract or two.

"Have not men, aye, whole nations, been named from the color and fashion of their maxillary hair? Was not the fate of Rome decided by an insult offered to the venerable appendage? Have not laws been framed for the regulation of beards, and for keeping their proportions curtailed within conscientious limits?"

"We declare ourselves at once as champions of the long beard ; we regard it with profound respect, and deeply lament that so comely an ornament should be banished. We cannot forget the picturesque effect which the shape of the beard had in the reigns of the Tudors, and we mourn that so refined an adornment should have gone out of fashion. But then, as now, France exercised taste for all Europe—Louis XIII. and Louis XIV. both ascended the throne in their minority, and in a spirit of fulsome flattery it was proposed among the courtiers, and carried by acclamation, that to present a loyal compliment to their bald-chinned sovereign, they should surrender their cherished beard and moustaches, and exhibit their features feminine and free."

Hence the fashion spread, until in later times, no one dared, Esau-like, to gratify nature at the expense of art.

Hudibras's beard must have been perilously attractive, for

"The upper part thereof was whey,
The nether orange, mixed with grey."

Bottom, the weaver, had a very accommodating taste in reference to his beard ; for in allusion to the part of Pyramus, which he was to play, he says—"I will discharge it in either your straw-colored beard, your orange-tawny beard, your purple-in-grain beard, or your French crown-colored beards—your perfect yellow." No less cheering is it to notice the refined cultivation which was given to beards in days still nearer to our own. The peaked beards in Vandyke's portraits we regard as being very comely ; and they almost make us think that a more handsome fashion of wearing the beard could not be devised. Sir Thomas More's attention to this classical ornament claims our highest admiration. When kneeling before the block, with the axe already suspended over his neck, he bade the executioner wait till he had put aside his beard, for that had committed no treason.

We have a few words more to say, and those are words of hope—we are enabled to prophecy that beards are coming back again. Civilized chins shall again repose in the shadow of perennial pilosity ; and the barber, no longer condemned to reap the barren crop of a stubble field, shall be restored to his pristine dignity as the artistic cultivator of man's distinguishing appendage. Already the martial moustache, the haughty imperial, and the daily expanding whiskers, like accredited heralds, proclaim the approaching advent of the monarch, Beard ; the centuries of his banishment are drawing to their destined close, and the hour and the man are at hand to re-establish his ancient reign.

“ Be not so mad (says Quarles) as to alter that countenance which thy Creator made thee ; remember it was the work of his hands ; if it be bad, how darest thou mend it ? If it be good, why dost thou mar it ? Art thou ashamed of his work and proud of thy own ? He made thy face to be known by, why desirest thou to be known by another ? It is a shame to adulterate modesty, but more to adulterate nature. Blush not to appear what he blushes not to make thee. It is better to be his picture than thy own.”

The Naval and Military Gazette of the 12th March, 1853, in a leading article advocating the wearing of the moustache generally by the military, says—“ If the cavalry—and the first to wear the moustache were the hussars and the household troops—did not wear this military mark, we then might have believed there was an impression that ‘ the moustache was not British,’ and that we were better looking fellows without it. However, the moustache is now called for on better grounds than merely the wish of the service and its military propriety. It is now called for on medical grounds. If the appearance of the soldiers alone were in question, we could have much to say in favor of the moustache.

distinctive military mark? Why does Prince Albert himself wear it? He is not a cavalry officer? Why do two-thirds of the army on half-pay wear the moustache? Because it is a very becoming and soldier-like and healthy adornment of the human face. Civilians too largely indulge in it. Are they less English on that account? It is well known that nothing better protects from both the sun and frost than whiskers and moustache. Ask those who have long served in India and Canada, the Cape colony and the Arctic regions."

A correspondent of the same paper speaks personally of the advantages he derived from wearing the hair about the face. "On my regiment landing (he says) from England at Algoa Bay, South Africa, in 1846, we proceeded at once to join Colonel Somerset's division, encamped on the Chalumna river, about fifteen days' march, during which both officers and men suffered much from sore lips, caused by the heat of the sun and dry wind. I recollect one sergeant-major in particular was a pitiable object, his lips being in a worse state almost than any others. I was one of the sufferers (for few of us escaped), and therefore can speak feelingly; and I know that as soon as our 'Chief' gave the order to allow the moustache to grow, those who were fortunate enough in possessing a beard never suffered afterwards."

In a number of the United Service Gazette, the editor thus takes up the subject, about six years ago:—

"A feeling appears to prevail that the Englishman has as good a right to wear hair upon his upper lip as a Frenchman or a German; and that if the hirsute adornment is suitable to the cavalry, it is equally appropriate to the infantry. Let us examine the question in a common-sense spirit. Nature says to man, wear moustaches on the upper lip; and it is the opinion of the pro-moustache party that nature's laws should be obeyed. Civilisation says, society could not hold together if this doctrine were admissible. Natural impulses are the apologies of the savage, who sets decency at defiance. Therefore, for the sake of order and harmony, and to remove man from the same low state as the beasts of the field, social rules are introduced, which place nature's laws in abeyance. Good: but may not this restraint upon nature be carried to a mischievous and absurd length; may not the advocates of these restrictions run into extremes which have not the commonest justification of reason? Why is not the moustache popular in modern England? Simply, because it is popular elsewhere, and John Bull has a dread of being thought anybody but John Bull. The excellent friend of Church and State stands much upon his reputation. No one, in his opinion, enjoy so high a character for honesty and bravery, and, as people are judged of by their appearance, he does not fancy that any one who wears a moustache can be taken for an Englishman. John has a notion that in proportion as the inner man is deficient in sterling qualities, he is assiduous to decorate his personal. If a man with an adorned upper lip goes into his counting-house, John takes it for granted he is either a 'distinguished foreigner,' or a member of the swell mob, or of some other class of society equally to be doubted; and he buttons his pockets with a mixture of alarm and resolution instantaneously. Nothing, therefore, but the suggestion of personal vanity stronger than the love of reputation, a 'most false imposition' (as Iago says) induces an Englishman to challenge the antipathy and distrust of his sober fellow-citizens. You will not often hear men admit that they wear moustaches because they look all the better for them. No; any excuse serves them but the true one. This man is subject to the toothache; that one is always travelling, and must 'at Rome do as Rome does.' Sometimes the practice of ours is the justification, or the pain of the razor, and not unfrequently the fear of inhaling malaria, which otherwise settles on the moustache and is wiped away. Why cannot men be honest at once, and say that it is because Anna Maria or Sarah Jane love those dear moustaches that they allow the hair to grow. Or more likely still, that because after an extensive study of the mirror it is obvious that they are handsomer with than without the hair? But all this has nothing to do with the military part of the business. 'To be, or not to be,' on the infantry soldier, 'that is the question?' Well, then, we say, let the soldier have the moustache, and let razors, shaving-pots and brushes no longer remain in his knapsack, to add to the weight so badly adjusted on his unhappy back. Shaving takes up time, is often a torture, and costs money. Let whiskers and moustaches have fair play, and that they may not become as dirty as those of Napoleon's grognards, let the drummer's scissors once a week be employed in a wholesale trimming. The soldier will look all the more manly for his hairy appendages, but not the more fierce. That is a fallacy. If men look the more ferocious for a few hairs more or less, women wouldn't like moustaches as they unquestionably do. It is the contrast—not the ferocity—that carries the day. 'Affection mateth not with its like, but its opposite.'"

Colonel E. Napier, in the United Service Magazine, for Sept. and Oct., 1851 (in "The Soldier as he Is and as he Ought to be," an article of extreme interest), advocates the adoption of the beard, having observed and experienced the extraordinary luxury of it during his campaigning at the Cape; and it is to be hoped such an authority may have its due weight in deciding so important a matter; conducing, as it would do, to simplification of the toilet, picturesqueness and propriety; to say nothing of the deliverance from that sum of suffering from daily shaving, which Byron declared quite made up for what the other sex endured in parturition.

The Agra Messenger, an influential Indian journal, in a satirical but truthful article a few months ago, instituting an inquiry into the difference between the valor of the British soldier and the native Sepoy, has the following pertinent remarks—

“ The British soldier is undoubtedly superior to the native, but to what particular cause is the superiority first attributable ?

After mature reflection and careful study of the idiosyncracies of military usage, we flatter ourselves that we have hit the right solution at last. It is a very simple one, simple as the rule by which Samson preserved his strength ; only that in the present case systematic transgression has produced the results which systematic obedience ensured in his, and vice versa. The true secret of British superiority lies in a nut-shell, or, more correctly, in a barber's basin ; the difference between the things compared literally turning in true Homeric phrase, ‘ epi-xyru acme ’ on the edge of a razor. The heart of the difficulty is to be found on the mere face of it. No diving below the surface will bring up the secret, which lies on the surface itself. In the cropped head and shaven visage of the British soldier, we must look for the source of those peculiar excellencies which place him so far above his hirsute and long-haired comrade in a purely military view. By the cut of his figure-head shall ye measure a man's capacity for warlike achievements. Long hair and whiskers of natural growth predicate physical weakness and courage of a very inferior order. A single touch of nature may make us all friends, but it takes many a touch of art—the art tonsorial—to make us passable soldiers. The external difference is only in a hair or two, but how wide is the difference of intrinsic worth which a hair more or less will betoken in the realms of Mars ! According to the rule of close shaving enforced in the British army, Curius ‘ of the unkempt locks,’ was a downright impostor, unworthy of the niche he enjoys in the Horatian apotheosis ; while the ‘ long-haired Achæans ’ proved their inferior breeding by taking ten years to conquer Troy. Mars himself must have kept a barber, or the wonders related of him have belied his natural inaptitude for achieving wonderful things.

This is the only rational way that has yet occurred to us of accounting for the jealous negligence with which the Sepoy's personal appearance has been kept distinct from that of the European. For while the latter is obliged to curtail his locks to a uniform pattern of regulated ugliness, and check the luxuriance of his chin and cheeks by frequent use of lather, the former is allowed the luxury of growing his hair to a reasonable length, and producing whiskers of a size sufficient to make the fortune of a May-fair dandy. Of course there is reason alleged for the indulgence as well as the prohibition. Respect for national prejudices forbids in the one case the curtailment which cleanliness demands in the other. Fear of political consequences professedly spares the whisker which fear of personal consequences would have clean effaced, root and branch. But such pleas are clearly inadequate to express the full purport of a distinction so obstinately maintained at no little abatement of the comfort and personal comeliness of our gallant countrymen. We cannot accept them as aught but groundless pretences for maintaining a distinction in which the secret of our military progress is so emphatically asserted. For has not the wondrous virtue of deficient hair been yet more emphatically asserted in a recent order issued by Sir W. Gomm, widening the old license enjoyed by the native army of wearing unlimited hair, into a direct commandment for every Briton connected with the native army, to encourage the unlimited growth of hair on one portion at least of the human countenance? Does not the new commandment clearly develop the principle concealed in the previous concession? Is not the moustache now set in evident antagonism to the razor? For cleanliness being assumed as the sole end and aim of close shaving in the British army, why is the British officer serving in the native army henceforth compelled to wear the outlandish symbol of a cause with which he and cleanliness have apparently nought in common? The commandment to desist from shaving the upper lip cannot imply the extension to British officers of the principle on which the investiture of the upper lip was outwardly conceded to the prejudices of the native army. What other solution remains then but the one already proposed? Can this mode of assimilating the officers with their men in respect of facial equipment, mean aught but the wish to carry out the ancient principle of preventing all possible assimilation between the British and native soldiery in respect of military efficiency?

Pleasantry apart, we are fain to say what end of public utility has been or is to be gained, of sufficient urgency to justify the contempt for private tastes and prejudices evinced in measures regulating the precise amount of hair to be worn or shorn by the members of public society? If the soldier's deficiency depends in no intelligible way upon the smoothness of his cheek or the trim of his moustache, why in the name of common sense and humanity is he forced to shave or not to shave in keeping with some trivial and childish scheme of an uniformity which practically does not exist at all? Are cleanliness and martial appearance compatible only with a shaven face? Or does the soldier who wears moustaches of necessity fight or look worse than the soldier who is forbidden to wear them? Are the habits of the European cleaner than the habits of the Sepoy? Is the excrescence which nature has planted on faces of every color less unsightly on a black than a white ground? Why is the principle of uniformity between officers and men, carried to an outrageous excess in the matter of a whisker, and entirely set aside in the more prominent items of belts and white taping? If we really encourage cleanliness by shaving clean and cropping the upper hair in true convict fashion, would not the end be yet more simply attained by sticking at nothing short of total baldness? The assimilation of lips and cheeks should clearly be extended to an assimilation of mouths and noses. The officer in a British regiment is allowed the option of a partial whisker. Why split the difference of a hair and refuse him the option of a whisker in perfect bloom, or the additional comfort of a moderate moustache? We blush for the credit of a régime which requires at this time of day to press the justice and propriety of leaving its subjects to wear what nature gave them in any fashion they pleased, consistent with general usage and due regard for personal decencies."

Many of your "smooth-faced" men say, wearing the beard looks unbusiness-like, and forfeits confidence. Others assert that it is a piece of egregious vanity to wear the beard; in fact, they seem to consider that they have a perfect right to say everything that is disagreeable respecting beards.

In standing up in defence of beards, we must say that this assertion about vanity is utterly illogical. A beard grows naturally on a man's face; undoubtedly, if we did but know it, for some good and wise purpose. Hair grows on the head and eyebrows, as well as on the cheeks and chin. Now if a man were to shave the hair off his head and brows, as smoothly as he does from his chin, the chances are that he would be thoroughly laughed at, and yet one proceeding would not be a whit more senseless than the other.

There is one certain fact we would mention with regard to beards. It is this. As a general rule, every man with a beard is a man of strongly-marked individuality—frequently genius—has formed his own opinions—is straightforward—to a certain degree, frequently reckless—but will not fawn or cringe to any man. The very fact of his wearing a beard, in the face, as it were, of society is a proof that his heart and conscience is above the paltry aid of a daily penny shave.

If men would not shave from boyhood up, they would find their beards would be flowing, their moustaches light and airy, both adding a dignity to manhood and a venerableness to age, to which shorn humanity must be strangers.

But the beard is not merely for ornament, it is for use. Nature never does anything in vain, she is economical and wastes nothing. She would never erect a bulwark were her domain unworthy of protection, or were there no enemy to invade it. We shall proceed to show that the beard is intended as a bulwark, and designed for the protection of the health. The beard has a tendency to prevent diseases of the lungs by guarding their portals. The moustache particularly, as we have already seen, prevents the admission of particles of dust into the lungs, which are the fruitful cause of disease. It also forms a respirator more efficient than the cunning hand of man can fabricate. Man fashions his respirator of wire curiously wrought; nature makes her's of hair placed where it belongs, and not requiring to be put on like a muzzle. Diseases of the head and throat are also prevented by wearing the beard.

If any inconvenience is felt from the beard in summer, we think it will be found to be chargeable to the manner of dressing the neck. Lay aside flashy cravats and stiff collars, leaving the neck free and open, and the beard will never be felt to be a burden. Hear what a well known physiological writer says on this point: "The Byronic fashion of dressing the neck is preferable to all others. The true plan ought to be to allow the beard to grow, and thus protect the neck and chest. This appendage was not created for nought, and cannot be cut off with impunity."—Weakness and disease in the eyes may be obviated in a great measure by wearing the beard. There is an intimate connection between the upper lip and the eye. Every one must have noticed, when he has had a small pimple upon his lip and has squeezed it, how the tears will start involuntarily to his eyes. Shaving the upper lip with a dull razor which pulls the hair, will produce the same effect. Many can speak to the beneficial effects of wearing the beard upon weak eyes. The toothache, too, has been prevented by the wearing of the beard.

Frequently cutting and shaving the hair has a tendency to make it thicker, hence the beard of man becomes the thickest of all human hair. The marrow-like substance of the hair and its two outer coatings are well seen in a section of hair from a well shaved chin. The razor cuts it across; it cannot grow longer, so it grows thicker and stronger; and each slice taken away by the shave, looks under the microscope, like the section of a bone, just as a bone is cut across when a ham is cut up in slices for broiling, whilst the stump remaining on the chin has just the same look as the bone on the section of the grilled ham ready for the breakfast table. The primly shaved mouth is thickly dotted round by myriads of hideous hair stumps, with inner layer and marrow all exposed. Fashion, ever since the days of Louis Quatorze, has demanded the sacrifice, and men continue to pay it. Happily they do not see the stumps of their beards through a microscope, or razor makers would starve. M. Withof, a curious investigator quoted by the celebrated Haller, has calculated that the hair of the beard grows at the rate of one line and a half in the week; this will give a length of six inches and a half in the course of a year, and for a man of eighty years of age, thirty feet will have fallen before the edge of the razor.

It is occasionally urged that beards are dirty appendages, such as dust gatherers. So far from being an encourager of filth, the beard, on the contrary, is an efficient protection against it. It gathers dust and dirt only to prevent their being inhaled into the lungs, or stopping up the pores of the skin. This important office it performs much in the same way that the eye-lashes and the short hairs in the ears and nostrils protect the organs about which they are placed. And it would be quite as sensible an operation for a man to clip his eye-lashes every morning as to remove his beard and moustache. The dirt which the beard collects, can be more easily removed than if, by the absence of the beard, it were allowed to lodge itself in the pores of the skin. Because a man with a beard of one or two days' growth looks dirty, people are apt to conclude that it is the beard which caused that appearance, while it is only its shortness that does so ; as soon as it has attained some length it no longer looks dirty.

There are many who in their own minds are convinced of the folly of flying in the face of nature by cutting the beard, but who lack the moral courage to follow their convictions. The beard, indeed, is a tender point for foolish ridicule to aim its shafts at. Every man who has passed the age of twenty knows what stereotyped, but yet cutting jests, his youthful whiskers have had to encounter. Many a man who might have faced the cannon's mouth has felt the laughter of fools too much for him. The only way to conquer this ridicule is to learn to despise it. If a man were to be turned aside by every laugh he would be a living weather-cock.

Many persons are now becoming somewhat ashamed of their antiquated prejudices against a most becoming and useful ornament to the human face divine. We might quote numerous medical authorities to prove the utility of the growth of hair on the upper lip, especially of men who, in their professional avocations, are liable to exposure to all the ever varying changes of season and climate, now subject to chilling damps, freezing cold, or unwholesome night vapors, and anon to hot parching winds, or the scorching rays of a powerful vertical sun. But we should rest satisfied with the prima facie evidence afforded by the fact that an all-wise Creator, for some useful and benevolent purpose, has ordained that the masculine face shall be protected and adorned by the growth of hair. Irrespective, therefore, of considerations of health and comfort, we fly in the face of God's providence, when we inconsiderately divest our features of every particle of their natural protection. Who so forward as an Englishman to ridicule and condemn the eccentricities of other nations. The contracted feet of Chinese women, the long tails, the shaven heads, the scalp locks of Oriental races, excite our contempt at their senseless folly: while follies on our part, equally as senseless, escape animadversion, and are complacently attributed to the rational dictates, or to the natural consequences, of a higher civilization. It was not the progress of civilization, it was a servile imitation of the first George that introduced among Englishmen the ridiculous practice of divesting their faces of every particle of hair. Prior to the reign of George I. such a practice was unknown, and would have been scoffed at as preposterous. Feelings of rancorous hatred and enmity towards a neighbouring nation, with whom we have perpetually come into collision, and over whom we have frequently triumphed, have tended to foster the practice into a prejudice, and to perpetuate it as a national peculiarity, distinguishing us in features, as widely as we were severed in feelings, from our miscalled natural enemies. Intellectual progress and general enlightenment are fast dispelling such absurd prejudices, and overcoming such ungenerous feelings. Few care to acknowledge that they entertain and cherish the bigoted opinions of bygone days. It is encouraging to know that those who share in these antiquated sentiments are fast disappearing from the arena of public life. Common sense has triumphed over bob wigs, pigtails, grease and hair powder, and will yet extend more generally that protection to the features which a luxuriant growth of hair affords, and men will sedulously cultivate beard, whiskers and moustache.

To apply Douglas's defiant speech in a perverted sense:—

“No man so potent breathes upon the ground
But I would beard him.”*

With regard to the growing fashion of again wearing the hair profusely on the face, much more might be advanced. The prevalence of the moustache among Englishmen may be attributed, like many other of our social customs, to the favor with which it is now viewed among our continental neighbours. Indeed, such is the rage in France for long beards and outrageous whiskers, that where nature has denied that ornament, the Parisian dandies, like the Chinese, have recourse to art to supply the deficiency; and false beards among certain classes there, are no more uncommon than wigs amongst us. In the event, too, of the color of the beard being red or very light, it is quite usual to dye it, as we do the "white stockings" of the horses in our cavalry regiments.

A chronological history of beards (observes a recent periodical writer), would be a history of the world, and we should have to trace it from Adam downwards; for it is almost certain that the hair's decoration came into fashion with the first man himself; though it is a deputed point, whether coming into the world a full grown biped, he possessed a luxuriant black beard from the moment of his creation, it being strongly maintained by Martinus Scriblerus and others, that our first father had no such distinguishing mark of manhood till after the fall, and that the pain of shaving was thereupon inflicted on him and his posterity for ever; and the author of Don Juan seems to have been of the same opinion, for he says,—

"That ever since the fall, man for his sin
Has had a beard entailed upon his chin."

Like all the oriental nations, the Assyrians appear to have taken extreme care of the beard, which, to judge from the bas-reliefs from Nineveh, they allowed to grow long, and arranged in so regular a manner, that the representations of it might almost be regarded as merely conventional.

Without pausing to inquire whether the custom of shaving. "pollarding the chin top, top and top," was practised by the patriarchs, it will be sufficient to observe that it must have been known to Homer; for that blind old bard of the Iliad borrows some of the finest of his metaphors from the art; describing the fate of Troy as being on the edge of a razor.

In the Psalms we read of Aaron's beard; and the golden beard of Esculapius, the father of physic, is universally celebrated; so that it is not at all improbable that in those days it was a professional distinction with the priest and the doctor to keep their chins unshorn, and hence might have arisen the proverb of the wisdom of the wig, and superior sanctity in a quantity of hair depending from the chin. The gods of the ancients are, with the exception of the "imper-bis Apollo," always represented with beards reaching to their breasts; and Thetis, we are told, in the first book of the Iliad, wishing to conciliate the great Jupiter, sat at his feet with one hand embracing his knees, and the other smoothing his flowing beard.

The custom of shaving appears to have varied considerably in different ages and countries, according to the caprice of fashion, the arbitrary will of sovereign princes, or the necessities of the climate; but the practice of abrasion, nevertheless, seems to have become more common as mankind have advanced in civilization. We are told by Cicero, that for some hundred years there were no barbers in Rome. Pliny and Varro inform us that the Romans did not begin to shave till the year of the city, 452, when Publius Ticinius Mena brought over barbers from Sicily. Scipio Africanus, Pliny adds, was the first Roman who shaved every day.

Speaking of the early Roman Kings, Juvenal tells us that they were proud of their long beards. And this reminds me of an anecdote I have heard, or read somewhere, of the good old King George the Third. It is said that the monarch, whose chin had remained unshorn for many years, was present at the chapel in Windsor, when the preacher by an unfortunate impediment in his speech, misread a sentence so as to make it appear "O Lord shave the King!" a lapsus linguæ which, of course, set the congregation into hysterics of well-bred laughter.

Few fashion have undergone greater mutations than those to which the hair and beard have been subject. With women long tresses—those natural jewels of the sex—have always been admired; but with men, the changes of dress, manners and language have been of less importance than the way of cutting their beards and trimming their locks. There was a time when

"'Twas merry in hall, where beards wagged all."

Whole nations have been named from their beards. The Tartars waged loud and bloody wars with the Persians, because they would not consent to cut their beards in the Turkish fashion. The insult offered to the beards of the senators, decided the fate of ancient and imperial Rome, which fell before the swords of the barbarous unshaven and audacious Gauls. Beards were worn by the Greeks till the time of Alexander the Great, B.C. 330 ; by the Romans till the year B.C. 297 ; by the Jews, from the earliest period, till in A.D. 1066, when they were discontinued in this country. Peter the Great of Russia had such a horror of hair on the face, that he appointed officers to go about and cut off the beards of all those of his subjects who wore them above a foot and a half in length.

The fashion of the beard, we all know, is an interesting topic with the male sex, from the stripling of sixteen to the patriarch of sixty. Barbers have wielded the destinies of empires, taking their rulers by the chin ; and have sometimes been the greatest of tyrants. A ludicrous tale is told of our government in 1831, who, by the mouths of Lord Goderich and Howick, ordered an allowance of two razors per annum, for renovating the ebony chins of the West Indian negroes, a people without beards ; and Mr. Hume, in the House of Commons, publicly declared about that time, in opposition to the razor grant, that the best instrument of the kind he ever possessed, had been bought of a Jew boy some twelve years previously for a shilling. Alas ! for Sheffield, if all men found shilling razors last so long, and shave their epidermis so cleanly as did that belonging to the honorable member.

The ancient Indian philosophers, called gymnosophists, were solicitous to have long beards, which were considered symbolical of wisdom. The Assyrians and Persians also prided themselves on their long beard ; and St. Chrysostom informs us that the kings of Persia had their beards interwoven or netted with gold thread. The figures on the Babylonian cylinders are usually represented with beards, and those on the reliefs from Persepolis, in the British Museum. The first Etruscans wore a large long beard, pointed and turned up in front. Mercury was represented with this sort of beard. In the earlier times the Etruscans marked the hair of their statues like scales of fish, or in corkscrew curls. The hair and locks (says Winckelmann, the first great sculptor who treated the hair with care,) disposed par etage (in stories) are found without exception in all Etruscan figures. Aaron Hill, in his Account of the Ottoman Empire, published in 1709, draws this distinction between the Persians and the Turks: "The Persians never shave the hair upon the upper lip; but cut and trim the beard upon their chin, according to the various forms their several fancies lead them to make choice of; whereas the Turks preserve with care a very long and spreading beard, esteeming the deficiency of that respected ornament a shameful mark of servile slavery."

The Chinese are said to affect long beards; but nature having denied their natural growth, they are sometimes supplied to the chin artificially.

Plutarch, in his life of Theseus, mentions, incidentally, that Alexander cut off the beards of the Macedonian soldiers, that they might not be used as handles by their enemies in battle; for nothing is so painful to the feelings as a tug at the beard.

The Greeks continued to shave the beard till the time of Justinian, under whom long beards came again into fashion, and so continued till the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, in 1453. The Greek philosophers usually made the beard a distinguishing feature in their appearance. Persius terms Socrates the bearded master (magister barbatus), and Prudentius bestows the same title of "barbatus" upon Plato. Adrian was the first of the Roman emperors who wore a beard. Plutarch says he wore it to hide a large wart and other scars in his face. The emperors who followed him continued to wear the beard.

An antiquarian writer has discovered that the custom of shaving off the beard, on the continent, was introduced by Peter Lombard, 1160. Innocent III. confirmed it with the monks at the Council of Lateran, in the year 1200; and the reason which induced the Council to make the injunction for shaving beards was, lest in the ceremony of receiving the Sacrament the beard might touch the bread and wine, or crumbs and drops fall and stick upon it.

The clergy, however, were averse to this change, and it appears that in France, from 1515 to 1547, Francis I. made the priests pay a large sum for wearing their beards.

The Christian priests seem to have adopted the custom of wearing beards from opposition to the heathen and Egyptian priests who shaved themselves.

Southey, in The Doctor, tell us of an insolent message sent by one of the early kings of North Wales to King Arthur. And this was his message—

“Gretyne wel Kynge Arthur in this manere wyse, sayenge, ‘that Kynge Ryons had discomfyte and overcome eleaven Kynges, and everyche of hern did hym homage, and that was this; they gaf hym their berdys clene flayne off, as moche as ther was; wherfor the messenger came for Kynge Arthur’s berd. For Kynge Ryons had purfyled a mantal with kynges berdes, and there lacked one place of the mantel, wherfor he sent for his berd, or els he wold entre in to his landes, and brenne and slee, and never leve tyl he have thi hede and thi berd.”

According to Hudibras, we should always “Speak with respect and honour

Both of the beard and the beard’s owner.”

The Anglo-Saxons at their arrival in Britain, and for a considerable time after, wore beards. The Normans not only shaved their beards themselves, but when they became possessed of authority they obliged others to imitate their example. It is mentioned by some of our historians as one of the most wanton acts of tyranny in William the Conqueror, that he compelled the English (who had been accustomed to let the hair of their upper lips grow) to shave their whole beards; and this was so disagreeable to many of them, that they chose rather to abandon their country than to lose their whiskers. Ordericus Vitalis relates a curious anecdote of Henry I., submitting to lose his beard at the remonstrance and by the hands of Serlo, Archbishop of Sees.

In the higher classes of society the beard, in a greater or a less degree, was encouraged by the English for a series of centuries, as is evident from the sepulchral monuments of kings and chief nobility, and from portraits where they remain. Edward III. is represented upon his tomb at Westminster, with a beard which would have graced a philosopher. Stowe, in his Annals, under 1535, says, “The 8th of May the king (Henry VIII.) commanded all about his court to poll their heads, and to give them example he caused his own head to be polled, and from thenceforth his beard to be knotted and no more shaven.

The practice of wearing the beard continued to a late period, and the reader will readily call to recollection the portraits of Paulet, Marquis of Winchester, Cardinal Pole, and Bishop Gardiner, all ornamented with flowing beards, in the reign of Mary I. The commentators on Shakspeare show, that in the reign of Elizabeth beards of different cut were appropriated to different characters and professions. The soldier had one fashion, the judge another, the bishop different from both. While the Churchman wore a long beard and moustaches that flowed on the breast, and was known as the cathedral beard, the soldier wore the spade beard and the stiletto beard, equally indicative of their calling. These beards were so called from their fancied resemblance to these weapons.

Malone has quoted an old ballad, inserted in a miscellany, entitled Le Prince d'Amour, in 1660, in which some of these forms are described and appropriated :—

"Now of beards there be Such a companie,
Of fashions such a throng,
That it is very hard
To treat of the beard,
Though it be ne'er so long.

"The soldier's beard
Doth match in this herd
In figure like a spade,

With which he will make
His enemies quake
To think their grave is made.

"The stiletto beard,
O, it makes me afeard,
It is so sharp beneath :
For he that doth place
A dagger in his face,
What wears he in his sheath ?"

John Taylor, the Water-poet, in his Whip of Pride, also particularizes the fashions of the beard, &c., as they still continue to subsist in his day :—

"Now a few lines to paper I will put,
Of men's beards' strange and variably cut ;
In which there's some do take as vain a pride,
As almost in all other things beside,
Some are reap'd most substantial, like a brush,
Which makes a nat'ral wit known by the bush.
(And in my time of some men I have heard, Whose wisdom have been only wealth and beard.)
Many of these the proverb well doth fit,
Which says, 'Bush natural, more hair than wit.'
Some seem as they were starched stiff and fine,
Like to the bristles of some angry swine ;
And some (to set their Love's desire on edge)
Are cut and pruned like to a quickset hedge.
Some like a spade, some like a fork. some square,
Some round, some mow'd like stubble, some stark bare,
Some sharp, stiletto-fashion, dagger-like,
That may with whispering, a man's eyes outpike ;
Some with the hammer-cut, or Roman T.
Their beards extravagant reform'd must be ;
Some with the quadrate, some triangle fashion,
Some circular, some oval in translation ;
Some perpendicular in longitude,
Some like a thicket for their crassitude.
That heights, depths, breadths, triform, square, oval, round,
And rules geometrical in beards are found.
Besides the upper lips strange variation,
Corrected from mutation to mutation ;
As 'twere from tithing unto tithing sent,
Pride gives to pride continual punishment,
Some (spite their teeth) like thatch'd eaves downward grows,
And some grow upwards in despite their nose ;
Some their moustaches of such length do keep,
That very well they may a manger sweep.
Which in beer, ale, or wine they drinking plunge,
And suck the liquor up as 'twere a sponge.

But 'tis a sloven's beastly pride, I think,
 To wash his beard, where other men must drink,
 And some (because they will not rob the cup)
 Their upper chaps like pothooks are turned up
 The barbers thus (like tailors) still must be Acquainted with each cut's variety."

William Rufus, the second Norman King of England, was so called for his red beard—it being common to give surnames in manhood from various peculiarities of person, and not as now by inheritance. The great hero of the East—the Nelson of the Turks, and the rival of Andrew Doria—Haireddin Pasha, better known by his noble title Barbarossa or Redbeard, acquired that name in manhood, as did Frederick the First of Germany, also surnamed Barbarossa; and who does not remember that tale of fearful interest wherein Bluebeard sacrificed so many fair maidens to his lust.

William Fitzosbert, or Longbeard, the great demagogue, reintroduced among the people, who claimed to be of Saxon origin, the fashion of long hair, in contra-distinction to the citizens and Normans, and, from wearing his own beard hanging down to the waist, obtained that name by which he is best known to posterity.

Jean Staminger, a citizen and counsellor of the magistracy of Brannan, upon the river Jura, in Upper Austria, who died Sept. 28, 1567, had a remarkably long beard, which reached to his feet, and rendered him an object of great attraction, especially to strangers.

Martin Van Butchell, father of the present Dr. Van Butchell, had a very long and fine beard, which reached beyond his waist.

The fashion of wearing a long beard, although banished by the Normans, gradually revived, and in the time of the Tudors we find the portraits of their great men all grim and warlike, with bristling hair and fierce moustache. A melancholy interest clings still to the venerable beard of old Sir Thomas More, who, when the executioner had already lifted high his axe to perform his deadly office, raised his weak hand from the block, exclaiming, "Wait, my friend, till I have put aside my beard; that has committed no treason." And again there is a story told of the gallant, but unfortunate, Sir Walter Raleigh, who, when the barber visited him in the Tower to trim his beard, said gently to him, "Desist, dear sir; there is a lawsuit pending between the king and me about this head, and I don't wish to lay out any capital upon it till the cause is tried."

It was the custom of old to color the beard and whiskers artificially, either for disguise or foppery ; softness in love, or ferocity in war. Arrian alludes to it, and states " that the people of India daub their beards white, red, purple and green."

In former times as much pains were bestowed on dressing the beard, as in later ones upon dressing the hair. Sometimes, as we have seen, it was braided with threads of gold. It was dyed to all colors, according to the mode, and cut to all shapes.

In Lodowick Barry's comedy of Ram Alley, 1611, one of the characters asks " What colored beard comes next my window ?" receiving for answer, " A black man's, I think." To which comes the response, " I think a red, for that is most in fashion." In Ben Jonson's Silent Woman, the barber exclaims, " I have fitted my divine and canonist, dyed their beards and all."

The church never showed itself so great an enemy to the beard as to long hair on the head. It generally allowed fashion to take its own course, both with regard to the chin and the upper lip. This fashion varied continually ; for we find that in little more than a century after the time of Richard I., when beards were short, that they had again become so long as to be mentioned in the famous epigram made by the Scots, who visited London in 1327, which ran as follows ;—

" Long beards, heartlesse ;
Painted hooes, witlesse ;
Grey coats, gracelesse ;
Makes England thriftlesse."

When the Emperor Charles V. ascended the throne of Spain, being only 16, he had no beard. It was not to be expected that the obsequious parasites who always surround a monarch could presume to look more virile than their master. Immediately all the courtiers appeared beardless, with the exception of such few grave old men as had outgrown the influence of fashion, and who had determined to die bearded as they had lived. Sober people, in general, saw this revolution with sorrow and alarm, and thought that every manly virtue would be banished with the beard. It became at the time a common saying, " We have no longer souls since we have lost our beards." In the latter part of his reign the beard was again revived, and he appears on his medal with a flowing beard.

In France the beard fell into disrepute after the death of Henry IV., from the mere reason that his successor, Louis XIII., was too young to have one. Some of the more immediate friends of the great Béarnais, and his minister Sully among the rest, refused to part with their beards, notwithstanding the jeers of the new generation.

The beard now gradually declined, and the court of Charles I. was the last in which even a small one was cherished. After the restoration of King Charles II. moustaches or whiskers continued, but the rest of the face was shaven; and in a short time the process of shaving the entire face became universal.

In Russia it continued somewhat longer. Butler, in his "Hudibras" alludes to the beard "cut square by the Russian standard;" which Grey illustrates by the following extract from The Northern Worthies, or the Lives of Peter the Great and his illustrious consort Catherine.—(London, 1728).

"Dr. Giles Fletcher, in his Treatise of Russia, observes, that the Russian nobility and gentry, accounting it a grace to be somewhat gross and bushy, they therefore nourished and spread their beards to have them long and broad. This fashion continued among them till the time of the Czar, Peter the Great, who compelled them to part with these ornaments, sometimes by laying a swinging tax upon them, and at others by ordering those he found with beards to have them pulled up by the roots, or shaved with a blunt razor, which drew the skin after it, and by these means scarce a beard was left in the kingdom at his death; but such a veneration had this people for these ensigns of gravity, that many of them carefully preserved their beards in their cabinets, to be buried with them, imagining, perhaps, that they should make but an odd figure in the grave with their naked chins. The Emperor Peter set about this reform in 1705. A certain time was given that the people might get over the first throes of their repugnance, after which every man who chose to retain his beard was to pay a tax of one hundred roubles. The priests and the serfs were put upon a lower footing, and allowed to retain theirs upon a payment of a cobeck every time they passed the gate of a city. For many years a very considerable revenue was collected from this source. The collectors gave in receipt for its payment a small copper coin, struck expressly for this purpose, and called 'the bearded.' On one side it bore the figure of a nose, mouth and moustaches, with a long bushy beard, surmounted by the words 'money received;' the whole encircled by a wreath, and stamped with the black eagle of Russia. On the reverse it bore the date of the year. Every man who chose to wear a beard was obliged to produce this receipt on his entry into a town. Those who were refractory and refused to pay the tax were thrown into prison.”*

As the hair began to be worn shortened, the beard was allowed to flow. Indeed this compensatory process has always obtained; in no age were the hair and beard allowed to grow long at the same time.

Shakspeare was constantly alluding to the beard. In his day this term included the three more modern subdivisions of beard, moustache, and whisker—they were all then worn in one. “Did he not wear a great round beard, like a glover’s paring-knife?” asks one of his characters, clearly alluding to the extent of cheek it covered, and which was a common fashion with military men during the reign of Henry VIII. It looked sufficiently formidable, and took least trouble in trimming and dressing. In Henry the Fifth, act 3, sc. 6, Shakspeare makes Gower exclaim, “What a beard of the general’s cut, and a horrid suit of the camp, will do among foaming bottles and ale-washed wits, is wonderful to be thought on!” In a word, the period, par excellence, of magnificent barbes comprised the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century.

With the renewed triumph of long hair, the beard gradually shrank up; first assuming a forked appearance, then dwindling to a peak, and ultimately vanishing altogether.

Although we are told that the fashion of smooth faces “came in with the Conqueror,” like so many noble families, yet it must be understood that it was principally popular with courtiers and rich men; for by reference to Fairholt’s English Costumes, we find that the aged, the unfashionable, and the lovers of old customs still delighted for many years in beards and whiskers of formidable dimensions—the square, the Franklin, the forked, the curly and the corkscrew. In the Canterbury Tales, we are told:—

“A merchant there was with a forked beard.”

In the course of time, we read of knights with “golden curls” about their faces, a sure sign of Saxon blood and lineage; and of some bucks who wore their moustaches curled in a manner so unique as almost to rival the splendid beards of the Ninevites, who appear, by the relics recently imported by Mr. Layard, to have paid particular attention to their facial ornaments.

* See Mackay’s Popular Delusions.

In the play of Time's Metamorphoses, by T. Middleton, (1596), we have a further evidence of the mutability of fashion in this respect; for we find one of the characters asking of another, "Why dost thou wear this beard; 'tis clean gone out of fashion?" And by a note to Grey's Hudibras, we learn that so curious were the gallants of the day in the management of their beards, that they put them in paste-board boxes when they went to bed, for fear they should turn in the night, and so disarrange them! Comb and beard-brushes were as common then as now; and Holinshed tells us that the dandies of his day spent hours in the arrangement of their beards and whiskers. In Lely's Midas, we have a barber instructing his apprentice in the manner of trimming the beards of his customers, from those who wore them "like a spade or a bodkin," to those who had them "hang down like the goat's flakes!"

Some of the learned in curious trifles have spared no pains to record the changes that took place in the fashion of the beard. Hotoman wrote a treatise expressly on the beard, entitled Pogonias, first printed at Leyden, in 1586, and, which on account of its rarity, was reprinted at length by Pitiscus in his Lexicon. In Bulwer's Anthropomorphosis, or Artificial Changeling, is a whole chapter "On the opinion and practice of diverse nations concerning the natural ensigns of manhood appearing about the mouth," quoted from innumerable authors, ancient and modern.

Various nations still cultivate and preserve the beard with scrupulous attention. To cut off the beard was esteemed infamous, and particularly disgraceful among the Jews.

It is so at this day among many Eastern nations. The Mahometans, by whom it is suffered to grow long, and is regarded as a mark of honour, consider it as a distinguished ornament, and their beards not unfrequently reach to their waist. They would resent as an indignity any insult offered to the beard.

The Turks are highly affronted if one even threatens to shave their beard. Aurengzebe, the Emperor of the Moguls, in the last century, terribly revenged the shaving of his ambassador's beard, on the Sophi of Persia. With the Lacedæmonians, the punishment of fugitives from the field of battle was to have their beards half shaved. We may therefore conceive the height of the contemptuous indignity offered to the ambassadors of David by Hanun (2 Samuel, x. v. 4.) Many people would prefer death to this kind of treatment.

The Arab makes the preservation of the beard a capital point of religion, because Mahomet never cut off his ; and with them, as with the Turks, the beard is a token of authority and liberty. They consider the beard the perfection of the human face, which, in their opinion, would be more disfigured by its loss than by that of the nose. To kiss the beard is the prevalent and respectful mode of salutation by wives, children and friends.

Mr. J. A. St. John, in his Isis, an Egyptian Pilgrimage, states as follows :—

“ When I arrived at Thebes I had one of the handsomest beards in the world, black as jet, and descending in curls and waves over my breast. This was a great recommendation to me among the Arabs, and I fear I must attribute to it much of the influence I possessed over them. Often and often, while passing along the streets of Gournou, Karnak, and Luxor, the women and the old men, as they sat on the stone mastabak beside their doors, would exclaim to each other, ‘ Wallah, by God, has not he a beard ! ’ ”

The late Sir John Malcolm, in his very interesting Sketches of Persia, gives a curious gossiping account of the estimation in which barbers are held in that country, and the wealth which they frequently obtain. Their skill in shaving the heads and trimming the beards of kings and nobles, though highly prized, is subordinate to that which they display as attendants at the warm bath. It is on their superior address in rubbing, pinching, joint-cracking, and cleansing the human frame at the Hummums, that their fame is established. The luxury of the bath in Persia is enjoyed by all, from the highest to the lowest. Among the various attendants, the man of most consequence is the dellák, or barber. For he who has the honor to bathe and shave a king, must not only be perfect in his art, but also a man altogether trustworthy ; and confidence amongst eastern rulers is usually followed by favor, and with favor comes fortune. This accounts for barbers building public bridges in Persia !

which implied doubt of the fact. He observed, he knew not whether the barbers of the Seffavean monarchs built bridges, but 'I do know', he said, 'that the Khâsterâsh (literally, personal shaver) of our present sovereign, in the abundance of his wealth, built a palace for himself close to the royal bath at Teheran. Then,' said the good Meerza, 'he is entitled to riches, for he is a man of pre-eminent excellence in his art, and has had for a long period under his special care the magnificent beard of his majesty, which is at this moment, and has been for years, the pride of Persia.'

'Well,' I replied, 'if your personal shaver has built such a mansion, I will no longer doubt the wealth of the barber of Shah Abbas, for that monarch, though he wore no beard, had, we are told by travellers and observe from paintings, a noble pair of moustaches, of which he is said to have been very proud; and the trimmer of which no doubt, was, as he deserved to be, a great favorite.'

"This conversation led to a long dissertation on moustaches and beards, upon which subject my travels to countries that my Persian friends had never seen, enabled me to give them much useful information. I told them many stories about the Sikhs, a nation dwelling between the territories of Cabul and India, who devoting their beards and whiskers to the Goddess of Destruction, are always prompt to destroy any one who meddles with them; and who, from a combined feeling of religion and honour, look upon the preservation of life itself as slight, in comparison with the preservation of a hair of these beards.

"I next informed them how beards, whiskers, and moustaches were once honoured in Europe. I told them an anecdote of the great John de Castro, a former Governor of Goa, the capital of the Portuguese possessions in India. He being in want of a considerable loan from the citizens of Goa, for a military expedition, was at a loss for an adequate security.* His first intention was to pledge the bones of his gallant son Don Fernando, who had recently fallen in battle; but finding, on opening the grave, that the carcase was putrid, he offered, as next dear to his personal honor, a lock of his cherished moustaches. This security was accepted; but immediately returned with more than the amount required, young and old vying with each other who should show most respect to so valuable a pledge.

"The Persians of my audience twisted their moustaches with a combined feeling of pleasure and pride on hearing this testimony to the value of that ornament of the visage; and Khan Sahib, who was one of the party, said to me with a smile, 'You gentlemen with the mission wear moustaches in compliance with the prejudices of the Persians; but is it true that many officers of your cavalry now wear them, and that they are again likely to become popular in England?' I said, perhaps they might; adding, I had no doubt that would be the case, if there appeared the slightest chance of their ever turning to account in the money market like those of John de Castro."

* These facts are mentioned in the introduction to Mickle's translation of the "Lusiad."

A Grand Vizier of Constantinople is also reported to have once borrowed a large sum of money on the security of his beard and whiskers ; and such was the faith of his creditors in the honor of a beard, that it is said they were content to visit their debtor occasionally, to see that their security was safely growing curly on his face.

“ It is,” says D’Arvieux, who has devoted a chapter to the exposition of the sentiments of the Arabs in regard to the beard, “ a greater mark of infamy in Arabia to cut a man’s beard off, than it is with us to whip a fellow at the cart’s tail, or to burn him in the hand. Many people in that country would rather die than incur that punishment. I saw an Arab who had received a musket shot in the jaw, and who was determined rather to perish than to allow the surgeon to cut his beard off to dress his wound. His resolution was at length overcome; but not until the wound was beginning to gangrene. He never allowed himself to be seen while his beard was off; and when at last he got abroad, he went always with his face covered with a black veil, that he might not be seen without a beard; and this he did till his beard had grown again into a considerable length.”

Burckhardt also remarks, that the Arabs who have from any cause had the misfortune to lose their beard, invariably conceal themselves from view until their beard has grown again.

To cut off the tail of a Chinese is in use as a national punishment. The Parsees are always shaven all over the head, and should he chance to remove his skull-cap (or indoor covering), the Parsee always places his hand on his crown, as if in shame of his bare head, and keeps it there till his cap is replaced.

In an article in the Quarterly Review, some eight years ago, mention was made of the Hon. Mrs. Dawson Damer having requested a lock of Mehemet Ali’s hair, to place in a collection which already boasted the hair of Nelson, Napoleon, and Wellington, when she was gallantly informed by the Pacha, that in his will he would request his son Ibrahim Pacha to present her with his beard.

Swearing by the beard of the Prophet is the Mussulman form of oath. Nearly all of the inhabitants of Schinde, whether Mussulmen or Hindoos, wear beards, which they often dye of a red colour.

Before the revolution of 1830, neither the French nor Belgian citizens were remarkable for their moustaches; but after that event there was hardly a shopkeeper either in Paris or Brussels whose upper lip did not suddenly become hairy with real or mock moustaches. During a temporary triumph gained by the Dutch soldiers over the citizens of Louvain, in October, 1830, it became a standing joke against the patriots, that they shaved their faces clean immediately; and the wits of the Dutch army asserted that they had gathered moustaches enough from the denuded lips of the Belgians to stuff mattresses for the sick and wounded in their hospital.

An amusing anecdote has lately been current in Germany. The authorities of Vienna have not, until very recently, attacked the beards of men, but a lady of high rank some time since made an unsuccessful attempt to induce about fifty servants of her guests to sacrifice the hirsute honors of their upper lips. The lady in question, the wife of the reigning Prince Adolphus Schwarzenburg, gave a grand ball, at which the crème of the Austrian nobility was present. As is customary on such occasions, the friends and acquaintances of the lady of the house permitted their valets to wait on the guests during the entertainment. The illustrious lady, who, in the matter of festivities, leads the fashion there, ordered that the servants should have their hair powdered. Now, as immense black, brown, or red moustaches do not exactly harmonize with white pericraniums, five florins (10s.) were offered to each of the gentlemen's gentlemen who would sacrifice his cherished schnurrbart. Need I say that the lady kept her money, and the men their moustaches.

A facetious writer in the Quarterly Review, asserts that a mutton chop seems to have suggested the form of a substantial British whisker. Out of this simple design countless varieties of forms have arisen. British whiskers, in truth, have grown up like all the great institutions of the country, noiselessly and persistently—an outward expression, as the Germans would say, of the inner life of the people; the general idea, allowing of infinite variety according to their individuality of the wearer. Let us take the next half-dozen men passing by the window as we write. The first has his whiskers tucked into the corners of his month, as though he were holding them up with his teeth. The second whisker that we descry has wandered into the middle of the cheek, and there stopped, as though it did not know where to go to, like a youth who has ventured out into the middle of a ball-room with all eyes upon him. Yonder bunch of bristles twists the contrary way, under the owner's ears; he could not, for the life of him, tell why it retrograded so. The fourth citizen, with the vast Pacific of a face, has little whiskers, which seemed to have stopped short after two inches of voyage, as though aghast at the prospect of having to double such a Cape Horn of a chin. We perceive coming a tremendous pair, running over the shirt collar in luxuriant profusion. Yet, we see, as the Colonel or General takes off his hat to that lady, that he is quite bald—those whiskers are, in fact, nothing but a tremendous land-slip, from the veteran's head.

To readers of English works of fiction published during the past eighty years, it must be a puzzle to guess whence could have come all the evil disposed Jesuits, plotting and doing every sort of mischief through the well or ill-written pages in question. Waverley and his brothers wrought an improvement in the world of imaginative prose, but the quasi evil-disposed disciples of Ignatius still retained their bad eminence, and wrought all the evil in their power to Sir Reginald Montfort and Lady Alicia as in times past. Catholic Emancipation is at last obtained ; the persons and principles of Catholics, lay and cleric, are better known and understood ; melo-dramatic villains and deep-designing knaves will be sought for in other places as well as in the cell and the confessional !—By no means. Our living writers still resort to the same haunts for their disreputable characters, as the cotemporaries of Bridget Bluemantle or the now-unknown author of "Says she to her Neighbour, WHAT !"

Since the epoch of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, the crop has been more prolific than ever ; and publishers find it profitable to resuscitate even such wretched productions as the Lollards or the Monks of Leadenhall, for though the Jesuits themselves were unborn when Prince Hal took purses, their dead and buried relations, the monks and friars, were all alive, and prompt for evil doings.

What deduction could be strictly drawn from the contemplation of this mighty, many-sided mass of fleeting literature, if it gave anything like a true reflection of the state of society either of past or present times ? merely this :—Only for the supernatural strength, wisdom, goodness, and omnipresence of certain Gipsies, madmen, outlaws, and brigands, all the venerable gentry and aged widows for eight centuries would have been deprived of their little property, the minors reduced to beggary on coming to age, young gentlemen on the eve of the wedding day, killed by ambushed parties, and their shrieking or fainting lady-loves carried away before their dying eyes ; and all done by the contrivance of diabolical minded, scowling fiends in soutanes and shovel hats. How the frame work of society has held together under such a dispensation, is not easy to conceive, nor have the romancers deigned to offer any explanation of the problem.

Let us be allowed to imagine a not very improbable case under these circumstances. A country recluse, deriving his information, from the authorities that rule in circulating libraries, entertains a heartfelt conviction that all the evils that now plague humanity, were hatched in the Old Castle of Loyola, somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees. He has never seen a live Jesuit, and the Parish Priest and Curate in his neighbourhood do not resemble in the least particular, such pictures as he finds scattered through his favorite works of reference. He finds their time occupied in the ordinary duties of spiritual shepherds, set over a sincere though wayward and excitable flock, but he knows from the information given in Father Eustace, The Lady and the Priest, Beatrice or the Unknown Relatives, The Convict, Devereux, The Bosom Friend, Aspen Court,* and other trust-worthy productions, that such monsters are to be found ; and he feels a conviction that it is his mission to discover and unmask them before the eyes of a careless and too trusting generation. Hearing that the Irish Metropolis is kept in terror by a body of strong, dark-coated young men, whose hats are distinguished by a rim of glazed leather, and who, though supported by the negligent British Government, are the secret spies and devoted champions of its implacable foe, he takes a second class ticket, and is found on the evening of the same day in Mountjoy square west, making marked enquiries concerning the morals and habitudes of the inmates of a house in its neighbourhood. He will not be put off with vague or equivocating information : his enquiries will go to the marrow of the matter, his eyes will pierce mill stones, or granite walls just as opaque ; and if necessary, he will aid the sun at noon day by a forty-gas lamp power, not to find an honest man, but a triple-dyed hypocrite. He consults respectable heads of families, police and car men, basket women and ragged little boys. He visits the church in Gardiner st., examines the interior of the dwelling house, and is no nearer to the expected discovery than when he left home. He finds that the young ladies and gentlemen who are regular in their attendance at the confessional, give more pleasure to their parents, and better example to the world abroad; that the attending heads of families discharge their duties more lovingly and effectually to each other, and to their children; that the cabman grumbles less when offered his legal fare, and seldom extorts an extra six-pence from the Unprotected Female in Dublin; that the policeman, when anger-provoking spirits disturb the public peace, does his necessary spiriting as gently as the case permits; and that the barefoot children grow up into well conducted men and women, and are officially ignored at Green st. and Grange Gorman.

* Honorable exception from the animus of the above named works, must be made in favour of The Young Duke, Henrietta Temple, Coningsby, Sybil, and other productions of their author, who with his eyes fully open to the expediency of flattering the public prejudice, has sought his most estimable characters, and most pleasing social pictures among the old Catholic families of England. Whatever may be said of his political articles or parliamentary speeches, his novels have not pandered to a vitiated taste in the public.

Taking a precis of the ordinary daily existence of the subject for whom his quest was made, he finds him after an early rising and morning prayer, celebrating a timely Mass for the spiritual comfort of labourers, and little shopkeepers, and habitually devout citizens, and spending hours in his confessional, administering comfort to the over laden and contrite, advice to the perplexed, and knowledge to the ignorant; and occupying his remaining time in devotional exercises, and giving sound instructions either secular or theological, to the youth confided to his care. He finds frugality prevailing in his repasts, and in the modest furniture of his apartment, and himself without personal property; and he says, "why should a man devise evil to his neighbour, and commit infamous acts, merely for the privilege of enjoying this life of labour, of privation, and of non-enjoyment as far as can be seen?" Perhaps after all, Miss Sinclair, Mrs. Trollope, Mrs. Maberly, Mr. Shirley Brooks, Mr. James, and Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, have not made as conscientious a perquisition as myself into the matter, and are therefore not to be trusted as truthful guides.

"However, as Ireland furnishes perhaps the best phases of Christian life, Catholic and Protestant, in the world, and that each party naturally wishes to appear well in the eyes of the other, it is not to be wondered, if Jesuitism should also present its fairest aspect in this favored corner. Let me then examine the continent where Mrs. Grundy's name is less terrible. Look at the mound of the abominations of the system piled up by that model of purity, philanthropy, and truth-telling, Eugene Sue. I will not, however, blindly trust to his guidance. I will look with my own eyes on the social aspect of Paris, see whether it is affected for the better or worse by the influence of the 'Parti Prêtre,' and like a free and conscientious Protestant, draw my own conclusions."

After a suitable time spent in that Vanity Fair, our wanderer in search of Miss Sinclair's Jesuit, sets out on his return with the conviction, that only for the incessant, untiring, loving, unselfish, heaven-inspired, and heaven-supported efforts of the clergy, regular and secular, France would at this day present a frightful picture of unbelief or antinomianism; men, women, and children would be governed by the mere impulses of sensuality and selfishness; and if any images were set up in the public places in honor of the influences that rule the land, they would be those of VENUS, BACCHUS, and MERCURY.

On quitting Paris, he procures the work about which we are at present concerned, peruses it carefully on his homeward journey, considers the natural results of the spirit and discipline of the system, acting on a well disposed novice, and begins to look on the members of the society in the light of the life-guardians on the Serpentine when the strength of the ice is problematic. He is at present occupied in aiding the Catholic and Protestant clergymen of his parish in works of practical good, irrespective of the peculiar tenets of those for whom the good is to be done, in diminishing party prejudices, and in promoting good feelings to each other among those neighbours of his, who take different paths to their houses of worship on Sunday.

Our biographer M. Poujoulat has evidently undertaken a labour of love: he scarcely leaves unrecorded any incident, in the infancy or youth of his beloved subject that came to his knowledge. The length of the work, 534 pages 8vo., and our limited space, cause the omission of much that we should otherwise wish to retain, and make the choice of selection an embarrassing matter. For reasons which the reader will comprehend before he has done with us, we commence our extracts at page 101.

"People often ask with profound surprise, how it is that the order of Jesuits has excited more prejudice and hatred, and become the object of more persevering attacks than all the other religious orders taken in a body ; they look on the fact as an incomprehensible mystery. On considering from a near point of view the existence of the Jesuits, the date of their first appearance, and the battle fields on which history finds them engaged, this exceptional hatred seems easy of explanation.

“ The Jesuits arose at a time when the greatest hatred prevailed against the Catholic Church, namely the epoch of the breaking forth of Protestantism ; and as they at once took up arms against the new-born foe, they were consequently detested. At a later date the companions of Jesus found themselves face to face with another enemy. They distinguished themselves as the firmest opponents of Jansenism ; they had to sustain the shock of the united forces of Port Royal and the Parliaments ; they had enemies in the magistracy as well as in the ranks of genius, two powers the more redoubtable, as being recommended to public estimation by virtue. In the controversy of the Five Propositions it was not easy for the public to distinguish with which side rested the correct theological principle. That which they best comprehended in the debate was what furnished them amusement ; and it so happened that comic entertainment and eloquent raillery at the expense of the Jesuits, gushed forth in exhaustless flow out of that immortal lie, Les Provinciales.

“ The Jesuits not only defended Catholic Truth against Luther and Jansenius ; they defended Religion in its essence, in its fundamental principles, in its works : their pens and tongues were employed in the service of those doctrines, which ensured the repose and the duration of governments. Instructors of youth, they implanted in the hearts of rising generations, religious and social truths ; and thus it was, that their work ceased not with the passing hour, but also embraced the future. This was the vanguard, the valiant phalanx, which it was necessary to get rid of, when in the eighteenth century a vast conspiracy under the name of Philosophy, was organised against Christianity. A campaign of calumny was opened by the same agency against the Jesuits : it was an essential point in the programme of hostilities.

“ If despite our long sufferings from which light and justice were at last to issue, public feeling has not thoroughly reconciled to itself the idea of Jesuitism, we can only see therein, the deep traces of former hostilities ; it is a proof of the breadth of the wound inflicted on our faith. For three hundred years, religion and authority have been vehemently assailed, and for these three hundred years the Jesuits have upheld religion and authority. They have been the devoted objects of deeper animosity and outrage than all the other champions of truth on the earth, because the world has been kept in amaze at the immensity of their labours, in the centre of which the martyr's purple is conspicuous. This hatred of the Jesuits is cotemporary with that revolution in Europe, which dates from the great war of the sixteenth century against the Papacy. They belong to no party, and accommodate themselves, as Catholicism itself does, to all forms of government among nations ; but their spirit, which is imbued with the virtue of obedience, still sympathises with authority. They love it, for it is at once the essential condition, and the visible exponent of order ; and order here below, is an image of that higher harmony where the glory of God himself is unveiled. It is not surprising that in our days worthy people retain prejudices against the Jesuits, because the most honorable, and even the most distinguished spirits sometimes take judgments on trust, and do not give themselves time to go to the bottom of historical research, but the simply bad will never be the friends of the Order.

“ If the company of Saint Ignatius was such as the Parliament of Paris represents it in the unfortunate decree of 1762, if all the abominations ascribed formed a portion of the instruction given by the Jesuits, impiety and revolt would have paid them devoted worship.

“ In a life merely contemplative, or devoted to study in the cloister, the Jesuits had lived in peace ; they would have encountered on their way none but the ordinary trials reserved for every Catholic institution : but they formed a militant body ; they were above all, men of apostolic action, sent against the powers of error and evil ; they ceaselessly offered battle under the Christian banner ; the most glorious portion of their destiny was exposure to assault. Saint Augustin has indicated to us the two cities, whose strife shall only end with time itself. Nothing can be more natural than the storms which form the staple of the history of the Society of Jesus ; that history is the history of truth and opinion in Europe for three centuries.

“ A nation which has strayed from God, must either return or perish. It was the will of Providence that France should be preserved ; it was God's good pleasure to use it as an instrument for the accomplishment of his eternal purposes. Thus it happened, that after those days when guilty follies drove Him from the temples, as they would have driven Him from Heaven if they could, the days of renovation returned. The low murmur of impiety which Fenelon had heard, became in the eighteenth century a tempest, and the tempest was now appeased. A deep felt need of religion sprung from the midst of the ruins ; impiety appeared in its true aspect, exhibiting its immense ravages and its bloody fruits. Crime had followed as the natural consequence of principles established with such levity and rashness ; there had been enough of horrors, of ruins, of untimely graves. France astonished by all that had been destroyed in ten years, and wearied with the weight of life without faith, eagerly demanded once more the worship of their forefathers, priests and altars. Then the man whose sword was in the ascendant, hearkened to this vast sigh of a reviving land, and had the courage to respond to it, notwithstanding the ignorant and low bred oppositions of those about him. The First Consul foresaw an additional strength conferred on his authority by a return to the Catholic Faith. He acquired both advantage and honour from the opening of the churches.

“ But if general opinion tended towards Christianity, and laid claim to it as to a long lost possession, there was greater interest exhibited for its recollections than its lights. People were glad to recover their church through a social, conservative, and patriotic instinct, but they knew nothing, or next to nothing, of religion. They had forgotten its benefits and its mighty works, its divine superiority over every institution raised by the hand of man, and the affecting and sublime poetry of its ceremonies and its festivals. It was necessary to strike a great blow in the kingdom of thought; a work was to be achieved, not by dint of reasonings and demonstrations, but by the double power which attracts and subjects, which induces reverie and thought, which exalts, animates, and colors everything; viz. imagination and style. It now behoved to rouse admiration for what would have only excited contempt in the eighteenth century. A brilliant writer, a great painter, was found to perform the task.

"A young French noble, an exile and wanderer, who at the outset of life, had seldom thought on religion, learned at last to know God, in the midst of the forests and the immense landscapes of the New World. No one returns in an impious frame of mind from scenes of solitude. Himself has said, 'woe to the traveller, who after making the tour of the world, has re-entered, an unbeliever, under the roof of his ancestors!' Having diligently sought his vocation, M. de Chateaubriand found it in Christianity. His book appeared at an hour the most favourable, the best chosen; it was the most brilliant and happy coincidence in the world of literature. Whoever has intimately studied the history of the human race, is well aware of the important part played by imagination among its various tribes: to despise it would be to exhibit ignorance in the art of governing men. You have done much for some great object, when you have associated it to the imagination. The book of M. Chateaubriand, rendered that service to Christianity: it will endure as marking an epoch. Look not into it for a studied vigorous theology, for profound philosophy, extensive learning, the exuberant riches of the fathers of the church; but consult it for whatever can be expected from sentiment and rich coloring.

"At the distance of more than half a century, and to us who may be already considered as posterity, this work cannot be accepted as admirable in every point of view. It still sustains its pristine reputation in the descriptive and critical portions; the mere Christian tableaux, in which we are conscious of laboured art, and a deficiency in the 'natural,' have faded to some extent. If in our days an attentive perusal of the 'Genius of Christianity' is less fertile in enchantments, there are still found, and always will be found, real and new beauties, beauties of a high order, which belong peculiarly to M. de Chateaubriand. They bear the striking impress of one of the most powerful minds that have ever enriched French literature. Even his defects have a certain character which leaves much to the excursions of fancy; they are fleeting clouds whose motions the mind loves to follow. The 'Genius of Christianity' attained its object amid enthusiastic acclamation. We may be permitted to doubt whether any one was converted, and went to confession after reading it; but at all events, he might now go to Mass, without pulling his hat over his eyes.

"Imagination was won over to the profit of the Christian religion, but reason waited for something more. People still longed, but they also desired to be instructed, and to be able to render a reason for their faith to a certain limit. Objections against the existence of God, and against Christianity, lingered everywhere, and had acquired a certain status in the habits of the time. It was necessary to put to silence the common places of incredulity, whose echo was still noisily prolonged in books and academies; and to undertake with this view the guidance of the new generations: the accomplishment of this work of an apostle was reserved for M. Frayssinous.

"When we look back after being borne forward on the tide of years, how many things are recollected, about which complaisance or passion made great noise, and of which nothing whatever remains! The memory of M. Frayssinous has risen and expanded over the dust of many a name, which once thought itself immortal. And as the works of man require to be seen, like monuments, from a distance, the labours of M. Frayssinous, after a lapse of forty or fifty years, now appear in their true grandeur.

"From the year 1801, we find him at the church of Les Carmes, where he became a catechist, to make known the principles of religion. M. l'Abbé Michel Clausel de Coussergues presented the objections, M. Frayssinous answered them. What a novelty in this Paris, which for ten years, had ignored Christianity! The great interest felt by the auditors, was a sufficient proof that they wished at last to emerge from the cavern of evil, the abode of every crime and every error. It was most consoling to see instruction in the Christian Faith, revived in the same place, where some years before, it had been sealed by the blood of martyrs. In 1803, M. Frayssinous was permitted to establish his conferences at Saint Sulpice, then restored to Catholic worship. At first, he contented himself with the building called the German Chapel, afterwards he made use of the church itself. It was on the 4th of January, 1807, that M. Frayssinous presented himself before this numerous audience. A brilliant assembly crowded into the vast enclosure; Cardinal Maury and the Minister Portalis, were there; the impression made was profound, the success immense. In 1809, Napoleon heaped persecutions on the illustrious and holy Pontiff, Pius VII.; it was only to be expected that he would impose silence on the conferencier of Saint Sulpice. The return of the Bourbons in 1814 again restored freedom of speech to M. Frayssinous, who continued the good work till 1822.

"Obliged to be an apologist for more than twenty years, M. Frayssinous chiefly addressed a congregation, whose cradle had rested between the temple of Reason and the scaffold. The auditors of the commencement of the century had forgotten their Christian Doctrine, his auditors of the Restoration had never learned it. From 1814 to 1822, he saw before him a youthful crowd, attracted by every thing great, desirous to raise itself to the knowledge of truth, and rejecting by an instinct of honor and moral dignity, the grovelling doctrines of the preceding century. What a delightful and befitting mission for this fervent apostle of reviving religion! M. Frayssinous was the instructor of a great number of young men, who were one day to possess considerable influence in their country; he was the lamp of their souls, and after divine grace, the father of their faith. He gave an impulsive movement to intelligence, excited courage, inspired generous designs. To him, in a great degree, is due the honor of the religious good effected under the Restoration, in spite of the hail storm of daily attacks from an anti-Catholic press. To him is due the honor of having sown in the hearts of his young hearers, so many good seeds destined to spring up at the proper time, and to have restored and kept up the Christian tradition in families.

“ When M. Frayssinous took his place in the pulpit, he had to prove everything, even the existence of God, for men had made it a point of honor to convince themselves and others, that they were orphans, and had been so from eternity. The new situation required a new kind of discourse. He had not to address Christians, but those who were strangers to the very elementary principles of religion and philosophy: it was necessary to stoop to the level of the intelligences of his auditory. M. Frayssinous comprehended this at once. It was a sad thing to be obliged to plead the cause of religion before children, as the Tertullians and Origenes of former days before Jews and Pagans ; but it was incumbent to meet the necessities of the time. He was obliged to establish the impotency of human reason to recognize the truth, and the philosophical advantages of an absolute scepticism. The conferencier of Saint Sulpice demonstrated that we were created for truth, that there are primary truths, and truths of deduction, and that we are furnished with the means of attaining them. And as the desire for truth does not absolutely prevent our being deceived, the orator searched out the cause of these errors. He proved the existence of God by the universal faith of the human race, and by the order and beauties of nature, and trod in the dust the arguments of Atheism. Providence in the moral order, the spirituality of the soul, natural law, free will and the immortality of the soul, formed in succession the subjects of the conferences. He established the dogma of man owing worship to the Divinity, and that this worship ought to be exterior and public. He established religious principles as the foundations of morality and society, discussed the value of cotemporary testimony, and the question of miracles, examined the books of Moses and the Gospels, and proved a divine foundation in the establishment of Christianity. Then, penetrating to the profound depths of religion, the orator contemplated its mysteries, the fitness and utility of which he lucidly exhibited. He cleared religion of ill-founded accusations, of calumnies so often re-produced, of wilfully false and hostile inventions, and re-established the precise theological truth in disputed points ; he shewed the social power of the Catholic doctrine, and saw in it alone, the solid elements of the greatness, the peace, and the future of France.

“ It needs but to indicate this order of ideas, this ensemble of Christian lessons, to comprehend the importance of the services rendered by M. Frayssinous to the youth of France, in the early part of the nineteenth century. Such a mass of facts, of motives, of reasonings, and of proofs, shed floods of light on those minds, which were ignorant of everything connected with religion, and were sincerely seeking the truth. The orator spoke with clearness, nervous force, and with vigorous and spiritual good sense. His information was solid, his argumentation well knit, the turn of the thought often eloquent. You saw in him an upright heart, profound faith, love of truth, love of country, horror of evil mens' doctrines, but of good will to the men themselves. He once said, 'if religion is without pity for error, as she is truth, she is full of consideration for the persons subject to error, because she is charity.'

"In citing M. de Chateaubriand and M. Frayssinous, as two mighty influences, which by different ways, favored the return to faith, we must not forget other labourers honourably united by their date to the work of reconstruction among us. M. de Bonald, caused in some degree the idea of the Divinity to take its place again in our philosophy, our society, and in the traditions of the human race; M. de Maistre attacked error in its remotest holds, with the original views of a rare genius, and the boldness of one who feels himself in possession of the truth. M. de Lamennais struck effective blows, but alas! to fall the deeper from his height of glory; and lastly, among this group of illustrious ancestors, let us find room for M. Michaud, the first Frenchman of the nineteenth century, who restored the great epopée of the Catholic middle ages, the first volume of his History of the Crusades, having appeared in 1808. The religious revival, however, particularly appertains to the Genius of Christianity and the conferences of St. Sulpice."

The above extracts are given from different portions of the life of the eminent and holy personage whose name heads this paper. We have taken no further liberty than arranging them according to time, and making them form an introduction to his history. His admission to the Society of Jesus closely followed the later conferences of M. Frayssinous, and as his subsequent career is so intimately connected with the after successful efforts of that society, he being in fact under God, its chief instrument for good in France, we may begin here to trace his heavenward route from his childhood upwards.

From the author's introduction we select a few lines.

"The perusal of this work should urge to a successful strife with discouragement. In it will be seen everything calculated to furnish strong hopes, and what constitutes the true honor of our age, the incontestible religious improvement of French society during the last twenty years. Nothing is lost when religion begins to revive, and resume her rights and her empire. Her tendency is to elevate the moral sense, true dignity, the idea of justice; and to teach us to look beyond the present hour. She is hopeful for the future, because she believes in the INFINITE, and she not only restores souls; she even aids in restoring states. As long as genuine religion shall remain free in our land, no evil can be irreparable."

The great grandfather of our Apostle, purchased the Chateau of Ravignan, near Mount Mersan in the Landes in the reign of Louis XIV; and with the castle and estate he bought the privilege of using the name, his own proper one being De La

Croix. The same gentleman owned an estate called the Gurgue, about four leagues from Bayonne, where he chiefly abode, as the Chateau of Ravignan was in a ruinous condition. The family followed the profession of arms. The father of the subject of our memoir was a Chevalier of Saint Louis under that unsaintly King the fifteenth of the name. His wife was a Saint C eran, and a brother-in-law of his, a lieutenant in the expedition, of Lapeyrouse, died in the Philippine isles. He wore through the dreary revolution without emigrating, though at imminent peril of his life. The devotedness of his valet Du-maine who once assumed his queue, powder, and embroidered coat, saved his life on the occasion.

On the 2nd of December, 1795, Gustave Xavier de La Croix de Ravignan was born at Bayonne, and privately baptized on the next day at the house of a watchmaker in the same town. As in the case of so many of the elect in the Old Testament, his name seems to have possessed prophetic power. During infancy he did not enjoy robust health. Afterwards, though frolicsome and lively with his playmates, he was serious when in the presence of his parents. His gravity made his family call him the young ambassador: he became one indeed, but it was to plead the cause of his fellow-mortals at the court of Heaven. His father being advanced in years at his birth, made him his close companion in all his little excursions to Bayonne and back.

In the year 1805, he conducted him to Paris, and left him under the care of the Abb  Hunot in the Rue Cherche Midi. He soon surpassed all his class-mates, and rather embarrassed his teachers by his extraordinary quickness in mastering his lessons. Even at that early time of his life, he experienced a strong devotional impulse; and performed his religious duties to the great content of the spiritual director of the school, the Abb  de Sambucy.

At the end of a-year and a-half, he was changed to a superior academy, Rue Matignon, presided over by M. Hix and three Clergymen, and affording secular and religious instruction to 250 students. The father-confessor was the Abb  Doremus, who about a quarter of a century later became the spiritual director of the Duchess de Berri. Here his progress was equally rapid. He was accompanied by his elder brother Hippolyte, who was also his god-father, and to whom he continued tenderly attached through life. We must afford space for one of his letters to his father, dated from the academy.

"Ah, dear and good papa! how I would wish to hear you call me once more your little companion, as when we used to walk together through the woods that surround the Gurgue! How happy I was at that time! Alas it is past. Let us hope that I shall one day re-visit my birth-place, which is so dear to me. How I long to see that happy day! Mean time, dear Papa, I console myself as well as I can, by sending you these letters, in which I describe what I feel.' 'Alas,' said he in another letter to his father, 'how I wish my studies were over, that I might be at liberty to embrace you, and be off to the chase with yourself and Dumaine.'"

His respect for the authority and advice of his parents was so great that he did not learn to ride or fence, though he delighted in these exercises, without obtaining their approbation.

"What particularly strikes us in this correspondence of his early years, is a character of a mature stamp, which early revealed itself, exhibiting a deep feeling of duty, strength, will, courage, and resolution. He is constantly pre-occupied with the necessity of doing good; he neglects nothing, but he is never satisfied with himself; though still a child, he seems sensible of a divine impulse, which prompts him to aim at perfection. One week of vacation is enough for him. At its close he commences his preparation for the opening of the classes. Endowed with a tender and sensitive nature, he endeavoured to conquer, or at least, restrain it; but, if on any solemn occasion, there was a mention of mothers, he at once sadly thought of his own; and his eyes filled with tears when at a distribution of prizes, he heard these words addressed to the children: 'Victors, your mothers will shed tears of joy at your triumphs; vanquished, your mothers will console you by their tender caresses.'

"Separation from the paternal hearth, weighed heavy on him. He sighed to re-visit his home, but then sadly reflected that a few days of happiness, would give place to the misery of a long absence. He used often to cry out, 'When shall I be able, poor child that I am, to live with my parents, without fear of being separated from them? perhaps never!' Ah! never indeed. Our greatest duties here are accomplished by the most distressing separations; and those mothers who are proudest of their sons, are often the most to be pitied."

At thirteen years of age, his parents were desirous that he should enter among the pages: but finding that generally these pages entered on a military career after a couple of years, he sought guidance in prayer, and announced to his parents, that he felt no inclination for arms, and preferred the study of law or diplomacy.

For five months before his first communion, he could not be induced to be present at a play. His preparation was probably as perfect as could be made by one of his age, where the grace received was so well aided by the most tender devotion in prayer and meditation.

“It was innocence itself, which on the 8th of June, 1809, in the person of Gustave de Ravignan, became the tabernacle of God. It was the child preserved, the child predestined, which on that day for the first time, was nourished with the bread of angels. Our poor country seldom presented at that period, a spectacle of the kind, so worthy of the regards of heaven. A first communion made by a child so stainless, was at once a benediction and the consecration of a destiny. A mysterious source of graces has been revealed to this sickly looking scholar of noble and grave mien, on whose countenance shines a tender and intense piety, and this source of grace shall never run dry. The first communion of Gustave de Ravignan, which so vividly presented the idea of an angel mingling with human beings, was the commencement of all the divine favors showered on a great life.”

After five years of successful studies, he lost his father whom he had not seen since his entry at M. Hunot's academy. His vacations had been passed in the city, as in those days the idea of a journey from Paris to Bayonne and back again every year, was not to be entertained. At fifteen years and a half old, he finished his studies with M. Hix, having had for class fellows, among other celebrities, Oudenot, Alfred de Vigny, Perignon, the composer Herold, and lastly Count D'Orsay, who in after years presented to his former comrade, a Head of Christ modelled by himself.

At sixteen years of age he commenced the study of jurisprudence, taking for his guide M. Goujon, who was recommended by M. Seze, the illustrious defender of Louis XVI. His confessor was the sainted conferencier M. Frayssinous, whose labours in the pulpit were at this time suspended by Napoleon, as mentioned before. He applied himself at intervals to the study of English, German, and general reading; and might be seen praying with fervor at an early Mass, and delighting a salon in the evening by the elegance of his manners and the agreeability of his conversation; for as our author remarks “Piety in the fashionable world has no need of making faces at the company.” Religion held his heart, and so exclusively, that these outward matters did not affect his deep seated piety in the slightest degree. He has occasionally said, addressing his mother, “If I have offended you in any way, I take refuge in your heart;” as St. Augustin once wrote, “If you are afraid of God, run and hide in his arms.”

Inheriting by race and tradition, loyal attachment to the Bourbons, he took up arms after the return from Elba, and was in peril of his life at an engagement in the lower Pyrenees. He would not quit M. Barbarin, his colonel, who was severely wounded, and the noble-minded but mistaken man, seeing no other means to compel his friend to fly for his life, snatched a pistol from his belt and shot himself on the spot. Gustave soon after rejoined the little body of French soldiers that were commanded by Count Etienne de Damas in Spain, and was appointed lieutenant of cavalry.

Want of space obliges us to leave out the many affectionate letters which he dispatched to his mother during these years of his youth : let our readers be assured that they were every thing that could give joy and comfort to the heart of a loving and religious minded mother.

We see prevailing in the life of the true soldier and the true saint, the same virtues of heroism, endurance, and loyalty to the cause adopted, and sometimes these virtues animating the same person in both careers, as in the instances of St. Martin, St. Ignatius, and the subject of this memoir, who will probably be one day publicly invoked among the ranks of the canonized defenders of the faith.

Gustave de Ravignan, after his brief military career, now devoted himself with more zeal to the study of the law. We extract a few lines of our author's, relative to the subject :—

“ The study of law touches on what is greatest in the history of men, and conduces to the most noble occupations of the understanding. Gustave de Ravignan ceaselessly added to his information by a regular course of reading, and by the good and profitable practice of making notes of what he read. On finishing his annotations on the Spirit of Laws, he remarked that a valuable work might be composed as a companion, having for its title the Morality of Laws. It was a great and happy idea. It strongly seized on his mind, and we have proofs that the courageous young student fully intended to execute it. The notes which we have seen are those of an intrepid workman. They bear for title ‘ Notes on Religion, History and Laws,’ &c. * * * He did not go on with the execution of the intended work : the will was good, but time failed. He was at the age when great designs traverse the brain of those enamoured of goodness, but maturity was denied to the conception of the large design.”

During parts of 1815 and 1816 his life was endangered by an attack on his lungs. His doctor recommended a visit to Caunterets, as he would have recommended any other place, but the instinct of a mother guided her to select the Eaux Bonnes in the Pyrenees, and after a short sojourn there his health seemed perfectly re-established.

In 1817 he was admitted to the office of Conseiller Auditeur, being the elect out of three candidates proposed, the interest of the Duke of Angoulême, which was chiefly due to his conduct during the Hundred Days, having, it is supposed, influenced the King's choice. His first essay as a pleader dated May, 1820. The notes made on his first brief, which are still extant, exhibit great powers of reason, extensive information, clearness, and force. In all his speeches during his legal career, there was evident a serious study of the subject matter, and a rare correctness in the opening and the discussion of the cause.

On the 31st of August, 1821, he was employed in the prosecution of Cauchois-Le-Maire, for an impudent and licentious attack on the government. He conscientiously drew a distinction between license and liberty, and had the pleasure of seeing an unprincipled and mischievous writer found guilty under all the heads of the accusation.

During the vacation of Pentecost the President Amy used to assemble a select number of his friends, among whom was always found De Ravignan, at his chateau de Rosay in Upper Normandy. In the number of the invited were to be found Chaveau Lagard, the illustrious defender of Marie Antoinette and Charlotte Corday; Michaud, a collaborateur of our biographer in the History of the Crusades, and one whom he characterises as a delightful talker, a profound politician, a historian of great talent, of great knowledge, and of an upright conscience; M. Berryer, then a brilliant young advocate, and the professor Lemaire. There our future conferencier chatted, made verses, enjoyed manly exercises, and contributed more than any one to the general harmless enjoyment. One amusement alone he would not share—the card table, or gambling of any description. About this period a friend of his of an irreligious disposition, fell ill, and was watched by him with the care of a mother. He ceased not till he had the inexpressible comfort of seeing the sinner thoroughly reconciled to his God before the near approach of his dissolution.

“We elbow the crowd but it is very rare to meet a man. How few are there who live on their own proper funds! who seek their strength and greatness in themselves! The life of nearly everyone is a life reflected, re-echoed, or borrowed. They drag on a life out of doors, for inside they find nothing; they seek everything from others, and outside their own proper habitation; they borrow their dreams, their ideas, even their opinions. Gustave de Ravignan's character exhibited a sustained greatness, the secret of which is a sincere desire to do good and advance without cessation. This man of the world, whom the world looked up to, and who stood far above its level, entertained a profound conviction of the dignity of human nature. He had considered with the eyes of faith, the divine stamp with which our nature is impressed, and it was on that account that he bestowed great care on his entire being ; he carefully attended to his soul, his spirit, and even his exterior. He was not only one of the most pious of young men, there could scarcely be found one more attractive. With his beautiful regular features, and their charming expression, his superb eyes, fine curling black hair, and his clothes cut in such a good style, you might have taken him at first for a person too much wedded to the world ; but with him all this was only the complement of the ideal of moral beauty. His Christian obligations were never absent from his mind ; he was surrounded with attractions, yet he inspired respect ; he was at once amiable and unaffectedly reserved. His gaiety never passed certain bounds ; and there was in his spirit a slight tinge of irony, which he turned to the purpose of entertainment, and never allowed to offend any one."

About this period, the successive deaths of his grandmother, and of a dear young friend, with the dangerous illness of a beloved sister, sensibly affected his spirits, and probably served to turn his wishes towards the life of a Religious. We give part of a letter written soon after to his sister Pauline, who was living at the time with their mother at St. Laurent.

"I earnestly long for repose. . It is as necessary to me as any other appliance for the sick ; the least noise affects me. I beg of my mother to get the pigeon house or some quiet apartment in the garden readied for me. I do not like to hear any movements of outward life where I am. Without doubt it is an error, a defect, a vice : I look on it as a malady affecting the nerves, or something of the sort. I must have night and silence round me. . . . I am very much annoyed that Michael is not giving satisfaction to my mother. He does not go to confession ! I will bring him with me when I go down, for I will go often myself to the Curé of the place. Adieu ! pray to God for me. Cherish religion, for we have no other real good in the world ; but you feel this better than I, and I love you the more for it."

He passed some happy days with his dear relatives at Ravignan or St. Laurent. The desire of entering into the ecclesiastical state had taken hold of him in a greater or less degree for some time ; and his biographer is careful to assert, that no worldly disappointment, or chagrin, or affair of the heart, had the least influence on the travailing of his soul in these days. M. l'Abbe Frayssinous his spiritual director, cautioned him against a too sudden resolve. After his return from the country in 1819, he resumed his legal functions, giving thereby great pleasure to his mother, who seems always to have opposed his vocation somewhat more vigorously than strictly became a devout Christian parent. This remark is made, not for the disparagement of the good lady, who, we hope, is enjoying at this moment the society of her blessed son in glory and bliss, but for a warning to living mothers, not to pull against the divine bands which are drawing their happy children into the refuge of Christian perfection. The rule in this matter is simple : force or persuade not your children to enter a Religious state, but do not oppose their wishes when they tend in that direction.

“ Among the worldly pleasures he enjoyed, the young counsellor preferred the little reunions at his mother’s. He there appeared lively, witty, and well pleased ; and often at the close of one of these parties, he would request them to fix on a time for the next. He took pleasure in dancing, and often when returning from a ball, he would find fault with himself for having been so much amused. His mother would sometimes say to her daughters, ‘ Our dear Gustave has given up his projects ; he now thinks only of that career which is opening so brilliantly before him.’ ”

“ One day in the year 1820, at a small party, the discourse turned on religion and the Jesuits. The Catholic Faith and the Company of Jesus were attacked, and Gustave de Ravignan undertook their defence. Immediately the vehemence of the assailants was directed full on the celebrated society ; but our young counsellor retorted with vigour, rectifying facts, confounding calumnies, and proving the innocence of the accused. All at once, having given utterance to his historic and religious convictions, he rose up with eyes on fire, sublime with truth, faith, and confidence, and cried out, ‘ I will die a Jesuit.’ ‘ Then,’ said his opponent, ‘ you will be hunted from every place, along with them.’ ‘ I may be hunted,’ answered he, ‘ but I will die a Jesuit notwithstanding.’ This scene, so indicative of prophetic inspiration, was never forgotten by those who witnessed it.”

He was appointed substitute to the Procureur du Roy, 1st. August, 1821 ; and during the following winter he went pretty freely into society by order of his director, who wished to test the genuineness of his vocation by bringing him face to face with the attractions of the world. He no longer danced, and was often found by his family very sad in appearance. His hour being come at last, he spoke to his mother of his being obliged to take a journey which might occupy him a week or so, promising to write if he would not have returned by that time. In embracing her at his departure, he jestingly requested her not to present a petition à la. Loveday.*

* An Englishman so called presented, a little before that time, a petition to the Chamber of Deputies, complaining that his daughter had become a Catholic, and embraced a religious state.

On the morning of the 19th of April, 1822, he entered the little seminary of Issy in the outskirts of Paris, where so many holy and learned men had tested their vocation before him. In the garden of the house called the Solitude, are two large cypresses standing like two silent sentinels, and the solitaires have a view of Paris, lying silent and untempting beyond their little world. He wrote to his mother as he had promised, asking forgiveness for not being more explicit with her, as he could not endure the sight of her grief. His director was M. Mollevaut, the superior of the house of Solitude. M. Fraysinous, on confiding him to this venerable guide, said, "when he informs me that you have received a call, I will be as much at peace as if the words came from God."

Mme. de Ravignan, in her distress, paid a visit to M. Fraysinous, now Vicar-General of Paris, and Almoner to the King. He gave her all the consolation and courage that could be obtained by looking at the separation in a religious light, and repeated more than once, "I am growing old: your son is destined to succeed me at Saint Sulpice." From a letter of her's to some lady among her intimate friends, the biographer gives his readers an opportunity to judge of the depth of the sacrifice she was obliged to make in parting from her beloved child.

He received a letter from the Procureur General, M. Bellart, in answer to one announcing his resignation of office, in which this brave defender and preserver of so many of the illustrious accused of past days, exhorted him to a most careful examination of himself before making his irrevocable choice; but such light had been already shed on his interior, that his path was as clear before him as a well beaten causeway through a marsh in the full blaze of noon. He thus addressed a friend some time after his entrance at Issy;—

"Oh, how I bless the infinite goodness of God! How was I employed in the world! In agitation, in torment, in debate; and for what purpose? Little of what was good; much of what was evil; often for nothing at all. Here, I pray; I meditate on the fundamental principles of faith; I labour for the sanctuary; and my conscience tells me, that I am of some service to my country, to my friends, to myself. Implore God that this life may endure long for me."

"Two days after this letter was written, he received the tonsure from the hands of the Bishop of Hermopolis (M. Frayssinous), whose own consecration had only just taken place. * * * It was a fine and affecting sight, such as we meet occasionally in the history of the Church. The young man kneeling before the Bishop to receive the lowest degree of priesthood, had been since 1814, his most assiduous hearer at Saint Sulpice. He had revealed all the secrets of his soul to him for ten years ; and it was by his advice that he had prolonged his stay in the world, in order that the gold might be the more purified in that world's furnace.

"After the ceremony the Bishop addressed the new cleric in words the memory of which has remained fresh in the minds of those present, and at once, claimed those rights of the Creator which men seem not willing to recognise. 'The world speaks of your sacrifice, you have made none : is it a sacrifice to quit the world for God ?' Being oppressed with the duties of the times, of which he felt the weight and difficulty, he demanded of the dearly-loved Levite the assistance of his prayers. 'You are going,' said he, 'to pass long days of peace in a holy solitude : forget not those who are launched on a sea disturbed with storms, and strewn with rocks.' Touching and merciful wonders of Providence ! The elect succeed each other : from one work crowned with glory, arises another work destined for a glorious future ; and the mantles of the prophets are bequeathed, as in the ancient games the torches passed from hand to hand. It was in 1822, that the conferences of M. Frayssinous ceased, and it was at the same period that the orator of Saint Sulpice introduced young De Ravignan into the sanctuary. When Ambrose baptized Augustin, he was little aware that the new Christian would be the most sublime and profound doctor of our faith ; but when the Bishop of Hermopolis opened the barrier to a vocation so well known to him, he knew full well the apostle that was going to arise for the glory of the Church."

His mother having gone to Saint Laurent, and being very anxious about his health, he writes to her in the most tender and affectionate style, describing his entire contentment in his present life, and mentioning that, to give pleasure to her and his other dear friends, he attends carefully to his health.

It is very probable that De Ravignan had no intention of entering the ranks of the Jesuits when he began his retreat at Issy ; but there was such bitter hostility shewn to the order by the revolutionary party about the year 1822, that he became decided, even as a brave volunteer quits garrison duty to encounter the enemy where the war is actually raging. His mother having returned to Paris in November, drove to Issy in all haste to embrace her son, but he had set out on foot on All Souls' Day to Montrouge, where the Society possessed a little house, with court and garden, since 1816, the novices amounting to one hundred.* She followed him thither, and wept, and embraced, and reproached him in turn. He consoled her as well as he could ; and when he had brought some degree of comfort to her mind, he remarked with a smile, " You see, my dear mother, that you did not name me Xavier for nothing." A small portion of a letter to his mother on her Festival day (St. Catherine's), is subjoined.

" I hope you will be convinced that the most serious reflections and the most abundant grace have conducted me to Montrouge, and that you will extend your love for your son to the society of which he aspires to be a member. May our Lord, through the love of his mother, and the intercession of your holy patroness, grant you all succour to pass well through this short life, and rejoin us in Heaven ! To-morrow I will pray for you at the Holy Sacrifice. I will communicate for the same intention : this is my bouquet for your festival, prayer, and union with God. Receive them with welcome : unite your prayers with mine that you may be consoled, and become tranquil and happy."

To his brother he writes, deprecating any merit to himself in the step he has taken :—

" Once the will of God is made known to us by faith, prayer, and meditation, the man is no more himself in following the route which has been traced out for him. When you think of me, pray that I may live only to do His will, to save myself thereby, and to labour in future for the sanctification of the souls committed to my charge. Herein is no question of strength, of sacrifice : there is nothing but facility and simplicity in executing the orders of the Sovereign Master. I pray yourself and our sister to rejoice, and to think more of that Heaven to which we tend, than of this earth on which we creep. Our mother is deeply affected ; but time, grace, and consolation from on high, will change her grief into true joy. . . . I rejoice with you on the promises made for your advancement ; but think of the King of kings, who after this life will distribute grades according to our fidelity here—and that for all eternity."

Our author introduces his account of the noviciate of his young postulant by some appropriate and judicious remarks.

" That man is in possession of true peace on earth, who can sincerely say that he is doing God's will. Not to be where we ought, is the real evil, even as the real good is to be where God wishes us to be. Philosophy is of accord with religion, in teaching that on the choice of a state in life, depends our future ; and that on the well or ill resolving of this question, depends the repose of society. True order is, Every Thing in its own Place. Let any organ of the human body be transferred from the spot where it ought to fulfil its functions to another, and this body, whose structure is so beautiful, could no longer exist. Suppose the least detail neglected in the most wonderful invention of mechanical genius ;—the machine loses its power or its surety. It is the same with societies, whose individuals are not at the posts assigned them by Providence. Terrible and frequent are the shocks we experience at times ; and if the world is not oftener thrown from its balance ; if it still holds out through such discordant and displaced elements, it is only a standing miracle of God that sustains it.

“ Before assisting at the profound labour of a soul which seeks to know God and itself, before considering the working of the constitutions which form the Jesuit, let us pay homage to the great Ignatius of Loyola, the wounded officer of Pampeluna, soldier of God and catechist of his people, founder of an institution, perfect in its first formation and never changed, father of a magnificent family of apostles and martyrs, and whose life was a prophetic image of the struggles and griefs of his posterity. All is one long combat in his genius, his means, and his object. He is roused to anger against his own person, and treats it as an enemy whom it is necessary to conquer. It is by a decided victory over himself that he will prepare to conquer the world. He emerges a new being from the grotto of Manreze ; and this unlettered man has become so learned in divine things, that he requires only thirty days to compose the Spiritual Exercises, a wonderful book, which has brought back so many souls into the path of order, and restored them to God.

“ These Spiritual Exercises are the preludes to the noviciate, among the Jesuits. There are eight days' exercises for the commencement of the noviceship, and thirty days for the third year of probation ; but they may also be used as a preface to every Christian state. It is a labour of interior purification, from which there cannot fail to issue a good and generous will for any labour to which we may have to apply. It is the grotto of Manreze for every aspirant to evangelical regeneration. Xavier de Revignan lays down the Spiritual Exercises on the threshold of an evangelical life.”

Our author now gives a resumé of the processes by which a pious aspirant, entering on his noviciate, comes to conquer his own irregular desires and propensities, breaks the yoke of the world's spirit and customs which formerly oppressed him, resigns his own proper will, and thinks only of what may be the will of his Creator in any future action or proceeding. Aided by meditation on the mysteries of the life of our Lord, he is decided to follow where the standard of the Cross leads the way. He selects the Saviour as his captain in the war he is compelled to wage against himself, the devil, and the world. Led by a heavenly call received in prayer and meditation, he embraces the station appointed for him ; and determining to acquire, through grace, a pure and disinterested love of his incarnate Saviour, all his thoughts, aspirations, and actions will have only one object—THE GREATER GLORY OF GOD.

Hear what Xavier de Ravignan says of his experiences of the new life he is about to embrace :—

“ A man tired of the world quits it ; he searches for a shelter ; he entertains a profound desire to take revenge on himself and his life, by labours profitable to his neighbours.

“ He believes that the great evil of the age is want of obedience. Feeling the utter worthlessness of what is called independence, he thirsts to be in subjection, knowing it to be the only safeguard to man’s dignity, and the assurance of true liberty, the emancipation of the soul.

“ The performance of the Spiritual Exercises brought the light and pointed out the way. He knocked at the gate of the company of Jesus.

“ What first struck him was the profound peace which prevailed in the religious abode, the silent halls, the order, the poverty which reigned everywhere, the kindly welcome given by the good brother who introduced him, the mild gravity of the father who received him. * * * He felt himself in an atmosphere breathing of goodness, of devotion, of the presence of God.

“ Still on the threshold, he will know the extent of his duties in his new life, and be penetrated with its spirit.

‘Are you ready to renounce the world, the possession and the hope of temporal goods ? Are you ready to beg your bread from door to door, if necessary, for the love of Jesus Christ ?’ ‘I am.’

‘Are you disposed to live in any part of the world, and in any employ which your superiors may judge to conduce to the greater glory of God, and the salvation of souls ?’ ‘I am.’

‘Are you resolved to obey your superiors as God’s viceregents, in every matter where your conscience detects no sin ?’ ‘I am.’

‘Are you sincerely determined to repulse with horror, all that the slaves of worldly prejudices love and embrace ; and do you feel disposed to desire and accept whatever Jesus Christ our Lord loved and embraced ?’ ‘I am.’

‘Do you consent to wear the livery of ignominy which He bore ; and through love and respect for him, to suffer as he did, abuse, reproaches, and false testimonies, without having in any way merited them ?’ ‘I do.’”

The noviciate of a Jesuit lasts two years ; and as the main object is to imbue him with a thorough spirit of devotion and obedience, human learning forms no part of his occupation, which wholly consists of exercises of meditation, self-denial, humility, and severity to self. A Religious being a man dead to the world, the agents to induce this spiritual death are merely grace, faith, persevering energy.

Xavier had probably less struggle with himself in conquering pride, self will, and bondage to the outward world, than others. He owned no attachments beyond the walls, except such as are rendered holy by our natural relations, and betook himself with genuine zest to the lowest occupation, sweeping and performing other menial offices, with the humility of a saint and the vigour of a labourer. This is the daily occupation of a novice.

"The Novices rise at 4 o'clock, and their first duty is a visit to the Holy Sacrament, which lasts a quarter of an hour: this is followed by an hour of meditation. At half-past 5, they make their beds, and sweep their chamber: they then hear Mass, and afterwards take breakfast. What are called exterior labors exercise them a certain time; these are the ordinary household duties which would be performed in families by servants or helpers. The remainder of the time till dinner is occupied by a conference on the duties of a religious life, by an exercise in reading, which holds half an hour, and by a recitation of verses from the New Testament, particularly the Epistles of St. Paul. The dinner, which is taken at mid-day, is followed by three-quarters of an hour of recreation. Meditation, the recital of the Rosary, and the Preparation, occupy the intervening time to supper.

"Once a week they have an exercise in humility, when the Novices make sincere though charitable remarks on the defects and imperfections of each other. On Monday they have an exercise in oratorical pronunciation, and speaking in public, taking for subject, a religious truth or the life of a saint. On Wednesday catechism is taught, and perfect liberty of remark is left to the class, in order to put the knowledge and temper of the catechist to the proof."

Our Novice's duty was that of monitor. He transmitted orders from the superiors, saw them executed, and appointed comrades (three by three) when walks were allowed. Their promenades sometimes extended to Meudon, and the weak or inactive found him a rough conductor, for he took no account of mud, cold, heat, frost, or snow. When the exercises of humility had place, no one was found to make a single remark on his manners, but when he read or made an oration, he was listened to as a master of tone and delivery.

"A noviciate without study was surely a great idea. To know one's self and to know God, to have triumphed over one's self, and to be accustomed to the rigorous performance of duty before opening a book or entering on the career of letters or human knowledge—what an effective and perfect preparation! A novice arrives at his studies with peace of soul, that peace so rare and so fertile, arising from the subjugation of evil propensities. He feels a keener relish for truth; and as his interior light has become clearer, he makes a better use of the gifts of nature. * * * The moral worth of a man confers additional value on his talents, while as long as the passions are allowed to obscure the soul, the greatest genius is never in full possession of his powers. On removal from the noviciate, during which the renewal of the man was perfected, the postulant is in the most favorable disposition to receive light, instruction, and elevation of the soul. When the barrier is removed, the intelligence springs forward with delight into the field of study so long closed to it. Xavier de Ravignan found such vivid pleasures in the acquisition of knowledge, that he probably reproached himself for the indulgence.

“ Study holds an important place in the apprenticeship of the company of Jesus. They devote to rhetoric and literature, the first two years which follow the noviciate ; after this, three years or sometimes more, are given to philosophy, the physical sciences, and mathematics. * * * Then the Religious is reduced from the rank of master, which he had held, to that of pupil—to wit in theology. He not only studies Dogmatic Theology and Moral philosophy, but also the Holy Scripture, Canon Law, Ecclesiastical history, and the Oriental languages. To these he devotes four years and sometimes more, being subject to strict yearly examinations. This long course of study is terminated by a general examination, in which he must have three favorable suffrages out of four, in order to gain admittance to the Profesion.

“ To a heart so truly Christian and an intelligence of such elevation as that of Xavier de Ravignan, what a world to reconnoitre and explore ! in these regions of theology, where the foundations of religion are revealed, where divine truths are established in their rigorous exactitude, where the whole sublime edifice of Catholic faith expands before us. What a science is that of the Divine Scriptures ! where nearly every word contains a wonder or mystery, a science not yet exhausted by the brightest geniuses, and whose whole secrets will never be penetrated by man. For him who prepares himself for combats and apostolical works, what an appropriate study is that of the history of the Church ! ever pursued and ever victorious ; ever reckoned among the things which have been or which have lost their power, and yet stretching from shore to shore, and advancing with its cross and its martyrs to the extreme boundaries of the universe. Who can help admiring this Church ! Mother of the greatest nations and the most durable monarchies—indestructible Pillar in the midst of such a mass of ruins ! Vessel constructed by the divine hand, steering with all sails spread through an ocean strewn with wrecks, and out of which, as from the ark, comes from time to time whatever is to renew the life of the world. These later studies occupied our candidate from November 1824, to July 1826.

“ During the summer of 1827, he was preparing to receive sub-deaconship and deaconship, these holy bonds which will link him inviolably to the sanctuary. He thus writes to his family concerning the expected event, 13th August 1827.

“ “ As I am informed by the superior, I will shortly have an additional consolation and a powerful means for intercession for you before God. * * * Pray all for me ; and if you can obtain for me the blessing of becoming a holy priest, you shall have an abundant share of efficacious prayers and fervent sacrifices. Thus it is that God invites to himself even the most unworthy.’ ”

The most touching, tender, and edifying letters were written during these studies to his mother, brother, and sisters. The burthen of nearly the whole being, renunciation of our own proper will, cheerful acceptance of the will of the Creator, the nothingness of this short span of life except the opportunity it affords of gaining a blissful eternity, love of the crucified Saviour, and the great benefit of meditating on the mysteries of his divine life. His mother not being reconciled, even at the end of his probation, to the selection he has made, he takes great pains to shew that it would be sinful to have resisted the gently drawing grace that induced him to embrace it, and that he will shortly be of more service by using his privilege of presenting the Holy Sacrifice for her weal here and hereafter. To her he is still the loving and respectful Gustave, though he has long laid aside that name to all his other correspondents. He is now, in 1828, thirty-three years old, having for the last six years, renounced the world, its honors, its pleasures, and its occupations. Before enjoying sacerdotal functions in perfection, he will have yet to spend five years as professor of Dogmatic Theology.

He gave his first lectures at Acheul, near Amiens, where he had fifty novices under his charge. In his lessons he was remarkable for the luminous precision of his explanations. He allowed no turning back or starting to one side, but kept his pupils within the circle traced out by the terms of the question before them.

Passing, much against our will, his letters to his relatives, redolent of piety, consolation, and submission to the Divine will, we approach the days of July, 1830. A sketch of the general state of the Society in France for some time previous, will not be amiss at this point of our notice.

Two months after the publication of the Bull, Sollicitudo, of Pius VII., 6th August, 1814, which re-established the Jesuits in the Christian world, an ordonnance of Louis XVIII. authorised the Archbishops and Bishops of the realm to erect ecclesiastical schools, of which they were to appoint the heads and the teachers. The Jesuits, under the inoffensive name of Fathers of the Faith, answered to the call of many of the Bishops, and were entrusted with the charge of these ecclesiastical schools. Bourdeaux, Soissons, Forcalquier, Montmorillon, Amiens, and Sainte-Anne d'Auray, were the first cities in France that gave welcome to these worthy successors of the Jouvencys and the Porées. To the work of youthful instruction they joined, as opportunity offered, the functions of home missionaries, preached, and heard confessions.

The famous congregation of which the valiant people of France were so afraid, while they ignored the very existence of republican clubs, whose hands were already on their throats, had for founder, in the beginning of the Empire, the Father Delpuits, and for director under the Restoration, Father Ronsin. While religion was acquiring something like liberty, the Abbé Legris Duval founded the Society of Good Works, who took the prisons, the hospitals, and the little Savoyards under their protection. The Society des Bonnes Etudes also flourished as a branch of the congregation. The Association of St. Francis Regis, established by a councillor of the Cour Royale, M. Gossin of pious memory, also arose to lend its aid for the effectually carrying on of the work of God in France.

“But it was the unholy mission of part of the public press of the era of the restoration, to mock, to insult, to invent evil against Catholicity under the convenient name of Jesuitism. They could not put the servants of God in the dungeon or under the axe, but they tortured them with railleries, and lying inventions. They could not expose them to the horrors of the circus; so they inflicted a daily flagellation on them before an excited public. They treated them somewhat like those early martyrs whose faces and bodies were smeared with honey, and then exposed under a burning sun to be tormented by mosquitos.

“The most blood-thirsty of their foes, could hardly avoid laughing among themselves, at the game they were playing:—men prepared to blow out the lamp of civilization and bring back the night of ignorance and anarchy! They represented them, poignard in hand, lying in wait for the lives of kings. Ah! if such were the designs of the Jesuits, their accusers would be only too willing to let them accomplish their purpose.”

While the tempest was raging, the Bishop of Hermopolis, (formerly M. Frayssinous, already honorably mentioned) on 26th May, 1826, contended that French priests were authorised by the Charter to submit themselves to particular rules in community; and mentioned, without looking closely at the consequences, that eight petit seminaries were presided over by members of the Society. Many devout and generous hearts were rejoiced at the avowal; but the liberal (?) papers sounded the alarm, and proclaimed the country in danger. A certain Count Montlossier, wearied with a lonely chateau life in Auvergne, and wishing to hear himself spoken of, now attacked the body in a bitter pamphlet, representing them as engaged in a conspiracy to overturn society, religion, and government. His brochure occupied the attention of the Cour Royale, which pronounced itself incompetent to try the question. The Chamber of Peers appointed an unfriendly commission, which referred the statement to the President of the Council. The Duke Fitzjames spoke vigorously against the views of Montlossier, and gave an instance of the wisdom he once exhibited in a plan to drive out the Jacobins, when he was an emigré during the old revolution. He collected his friends together one day, and proposed that all the Capuchins in Europe should be summoned to enter France in procession, bearing before them the Cross as their standard, and Jacobinism would cease to exist.

The Bishop of Hermopolis, minister of ecclesiastical affairs and public instruction, examined, with the firm impartiality of an historian, the praises and the accusations of which the Society had been the object for three centuries, dwelt on its re-establishment by Pius VII., and the re-entry into France of a certain number of its members under the buckler of the Liberty of Worship. His efforts were in vain ; a majority of 130 voices above 63 resigned the petition to the President of the Council. This was in January, 1827. A year after, a commission was appointed to examine measures necessary for the execution of the laws of the realm in regard to secondary ecclesiastical seminaries. From the report of these commissioners sprung the Ordonnances of June, 1828, which dispersed the eight colleges mentioned, and set restrictions on the rights of petit seminaries. The Bishop of Hermopolis gave in his resignation ; another Bishop, M. Feutrier, did not shrink from the heavy responsibility. The poor old King was obliged, against his own will, to temporize ; but it is not by concessions to injustice, but by vigor, that states can be upheld. Two years after the Ordonnances had effect, Charles X. and his family were on their way to exile in Holyrood.

The apostles of the new order of things had now everything their own way.

“ They persuaded the people, who are always ready to believe every thing but the truth, that the Jesuits were pestilent animals, whom it was necessary to extirpate from the face of the earth : and the Hercules of the people, armed with his club, appeared at the gate of the seminary of Acheul.

“ On this occasion, Hercules consisted of a few hundred wretches, who learning that the insurrection of July had triumphed in Paris, determined to have a little campaign for themselves. The band had for chiefs, three traders clad in blouses, who knew the place well, for they had been pupils at the seminary, and had always shewed themselves impenetrable to every good influence. They had never forgiven the Jesuits for their endeavors to make them good members of society. Armed with cudgels and iron bars they arrived at Acheul about midnight. They found the gate closed, but they soon broke it in, and spread through the court with cries of 'Vive la Charte! Vive l'Empereur! Vive l'Enfer!'"

Father Ravignan addressed them from a balcony, but he was soon struck by a stone in the forehead, and obliged to retire. The address and courage of a student, a Breton by birth, delayed the destruction of the house, till a sudden recollection of the Oratory of the Sacred Heart passed through their ignoble heads. They repaired thither, they drank, they tore the books to pieces, and committed other depredations; but the report of a little band of soldiers marching to the rescue, soon dispersed the cowardly marauders. The three gents in blouses found something the reverse of a blessing attending their subsequent career.

There being no hope of surety in a further abode at Acheul, the students dispersed, the head of the establishment dividing his riches, amounting to five francs a head, among them.* The masters and students in Theology appointed a rendezvous at Brigue in Switzerland, where the Society of Jesus owned a small establishment.

Father Xavier found shelter in the house of a friend at Amiens, and watched and sheltered as well as circumstances allowed, his dispersed brethern. Few of his acquaintance of old days would suspect the shabby brown wrapper, and the equally shabby waistcoat and trowsers, to be the only suit of the once finely attired Gustave de Ravignan, the successful advocate.

At the end of September, masters and pupils were assembled in their house at Brigue in the Valais, on the left bank of the Rhone, and near the entrance to the Simplon. It had once been a citadel of Buonaparte's. With the mountains keeping out the sun from the dwelling, poor Xavier suffered enough from the cold, but never complained. Grateful for the reception they met from the Valaisans, Father Xavier and his companions collected subscriptions, and built a little chapel on a neighbouring mountain, where the dispersed families of the country round might enjoy the comforts and aid of religion. Many of the letters he wrote at this period to console and fortify his friends, are given in the biography.

"The five years of profession being achieved, there remained the third year of probation, the last period of profound retreat and spiritual labors before entering on the fulfilment of the different employs and ministries of the Society of Jesus. It is at once a halt and a final effort of preparation before entering on the career. . . .

'The man* destined to the apostolic ministry spent two years in recollection and silence. Then came nine years of studies and five or six of teaching. He was ordained priest, and yet has never exercised priestly functions. He is probably thirty-three years of age, and fifteen or sixteen of these, have been spent in a religious life. The Religious, the Priest now re-enters the noviciate.

"He must now for an entire year renounce human studies and exterior human relations. He must apply to himself everything that can promote a sincere humility, a general abnegation of will, and even of judgment, a subjection of the inferior propensities of our nature, a more profound knowledge, and a greater love of God, so that he may be better enabled to assist others in their progress through the same paths for the greater glory of God, and of our Lord Jesus.

"This time of holy repose which will never return, passes too quickly: I have enjoyed it, and I never can enjoy it again during my earthly probation.

'Then the great career of the Exercises is again measured through; prayer and meditation are prolonged. The spirit of the Institute, the conditions of the apostolate, poverty, suffering, obedience, everything that constitutes the duties of a Religious, are again studied and sounded. Some teachings of catechism to children, some missions in the neighbourhood, vary the solitude, and serve as prelude to those ministries still more dear to the heart of an apostle.

'When the year is expired, the superiors enquire into the progress made in virtue and knowledge by the aspirant, and according to the judgment entered by the Father General himself on the report, the gradus is given; i. e. he is admitted to pronounce the latest vows of a Spiritual Coadjutor or a Professed. These two classes are equal in rank, neither privileged beyond the other; but the latter named are entitled to assist with the superiors at the provincial and general assemblies of the order. These reunions are very rare and limited to certain cases'. "†

* What follows is from the pen of Father de Ravignan.

† From the Existence and Institute of the Jesuits, by Father de Ravignan.

This last period of repose and preparation was passed by Father de Ravignan at Estavayer in the Canton of Fribourg, on the edge of the Lake of Neufchatel, where the order had a college of novices. Though seemingly inactive at the time, his mind must have been teeming with projects for the advancement of God's reign on earth.

"The Jesuit resembles a soldier ever on active service. When not on the field of battle, he is under the tent; he is always on duty, ever at his post, and dies without experiencing sickness. A learned and vigorous laborer of the seventeenth century, when advised to take some repose, exclaimed that he would have all eternity for repose. This has been for three centuries the answer of every Jesuit worthy of the name; it is the response of every one who devotes himself to the good fight, heroes of religion, apostles or sisters of charity. Man can always do more than he really effects; and it is oftentimes in the later season of life that the fairest flowers of genius spring out."

Apropos to the young ladies of several French families who were exiled to Fribourg by the glorious days of July, taking the veil in the convent of the Sacré Cœur, he said in one of his letters :

"How much do parents need to be instructed on the point of the vocation of their children! Let us never, by any means, infringe on their liberty, but by all means allow them liberty to devote themselves to God. Tender mothers, if your daughters feel a genuine vocation for a religious life, exhibit a real love, and remember that your authority does not extend to the choice of a state."

"And this prudent practice was ever followed by Father Xavier. His advise was, 'never exhort your children to the choice of a religious life: let them make a selection in perfect unrestraint. Such a wish may be felt in the secrecy of the heart, but expressed to God only.'"

During this third year he varied his interior studies and exercises by catechisings and missions among the country people of Champéry, Monthey, Saint Maurice, Outre Rhone, &c. He at last broke a silence of twelve years, and plunged into the work of the salvation of souls. "The time being come he made his vows of a professed, heard the bell of his active life ring, and never after reposed till he was received into the arms of his Lord."

The society in which our apostle was now incorporated, being deprived of the right of teaching, exercised themselves either with their novices or theological students, or on missions. In 1832, while the cholera raged, they were found at the bedsides of the sick and dying: their house at St. Acheul was converted into a military hospital. It was at St. Evreux during a spiritual retreat, that Father de Ravignan first exercised his full powers as member of the company of Jesus. M. l'Abbé de Bouclon, in a notice of his life, thus describes the impression made on himself during the retreat given to the novices.

"We saw enter, and take his seat in the Chair of Theology, a meagre looking priest, austere in appearance, with penetrating deep set eyes, and the marks of long watchings about the lids, but with angelical sweetness breathing from his features. He began by saying, that he had not come to deliver a discourse, but to edify himself in our company, and profit of the graces which God had shed on our holy mansion, and to communicate whatever lights he had received from the HOLY SPIRIT for our benefit and spiritual advantage. Consequently, there was less need of preaching than of recollection, silence, and prayer; for God does not communicate himself except to those souls who pray, and who await his pleasure in silence; witness the apostles when awaiting the descent of the PARACLETE. We need a great tranquillity in the soul, a complete subjection of the passions, as God, according to the Scriptures, does not visit our souls when in a state of trouble.

"The pool of Siloé was still at first; and when its waters were troubled, it was to indicate that the Angel had descended into them. As it was the Holy Ghost who was to enlighten us in this retreat, he begged us to offer a holy violence by our prayers, that his words might be endued with power. He promised us nothing but familiar colloquies, and kept his promise too, for he sat in a corner of the pulpit,* from which he never stirred; and never used action when excited, except with one arm.

"His discourses were apparently simple in structure, but flashes of fervor broke forth at every instant. His phraseology, negligent in appearance, exhibited in reality diction of the purest character. The good Religious had deceived us; he was already a finished orator. He engraved in our hearts the most finished maxims of religious perfection. He discovered for us an entirely new world in the interior spiritual life;—in the life hidden in God, as St. Paul says. He preached one of the incomparable weeks of the Exercises of Saint Ignatius. From the second day of the retreat he brought our consciences into complete subjection: the whole seminary was at his feet.

"I went to confession like the rest, but among the last and least fervent. I found the prie-dieu on which I kneeled, literally wet with the tears of those who had preceded me. The charm of his discourses was forgotten in the unction of the relation of the good father with his penitents. 'Oh the happy fault!' he would say: 'you will henceforth be freed from pride.' Such was his sympathy and pity, that I fancied myself for the moment, transported into the arms of the mercy of Jesus Christ. I was about to lift my head, and seriously to ask him if he was not that Saint Ambrose, who wept the sins of his penitents, when themselves showed no compunction. Incredulous souls, who might have resisted his eloquence in the pulpit, could never have resisted his cordial sympathy in the confessional. * * *

He still asserted to us that he feared the gift of eloquence, lest it might damage the action of the HOLY GHOST in our souls. The fruits of a retreat preached by such a man may be guessed. From the silence of the house inhabited by a hundred and fifty young people, noisy enough at other times, you would say it was occupied by shadows.

"On an occasion when the Holy Sacrament was exposed, and he was consequently obliged to stand up, he spoke of the love of Jesus for all men, but particularly for those destined to continue and perpetuate his mission and sacrifice on the earth. The subject enkindled him. I have never heard such beautiful developments on a subject worthy of the meditations of an entire life. The great orator was at length revealed; and we afterwards heard without surprise, the triumphs of his eloquence.

"He quitted us at last, this man of God, from whom we no more wished to be ever separated, than St. Peter wished to descend from Thabor. But he left peace in our souls, divine grace in our hearts, and the most loving cordiality among the brothers. After his departure, the seminary appeared entirely renewed in a spirit of fervor, charity, love of the rule, and of study."

In this wise Father de Ravignan commenced his apostolical career. He went forth with the ardor of those who parted from Olivet, to subjugate the world to the peaceful yoke of the Gospel. He had left the retreat of Estavayer on the lake with an inextinguishable thirst for the salvation of souls; and his first efforts were directed to those young disciples who in time were to be at the head of those appointed to shew the way.

During the year 1835, Father de Ravignan remained at Acheul, and preached during the advent at Amiens, being his first season of public teaching. He was called on to preach during the next Lent at the church of St. Thomas Aquinas in Paris. His former acquaintances, noble magistrates and councillors, who had last seen him, some on the bench, others at a ball, others the admired centre of a salon, fourteen or fifteen years ago, dressed with elegance and refined taste, now recognised him in soutane and rochet, with forehead bald, hair short, countenance pale and meagre, but bearing the unmistakeable impress of the seal of the Divinity.

His presence was demanded at Bourdeaux for Advent in the same year. He had the happiness of joining his mother and others of his family for some days before he made his preparatory retreat at the old chateau of Ravignan, which was now the family seat of his elder brother.

As might be expected, the accession of the citizen-king was attended by a decided indifference to religion ; but still there was a leaven of devotion among the people : they anxiously enquired was there nothing to be done ? and God sent the idea of re-establishing the Conferences at Notre Dame.

“ M. Frayssinous was no longer there. Years and adversity had passed over his head, and added to his glory ; but champions are never wanting to the good fight, and Providence bestows on them the gifts by which they are to succeed. The conferences were opened in the Metropolitan church of Paris by a young priest whose talents bore a lively, sparkling, and original stamp. He spoke, as few have spoken since orators first appeared on the earth. His object was to reconcile the people of his time to the religious idea ; and indeed he possessed every quality calculated to charm the young. Among the enemies of Christianity might then be encountered writers, whose style and imagination were adapted to mislead ; but the young orator proved himself more attractive still than these fantastic and erring seducers. They accused Christianity of hating liberty :—the young orator, formerly editor of L'Avenir, himself animated by a love of liberty, which he could scarcely keep within bounds, recalled to their minds that without the Gospel there never would have been any liberty for the people ; and repeated that if Christianity disappeared from the world, it would sink back into servitude. The Christian, on coming out of Notre Dame, found himself newly armed ; the unbeliever found himself obliged to reflect, and moderate the expression of his contempt. The Abbé Lacordaire, having gone on a visit to Rome, a successor was needed at Notre Dame : the illustrious Mgr. de Quelen nominated the Abbé De Ravignan.

“ Our Religious appeared for the first time in the pulpit of Notre Dame in the Lent of 1837. * * * Every look was fixed on the noble and austere countenance, which presented nothing of the world, but on which appeared, as if engraved, long habitudes of meditation and penitence. Before commencing, the preacher took a few moments of recollection, which infused a deep feeling of respect into the souls of his auditors : then he made the sign of the cross at the full extent of his arm, emblematic of the fullness of his faith ; and his first words, in the lull of a profound silence, had the effect of music in the vast nave. As the preacher advanced in his discourse, the audience became more and more subjected to his strong and calm convictions. They remarked the perfection of his diction and gestures, and no one dared to think it was art : they felt themselves in presence of an apostle. There was in his appearance such authority, and in his words such eloquence, that those present felt themselves as much influenced by what they saw as what they heard. But the word he spoke was truth itself. A great orator had shewn himself without at all resembling his predecessor, and his deeply affected auditors repeated in whispers, 'He is a man of God.' Such was he the first day, and such they found him during the ten years of his holy career at Notre Dame. He retained the auditory of Father Lacordaire, and increased it by individuals from the highest ranks of French society, desirous of bringing order into their mode of life. They crowded to these Sunday conferences as to festivals. The understanding sought light, the heart repose, and the souls who aspired to ascend to God, laid up a provision of courage. The privilege of occupying a little space in the nave was not considered dear though purchased by long hours of waiting. Father Xavier, addressing himself to the nobler part of man, excelled in laying hold on his sense of honor, and when he became a Christian, he entered into possession of the most noble portion of himself."

The conferences lasted from 1837, to 1846 inclusive. M. Poujoulat gives a resumé of the subjects, p. p. 237 to 281 of the volume. As might be expected, they contain the essence and proofs of Catholic doctrine, and the full relations and duties, during this life, of a devout soul to its Creator. Our space would afford but the most meagre outline of matters, the full development of which is worthy of the most attentive perusal. We direct the reader's serious attention to the original, giving a few extracts taken almost at random.

"The man without Christianity will become an idolater, a worshipper of brute force: to say that there never was idolatry, is the same as to wish that it should still exist. Put away from before your eyes these temples, these idols, these names of impure divinities, and all the sombre veils of antiquity; pierce these clouds studded with errors, and what will you find in the heart of the idolater? —the same thing you would find in the individual of this present day —man like unto himself where he is destitute of faith. * * *

"One day a tree was felled in a wood; it was hewn and fashioned. This time it was not to be made into a god;—no, it was for something better. A man laden with griefs, ignominies, outrages, condemned by the cowardice of a prevaricating judge to an ignominious death, was to carry this cross. He took it on his shoulders; spent with fatigue, he dragged it to the top of the hill. There, his garments are torn off him with violence; he is fastened, nailed to the wood; the cross is fixed in earth, it stands upright;—the world is regenerated, changed, instructed for ever:—vain thoughts of men, where are you? * * * Men believe that to subject the world, brilliant armies and powerful geniuses are needed:—No, facts prove the contrary. Livid and bruised flesh, blood gushing forth with violence, a crown of thorns, an infamous and cruel death, a cross of wood:—Lord, behold your arms and the instruments of triumph prepared for the conquest of the universe. And all the stones of this temple were hewn, and chiselled, and set in their places, to do homage to this truth. See the cross at the end of the sanctuary exalted above the altar : it says, ' this temple was built for me.'

" Statesmen have no fear of a church or religion which calls itself Pagan, Arian, Greek, Turkish, or Anglican. Catholics fear only their own church, and all separatists are equally in fear of it. Why so ? Because elsewhere the church and state are one ; i.e., the church is submissive to the state ; and this can never be the situation of the Catholic church. Its origin, its laws, its authority, its faith, forbid the fact. To fear and hate the priest and his mission, is to fear and hate the Gospel : history has well proved it. The Catholic church is the superior power which combats man's inferior propensities, and therefore he loves it not. He begins to love it when he shews a submissive spirit. But to believe, it is needful to be courageous at heart. The Church is a great school of reverence, it is also a great school of courage.

" One of the most useful of the conferences was the explanation of this dogma, Out of the Church there is no salvation. It enlightened the consciences, and disarmed the oppositions and prejudices of many. No one after hearing the exposition, ventured to say, that an error held in good faith would be punished by damnation. They learned ' that a genuine desire of the heart to belong to the TRUE CHURCH, would be sufficient in the eyes of God. HIMSELF alone is judge of the sincerity, the reality of this desire. * * So the Protestant in good faith, who sincerely believes himself in the way of truth, shall be saved, if he has not committed, without amends or repentance, any of these grave offences which exclude from salvation.

" ' An impossibility of distinguishing the church, which produces invincible ignorance, is not in itself a cause of damnation : the church has so defined against Baius, in proscribing that impious doctrine.

" ' That which brings condemnation is, voluntary and culpable error : this is the error which puts you out of the pale of the church, and excludes you from salvation. It is necessary to seek the TRUTH in sincerity. Comprised and defined in this way, the principle has nothing intolerant or cruel in it. We must beware of positively affirming the reprobation of any person in particular, whatever may have been his religion, his country, his era, his conduct even. At the last instant of life, on the threshold of eternity, mysteries of divine justice are doubtlessly wrought in the soul, but they are accompanied by the higher mysteries of mercy and love.' Beautiful and compassionate words ! inspired by a profound feeling of the goodness of God, and the weakness of man.

" ' Must Catholic faith be accused as exclusive ? Exclusive unity is the very character of TRUTH itself : it essentially excludes the FALSE. Religious truth is ONE because God is ONE. Still the Catholic church condemns resistance to KNOWN TRUTH only.'

" Some months before his death, the man of God addressed these lines to a venerated friend, ' I have just revised my Conferences. These poor Conferences are not written : I do not know how to write. After my death it will be judged whether there is anything in them worth publishing.' But these Conferences will, we hope, be published ; and it will then be seen that the study of them will be judged eminently profitable. There will be discovered in them, a sound and well defined theology, solid information, well knit argumentation in the style of Bourdaloue, a turn of phrase lively and concise as the word of command, a certain military fashion of imparting doctrine, modified by the piety and mildness of the tone.

“ Another pencil than ours shall finish the portrait of the orator of Notre Dame. ‘ He has studied in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, science remarkable for its light, but still more remarkable for its heat ; and so, although he knew well enough how to convince, he knew better how to convert. His knowledge, full of unction, blazed only to warm. Flashes of flame issued from his mouth which penetrated to the inner folds of the heart. He knew well that heat penetrates farther than light ; one can only brush and gild the surface, while the other pierces the very entrails, thence to extract desirable fruits and inestimable riches. It is this general warmth which gave such divine efficacy to his saintly lectures. He has restored religion to the heart of society ; but do not suppose that he made use of disguise to render her more agreeable in the eyes of worldlings. He presented her in her natural garb, with her cross, her crown of thorns, her estrangement from the world, and her sufferings.’ These are the words of Bossuet : in painting St. Francis of Sales, he most accurately represented Father Xavier de Ravignan.”

On the 17th February, 1839, he had for listener his former preceptor and guide, Mgr. Frayssinous, now an aged man with white hair, and a venerable countenance, whose benevolent expression never yielded to the rudest trials. Allusions were made by the preacher to the former efforts of the good old bishop, and his own obligations to him. At the end of the discourse all eyes rested on the former conferencier, and a murmur of admiration and pleasure arose from the congregation. It will be recollected that the preacher received the tonsure from his auditor, 11th June, 1822, just seventeen years before.

For four years had Father Xavier held his conferences in Notre Dame, and the result seemed to himself only the conversion of a very small number of souls. He judged that a large proportion of his hearers came to see and be seen ; and that if religious principles were admitted, they were not followed up to their legitimate conclusions. A bold idea took possession of him—he would have a retreat for men during holy week at Saint Eustache. The success was great. Next year the retreat was held at Notre Dame. Being once established there was no falling off, but an increase in numbers and zeal from year to year ; the retreat in fine was the crowning of the conference.

Three or four times a day the good father addressed his flock, and in the intervals was found in the confessionāl of the establishment Rue des Postes, or that of Rue de Sevres, or in a room off Notre Dame. His residence was in Rue de Sevres, and many a time during the few hours allowed for sleep, was he wakened up for the consolation of some untimely, or wayward, or impatient penitent. Scarcely would he have laid down his head to get a few moments' rest when steps would be heard in the corridor leading to his cell, and a new intruder be introduced.* He would be received as cordially as the rest, and having cleared his bosom of its "perilous stuff," and received divine instruction and consolation, he would soon be repacing the corridor to give place to some other restless spirit.

"A day came when the servant of God forgot all fatigue, and in his new found bliss, hardly seemed to touch the ground: it was the day of Paschal communion for the men. Who does not recall the seraphic radiance of his countenance, when on Easter morning he offered the holy sacrifice, and then, in concert with the Archbishop of Paris, distributed the BREAD OF ANGELS to these thousands of Christians! Those were the days of great consolation—his happiest days in fact. For two centuries France had not afforded such sights. There men of all ranks and all ages advanced in crowds to the altar, with arms crossed and eyes cast down, in an attitude of recollection, of dignity, and of strength, to receive under the veiled appearance of bread, the Incarnate God, who in the preceding century was openly outraged at the same place. It was a memorable event, and for sixteen years it has been annually renewed with increased blessings. A nation cannot be near its fall, when it can present to the world such cohorts armed for the good fight; when it can produce such an instrument for the salvation of souls as Xavier de Ravignan."

During the ten years of the conferences, Father Xavier had his spare time sufficiently taken up by retreats, Advent lectures, charity sermons, &c. in the various cities of France. One sermon for the construction of a church in Switzerland produced 10,000 francs. Along with the whole church in France, he mourned the loss of Mgr. Quelen, Archbishop of Paris, who passed to his rest, 31st December, 1839.

* One of the Protestant traditions (an expression borrowed from the Rambler) is the state of slavish subjection in which the Catholic laity is kept by their clergy. We wish that a convincing Protestant would accompany us some week morning to the church of * * * He would then see the benevolent Father P. obliged to make three long weary rounds of the sanctuary rails to administer the Holy Communion to about sixteen or twenty people, when a quarter of one circuit would have been more than sufficient, if it pleased those slaves to consider his convenience for a moment. This, and various other modes of "ingeniously tormenting" their spiritual fathers by unthinking and selfish Catholics, have decidedly convinced us that, compared with a really devoted Priest, the worst used of Mrs. Stowe's negroes may be considered a free, enlightened, and inquisitive Citizen of Boston.

It was in 1840 that the circumstance occurred of himself and his community in the Rue des Postes being obliged to go without a dinner, while writers after M. Guizot's heart were proclaiming the endless riches possessed by the body.

In 1841 he lost a younger brother; the same year he was invited to Rome. He preached during the advent at the church of Saint Louis of France, and afterwards held a retreat at the church of Caravita. The Society of Saint Vincent de Paul was established the same year at Rome, and a few days after the retreat at Caravita, occurred the miraculous conversion of M. Ratisbon the Jew. The reception of Father de Ravignan by Pope Gregory XVI., was what might be expected; his pontifical blessing was given to the work of the conferences.

During the lent of 1843 he received news of his mother being dangerously ill. The retreat and confessions kept him away from her death bed:—This was part of his last letter to her.

“‘ I am in deep affliction for being prevented by the duties imposed on me by God himself from joining my brother and sister in their tenderness and cares for you. The Lord has sent you new and sharp sufferings: Oh, how I wish for power to bring solace for them! At least I can offer each day, at the sacred altar, the holy sacrifice of the Mass for my good and tender mother. The blood of our Lord Jesus will intercede for you better than I can. It will obtain for you the graces of resignation, strength, and confidence, which are so necessary for us all. Ah, yes! confidence in the boundless goodness of God. Receive my most tender and profound respects.’ This letter was written in large characters, so that the poor dying mother might be able to trace out the lines written by her son. It was signed Gustave, to give her still greater pleasure. The first moment duty permitted, he hastened to Bourdeaux, hoping still to see his mother alive. He found but her cold remains, and could only pray by her coffin. He followed to the tomb, her who had so lovingly watched his cradle, and whose life, dashed with bitterness, had been one long act of maternal devotedness.”

When the monopoly of the university in public instruction began to be assailed, they made (as our author remarks) powder out of Jesuitism, and scattered it on the charter, to prevent its rights being read out. A shower of pamphlets fell round the order, and in 1843, the evil passions of its enemies had infected the chamber of deputies. During the storm an eminent lawyer, M. de Vatimesnil, gave this as his opinion:

"The law has only to ascertain if men living in a common dwelling, and occupied about religious objects, contravene the article 291 of the penal code. When it is proved that there is no infraction of this particular article, the law takes no cognizance of their belief or of their rules. The members of religious associations do not form a legal corporation; they are only individuals living together, united by a purely civil contract or quasi contract, and subject to a common rule. No doubt but religion looks on the matter in another light, but human law can only consider it from this point of view."

Such was the veneration among all classes for Father de Ravignan, and such the good, it was considered, he could accomplish, that a friend thus addressed him—"Write something to explain what a Jesuit is, and say that you are a Jesuit yourself." The working out of this idea required a certain intrepidity, the very quality he possessed in perfection; and therefore it offered a greater charm for him. He published The Existence and the Institute of the Jesuits, and in a pamphlet shape, the letter of M. de Vatimesnil, with a brief on the legal status of unauthorised religious institutions in France; both productions bore his name on title-page.

From the introduction we quote a few passages.

"Prudence has its laws, its limits. In the lives of men there are circumstances, where precise explanations become a duty to be strictly fulfilled. * * * I am a Jesuit, that is, a member of the company of Jesus. This declaration I owe to myself, to my ministry, to my brothers in the priesthood, to the youth intrusted to us, to the faithful who honor us with their confidence; I owe it to the Church of God.

* * * Before I became Priest and Jesuit, I was a man of my time—a Frenchman, I am so still. In becoming a Religious, I did not intend to abdicate my country, nor to violate her laws, nor renounce the rights or duties of a citizen. * * * Has the charter proclaimed liberty of conscience—yes or no? Is evangelical perfection a right of conscience—yes or no? Well, the Religious state is Evangelical perfection in practice. I ask, by what right then do you prevent me from being a French Benedictine, Dominican, or Jesuit? I do not demand public and recognised existence, nor the smallest portion of the revenue of the state; I simply ask to breathe the free air of my country; I claim the privilege of making vows, and of observing in community with my brothers, rules approved by the Catholic Church. And in what respect, may I ask, does my liberty interfere with yours, or interfere with any one's? * * * What words coming from our mouths, have compromised public tranquillity or respect due to the laws? And yet from more than two hundred pulpits have our words gone forth in the most populous cities, in the most humble hamlets. If the sun shines for all the world, must justice and common sense extinguish their lights when we are in question?"

does it appear so sad, that they should have to be written at all, and why does the accused appear so immeasurably superior to his accuser? It is because the language we have just heard, is that of innocence in the face of injustice. Innocence and truth have the same destiny on the earth—one meets injustice, the other calumny. Sisters from the beginning of the world, they have ever found fallen man their enemy, but neither has ever been totally crushed. Struck down to-day, they rise to-morrow, in twenty years, in a hundred years. What matters the number more or less? And this is the secret of the indestructible duration of the Society of Jesus.”

The Existence and Institute of the Jesuits consists of four chapters. The first includes a précis of the Spiritual Exercises with a sketch of the “four weeks” employed in recollection, and in purifying and elevating the soul. The second is taken up with the constitutions of the Society, which Richelieu called the master-piece of genius. It treats of the noviciate, the studies, the third year of trial, the different ministries discharged by the order, the government of the society, and the vow of obedience. “A divine light is shed on those things never mentioned by the irreligious and prejudiced except as gloomy mysteries. It is as if the Society had opened all its doors and gates, that the world might inspect its spirit and discipline at its entire convenience.” In this second chapter is also given the daily employment of a day by a Religious of the order; and our author hints that many among the detractors of the Society would probably feel a little embarrassment about publishing a true journal of an ordinary day in their own lives.

The third chapter is entitled Doctrines of the Society of Jesus. Father de Ravignan shews in this chapter that the Society entertains no peculiar opinions, but follows those universally received, particularly those enlarged on by St. Thomas; and that in open questions, there is thorough liberty to individuals to adopt either side without blame.

“The Jesuits have no peculiar doctrines; but every religious body has a spirit peculiar to itself; and the company of Jesus forms no exception. Its proper spirit is, zeal for the salvation of souls, defence of truth, and the propagation of the holy reign of the Gospel. In theology and philosophy it has a decided tendency to guard the rights of rational liberty and of reason; and therefore it has ever battled against the doctrines of Luther, of Calvin, and of Jansenius. • • • The glory and very life of the Church is its Apostolicity: the Jesuits are essentially Missionaries. Their first mission arrested Protestantism in Europe; and as Fenelon said in one of his finest sermons, ‘the company aided by the Portuguese, opened for the church at its birth, a new road to the Indies.’”

In the enumeration of the successful results of the missions of St. Francis Xavier and others of the body, occur the words spoken to Philip V. by the bishop of Buenos Ayres: "Sire, among these numerous tribes composed of Indians naturally prone to every kind of vice, there prevails such innocence, that to the best of my belief, no mortal sin is committed by any one."

The fourth chapter is dedicated to the subject of missions, and is written with great freedom, brilliancy, and convincing force; and at the conclusion, an appeal is made to the good feeling, common sense, and common justice of his countrymen.

The chamber of deputies were as insensible to the influence of the work, which, by the way, ran through several editions in a few months, as the ears of Esop's ass to the melody of the nightingale, or as our own Commons are to mere logical argument, when they have decided to vote for or against ministers. In May, 1845, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of M. Berryer for the cause of good faith and mere justice, the majority confided to the government the care of seeing the laws executed.

The unfortunate Executive did not well know how to set about the ungracious task of dispersing the dreaded though unresisting community.

"The cause of the Jesuits had assumed a name and a countenance—it was entitled 'Father Xavier de Ravignan.' The Government stood in his presence, and not before nameless phantoms. The prime-minister said to him: 'A great storm is blowing—I will meet it—I have spoken to the King—to the council—we cannot be guilty of such gross injustice—no measure has as yet been resolved on; we will let the flood go by.' . . . The court opened a negotiation with Rome. . . . The Pope felt it his duty not to submit to the demands of the government; and Father de Ravignan thus summed up the state of matters 12th July, 1845—'The Holy See has made no concession; the Father General believes it our duty to submit; and we will probably be obliged to disperse, and live here and there in little groups of threes and fours.'

"And this was the great victory achieved:—a community of poor priests instead of living together under the same roof, were obliged to separate and seek asylums, where two or three might live together unmolested. Humanity might fearlessly resume its march of glory, and the great of the earth enjoy untroubled sleep."

In February, 1845, he had to sympathise with his brother Hippolyte for the loss of his beloved wife. After the Lent of 1846 he found his constitution much shaken, but he continued to discharge his missionary labours, visiting Toulouse, Avignon, Metz, Nancy, Lyons, Bourdeaux, and other cities.

We find him at the Eaux Bonnes in 1847, when he fancied he was recovering some of his old vigor. From his retreat at Vals, in August of the same year, he wrote a letter to a friend, from which we select a few extracts worthy of the serious consideration of the heads of families.

God has assigned to Christian fathers and mothers, the important mission of preparing and assuring, as far as in them lies, the future welfare of their children. The essential point is, that these children should, before God, be strongly convinced of the necessity and duty of occupation and labor.. My soul is sad, my heart afflicted, when I reflect that at this present day, and under the circumstances of the times, when every man, every Christian is called by God to fight for the good and the true, young persons do not arm themselves with zeal and courage to exercise a useful influence some day, and to exhibit in a sickly state of society, qualities of probity, devotedness, zeal, honor, faith. Ah! I beg of you to animate and urge on your sons in this good career."

In 1845, M. de Montalembert offered hospitality to Father Ravignan and his companions, when they were deprived of the right of living in community in the name of the laws of the realm. The invitation was not accepted, but the offer was gratefully remembered in connexion with the other struggles of that intrepid combatant of the Church.

" 'Let me return you,' wrote Father de Ravignan on the 10th of July 1846, 'the most hearty and enduring thanks in the names of the objects and persons most dear to me. May God sustain, preserve, and recompense you. Beautiful and rich will be the crown reserved for you in heaven.' When the vigorous and eloquent pamphlet on the Duty of Catholics appeared, no one did such ample justice to the author as Father de Ravignan. These devoted and generous pages produced in him the most profound emotion. He wrote to the Count on the 22nd of July, 1845: 'Rising from prayer, and sitting at my writing table, it seemed to me while reading your lines as if I was praying still. I return thanks to our all good and all powerful Lord for having raised up such a great soul for the defence of the liberty of the Church.' M. l'Abbé Dupanloup, afterwards consecrated Bishop of Orleans, being in Rome a little after the election of the present Pope, heard from the lips of Pius IX. the most cordial testimonies to the services of M. de Montalembert. Father de Ravignan deeply enjoyed this act of just gratitude rendered from so high a quarter to his worthy and religious friends."

A meeting of the Society being held in Rome in the winter of 1847, he journeyed thither at the suggestion of M. de Montalembert, backed by the advice of his medical attendants. He felt the brewing of the coming storm, and wrote in very low spirits to the Count on the state of society in the city.—The Company of Jesus being called on for a profession of political faith, he answered :

“ Our Institute recognises acts of political faith no more than the Gospel or the Church recognises or teaches them. We are merely Christ’s apostles for all places, for all nations, and in presence of all forms of Government. We keep silence, we pray, we wait. This is our entire policy, and God forbids us to adopt any other.”

Our good father was received with marked kindness by the saintly Pius. He returned to Paris on the outburst of February, 1848, that being the post appointed him by order of the Father General. For some of his letters touching the disturbances in June and the death of the Archbishop of Paris, we refer to the original.

Our author taking up the subject of the liberty of Religious education at this point, gives a sketch of the relations of the Church and State in France on this subject, before the revolution, when neither the university nor the bishops had the exclusive monopoly of public instruction. When Buonaparte set about rebuilding society out of the ruins left by the revolution, he considered it essential that national education should be based on the precepts of the Catholic religion, and therefore selected the chief directors from among the clergy. No essential change occurred during the years of the Restoration ; but from 1830 to 1837 there was nothing done of a decisive character in favor either of the University or the Clergy. Thenceforward the struggle went on, the Abbé Dupanloup vigorously assailing the University, and maintaining the right of the Clergy to be allowed a share in the important concern of the education of youth. From the Religious Pacification published by him in 1845, we extract a passage in which he makes an unjust law speak in the exact spirit of its intention.

“ In the old Pagan times the judges thus addressed their victims : ‘ Seeing that you are Christians, you are no longer Roman Citizens ;’ our present rulers say to us, ‘ You are Regular clergy, consequently you cease to be French citizens. * * * If you are more than a mere Christian, than an ordinary Priest, if you are in fact, a Religious, begone ! We banish you from your own proper house. We have no objection that you be a Christian, aye, even a Priest, but to a certain degree of perfection only. Whoever passes that bound, ceases to be considered a citizen by us. As you despise the things of this earth in your aspirations after a heavenly country, it is but right that you should have no enjoyment in this world, except under all the conditions and restrictions we choose to impose. We give you full liberty to breathe the common air, to practise meditation at your leisure, as long as the law takes no offence. In a word, your country must be considered in the light of a way-side inn, not a family abode. A home, citizens' rights, rights of nature, native country, none of these things are for Perfect Christians. They may seek them elsewhere if it please them."

Catholic exertions for the liberty of religious education required a central point of action. Father de Ravignan turned his earnest attention to the matter, and a committee was organized in 1844. A great deal of good was done by the publication of Episcopal charges, and other useful writings; and additional service was rendered to religious liberty by M. Le Baron Cauchy, who in a work on the religious orders, gathered into the compass of a few pages, all the claims possessed by the Jesuits to the respect and gratitude of the Christian world. But strange as it may appear, it was not till after the proclamation of a republic in 1848, that the good object was attained.

The Abbé Dupanloup was associated in the prosecution of the great work, with no less a name than M. Thiers. Our biographer gives all due praise to the diligence and devotedness of this remarkable man in the new phase of his public career; but the reader feels that he is surprised at the zeal of one whose antecedents were such as the world knows well enough. One expression of the Abbe's during the discussion is worth recording.

"With the pretended right of the State to fashion childhood and youth to its own image, he was well content, as long as it called itself by the name of St. Louis, but what would be the result, if the name of the State for the time being, happened to be Sardanapalus or Proudhon?" Father de Ravignan had said early Mass for his friend, on the day when this pious and valiant defender of Religious liberty, weighed down by private sorrow at the time, was to speak on such a momentous subject. 'God has assisted me,' said he with humility, on passing out of the assembly."

On the 15th of March 1850, the liberty of religious instruction was established, after a ten years incessant struggle.

The most fervent piety and most strenuous and unflagging exertions for the promotion of God's kingdom on earth, could not exempt Father de Ravignan from family sorrows and trials. His sister lost her husband Count Excelmans by a violent death, and was bereaved of her daughter soon after. His brother followed the remains of a beloved wife and daughter to the tomb within a short space of time. He gave all the consolation that could be drawn from religious sources, to the survivors, but his own tender disposition was deeply affected by the losses and the affliction of the survivors.

In the Lent of 1850 he appeared again at Notre Dame, not to lead the conferences, for he was now unable to preach for any length, but to hold a retreat. According as he felt his voice strengthening, he lent himself to the cause of every charitable work that solicited his co-operation. He visited London during the great exhibition of 1851, at the invitation of Cardinal Wiseman.

“Bossuet writing to Lord Perth, High Chancellor of Scotland, who was converted to the Catholic faith after reading the Exposition, said, ‘You must now be aware, after reading through my letters, of the tender love which I feel for England and Scotland, on account of all the saints who have flourished in these realms, and of the faith which has produced such excellent fruits. A hundred and a hundred times I have longed for the opportunity of laboring for the reconciliation of that great island, for which my earnest prayers shall never cease to ascend to Heaven.’”

Our unworldly father looked on the matchless collection of the Crystal Palace, only as a gorgeous instance of the worship of matter ; but said he in a letter to a friend :

“‘There is something better in this country : it is a grave and serious movement towards the Catholic Faith. It is not general, indeed, but it is very evident and marked among thinking people. . . . I believe that one element of the power of this country, is the share taken by young men of birth in public affairs. All the traditions of the past are still here in full vigour. They respect authority, the law, the constitution. The landed aristocracy is rich and powerful. Meanwhile they speak of the progress and influence of the middle class.’ He gave conferences during the months of May and June, and the French chapel being too small, they were removed to a concert room. Himself was a living refutation of so many errors and calumnies heaped on the church. The Englishman given up to worldly enjoyments, and entertaining a very strange idea of our priests, was astonished by the involuntary respect he was obliged to feel in presence of the apostle. A certain atmosphere of sanctity in which he was enveloped, did more than the most invincible argument, or the most powerful genius.”

In the early part of 1852, he was believed to be at the point of death ; and the doors of the house in the Rue de Sevres was constantly beset by people of every condition. The prayers of such an earnest multitude prevailed with God ; and in May we find him convalescent at Versailles, with strict injunctions from his medical adviser, Dr. Cruveilhier, to relax and take rest. Like every fervent soldier of Christ he naturally regretted the loss of the forces necessary to carry on the holy war, but devout submission still kept him reconciled to God's good appointments. On the 9th of September, the first festival held in honor of blessed Peter Clauer, he wrote a long letter to his old attached friend, Mgr. Dupanloup, lamenting his inability to be present at the happy solemnity.

In June, 1853, he attended the meeting of the Society in Rome for the election of a successor to Father Roothan, lately deceased. Some votes were given for himself, but Father Beekx was elected. The quasi-liberal journalists of Turin could not let such an opportunity pass without spreading mis-statements and lies respecting the election ; we extract in preference, some lines from Father de Ravignan to Count Montalembert, dated 1st August, 1853.

" There was neither a French party, an Italian party, nor a Belgian party ; not a shade of division nor of ill-feeling. We endeavoured to sound the dispositions of those judged worthy to fill the office of Father general. Prayer and peace have preceded every move, and have brought about the happy result. Our choice was decided a month ago, and we are now labouring for the perfection of the rule, and for the accommodation of ourselves to the exigencies of the times, and for the consolidation and increase of the good we hope yet to do. Aid us to thank Heaven for the concord that reigns amongst us, and for the entire liberty we enjoy in settling every matter according to our constitutions. The sovereign Pontiff has been much pleased with the election of Father Beekx. He has spoken to me at large on the state of the Church in France. He can well appreciate all the good that has been done ; he mentioned the Bishop of Orleans in a manner most gratifying to my feelings."

The father expresses most feelingly in the suite of this letter, the deep gratitude felt by the father of the Society and all its members to the Count, the strenuous defender of their rights, and of the general liberties of the church.

It must have afforded Father de Ravignan great consolation (let not this be mistaken for gratified spiritual pride or vanity.) to have been the instrument chosen by God in effecting so many tardy conversions. A young woman once presented herself at the parlor of the house Rue de Sevres, and though the father was occupied, and several obstacles came in the way, she persisted, saw him, acknowledged to not having ever received Baptism about which she had heard him preach, persevered in her good purpose, and became a fervent Christian.

An old actress sent for Father Ravignan in her last illness, acknowledged that she knew nothing of the nature of religion, but that she had heard him once preach without paying much attention, that during her present pains she was strongly reminded of him, and was urged by some interior influence to send for him, that she supposed it was what the Christians call grace, and that she wished to make her confession. She did become a true penitent indeed, endured all her tortures patiently, and even desired their continuance by way of penance. She expired after severe sufferings, with a heavenly smile on her face; her pious decease was a source of true pleasure to her father confessor.

He devoted much of his later years to holding retreats in the house of the Sacred Heart, Rue de Varennes, as the failure of his voice prevented him from holding conferences. The ladies of the Fauborg St. Germain were obliged to keep a sharp look out for tickets as the chapel was not large. In 1851, being disagreeably affected by perceiving a growing spirit of negligence prevailing in the society of the day, he held forth to his high bred audience in a style the reverse of complimentary.

“He spoke to these ladies of the employment of their time, of their toilettes, of their expenses, of the manner of their educating their daughters, of the reading of frivolous or evil books, visits where nothings succeed to nothings in the happy cases of the absence of back-biting. So pass these days which should be filled with useful employment. A severe account of them will be exacted, for time is given us to obtain merit before God. And the toilettes! with what sadness of heart did the man of God represent their luxury and their style of dress at evening parties! With what delicacy of expression he knew how to speak disagreeable things! ‘Ladies, how are you attired? Shall I tell you? You are attired just like—Truth herself.’ He also denounced those dances which might have suited Pagan times, but were unfit for Christian people.

‘Do you suppose, ladies, when your daughters’ bouquets are found faded at the end of these dances, that the lilies of their souls are not equally faded?’ The holy man did not spare those mothers, little watchful over the faith and innocence of their daughters, and many a queenly brow was bent to the earth. Passing to other subjects he pointed out the abyss opened under the feet of people by lavish expense. He produced a startling effect in their souls by the mode in which he proposed the simple question, ‘Ladies, do you pay your debts?’ He laid his hand on hidden but smarting sores, and lifted veils which concealed the causes of shame and ruin. . . . In consequence of the good impressions made, there began to appear in the evening reunions, the kerchiefs which soon got the name of the Ravignans. About two hundred years before, modesty warned and corrected, had imagined the Bourdaloües." *

Our author next gives an outline of the course of instructions imparted during these retreats at the Maison du Sacré Cœur, to which we direct the careful attention of the devout in or outside the cloister. It is followed by sundry letters of comfort, encouragement, and direction to some individuals who had particular claims to his attention. To those dispirited souls who seemed to have no worldly comfort in their future prospects, he pointed out the long series of suffering and endurance borne by our Crucified Redeemer, and the mere reasonableness of our being prepared to bear his cross during this short scene of trial, that we may then enter into the participation of his glory.

Father Roothan shortly before his death, had enjoined it as a duty on Father de Ravignan to write a history of the Pontificates of Clement XIII. and Clement XIV. We will touch slightly upon the subject of the work, regretting our all too narrow space for the treating of this and other deeply interesting subjects.

In 1761, Voltaire writing to Helvetius made use of the well known horrible expression springing out of his hatred to the Jesuits for being the foremost champions of Christianity.

"Infidel Philosophy, in order to destroy the Christian religion, had enrolled Jansenism in its ranks, on account of its fixed determination to destroy the Society of Jesus. The Jansenists, occupied with their own proper quarrel with the Jesuits, little thought of the disturbance they would cause in the moral order by extinguishing them ; but the Philosophers were fully aware of the vacancy that would spread round the banner of Catholicism, when that wished for consummation would take place. St. Alphonsus de Liguori called the Institute of St. Ignatius, the bulwark of the Church of God, and Voltaire and his school were of the same opinion. Twenty thousand Jesuits scattered through the world as instructors of youth, directors of souls, preachers, writers, apostles of civilization, and martyrs at need, bathed the earth with their sweat and blood. . . . The order never required reformation. Lord Bacon applied to the members the words of an Ancient, 'being such as you are, would to God that you were ours!'"

* Oh for a month of Father de Ravignan once more ! at Notre Dame, St. George's, Southwark, or St. Francis Xavier's, Dublin, to moderate the dimensions of hoops, or trundle them into the Liffey or the Red Sea.

The most terrible catastrophes of history arise from the blunders of minds without faith, and the depravation of morals. For forty years before the Revolution the Kings of the South of Europe lent their hands to their own destruction. By the sides of these weak or wicked kings, were found ministers unable to prevent the evil or prompt to work it. Choiseul in France, Pombal in Portugal, Wall and D'Aranda in Spain, and Tanucci in Naples, went before the breeze of innovation, and rejoiced in the work of iniquity.

"Pombal, one of the most odious creatures ever known, planned the destruction of Catholicity in Portugal, provided himself with monstrous accusations against the Jesuits, struck them without proofs, without trial, without any avowable motives, and crowned his tyrannical measures by the cruelty of their execution. Mme. de Pompadour, finding them intractable with respect to her own weaknesses, demanded their expulsion from France. Choiseul, the minister, was only too happy to second her hatred in denouncing them to the Parliament. Charles III. of Spain was devout, but he was influenced by an atrocious calumny, by which the honor of his mother and his own legitimacy were compromised, and he signed an order for their banishment. Six thousand priests, with nothing but their breviaries and a change of clothes, were hurried on board with barbarous precipitation. Naples, Parma, and Malta, rivalled Spain in the evil work. Pope Clement XIII. whose reign of ten and a-half years was one scene of struggle and protest, wrote to Joseph I. of Portugal in the words of Scripture—'Have pity, my son, on the gray hairs of your father, and do not afflict him in the last days of his life.' At the approach of the storm, he exhorted Louis XV. to be firm in defence of the interests of Religion, and to the Bishops, to co-operate with him."

All except three did their duty. When the parliament issued its decree in 1762 the Pope in consistory, declared the decree of parliament null and void. The modest king advised the Head of the Church to be silent on the merits of the order after the impudent proceedings of the parliament in 1764; the Bull, Apostolicum, was condemned and prohibited, but the Bishops of France gave it their unanimous adhesion, and addressed vigorous reclamations to the court in favor of the proscribed company.

Clement XIII. at bay before the Courts of France, Spain, and Naples, declared to the Ambassador of Spain that like some of his predecessors, he preferred exile to the betrayal of the cause of Religion and the Church. He would not wait for a reply, but ordered the doors to be opened in order to end the conference. The occupation of Avignon, of Beneventum, and of Ponte Corvo, did not turn him from his resolve. He shewed this heroic determination though assailed from without by those who ought to have shewn themselves his affectionate and dutiful children, and oppressed with the infirmities of age. He was released by death from his sufferings, and his hapless successor, Clement XIV. was required, as the dreaded sons of St. Ignatius were now expelled from four kingdoms, that he should banish them from the world entire——extinguish them altogether. For four years he temporised; he lived from day to day hearing nothing but injunctions and threats; and after every sleepless night, he commenced another day of misery and anguish. At last the poor Pope, as the pious witnesses of his torments called him, signed for the SAKE OF PEACE, the Brief of Abolition, 21st July, 1773, and on the 22nd September, 1774, the anguish of his soul brought him to the tomb. In the process of the Canonization of St Alphonsus de Liguori it was proved on unquestionable evidence, that the venerable servant of God living at Arienzo, a little town of his diocese, was found by his domestics in a species of trance which endured for a part of two days, 21st and 22nd September, 1774, and that on his awaking from it, he announced the death of the Pope whose last moments he had been allowed in spirit to sustain.

The literary and religious world are aware of the existence of Father Theiner's History of these transactions, written in an unfriendly spirit to the Society of Jesus. Father de Ravignan was enjoined by the General, as already mentioned, to go over the same ground, with the object of making a better apology for the Pontiff who had suppressed the Company. Aided by the researches of Father Montezon, he laboured from February, 1853, to July 1854, when the work, under the title of "Clement XIII. and Clement XIV.," appeared in one volume. A supplementary volume by way of appendix was afterwards issued. He wants nothing to be believed on his own word: he gives transcripts from original documents to prove the heroic resistance made by Clement XIII, and the harassing, goading, and threatening, that at last forced his successor to sign for the Peace of Christendom, the death warrant of the supporters of the Faith. The Historian had to deal between the love for his order, and the reverence due to the Head of the Church; but he seemed more anxious, as far as truth allowed, to apologize for the signing of the cruel mandate under the pressure of necessity, than to excite sympathy for, or justify his own brotherhood.

"What a mass of mighty works perished in Europe, in America, and in Asia, on the suppression of the Jesuits, and what a spectacle was presented by that silent obedience to the Pontifical Brief!

Works, the most important and precious, sunk in silence, and not a murmur escaped from the heap of ruins. No one in our days can overlook the breach made in the defences of religion and society : the Jesuits fell, but their downfall crushed the world."

The number of converts distinguished by their piety, learning or birth, won over to the Catholic Faith, and many of them through conferences held with himself, consoled the Father in a great degree for his later inability to preach, or endure the rough life of an active missionary. His biographer devotes a chapter to the Oxford movement, and to the visits of Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Allies, and others, to the cell of the zealous missionary. The first step generally taken by devout Anglicans uneasy about their spiritual state, was to go over to Paris, and visit the Churches and Hospitals, where a zealous young guide (M Auguste Cochin) generally secured them, and conducted them either to Sister Rosalie or Father De Ravignan. He read but could not speak English, and many of his visitors were in the same predicament as regarded French ; but their hearts were possessed by a devout spirit, and they simply and earnestly sought the true path of life in which they might walk with safety. There was a power of attractive piety about their spiritual counsellor, by which, under God, their understandings were enlightened, and their hearts filled with holy desire for that full communication with CHRIST, his Blessed Mother and his Saints, which can be found alone in Catholic Communion. Rev. Wm. Allies gives an account of his visits to Father Ravignan in his delightful and interesting Journal of a visit to France and Italy : to this work we have great pleasure in referring our readers. These conversions were very seldom brought about by discussion. His hearers were earnestly desirous of truth ; he affirmed such or such doctrines ; their hearts were moved by grace, and they unhesitatingly welcomed the guidance of that Church, within which confidence reposes, and the troubles of religious doubt and disquiet are unknown.

In the Lent of 1855, Father de Ravignan preached in the Chapel of the Tuilleries before the great of the earth, and was not afraid to speak of the necessity and difficulty of self-government, of sin, and of hell. To suppress any self-glorification, as we may suppose, that might arise from having held forth before the High Powers, he next preached a retreat to poor old men of one of the houses of the Petites-Sœurs des Pauvres. 'I am not able now to do much,' said he to the Lady Superior ; 'do me the favor of confiding this little work to me.' His identity was kept a secret to his audience, who little suspected they were listening to the great orator of Notre Dame.

Father de Ravignan had received from Heaven, along with the power of turning the hearts of his hearers to God, the gifts of being well qualified to direct their steps in the way of Christian perfection, for he was well acquainted with the spiritual life and its sacred depths. This habitude of guiding souls, had given him wonderful light for distinguishing true vocations. He attached himself with a paternal tenderness to those young spirits, who on considering the things of the earth, had found them unworthy of their attachment, and had set forward on their road to Heaven through the quiet paths of prayer and the cloister. He took particular interest in those, who had renounced rank, brilliant prospects, or the enjoyments attending wealth, youth, and beauty. We insert extracts from his letters to a young Carmelite, who had renounced high station, and its accompanying seductions, for the close gratings of the daughters of St. Theresa. These letters date from the 2nd November, 1856.

" Oh! how I long to revisit our dear Carmel of the Rue de Messine! There it pleased God to send me true consolation. Courage, my child, for self-conquest, prayer, then death! May we tend with one accord to this perfection, which is the only way traced for us by the Divine hand. You commence your religious life nearly at the same time of year, in which thirty-four years ago, on All Souls' day, without a word to any one but the venerable priest my director, I went alone at foot, to knock at the door of our noviciate of Montrouge. I was then twenty-seven years old, and now I have arrived at old age. I had lived too eagerly the life of the world: I brought away deep wounds which left sharp pains behind them. And now, poor laborer of the eleventh hour, faithless disciple of God who had long since called me, I felt myself thenceforward drawn to the interior life, the principle of such unspeakable happiness. And after the promises of these early days, what have I done? However, God be blessed that I have still found myself drawn to prayer, to recollection. I have always found in them, remedies for my misery, and living grace for my efficient help. You, my child, will do better than your father. You will courageously embrace this life of immolation and prayer. In the perfect renunciation of yourself, and in an inviolable fidelity to prayer, you will meet with strength and peace. How happy will I be to behold the fruits. Advance then to the cross of your master like MARY, your mother and your queen. . . Aspire, as you can and ought—aspire, I say, to that life of prayer which your blessed mother, St. Theresa, has bequeathed to her daughters, as their peculiar inheritance. Let no bitternesses, distractions, obscurities, or any temptations whatever, stop your progress. God has appointed your place in the way to the garden of delights, where you will indeed have to drink his chalice and bear his cross, but still with unspeakable comfort. Doubtlessly our lot is to die and immolate ourselves—to die to ourselves and to everything which holds us to the earth, in order to enjoy life in a higher sphere.

“This is the proper day to congratulate you on the fruits of your retreat, and the holy resolutions with which our Lord has inspired you. Bless him with your whole heart for the attraction you feel towards the Divine Infancy. Nothing can be better. You will there comprehend the simplicity as well as the entire generosity of the immolation. . . . Holy prayer will bring you through the crucible of Divine Love. All is well when we wish to die, in order to live only by grace, for the glory of God and the salvation of souls.

“Saint John of the Cross, the admirable disciple of your admirable mother, has marked out the way. It is encumbered with obstacles, the struggle will be long; but what joys are found in the very pains, when God has seized on the heart to attach it inviolably to himself! Your heart, dear child, is wholly given up to your Divine Master: May he be ever blessed!

“Prayer, my daughter, is the life of Carmel: it is a world without limit, it is Heaven upon earth. In spite of repugnances, spiritual droughts, and continual distraction, the heart devoted with constancy to the holy exercise of prayer, finds therein a peace, a comfort surpassing all sensible pleasure. It is the intimate friendly relation with God, with a father always tender, notwithstanding his apparent rigor, and the rough trials he sends. Embrace prayer, courageously persevere, and your soul shall be strengthened, elevated, blessed. Can anything be better than to think and to live for God alone, and to love him without interruption? Ah! this way is rough, beset with briars and thorns: we are sometimes torn, sometimes thrown down, but with courage we rise and proceed. The life of Carmel, life of a victim immolated for the glory of God and the salvation of souls, is an arduous course, at the end of which are beautiful crowns, prizes for the victors: we must run and patiently struggle to obtain them.

“It is necessary to fight valiantly in order to live this life of devoted and vigilant love, which your mother St. Theresa obtained as a grant for herself and her daughters. The hour of your profession approaches. Oh! prepare the victim by the desires of your heart ever united to the heart of your loving master.”

His last apostolical labors were devoted to a retreat given to the Carmelites of the Rue de Messine. It commenced 12th November, 1857, at 4 o'clock in the evening, and ended 20th of the same month. He came on foot, notwithstanding the season and the distance from the house Rue de Sevres; and discoursed four times in the day, seated in a straw chair in the parlor, and with his face turned towards the veiled nuns, who listened from behind the grilles. He took a slight repast at 12 o'clock, and returned home on foot at 6 in the evening. It is a happy circumstance that the substance of the discourses has been preserved: an outline is given p. p. 479. 502.

Early in December he fell ill.* He was able to celebrate Mass on the festival of the Immaculate Conception; but it was his last on earth.

They brought him the Holy Communion at 5 o'clock every morning; and Mass was celebrated in his chamber by permission of the Archbishop. His left lung only was now remaining, and that much affected since 1852; and in consequence he suffered much in his breathing. He sometimes desired death, at others thought of convalescence, and the labors it would refit him for; but dreaded a recovery unattended with powers to be useful to his fellow mortals. Till the 10th of February, 1858, he was able to rise and sit for a few hours in an easy chair near the fire. It would require more space than we can afford, to mention the numerous relics that were sent from Germany, Italy, and England, which, though convinced of his approaching death, he piously wore about his person; the Novenas that were offered up for his recovery; the crosses, &c. that were sent to receive his benediction. His illness caused a profound sensation through every part of Christendom, where devotion still retained any influence.

From the 21st, of February an inflammation of the bowels was added to his other sufferings. On the 25th, the forerunners of death were evident—the restless and cold hands, feeble, short, and abrupt breathing, and the cold perspiration streaming down the countenance. For the circumstantial diary of the last hours of his well spent life, and his heavenly communications with his devoted brothers in the ministry, who read for him, prayed with him, and rendered all the solace in their power to his bodily sufferings, we refer to the work. They are more suited to the pages of a book on ascetic devotion than to those of a secular journal. Suffice it to say, that the same severity to self, the same ardent love of his Saviour, and the same zeal for his neighbour's salvation, that were so evident during his active career, prevailed during these trying hours: we supply a few passages from the latest moments of his trials, supplied by Father Pontlevoy.

* The account of his illness and happy death was obtained from Father P. de Pontlevoy.

"It was one hour after midnight. I found the good Father in his agony : a feeble and panting breath escaped with difficulty from his breast ; he was bathed in a cold perspiration, and his poor hands were as if frozen. 'Dear Father, do you know me?' said I. 'I do, I do.' 'You are going to expire.' 'But I have not suffered enough yet.' 'Do you wish to gain the jubilee before dying?' 'Most earnestly.' 'Then kiss this crucifix.' I presented him a venerated crucifix which himself had brought from Rome. 'Make an act of charity. Offer to our Lord Jesus Christ the sacrifice of your life.' 'With my whole heart.' 'Ask pardon from God for all the faults of your life.' He joined his hands, raised his eyes to heaven, and cried with a loud voice, 'My God, pardon all the iniquities of my life! My father, beseech God that he may grant me pardon.' He then received the last absolution. . . . The Father Provincial said, 'would you wish that we recite the prayers of those in their last agony?' 'Oh, with great pleasure.' While we repeated these prayers aloud, he evidently united his intentions to ours. He expired on the 26th of February, 1858, at half past One in the morning, with his eyes intensely fixed on the crucifix before him, and giving three long sighs at the name of the Saviour of the world. He was sixty-two years, two months, and twenty-three days old. Thus died Father de Ravignan : thus die all the saints.

His last days were in some measure a resumé of his life. His soul, his character, were evident during these solemn hours. Ardent faith, humility, obedience, delicacy, goodness of heart, unalterable peace, resolution, immovable firmness—all were there."

There was grief and profound emotion through the whole city of Paris, when the death of Father de Ravignan was announced. His body, clothed in his Religious habit, was laid on a bed in a lower room of the house, Rue de Sevres, for three days ; and the populace of the city, ever in extremes, crowded from Wednesday to Sunday to look their last on the remains of him who had labored so much for their salvation, and whom they looked on now as a saint.

It was wished that the grandest of obsequies should be celebrated over his remains in Notre Dame ; but the Father Provincial preferred that it should be otherwise, and that he should be borne to his resting place on a poor hearse as a simple Religious. His old and attached friend, Mgr. Dupanloup, summoned by telegraph from Orleans, delivered an improvised funeral sermon in St. Sulpice, which was filled to overflowing. The unstudied discourse affected himself and his audience to tears, and thousands were obliged to content themselves with stations on the steps and in the yard. .

Even as conversions from vicious courses are more seldom wrought by severe measures, than by mildness and patience, so as already observed, conversions to Catholic faith and practice are more the result (humanly speaking) of friendly inter-communications with Catholics of devout lives, and the study of devotional books, than of the perusal of controversial works or of holding viva-voce discussions. We therefore welcome the life of this good and great man, as calculated for the spread of piety among Catholics, and the partial removal of the prejudices against the Society of Jesus, and the Church of which it forms one of the strongest bulwarks. Should it be said that he was an exception, we repeat in the words of his biographer, that he was a Jesuit to his heart's core ; and from ourselves, that his heroic character, his love of his kind, his severity to himself, his zeal for the salvation of souls, his stainless life, and ardent piety, are common to him with thousands and thousands of his brethren ; and that though many may lack his human abilities, the amount of good, spiritual and temporal, wrought by their quiet and silent efforts is incalculable, and will not be known in its grand proportions till they are called to receive their reward at the last day in the presence of the angels and of the whole of Adam's race.

We are not altogether pleased with the execution of the portrait accompanying the volume. Intellect and penetration are abundantly expressed in the ample forehead and eagle eyes, and resolute firmness in the lower part of the face, but there is a hard quality about the mouth, which we are sure did not belong to the living features. Though denying to himself, he was charity itself to all others.

M. Poujoulat is well known in the literary world of Paris by his share with M. Michaud in the "History of the Crusades," his "Letters from the East," "History of Jerusalem," and other works relative chiefly to Palestine and Egypt. He has contributed largely to Le Correspondent and other Catholic journals, and has all the ease and skill of a practised writer. It is very desirable that a translation should be presented to the English reading public, for as our readers may perceive, even from our meagre sketch, there is a considerable amount of historic information to be got, in addition to the edifying life of the subject of the work ; and the outlines of the retreats and conferences would be most acceptable to every devoutly inclined person whether in community, or battling for salvation amid the turmoils of the exterior life.*

* In the Past and Present of Thomas Carlyle there is a most delightful and spirit-stirring picture of the talents, the struggles, the self-denials, the heroism and the exertions of a monk of the dark ages, for the weal of his little community—what may be called his “little world.” Would that the Jesuit in Devereux could subject this German-souled and genial Pantheist to the mesmeric trance, if mesmerism itself was not a humbug and if the practice was not interdicted by the Church. Having put him in rapport with himself, he might for the time, imbue him with a Christian spirit, give him pen and paper, nor allow him liberty, till he had sketched the subject of this memoir in his own peculiar spirit and fashion. Then would a matchless picture be given to the world, for which under present circumstances it will have long to wait.

ART. VI.—THE DEAF AND THE DUMB.

1. The Lost Senses. By the late John Kitto, D.D.F.S.A. Editor of the "Pictorial Bible," and "The Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature." London: Cox, 1857.
2. Catholic Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. Twelfth Annual Report. Dublin: 1858.

Varied as the ideas may have been relative to the privations endured by the deaf mute or those deprived of sight, popular opinion at all times leaned to the side of the blind, and regarded the combined loss of the two senses of hearing and speech as comparatively more easy borne than that of not being able to behold all the beauties which Nature and Art present to charm our vision, combined with the still more hallowed pleasure of regarding the dearest objects of domestic life; these considerations present themselves so palpably before the mind as to exclude the idea of any loss being comparable in extent to that experienced by the blind. We are free to acknowledge that we indulged in similar theories, and it was not until we had studied with deep interest and much attention the very instructive little volume which has, we may say, been bequeathed to us, by one who experiencing the loss of one of those senses, devoted himself to the study of all the others, that our illusions have been dispelled; and so clearly has he pointed out the various sources of enjoyment open to the blind (in the intellectual not the material world,) that we, sceptics as we admit ourselves to have been, have had the scales removed from our eyes, and sad as the choice may seem, pronounce in favor of the blind.

In order, however, to prove the truth of this axiom which may at first glance startle our readers, we think the best mode of convincing, is to adopt that which convinced ourselves, namely, the proofs presented by the experience of Dr. Kitto in his most interesting work entitled The Lost Senses, a book which we would fain see on the table of every philanthropist who sympathizes in the sorrows and privations of his fellow man, or who, in any way is desirous of ameliorating his condition.

Without further prelude we shall lay before our readers, as much of the spirit of the work as we can condense in the brief space allotted to us; we perused it with both pleasure and profit, and trust it will afford equal gratification to those who may be tempted to glance over this resumé.

Dr. Kitto has left us a short but most interesting sketch of the feelings and sensations experienced by him on the total deprivation of hearing, a calamity which occurred to him in his twelfth year. The circumstances of his early life held forth no promise of a future of affluence; his father, who was a master builder, commenced life under rather advantageous auspices, in connection with an elder brother, an engineer of great repute; the road to fortune was open to him, but unhappily, like many others of equal or even superior genius, prosperity destroyed both brothers, and after a few years they were reduced to comparative poverty; and the father of our author had to earn his bread as a jobbing mason, in which precarious employment his little boy was called on to assist him. The accident, to which it may be he owed all the mental culture of his after life, occurred on his father's birth day in the year 1817; and twenty-eight years after he writes a succinct account of all he thought, felt, or remembered of that to him most momentous day; we give it in his own words:—

“The circumstances of that day—the last of twelve years of hearing, and the first of twenty-eight years of deafness, have left a more distinct impression upon my mind than those of any previous, or almost any subsequent, day of my life. It was a day to be remembered. The last day on which any customary labour ceases,—the last day on which any customary privilege is enjoyed,—the last day on which we do the things we have done daily, are always marked days in the calendar of life; how much, therefore, must the mind not linger in the memories of a day which was the last of many blessed things, and in which one stroke of action and suffering,—one moment of time, wrought a greater change of condition, than any sudden loss of wealth or honours ever made in the state of man. Wealth may be recovered, and new honours won, or happiness may be secured without them; but there is no recovery, no adequate compensation, for such a loss as was on that day sustained. The wealth of sweet and pleasurable sounds with which the Almighty has filled the world,—of sounds modulated by affection, sympathy, and earnestness,—can be appreciated only by one who has so long been thus poor indeed in the want of them, and who for so many weary years has sat in utter silence amid the busy hum of populous cities, the music of the woods and mountains, and, more than all, of the voices sweeter than music, which are in the winter season heard around the domestic hearth.

On the day in question my father and another man, attended by myself, were engaged in new slating the roof of a house, the ladder ascending to which was fixed in a small court paved with flag stones. The access to this court from the street was by a paved passage, through which ran a gutter, whereby waste water was conducted from the yard into the street.

Three things occupied my mind that day. One was that the town-crier, who occupied part of the house in which we lived, had been the previous evening prevailed upon to entrust me with a book, for which I had long been worrying him, and with the contents of which I was most eager to become acquainted. I think it was 'Kirby's Wonderful Magazine;' and I now dwell the rather upon this circumstance, as, with other facts of the same kind, it helps to satisfy me that I was already a most voracious reader, and that the calamity which befel me did not create in me the literary appetite, but only threw me more entirely upon the resources which it offered.

The other circumstance was that my grandmother had finished, all but the buttons, a new smock-frock, which I had hoped to have assumed that very day, but which was faithfully promised for the morrow. As this was the first time that I should have worn that article of attire, the event was contemplated with something of that interest and solicitude with which the assumption of the toga virilis may be supposed to have been contemplated by the Roman youth.

The last circumstance, and the one perhaps which had some effect upon what ensued, was this. In one of the apartments of the house in which we were at work, a young sailor, of whom I had some knowledge, had died after a lingering illness, which had been attended with circumstances which the doctors could not well understand. It was, therefore, concluded that the body should be opened to ascertain the cause of death. I knew this was to be done, but not the time appointed for the operation. But on passing from the street into the yard, with a load of slates which I was to take to the house-top, my attention was drawn to a stream of blood, or rather, I suppose, bloody water, flowing through the gutter by which the passage was traversed. The idea that this was the blood of the dead youth, whom I had so lately seen alive, and that the doctors were then at work cutting him up and groping at his inside, made me shudder, and gave what I should now call a shock to my nerves, although I was very innocent of all knowledge about nerves at that time. I cannot but think it was owing to this that I lost much of the presence of mind and collectedness so important to me at that moment; for when I had ascended to the top of the ladder, and was in the critical act of stepping from it on to the roof, I lost my footing, and fell backward, from a height of about thirty-five feet, into the paved court below.

Of what followed I know nothing: and as this is the record of my own sensations, I can here report nothing but that which I myself know. For one moment, indeed; I awoke from that death-like state, and then found that my father, attended by a crowd of people, was bearing me homeward in his arms: but I had then no recollection of what had happened, and at once relapsed into a state of unconsciousness.

In this state I remained for a fortnight as I afterwards learned. These days were a blank in my life, I could never bring any recollections to bear upon them; and when I awoke one morning to consciousness, it was as from a night of sleep. I saw that it was at least two hours later than my usual time of rising, and marvelled that I had been suffered to sleep so late. I attempted to spring up in bed, and was astonished to find that I could not even move. The utter prostration of my strength subdued all curiosity within me. I experienced no pain, but I felt that I was weak; I saw that I was treated as an invalid, and acquiesced in my condition, though some time passed—more time than the reader would imagine—before I could piece together my broken recollections so as to comprehend it.

I was very slow in learning that my hearing was entirely gone. The unusual stillness of all things was grateful to me in my utter exhaustion; and if in this half-awakened state, a thought of the matter entered my mind, I ascribed it to the unusual care and success of my friends in preserving silence around me. I saw them talking indeed to one another, and thought that, out of regard to my feeble condition, they spoke in whispers, because I heard them not. The truth was revealed to me in consequence of my solicitude about the book which had so much interested me in the day of my fall. It had, it seems, been reclaimed by the good old man who had sent it to me, and who doubtless concluded, that I should have no more need of books in this life. He was wrong; for there has been nothing in this life which I have needed more. I asked for this book with much earnestness, and was answered by signs which I could not comprehend.

‘Why do you not speak?’ I cried; ‘Pray let me have the book.’

This seemed to create some confusion; and at length some one, more clever than the rest, hit upon the happy expedient of writing upon a slate, that the book had been reclaimed by the owner, and that I could not in my weak state be allowed to read.

‘But,’ I said in great astonishment, ‘Why do you write to me, why not speak? Speak, speak.’

Those who stood around the bed exchanged significant looks of concern, and the writer soon displayed upon his slate the awful words—‘YOU ARE DEAF.’”

His first sensations on this announcement were not very overpowering; he was too young to know the extent of his calamity, and if he thought at all on the subject merely considered his deafness as temporary, but such alas! was not the case, and every experiment that medical skill could suggest was tried in vain to restore the lost faculty, and he seems to dwell with peculiar feeling on that sad phase of his existence, and the innumerable tortures he had to undergo: but medical art was of no avail; and sorely puzzled, the doctors had at length to desist, having come to the conclusion that the auditory nerve was completely paralyzed. He pays a very kind tribute to the exertions used by Mr. Snow Harriss in putting him through an electrical operation, but all was useless.

It was some time before his general health regained a proper tone, and during those hours of weakness and uninterrupted quiet, the base of his after life was fixed ; he had no resource but reading, and the book to which he so feelingly referred was re-borrowed for him, and he attributes much of the habits of his future career, to the avidity and interest with which he read this book, "Kirby's Wonderful Magazine;" it drew his attention to books as a source of pleasure and information.

At the period of which he has written, education was not as general in the class in which he then moved as in the present day. Many, it is true, could read, but it was not considered a necessary attainment ; and books were so extravagant in price as to be scarcely within reach of those whose means were limited. Religious literature was consequently that most in vogue amongst the poorer classes, who not being able to purchase the current literature, wished at all events to have something of substantial and permanent worth for their money ; thus, the works eagerly read by young Kitto were of a character to form the structure of good and sound mental training ; he assures us in his short biographical sketch that he never saw a newspaper to read till he was near twenty. At a later period he indulged his literary predilections for books of a different class, and went through a range of metaphysics, poetry, history, and even novels ; but amid all this heterogeneous mass of reading, the theological bias given by his earlier reading returned with redoubled ardour, and whatever he had learned or whatever talent he had cultivated, eventually proved most useful, an instance of which he mentions for the benefit of the young as it involves instruction to them by proving that mental culture, no matter how apparently useless or it may be abstruse, is sure eventually to benefit the possessor. Having acquired the Hebrew language with no higher view than that of qualifying himself to teach that language to the sons of a friend whose tuition he had undertaken, the knowledge became in after life one of the most useful acquirements he ever made.

We now close his brief biography, which led us away by the interest we felt in all concerning this gifted man from the subject in hand.

He conceives that there is more connexion between the organs of hearing and of speech than is usually supposed ; the general impression being, that dumbness is occasioned by the inability of hearing the human voice, which precludes the possibility of one born deaf acquiring language ; this, in the abstract, is mainly correct ; still, Kitto contends that apart from this, and physically connected with deafness, there is a sort of inability to utter articulate sounds. The impressions of one who has had, himself, practical experience is almost an irrefragable proof of the truth of this reasoning ; the hearing being the more delicate organ is utterly extinguished by that which may only impede the vocal organs, leaving them sufficient vitality to be partially awakened under artificial training ; thus, the deaf may be taught to speak as it were mechanically, but there still exists difficulty or pain in the use of this acquired art, which is another proof, if such were necessary, of the almost physical impossibility of speech with one born deaf.

To explain this theory more practically we need only point to our author, who says, that before the accident which deprived him of hearing, his pronunciation was clear and distinct, but that after that event, he spoke with pain and difficulty, and in a voice not easily to be understood, and though at a later period he was unconscious of having felt thus, those who watched him with interest at the time, remembered his having complained of pain, and remarked the peculiar change in his voice, which had become similar in intonation to that of one born deaf and dumb, but who had been taught to speak. This appears to be corroborative of his former assertion relative to the affinity between the organs of hearing and speech.

So strong was the disinclination which he felt to speak that, for many years after his becoming deaf, he communicated his thoughts by writing to avoid the occasion of speech ; he sometimes expressed his wishes by a slight motion or gesture, and rejoiced in the protection afforded him by the impression that may entertained of his being deaf and dumb, and he would have eventually become so, from disuse of the vocal organs, were it not for the intervention of some kind and judicious friends.

When going to the Mediterranean, he was fortunate enough to have for companions on his voyage a German physician named Dr. Korck, and one or two other well-informed and kind-hearted men, who soon perceiving how the matter stood, entered into a conspiracy with the captain of the ship not to understand a word he said except orally ; this they persevered in so well that before the end of the voyage he relinquished the habit of communicating by writing, and never after resumed it ; in fact practice rendered him so perfect that his language became sufficiently clear to be understood even by foreigners.

It is a remarkable fact that on thus again, as we might say, having obtained the use of speech, his language became more copious, and he used words far more choice than any he had heard previous to his calamity ; this was occasioned by forming his language on books which rendered him sometimes doubtful as to the true pronunciation ; a few of his words were pronounced in the provincial dialect, such as tay for tea. This, though an error which he immediately detected, seemed to afford him a species of pleasure, as it appeared to give his language a living character.

He had at all times a singular reluctance to use any superfluous words, complimentary phrases, or even terms of endearment. Of this he was on one occasion touchingly reminded, when one of his little boys suddenly quitted his study, and ran off to tell his mother that his father had for the first time called him "Dear." This avoidance of all unnecessary expletives rendered his language dry and hard ; his voice was unusually loud, but not articulate except to those very near, and it was sometimes amusing, at others annoying, to see the sudden start and turning round of persons in the street at the almost unearthly sound of his voice ; this was merely in the sound, as those to whom he spoke could understand him perfectly,

The play of the mouth or muscles enabled him to form a very distinct idea of the sound of the voice or even the laugh, and he formed a very accurate idea of the distinctive characters of both in various persons ; this he attributed to the experience he acquired during the days of his hearing, and does not conceive it possible for one born deaf to distinguish one voice from another.

Though many anecdotes have been recorded of what has been termed mouth reading, he appears sceptical on this point, and did not attach the same amount of importance to this practice that others have done ; he considers the greater portion of it guess work, which may be correct, or may not, according to the quickness of perception in the parties under its influence.

There is he considers a peculiar susceptibility of the whole frame to tangible percussion ; this kind of vibration which on some occasions seems to pervade the whole frame to the very bones and marrow, is not, he conceives, in anything different from the feeling experienced by persons who are in possession of their hearing, but the sensation is more concentrated, and consequently more acutely felt.

The loudest thunder was perfectly inaudible to him, and he gives a touching instance of a peal of bells, which he recollected in childhood as having imparted to his young soul a strange and inexplicable delight; he made vigorous efforts to catch even the faintest intimation of that dear old sound, but in vain; at no time, and under no circumstances, could he even recover the slightest trace of that familiar voice, which he describes as the music of his childhood. When he placed himself in direct contact with the tower, he became conscious of a dull percussion over head, like that of blows struck upon the wall above him. The tower was both lofty and solid, composed of granite and limestone, which may perhaps account for the indistinctness of the impression.

He describes a strange sensation which he experienced whilst shewing St. Paul's to a young friend from the country; they chanced to be examining the clock at the very time it began to strike, and the vibration imparted to his whole frame the feeling as if heavy blows had been struck on the building where he stood, and communicated through the medium of his feet, diffused over his whole body. He conceived a faint idea at the time of having heard a dull metallic sound, but after reflection induced him to believe this was only occasioned by early recollections, and was consequently merely an association of ideas.

He has given very minute details of the painful shocks felt by his entire nervous system, at what persons possessed of hearing would pass almost unnoticed, such as the moving of furniture, as tables, or sofas over the floor, either above or below him; being unprepared by any preliminary sound they startled him dreadfully, and the vibration being diffused through the feet over the entire frame, affected him sensibly. He compares the moving of a table to the combined noise and vibration of a mail coach drawn over a wooden floor; the feet of children, like the tramp of horses on the same floor; and the shutting of a door like a thunder-clap shaking the very house. These sensations, though intensely painful, would have been utterly indescribable by one born deaf; it is only by having once heard them, that they are capable of illustration.

It is a strange anomaly that the percussions which made the strongest and most painful impressions were those experienced from another room of the same floor; the fall of a book for instance causing a painfully distinct percussion, as occurring upon the very boards where he stood. The loudest knocking at the door was perfectly inaudible, whilst shutting the same door caused a distressing sensation ; he was not altogether insensible of the beating upon the door of the room in which he happened to be ; this he describes so feelingly as to induce us to give the extract in its entirety :—

“ Having business in London, I went in upon the previous afternoon, that I might have the whole of the following day before me in which to go through it, and took up my quarters for the night at an inn. I locked the door before going to bed ; but the bed being strange, some time passed before I could get to sleep. My meditations were not of a very pleasing character. I reflected that I was now apart from those who would know perfectly well how to act towards me in any emergency that arose, and whose first care would be to arouse me in case of fire or any like accident. But here I was among strangers who probably only regarded me as “hard of hearing,” and who, under that impression, would make no other effort to attract my attention than by uselessly thumping at the door, which I had unadvisedly locked. The fatal fire at an inn in Oxford Street, not far from the spot where I then lay, had been sufficiently recent to give an agreeable pungency to these considerations. It was clear that I ought not to have fastened my door. Then why not get out and unlock it ? It was very cold ; and by this time I was warm in bed : and as I had from my youth up abominated cold beyond all other evils of life, it was a serious and nicely balanced question—whether it were better to risk the possibility of being roasted alive, or to incur the dead certainly of a chill by turning out to unfasten the door. Before I could make up my mind, I fell asleep ; and in the morning I awoke safe and sound. Apprehending, however, that I should not be able to distinguish the knock of the attendant when he should bring my warm water at the hour I had directed, I now unfastened the door and returned to the bed,—concluding that after having knocked, and finding that I did not answer, he would come in without more ceremony. I lay awake and watchful, when presently I became conscious of a tremendous thundering at the door, which I think would have sufficed to awaken me had I been asleep. I cried, “ Come in ! ” and in came the warm water, the bearer of it looking quite naturally, as if nothing particular had happened. This discovery gave me greater satisfaction than anything connected with my physical condition which had occurred for many years, as it showed that in one important class of matters I was not so entirely helpless as I had previously imagined.

Alas ! alas ! This pretty discovery has, after all, come to nothing : and yet I suffer the page which records it to remain ; as the explanation which I have now obtained, with reference to the fact on which this satisfaction was founded, serves better than almost anything I could state, to illustrate the uncertainty of the impressions derived from the source under consideration ; and this is one of the points which it is the object of this chapter to demonstrate.

Having some misgiving that, after all, there might be some mistake in the conclusions to which I had arrived, I read the above paragraph to my wife, to whom I had not previously described the circumstances with the same degree of minuteness and coherence. She shook her head, and doubted much, affirming that she had often knocked at room doors in vain, to attract my attention. "If the head of the bed had been on the same side with the door, and some part of it had touched against the wall, I could understand it better: but as you state that the head of the bed was against the side of the room opposite the door, it is at variance with all my own observations, and requires further proof." Then why not prove it at once?

Accordingly, a loud knocking at the door of the room in which I write this, was speedily produced, but I could distinguish nothing. "The room is too large, let us try another." This was done, in a very small room, still without effect. "It is clear to me," quoth my wife, "that what you took for a 'knocking' at the door, was a stamping upon the floor. In all probability the attendant had been knocking in vain, and then as a last resort, to avoid coming in upon you unannounced, bethought himself of stamping upon the floor." To prove this she went out; and presently I distinguished the very percussion, which at the inn I had mistaken for a knocking at the door. She had merely stamped on the floor outside; and the identity of the sensation produced, with that which I had previously experienced, at once settled the whole question."

He details with almost painful sensitiveness the various degrees of pain experienced by the deaf occasioned by shocks to the nervous system of which those blest with hearing are happily ignorant; they amount at times almost to torture. After all that has been stated it could scarcely be supposed that music could impart any gratification; such is not however quite the fact, as we shall see by his own admission.

On one occasion he mentions his having been in a church in the west of England, the organ of which was considered the finest in that part of the country; whilst in the body of the church he was quite insensible to its tones, yet in the gallery he experienced a strong vibration but without any metallic sound, and more like the distant singing of a congregation, where only the very higher notes could be caught, than anything else to which the sensation might be compared.

A piano playing even in the same room was quite inaudible. One day however, very many years before he wrote his work, he happened to place his hand upon a piano when it was in the act of being played, and became conscious of a more pleasurable sensation from the higher notes, than any he had felt since his deafness. On further experimentalising he discovered, that the notes were more distinct when his fingers rested on the wood over which the wires were placed and to which they were attached. He could then make out with tolerable distinctness all the high notes, and if he knew a tune, so as to be able to supply the low notes from imagination, he obtained a considerable degree of enjoyment in the music ; the loud notes however were more suitable to his capabilities.

He seemed to feel particular interest about a lad both blind and deaf of whom he had been reading, and whose principal enjoyment seemed to be derived from striking a small key upon his teeth ; as we shall give a more lengthened detail of this poor lad's sad condition before concluding this paper, we merely mention it here, in order to illustrate a similarity of sensation, which Dr. Kitto discovered on reading this, and of which he was unconscious before ; namely, the habit he had acquired of striking the back of his thumb nail, or the point of a pen-knife, upon the edge of his teeth ; he also describes a pleasure he experienced without being conscious of the reason, in vibrating a knife or spoon upon the edge of a dish or plate, or against an empty tumbler or wine-glass. He seems desirous to extend the knowledge of this slight but pleasurable feeling, as of some value to those whose range of sensations is limited.

Keener perception, or strong ervisual powers, are considered by the many, as the essential prerogative of the deaf.

From this proposition Dr. Kitto altogether dissents ; he admits, it is true, a keener perception of the beautiful whether in nature or art as being perfectly possible, but the mere attribute of discovering objects at a distance, or retaining sight to a later period than ordinary and more gifted mortals he altogether disclaims.

To the danger, which he seem to apprehend, of losing, to him, the only charm of existence, sight, he pathetically alludes, and here he draws the first picture of the relative positions of the blind and deaf ; the former he describes as enjoying all the intellectual and social intercourse of a cheerful fireside, combined with the higher mental culture afforded by lectures, sermons, and the reading aloud of others ; the community of feeling thus imparted, informs the understand, and supplies food for thought. But to conceive the situation of one who has lost both these senses, the horror is too great to dwell upon, and could only be felt in its most acute sense by those who once enjoyed their possession.

A more refined and exquisite sense of the beautiful is however developed in a stronger degree in those deprived of the other senses ; this is to them a source of the deepest and most agreeable emotions. It is well however that the range of pleasurable is far more extensive than that of unpleasurable perceptions, for each is felt with like keenness and discrimination.

The latter sensation, Dr. Kitto describes as having become almost morbid with him, and relates the thoroughly miserable feeling he experienced when in the same room with a man exhibiting distorted or imperfect features, or displaying any sinister or malignant expression in his countenance. "I used," he says, "to feel a strong inclination to fly at them, and drive them from me, but found it more safe and prudent to quit their presence, which I uniformly did as soon as possible."

He gives a painful instance of the bad effects of placing about young people in any position of authority any one possessing a marked deformity ; this remark holds good in reference to all young persons, whether labouring under the painful disabilities of the deaf mute, or in full possession of all their faculties.

"There was," he says, "placed over me a man whose nose had been destroyed and his upper lip disfigured by cancer. This was a terrible infliction on me. It happened that this man's temper and conduct justified the horror and aversion with which his presence inspired me ; and by this combination of qualities he acquired a strange influence over me, such as no man ever before, or ever since possessed. He seemed as my evil genius. I dreaded, hated, loathed him ; and became in all things the slave of his will, obeying the slightest motion of his finger, and the faintest twinkle of his small eyes. He has many years been dead, but I see him now, and dream of him sometimes."

All grand and beautiful objects in nature gladdened and filled his heart, he knew not why or how.. The "great boundless ocean," the wooded mountain, and even the quiet town, possessed for him a peculiar charm at all times, but when lighted by the pale radiance of the moon he became perfectly enraptured by them.

An exquisitely keen perception of the beautiful in trees, though developed at rather a late period in life, amounted in him almost to a passion, and to destroy one appeared to him an awful act. He acknowledges that, entertaining those views, he considered the slaughtering of a tree as infinitely worse than that of an animal, whose years would be but comparatively few.

Paintings, particularly in bright and vivid colors, were to him a source of intellectual enjoyment; and he refers to the many happy hours he spent in the London National Gallery as tending to form and purify his taste, and to invigorate his perceptions. He looked on a picture as an object of sensation, and formed his judgment of it according to the degree of enjoyment it afforded him. This, though an instinctive perception, was generally correct, as it uniformly happened that he singled for his admiration the paintings which he afterwards learned were first-rate works of art.

One of the most remarkable traits of visual organs possessed by a deaf mute, is that of seeking and knowing the character of persons by their countenance. Thus it is true, to a certain extent, that every one deaf must be more or less a physiognomist, not by any rules of art, but merely as a matter of impression, and these impressions are almost invariably correct.

Darkness, or even twilight, to a deaf mute is peculiarly irksome: the reason is obvious. No book can be read, no communication carried on, a gesture of assent or dissent cannot even be perceived, and the play of the countenance, which sometimes betrays the inward thoughts, is altogether shrouded. There are other inconveniences to which darkness exposes the deaf; they cannot stir out after nightfall, or even during twilight, as their incapability of hearing would render it almost impossible for them to avoid accidents: their own deafness preventing them from hearing the sound of carriage wheels, and the dim light concealing them from the driver, precludes all possibility of escape by any other means than staying at home.

Though deafness must be admitted as a sad disqualification for almost every high pursuit in life, yet we have an instance in the gifted man who has afforded us so much useful and interesting information, that all avenues are not closed upon those so severely tried; and that he trod the path of literature, and acquired a just celebrity, is too well known to need elucidation here. Yet had he much to contend with in his upward path, for literature is not all closet work; it involves, or should involve, intimacy with men of similar pursuits, and business often of a delicate and perplexing nature; and when he goes forth into the world, in which so many other men find their element, his strength departs from him.

The consciousness of his deafness renders him almost morbidly sensitive, and neutralizes many of the advantages which belong to his position. He is in a manner debarred of those personal friendships in which other men find strength and solace; no new ideas are started, or brightened by friction with dissenting minds,—no hints gathered. This utter self-dependence is in itself a serious disadvantage, when it is remembered how much a man's career is influenced by personal intercourse with studious men. All this has to be combated, and the deaf man must work his own way, unaided and unencouraged.

Serious and sad as those disqualifications may appear, there are influences even more detrimental than mere intellectual or social intercourse. Where business is to be transacted the man of letters has much to contend with: conscious of his inability to convey his ideas, he will depart, leaving his business unfinished, or engross too much of the time of the man of business, and be thus considered a bore: thus literature, though presenting less impediments to the progress of the deaf man, has, nevertheless, its disadvantages.

Kitto was six years deaf before he was even aware that there existed any mode of communication with the fingers. A gentleman happening to accost him through this medium, and discovering his complete ignorance of it, taught him on the spot. This mode of communication was not, however, as general at that period as it has since become.

He alludes in very touching terms to his children, even during infancy, attempting to address him by these means, and seems to have felt more acutely the privation of never having heard their infantine prattle than almost any thing to which deafness had subjected him. Finger talking, however, seems to have afforded him vast sources of enjoyment, as he speaks in glowing terms of the cheerful and instructive intercourse carried on with friends, as they rode side by side for months together, whilst travelling over the plains of Asia.

The really practised finger speaker prefers that mode of communication to writing, being a more rapid mode of conveying ideas. The perfection of a dactylogist is to form characters with rapidity and distinctness: the acquisition of this knowledge is difficult. The main causes of this indistinctness arise from the set signs used to represent the alphabet; some of them are too much alike to be distinguishable in rapid movement. Upon the whole, he considers the system as very defective, and capable of great improvement ; there would be danger and difficulty, however, in altering an established usage. The best mode of improvement, without disturbing existing arrangements, would be to establish a set of arbitrary signs expressing familiar phrases, such as "and" and "the," and terms of common import might also be taught thus.

Talking in the air is also a mode used by those who are ignorant of finger talk ; but this is even more liable to mistakes, and can only be required in the open air, and when at a distance from writing materials. Of signs, as a medium, he appears to have had but a limited acquaintance. The born deaf and dumb, however well instructed to speak, to write, or to use the fingers, will, through choice, resort to signs in their intercourse with each other, for signs are their natural language.

It so happened that before his own deafness he had a boyish acquaintance with a born deaf mute who was running wild about the streets and entirely uninstructed ; after a lapse of some years he came again into contact with him, and found that though he had undergone a course of training, he could better express his ideas, or understand those of others, by signs than any other mode. The signs were of his own devising, and generally indicated some peculiarity of the person whom he wished to point out ; for example, to avoid a perplexing multiplicity of signs, females and young people were for the most part designated in reference to their relationship to the head of the family, and translated into words would stand thus :—the wife of Longnose ; the first, second, or third son, or daughter of Longnose, &c.

The knowledge of signs which he thus acquired proved useful to him when in foreign parts, where the habit of substituting signs for oral language was regarded as want of knowledge of their particular tongue, rather than deafness. The signs used by the orientals were somewhat similar to those used by his former friend the deaf mute ; some however were founded on national or local customs ; those were more difficult to be acquired, and were not mastered till he had been for sometime a resident in the east. Travel, however, to a deaf man, notwithstanding all the help of signs, is sometimes dangerous. We cannot better exhibit the truth of this, than by giving in his own words a little incident which bears on the subject :—

" I was staying at the village of Orta Khoi on the Bosphorus, about six miles above Constantinople, of which it is one of the suburbs, and was in the frequent habit of going down to the city and returning by water. One morning on which I had determined to go, it threatened to rain; but I took my umbrella and departed. On arriving at the beach, it appeared that all the boats were gone, and there was no alternative but to abandon my intention, or to proceed on foot along a road which manifestly led in the right direction, at the back of the buildings and yards which line the Bosphorus. I had not proceeded far before it began to rain, and I put up my umbrella and trudged on, followed, at some distance behind, by an old Turk in the same predicament with myself: for it should be observed, that, at and about Constantinople, the people are so much in the habit of relying upon water conveyance, that there is less use of horses than in any Eastern town with which I am acquainted. Nothing occurred till I arrived at the back of the handsome country palace of Dolma Caktche, the front of which had often engaged my attention in passing up and down by water. Here the sentinel at the gate motioned to me in a very peculiar manner, which I could not comprehend. He had probably called previously, and in vain. Finding that I heeded him not, he was hastening towards me in a very violent manner, with his fixed bayonet pointed direct at my body, when the good-natured Turk behind me, who had by this time come up, assailed me very unceremoniously from behind, by pulling down my umbrella. After some words to the sentinel, I was suffered to pass on under his protection, till we had passed the precincts of the imperial residence, where he put up his own umbrella, and motioned me to do the same. By this act, and by the signs which he had used in explanation of this strange affair, I clearly understood that it was all on account of the umbrella. This article, so useful and common in rainy climates, is an ensign of royalty in the East; and although the use of it for common purposes has crept in at Constantinople, the sovereign is supposed to be ignorant of the fact, and it may not on any account be displayed in his presence, or in passing any of the royal residences.

That day I was detained in Pera longer than I expected; and darkness had set in by the time the wherry in which I returned reached Orta Khoi. After I had paid the fare, and was walking up the beach, the boatmen followed and endeavoured to impress something upon me, with much emphasis of manner, but without disrespect. My impression was that they wanted to exact more than their fare; and as I knew that I had given the right sum, I, with John Bullish hatred of imposition, buckled up my mind against giving one para more. Presently the contest between us brought over some Nizam soldiers from the guard-house, who took the same side with the boatmen; for when I attempted to make my way on, they refused to allow me to proceed. Here I was in a regular dilemma, and was beginning to suspect that there was something more than the fare in question; when a Turk, of apparently high authority, came up, and after a few words had been exchanged between him and the soldiers, I was suffered to proceed.

As I went on, up the principal street of the village, I was greatly startled to perceive a heavy earthen vessel, which had fallen with great force from above, dashed in pieces on the pavement, at my feet. Presently, such vessels descended, thick as hail, as I passed along, and were broken to sherds on every side of me. It is a marvel how I escaped having my brains dashed out; but I got off with only a smart blow between the shoulders. A rain of cats and dogs, is a thing of which we have some knowledge; but a rain of potter's vessels was very much beyond the limits of European experience. On reaching the hospitable roof which was then my shelter, I learned that this was the night which the Armenians, by whom the place was chiefly inhabited, devoted to the expurgation of their houses from evil spirits, which act they accompanied or testified by throwing earthen vessels out of their windows, with certain cries which served as warnings to the passengers: but that the streets were notwithstanding still so dangerous that scarcely any one ventured out while the operation was in progress. From not hearing these cries, my danger was of course two-fold, and my escape seemed something more than remarkable: and I must confess that I was of the same opinion when the next morning disclosed the vast quantities of broken pottery with which the streets were strewn.

It seems probable that the adventure on the beach had originated in the kind wish of the boatmen and soldiers to prevent me from exposing myself to this danger. But there was also a regulation preventing any one from being in the streets at night without a lantern: and the intention may possibly have been to enforce this observance, especially as a lantern would this night have been a safeguard to me, by apprising the pot-breakers of my presence in the street."

Signs he considers the natural language of the deaf mute, as it is the mode adopted by persons ignorant of each other's language, and virtually dumb to each other. "The Indians, Tartars, or aboriginal inhabitants of the country west of the Mississippi, consist, he informs us, of different nations or tribes, who each speaking different languages, or dialects of the same language, hold converse without speaking, having adopted a language of signs."

Some of the signs employed by the Indians, have a peculiarity arising from their savage customs; but there are others more universally applicable, and are the same as those used in the schools for the deaf and dumb, after the method of the celebrated Abbé Sicard.

He conceives it probable that some vague rumours concerning this people, led the Abbé to conceive the possible existence of a nation of deaf mutes. The following passage from one of his books is cited in Dr. Orpen's "Anecdotes and Annals:—" "May there not exist in some corner of the world an entire people of deaf-mutes? Well, suppose these individuals were so degraded, do you think that they would remain without communication and without intelligence? They would have without any manner of doubt, a language of signs, and possibly more rich than our own ; it would be certainly unequivocal, always the faithful portrait of the affections of the soul ; and then, what should hinder them from being civilized ? Why should they not have laws, a government, a police, very probably less involved in obscurity than our own ?”

This gifted and excellent man was clearly of opinion that signs were the proper language of the deaf mutes. This opinion is borne out by others and particularly by mutes themselves, if the instructed deaf-mutes may be accepted as the exponents of their own feelings on this matter. In the sixth report of the American Asylum at Hartford, Connecticut, the following is given as the answer of a deaf mute to the question—“ Which do you consider preferable—the language of speech or of signs ?” Answer—“ I consider to prefer the language of signs best of it, because the language of signs is capable of to give me elucidation and understanding well. I am fond of talking with the deaf and dumb persons by signs, quickly, about the subjects, without having the troubles of voice : therefore the language of signs is more still and calm than the language of speech, which is full of falsehood and troubles.”

Kitto is of opinion also, that signs will be their constant means of intercourse amongst themselves ; writing, reading, and the fingers, their instruments of acquiring knowledge, will be merely used in correspondence or communication with those beyond their own class ; speech learned with so much difficulty, and used with such pain and reluctance, can never be of much intrinsic value to them. This opinion he deduces from his own experience, for when he felt so much reluctance to speak, and such difficulty in speaking, how much more irksome must not the effort be to those born deaf and dumb, and he appears to be thoroughly convinced that writing and signs are sufficient for all the intercourse of which a deaf mute is capable.

The Abbé Sicard unites in this opinion. Few of his pupils were taught to speak. His predecessor, the good old Abbé de l'Epée whose views were not so expanded though his heart was as large as Sicard's, indulged in the vain hope of restoring deaf mutes entirely to society. This was an idle dream. Deafness—the same cause which cut Dr. Kitto off from society, though so eminently qualified for its enjoyment—would alone, as he says, though they “ spoke with the tongues of angels,” suffice to exclude them from it. His own facility of speech was of comparatively little use to him beyond the walls of his own house.

The following letter written in English by Laurent Clerc, one of the pupils of Abbé Sicard, and afterwards engaged to teach in the American Asylum at Hartford, corroborates this opinion. It was addressed to Dr. Orpen, the founder of the Irish Asylum :—

“ Connecticut Asylum, Hartford,
“ September 30, 1818.

“ We have received the report you forwarded us. I ought not simply to thank you for this complaisance, but for the opportunity you have thus afforded us of augmenting the number of our acquaintance with men of benevolence. The report is excellent, and the time we have employed in reading it has certainly been profitable to us. It has excited our wish to pursue the object of increasing our library. Send us then an account of all you may hereafter do ; it will be a new obligation which we shall owe you.

“ The eulogy which you have given to my master's mode of instruction has sensibly affected me ; and the answers of my friend Massieu, which you have mentioned in your address, are exactly the same as I saw him write ; and I think them so correct and so precise, that they themselves prove the excellency of Monsieur Sicard's system. I therefore wish very much that you would follow the same, and lay aside the useless task of teaching the Deaf and Dumb to articulate sounds, or I cannot expect to see your pupils forward enough to understand abstract ideas. If I have not mistaken the contents of your Report, it appears that — and — of — and — have not been very kind to you ; you ought, nevertheless, not to be sorry for it, for whoever declines to communicate his secrets gives a proof of their sterility.

“ Adieu ! The task which you have embraced is a very good one. May the Lord bless you, and keep you, make his love to shine upon you, and be gracious unto you, lift up his countenance upon you, and give you courage and light, and reward you above, for the good you are doing to my poor companions in misfortune.

“ Your humble servant,
“ LAURENT CLERC.”

We give another specimen of letter writing ; though not by any means so well composed as the first, it is so graphic that we cannot omit it. It was written by a pupil of the Claremont Asylum near Dublin, to no less a personage than George IV. The writer appears to have been considered the best specimen of the instruction imparted in that institution. He was much excited by the visit of George the IV. to Dublin, and wrote him the following letter, which the King actually received, and to which he responded in the shape of a draft for ten pounds, with which he was afterwards apprenticed to the printer of this Review.

“ Wednesday, July 4, 1821.

“ My Dear George,

“ I hope I will see you when you come here to see the deaf and dumb pupils. I am very sorry that you never did come here to see them. I never saw you ; you ought to see the deaf and dumb boys and girls. I will be very glad to see you, if you come here often to see me. Did you ever see the deaf and dumb in London ? In what country did you ever see the deaf and dumb ? The boys and girls are very much improving, and very comfortable here. Are you interested in seeing the deaf and dumb ? All the soldiers in the armies belong to you ; the King of England gives a great deal of money to them. You must write a letter to me soon. I am very much pleased with writing a letter to you. I want to get a letter from you. I am much polite and very fond of you. How many brothers and sisters have you ? Would you like to see me at Claremont ? I could not go to London, because there is too much money to pay to the captain of a ship for me. I am an orphan, and a very poor boy. God will bless you. I love God very much, because he is the Creator of all things, and sent his Son to save us from sin ; He supports us and gives us everything, and makes us alive in the world. Do you know Grammar, Geography, Bible, Arithmetic, Astronomy, and Dictionary ? I know them very little. Claremont is a very beautiful place ; it has a great deal of meadows, ponds, lakes, trees, flowers, gardens, a horse, and an ass. I am thinking of everything, and to be polite to every one. Some of the deaf and dumb boys are always working in our garden, with my brother. I have been at school for four years and a half. I am sixteen years of my age. I am very delighted that I am improving very much. Perhaps I will be an Assistant of the Deaf and Dumb School. There are forty-one pupils at Claremont. Where were you born ? I was born in Dublin. I am quite deaf and dumb, and can speak very well. Would you like to correspond with me ? I would be very fond of you. You ought to write a long letter to me soon. What profession are you of ? I never saw you ; I am very, very anxious to see you indeed, and would like to see the King of England very much. We want a new school-room, and we want more deaf and dumb boys and girls at Claremont ; but we have not money enough to buy clothes and food for them. Will you send us some deaf and dumb children, and give us money to pay for educating them.

“ I am your affectionate Friend,

Society, to the deaf man, is rather an infliction than an enjoyment ; the consciousness of his utter isolation wounds him deeply, as he becomes painfully aware of the depressing influence his presence must create in the social circle ; with them, though not of them, he feels like one thrown amongst a foreign race, where unknown tongues are recounting matters which to him, the uninitiated, seem fraught with the deepest interest, and yet, of which he is totally ignorant.

The almost morbid desire with which the deaf mute craves to know all that passes around him, is to the observer a subject of deep pain ; the mere commonplaces, which form the staple matter of general conversation, become so vapid by repetition, that the deaf man can be scarcely persuaded that he is accurately informed when the twice told tale meets his perception ; having watched the play of feature, the varied interest, or pleasure, or enthusiasm with which those around him have listened to what to him seemed so dull and stale, makes the deaf man immediately conscious that the principal charm has been the play of conversation, and not the matter to which it related. Dr. Kitto alludes most touchingly to that ardent desire he experienced to hear the nameless nothings which nobody thinks worth repeating to one who is deaf ; he longed to hear the talk of children to each other, and often marvelled at the little interest apparent in the streets to hear the passing conversation ; speculating, as he said, within himself, on all the useful knowledge that could be gleaned from the casual expressions which strike the ear on all sides.

He gives an anecdote from the first Report of the Dublin Asylum, which so painfully illustrates the facts we have noted, that we cannot withhold it :—

“ Thomas Collins (a pupil whose progress was afterwards considered remarkable), being present where some gentlemen were conversing on a subject that interested them deeply, he watched the varying expressions of their countenances, with the most minute and anxious attention, as if endeavouring to catch some knowledge of what seemed to afford them so much entertainment, and striving, as it were, to burst the bonds which withheld him from the social circle. He repeatedly asked by signs to be informed of what was the source of their obvious gratification, but the subject of their conversation being beyond the range of his attainments at that time, he could receive no answer that was calculated to satisfy his curiosity. Finding all his efforts to participate in their pleasure fruitless, and productive only of disappointment, the poor child at length, turned away his head, with a countenance expressive of the deepest regret and dejection, and almost bursting into tears, made use of the few words which he had at that time learned to use and to understand, to say, ‘ Deaf and Dumb is bad,—is bad,—is bad ! ’ ”

Kitto describes with painful interest his sensations on witnessing a public meeting held at Exeter Hall for the Niger Expedition. Prince Albert was president on the occasion, and being his first appearance in public naturally attracted a vast assemblage of illustrious persons. It was something to see together, as he remarks, on one platform, such men as the Bishops of Winchester, Exeter, and Chichester, Archdeacon Wilberforce, M. Guizot, Earl of Ripon, Daniel O'Connell, Lord Howick, Lord Ashley, Sir R. Peel, S. Gurney, Dr. Bowring, and many other famous personages. He watched the speakers with deep interest, men of political and historical fame, and took much pleasure in comparing the relative oratorical powers of the speakers lay and clerical, and admitted that the balance of impressive and graceful manners was evidently in favor of the political speakers.

He admits having felt a strange desire to observe the motions of the speakers, though utterly unconscious of a word they uttered, and watched with deep interest the enthusiasm of applause with which a favorite orator was greeted; there was much scope for his imagination, as he was acquainted with the usual style of the most eminent of the speakers from the political and religious papers of the day. He describes vividly the feeling he experienced on reading the speeches next day, and his disappointment on perceiving how seemingly poor and meagre they appeared when contrasted with the enthusiasm with which they were delivered. This, however, he attributed to the fault of the reporters.

Of the many essential differences between the blind and deaf Dr. Kitto enumerates, in a particular manner, the prominent tendency to the poetical in the former and the almost utter absence of such tendency in the deaf, at least as far as rhyme or poetical numbers; this he explains very simply; in the first place the deaf man wants language, and then he has in a painfully literal sense no ear for numbers. It is consequently nothing remarkable that deaf mutes, who either become deaf in childhood or have been born so, never attempt to contend with these difficulties. With regard to those who have become deaf at a later period the case may be different, though he does not seem to know of any case worth recording; he made, himself, some slight attempts in the poetical way, but does not appear to attach much importance to his effusions in that line. We give here a specimen of his poetical talent, not selecting it as altogether the best, but the shortest:—

ALTERNATIVES.

Were all the beams that ever shone
From all the stars of day and night,

Collected in one single cone,
 Unutterably bright ;—
 I'd give them for one glance of heaven
 Which might but hint of sin forgiven.

Could all the voices and glad sounds
 Which have not fallen on my sense,
 Be rendered up in one hour's bounds—
 A gift immense ;—
 I'd for one whisper to my heart
 Give all the joy this might impart.

If the great deep now offered all
 The treasures in her bosom stored,
 And to my feet I could now call
 That mighty hoard ;—
 I'd spurn it utterly for some Small treasure in the world to come.

If the sweet scents of every flower—
 Each one of which cheers more than wine—
 One plant could from its petals pour,
 And that were mine ;—
 I would give up that glorious prize
 For one faint breath from Paradise.

Were all the pleasures I have known,
 " So few, so very far between,"
 Into one great sensation thrown—
 Not then all mean ;—
 I'd give it freely for one smile
 From Him who died for me erewhile.

Though deficient in poetical talent, as regards rhyme or metre, the deaf mute possesses an inherent feeling of poetry, which pervades occasionally his entire nature, and renders his mute language almost sublime. Massieu, the celebrated pupil of the Abbé Sicard, furnishes one or two instances of true poetical feeling, though expressed in prose. Of his life, though truly interesting, our space will not admit further mention than merely to record his answers to questions put to him at different periods; the first we give relates to the earlier portion of his life, before he had the good fortune of knowing his kind master, the Abbé Sicard :—

" What were you thinking about while your father made you remain on your knees ?"

" About the heavens."

" With what view did you address to it a prayer ?"

" To make it descend at night to the earth, in order that the plants which I had planted might grow, and that the sick might be restored to health."

"Was it with ideas, words, or sentiments, that you composed your prayer?"

"It was the heart that made it. I did not yet know either words or their meaning, or value."

"What did you feel in your heart?"

"Joy, when I found that the plants and fruits grew. Grief, when I saw their injury by the hail, and that my parents still remained sick."

At these last words of his answer, Massieu made many signs, which expressed anger and menaces. The fact, as I have been informed (says the narrator), was, that during his mother's illness, he used to go out every evening to pray to a particular star, that he had selected for its beauty, for her restoration; but finding that she got worse he was enraged, and pelted stones at the star.

"Is it possible that you menaced the heavens?" said we, with astonishment.

"Yes."

"But from what motive?"

"Because I thought that I could not get at it to beat it and kill it, for causing all these disasters, and not curing my parents."

"Had you no fear of irritating it?"

"I was not then acquainted with my good master Sicard, and I was ignorant what this heaven was. It was not until a year after my education was commenced that I had any fear of being punished by it."

"What is hope?"

"Hope is the blossom of happiness."

"What is the difference between hope and desire?"

"Desire is a tree in leaf, hope is a tree in blossom, enjoyment is a tree in fruit."

"What is gratitude?"

"Gratitude is the memory of the heart."

"What is time?"

"A line that has two ends,—a path that begins in the cradle and ends in the tomb."

"What is eternity?"

"A day without yesterday or to-morrow; a line that has no end."

"What is God?"

"The necessary Being, the sun of eternity, the mechanist of nature, the eye of justice, the watchmaker of the universe, the soul of the universe."

The acute and dangerous question, "Does God reason?" is said to have been put to him by Sir James Mackintosh. The answer was—

"Man reasons, because he doubts; he deliberates, he decides. God is omniscient; he never doubts; he therefore never reasons."

Persons born deaf rarely obtain the use of hearing; the recovery of the blind is not so unfrequent; even thus are the blind solaced by a hopeful feeling, that their case is not irremediable ; and vain as that hope may eventually prove, it still possesses a charm of which the deaf are totally bereft. Thus, the more a person reflects on the relative privations of the blind and deaf, the more will he become imbued with the feeling, that dreadful as the loss of sight is, (and we do not want to prove aught that might seem to lessen the sympathy we all feel for those deprived of the golden glories of the day,) yet, as all sorrows and joys are comparative, the loss of hearing tends more to sadden the social happiness of our being than the loss of sight.

Dr Kitto gives several reasons for expressing this opinion in which we have coincided. He accords to the blind a higher degree of mental culture, which is, in itself, a source of the purest pleasure, and appeals to the fact that the memory may be taxed in vain to recollect the name of a single deaf person of any note either in past or present times, whilst, as he says, a host of blind men distinguished in every branch of knowledge rushes on the mind ; even in optics they have been distinguished. Blind James Wilson says truly :—

“ In the pursuit of knowledge the blind have been very successful ; and many of them have acquired the first literary honours, which their own or foreign universities could bestow. In the different branches of philosophy, if they have not excelled, they have been equal to any of their contemporaries, but more particularly in the science of mathematics ; many of them have been able to solve the most abstruse problems in algebra. In poetry they have been equally distinguished. Two of the greatest men that ever courted the muses, laboured under the deprivation of sight : Homer, the venerable father of Epic poetry ; and the inimitable author of ‘ Paradise Lost.’ In philosophy Saunderson and Euler appear in the most conspicuous point of view ; the former lost his sight when only twelve months old, but was enabled by the strength of his comprehensive genius, to delineate the phenomena of the rainbow with all the variegated beauty of colors, and to clear up several dark and mysterious passages which appeared in Newton’s ‘ Principia ;’ and although the latter did not lose his sight till he had arrived at the years of manhood, yet from that period he was able to astonish the world by his labours in the rich fields of science, where he earned those laurels which still continue to flourish in unfaded bloom. In mechanics the blind have gone to a considerable length, almost to surpass the bounds of probability, were the facts not supported by evidence of unquestionable authority. Here we find architects building bridges, drawing plans of new roads, and executing them to the satisfaction of the commissioners. These roads are still to be seen through the counties of York and Lancaster, where they have been carried through the most difficult parts of the county, once bogs and mountains. Indeed there are few branches of mechanics in which the blind have been excelled.”

It is a strange fact that the conductor of an Asylum for the Blind, and the principal of a Deaf and Dumb Asylum, having respectively written on this subject should both agree as to the superior advantages of the blind over the deaf. Dr. Guillee, the director and physician of the institution for the blind at Paris, wrote as follows :—

“ Which are the most unhappy, the deaf-mutes or the blind? People ask us this every day. We shall resolve it to the advantage of the blind, because we think them in fact less unhappy. Strangers to all that passes around them, the deaf-mutes, who see everything, enjoy nothing. Like Tantalus, whom the fable represents to us as devoured by unextinguishable thirst in the midst of water, they are continually subjected to cruel privations. An insurmountable barrier separates them from the rest of men ; they are alone in the midst of us, unless we know that artificial language which the talent and charity of their ingenious teacher have created for them. The custom which they have of reading the physiognomy is very often a subject of ever additional anxiety to them ; they do not always divine aright ; doubt and uncertainty increase their anxiety and suspicions ; a serious cast, which resembles sadness, then invades their countenance, and proves that with us they are in their state of real privation. Obligated to concentrate themselves within themselves, the activity of their imagination is thus greatly augmented ; and as attention and judgment follow necessarily the perception of ideas, they exhaust themselves immensely. Therefore one sees few deaf-mutes in the lists of longevity, because the frictions are too lively, and to use an expression common but exact, ‘ the sword wears away the scabbard.’ ”

“ More favoured than these melancholy children of silence, the blind enjoy all the means of conversation with other men : no obstacle hinders them from hearing or being heard, since the ear, which has been so philosophically defined as the vestibule of the soul, is always open for them. The exchange is rapidly made, because they speak the vulgar language. It would be easy to prove that the blind have several other advantages over the deaf-mutes ; but it would be exposing myself without much advantage to repeat what I have already said. Besides, would it not be idle to dwell too long upon a parallel between deafness and blindness, when it is not permitted us to choose between these two afflicted mutilations, which we can only alleviate as to their consequences where they do exist? ”

Dr. Watson, the able manager of the Kent-road Asylum, fully coincides with the opinions we have placed before the reader, and to elucidate the matter more clearly he brings it to the test thus by actual comparison :—

“ Take, it may be said, a boy of nine or ten years of age, who has never seen the light, and you will find him conversable, and ready to give long narratives of past occurrences, &c. Place by his side a bo of the same age, who has had the misfortune to be born deaf, and observe the contrast. The latter is insensible to all you say: he smiles, perhaps, and his countenance is brightened by the beams of 'holy light;' he enjoys the face of nature, nay, reads with attention your features, and by sympathy reflects your smile or frown. But he remains mute: he gives no account of past experience or of future hope.—You attempt to draw something of this sort from him; he tries to understand, and to make himself understood; but he cannot. He becomes embarrassed—you feel for him, and turn away from a scene too trying, under the impression, that of these two children of misfortune, the comparison is greatly in favour of the blind, who appears by his language to enter into all your feelings and conceptions, while the unfortunate deaf-mute can hardly be regarded as a rational being. Yet he possesses all the advantages of visual information as direct sensation. All this is true. But the cause of this apparent superiority of intelligence in the blind is seldom properly understood. It is not that the blind possess a greater or anything like an equal stock of materials for mental operations, that is, sensations, as already described. No, but they possess an invaluable engine for forwarding these operations, however scanty the materials to operate upon—artificial language. Language we have defined to be the expression of thought; so it is, but it is moreover, when refined and methodised, the medium of thinking. Its value to a man is nearly equivalent to that of his reasoning faculties; without it he would hardly be rational."

Much as we have adduced (and infinitely more could be said) in proof of the privations which the deaf mute endures, and sad as is the condition of the blind, yet all fall far short of the intensity of suffering, and the fearful privations experienced by those who are unhappily deprived of the three senses. Cases of this description are, thank God, happily rare, and up to the present century, no instance of this awful calamity was recorded. Dr. Watson, writing in 1809, appears to be ignorant of the existence of such a combination of privations; but his book had hardly been printed when he became acquainted with one or two examples. James Mitchel, to whom we have before alluded, furnished a sad instance of so dire a misfortune. Dr. Kitto gives a letter which he received from Mr. (afterwards Sir) Astley Cooper; this letter describes so accurately, yet so concisely, the boy's state, that we subjoin it:—

"MY DEAR SIR,

"The boy whom I mentioned to you as having been born deaf and blind from congenital cataracts, was brought to my house by Mr. Saunders, oculist. When he was led into my parlour he put his hand to the wall, and felt around the room until he met a chair, on which he placed himself. A key was given to him, with which he immediately began to strike his teeth, and from which he seemed to derive great satisfaction. In lieu of the key a piece of wood was put into his hand ; he struck his teeth two or three times with it, and threw it from him with a whining noise, and with frequent lateral motion of the body, expressive of uneasiness and disappointment ; but upon a key being again presented to him, he beat his teeth with great apparent pleasure, and seemed to wish to continue the gratification for a length of time.

"I wrote to Mr. Saunders for further information, and he gave me the following particulars :—

"The lad's name is Mitchell, son of the Rev. James Mitchell of Ardelach, Inverness. His age, I think, about ten years ; very strong, and apparently healthy. He was tractable, and his father and friends managed him very easily ; for after being gently patted on the head, he would readily submit to their direction and guidance for the accomplishment of any ordinary purpose.

"As soon as he came into the room he walked around it, feeling every article of furniture. He had the custom of feeling everyone, and of running his hands up and down their limbs, as if to judge of their stature. If anything pleased him he patted his stomach, as if that organ had, in the course of his existence, given him most pleasure, and he instinctively referred to it for the expression of delight. His principal amusement consisted in hammering his teeth with some elastic substance, as a key, and was very angry when checked by the substitution of some other substance incapable of vibration. When I attempted the operation for the cataract, his friends lost their power of managing him ; but when liberated from the restraint necessary on that occasion, he was equally tractable as before, and seemed perfectly free from sulkiness. He would not however suffer me to approach him afterwards without great difficulty, possibly distinguishing me by the nose.

"I am yours, very truly,

ASTLEY COOPER."

Dugald Stewart, the man most competent to give an opinion on this phenomenon, read an interesting paper on the matter in the year 1812, from which, and other additional facts communicated by Doctors Wardrop, Gordon, and Spurzheim, the following details have been elicited. James Mitchel was born on the 11th of November, 1795 ; his mother was very soon aware of his blindness, by noticing that he never turned his eyes to the light, or to any bright object ; of his deafness she was also soon made aware, as noise, no matter how great, never disturbed him ; his deafness was altogether complete, but his sense of vision was not quite so imperfect. When sufficiently grown to distinguish colors, he was attracted by those that were bright and dazzling, and seemed to enjoy a strange pleasure in holding between his eye and luminous objects, such bodies as he found capable of increasing the quantity of light ; and his chief amusement consisted in concentrating the sun's rays by means of a bit of glass or a transparent pebble, which he would occasionally break into whatever shape he pleased between his teeth. He adopted even stranger modes to gratify his fondness for light. He would retire to an outhouse or room, shut the doors and windows, and remain there for a considerable time, with his eyes fixed on some small chink or hole which admitted the sun's rays, and catch eagerly the gleam of light thus concentrated. He also on dark nights kindled a light for his amusement ; and it was strange to behold the intense happiness he seemed to experience in realizing thus some undefined though pleasurable sensation.

His perception of shining colors has been attributed to the efforts of an operation performed on him in the year 1810, by Mr. Wardrop, who, having fixed his head by machinery, operated on his right eye, with such manifest improvement as could scarcely be hoped for ; the death of his father during the next year unfortunately put an end to all further attempts for his relief. The result of Mr. Wardrop's operation however enabled him to discern surrounding objects if not very minute. With regard to colors, red seemed to attract him most, next came white, then yellow ; the flowers he gathered in the fields were uniformly of those colors.

He possessed in a peculiar degree the senses of touch and of smell. When a stranger arrived, his smell invariably informed him of the circumstance and attracted him towards the newcomer ; he then proceeded to survey him by the sense of touch ; and in order to form an accurate idea, the first thing he did was to examine his boots, if he wore any ; he next went to the lobby to feel his whip, and after that scrutiny proceeded to the stable, handling his horse with great care and apparent attention. If visitors arrived in a carriage he took particular pains in examining it ; in all this he was undoubtedly guided by smell and touch alone.

Mr. Wardrop, who watched this trait with peculiar interest, says, " When a stranger approached him, he eagerly began to touch some part of his body, commonly his sleeve, which he held near his nose, and after two or three strong inspirations through his nostrils, appeared decided in his opinion. If it happened to be unfavourable, he suddenly went to a distance with every appearance of disgust ; if favourable, he showed a disposition to become more intimate, and expressed by his countenance more or less satisfaction."

We have, in an earlier part of this paper, alluded to a strange habit he had acquired from childhood, and which seemed to impart a singular feeling of pleasure; this habit was that of striking his teeth with a key or any instrument that emitted a sharp sound, and this he would do for hours together. Dr. Gordon records, "that when a bunch of keys was given to him he would select from amongst them the one which sounded to him most pleasingly;" this was a strange phenomenon. Mr. (now Lord) Brougham having observed this circumstance, brought him a musical snuff-box, and placed it between his teeth. This, not only excited his wonder, but appeared to afford him intense delight. Whilst the instrument continued to play, he held it tight between his teeth, and when the airs were concluded, continued to hold the box to his mouth, examining it closely with his fingers, and expressing the most intense curiosity.

This poor fellow, though thus tried, was possessed of a warm and kindly nature, and was ardently attached to his family; of young children he was particularly fond, but never associated with, or attempted to join in the amusement of boys of his own age. The feelings he evinced at his father's death and burial, in 1811, have been variously represented; we are, however, from the uniform strength of affection he always exhibited for those he loved, particularly his relatives, inclined to give more credence to the testimony of the Rev. T. Macfarlane than to any of the others. Mr. Macfarlane states that:—

"When the coffin which enclosed his father's corpse was brought from the house and placed upon chairs in the court before the manse previous to the interment, I approached to the coffin, and soon after saw James Mitchell come from the house in considerable agitation. He turned about rapidly, and snuffed very much, evidently guiding himself by the smell. He directly approached the coffin, smelled it most eagerly for several seconds, then laid himself down upon the lid on his face and embraced the coffin, while his countenance exhibited marks of the most lively sorrow. I stood close by him, and after a short time patted his head once or twice, upon which he rose and returned into the house. This occurred immediately upon the coffin being brought out, and about twenty-minutes before it was lifted in order to be removed to the churchyard. As the accuracy on this subject has been disputed, I purposely delayed writing to you till I should have an opportunity of conversing with the Rev. Pryce Campbell, brother-in-law to Mrs. Mitchell, who was present at the funeral, and by whose direction everything was conducted. I fell in with this gentleman. I took an opportunity of asking him if he observed any marks of sorrow about James Mitchell on the day of his father's funeral. He replied that he observed the most unequivocal marks of grief in his countenance, and added a circumstance which escaped my notice, that when the coffin was about to be lifted in order to be conveyed to the churchyard, James Mitchell clung to it, endeavouring to prevent its being carried away, and he (Mr. Campbell) was obliged to remove him from it by force."

James was blessed with an excellent sister, who made her afflicted brother the sole object of her sisterly care, and her solicitude enabled her to devise various means of communication with him. Her approbation or displeasure were intimated by touch; this she did in several ways. For instance, when signifying her highest approbation, she patted him on the head, back, or hand, with great cordiality. This expression bestowed more sparing, merely intimated assent; and she had only to refuse him those tokens, or repel him gently, to convey, in the most effectual manner, her sense of displeasure. On one occasion when his mother was from home, this kind and thoughtful sister endeavoured to allay his anxiety for her return, by intimating to him how long she would be absent; this she did, in the following simple but touching manner, by laying his head gently down upon a pillow, once for each night that his mother would be away, thus implying that he would sleep so many times before her return.

He proved his sense of the kindness bestowed on him by this devoted sister, in the unselfishness with which he resigned, in her favor, the care of a favorite aunt to whom he had become much attached during a severe illness in 1814. His sister having taken ill before he recovered, he insisted on his aunt leaving him to attend to her, though he felt her loss exceedingly, and never rested till he gained his point; this affection and consideration for others was not exemplified in this case alone; he evinced it to many for whom he did not feel the same amount of affection as for his much loved sister. An anecdote replete with this kind and thoughtful feeling for others is recorded of him. He at one time had a severe wound in his foot which confined him for a lengthened period; during his convalescence he had to keep his foot resting on a low stool. About a year afterwards a servant boy with whom he had been in the habit of playing, met a similar accident. James having noticed his remaining in the same attitude longer than was usual with him, examined him attentively, and perceiving by the bandages how matters stood, mounted at once to a garret where the little foot-stool had been stowed away, and selecting it, by touch, from amongst other furniture, brought it down in his hand to the kitchen and laid the poor boy's foot gently on it.

James always possessed a gay and cheerful disposition, and was particularly fond of practical jokes, the success of which invariably threw him into ecstasies of enjoyment, laughing and jumping about in the most hilarious spirits. His favorite joke was locking persons up as prisoners in rooms and stables. He had strange instinctive perceptions with regard to property ; on one occasion he met a person riding near the manse, and on feeling the animal seemed to recognise it as belonging to his mother. The rider, who had purchased the horse a few weeks previous from his mother, dismounted to watch what the lad would do, and was much amused to see him deliberately lead the horse home, take off the saddle and bridle, place corn before him, and then lock the stable-door, putting the key in his pocket.

With regard to his religious feelings, we can form no correct idea. It is true he accompanied his family to church, and behaved there decorously, and even knelt at family prayers, but whether he was conscious of the existence of a superior Being, or that these outward acts were merely mechanical or the force of habit, we cannot vouch. That James Mitchell possessed a sound and rational mind there is every evidence to prove ; his acts never indicated incoherence or fatuity, and we know not what might have been done in his case, had any attempts been made to impart education. Laura Bridgman, of whom we hope to treat in a future number, was far more unpromising than James Mitchell, and yet with all the disadvantages attending her case, she has attained to a degree of culture which in the blind and deaf might be almost considered impossible.

Purposing in a future number to devote a paper to the Blind, we shall reserve Laura Bridgman's case, as she may as reasonably be classed amongst the blind as the deaf.*

Thus far we have written generally, of the condition of the deaf and dumb, and we now turn to the consideration of the facts relating to the efforts made in Ireland, for the education, moral and physical, of those afflicted beings.

* Printing is an excellent trade for the Deaf and Dumb. We saw, last summer, in the town of Zabley, in Wurtemberg, a Printing establishment lately opened by M. Theodise Helgerad. All the compositors and pressmen to the number of 160 are deaf and dumb, and have been educated at M. Helgerad's own expense to the employment they are now engaged in. The King has conferred on him a large gold medal for this reclamation from the social and moral waste.

In May, 1816, "The National Association for the Education of Deaf and Dumb children of the Poor in Ireland," was opened at Claremont, near Glasnevin.

This was, and still is, a most excellent Institution ; but unfortunately for its usefulness, it was strictly, and exclusively Protestant ; and Catholic parents who sent their children for instruction to this establishment were fully aware that those children in gaining knowledge, abandoned faith. That is, the child should learn the Protestant religion, or leave the school. This system rendered Claremont unpopular, and it became as exclusively Protestant as the Blue-coat schools are, and as the Endowed schools were supposed to be.

At length the Catholics resolved that they would help themselves, and after many struggles they were enabled to open an Institution for deaf and dumb girls, under the care of the ladies of St. Mary's, at Cabra, in the year 1846. The eleventh of January in that year, Agnes Beedem, aged eight years, and Maryanne Dogherty, aged nine, were admitted.

The first annual meeting was held, May 3rd, 1847, the late Archbishop Murray in the chair ; Michael Staunton, then Lord Mayor, was the second chairman, and the honorary secretaries were the Rev. Thomas M'Namara, the Rev. S. A. Farrell, and the late W. Nugent Shelly.

From the Report read to this meeting we learn that when the Nuns at St. Mary's had consented to take the management of the school, it was resolved that two of the sisters should be sent to the Institution of Le Bon Sauveur, at Caen, in Normandy, to learn the system of instruction of the deaf and dumb there so successfully pursued. It was, after some further consideration, determined to send with the two sisters, two of the deaf mutes from Cabra, "that they might from the commencement, have an opportunity of reducing to practice the system of education which they themselves would receive."

Referring to these topics, the Rev. M. Furon, the chaplain of "Le Bon Sauveur," thus writes, and his letter is most interesting :—

"Caen, 31st December, 1845.

"DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,

"I have deferred so long to write to you, because I was desirous to procure some precise information concerning the most approved-of books in England which relate to the instruction of deaf mutes.

M. Gruel has had the goodness to write to a Professor of the School at Paris, who has taught in an English school, and who is well acquainted with the best works on the instruction of deaf mutes : but as this person has not as yet replied, and as time presses on me, I at length put my hand to the pen to write to you these few lines.

“Our community await with patience the arrival of the two Irish Religious, whom they shall have the pleasure and the happiness to initiate and to train in the good work, in which they employ themselves with much consolation and success. Our Religious highly approve of the idea suggested by M. Gruel, of sending with the two Sisters who are to come, two or three deaf mutes who may be intelligent, and who have not as yet received instruction. These children shall be associated with our fifty deaf mutes, and shall not have any difficulty in accustoming themselves to them. You may rest assured that our Superioress shall not offer any difficulty on the subject of the pension to be paid for the young Irish. It is certain that this shall be a very efficacious means of training your Religious in the art of instruction, since they shall thus be themselves able to apply, from the very first day, the principles and the rules, which we shall be eager to impart to them.

“If you know of any good English elementary books used for the instruction of deaf mutes, we shall be much obliged to you if you send them to us ; this would, in a great degree, facilitate the good work which we undertake. It is needless for me to tell you, that as these works are Protestant, it is not with the intention of putting them into the hands of the pupils or preceptresses that we ask you for them, but solely for our own use, to extract from them that which we shall find worth taking. We shall be also very glad to have one of your little catechisms for the use of children. You will understand, in fact, that it would be more convenient to have these small elementary treatises in English, than to be obliged to translate the French works of this kind which we possess. It would be very apropos (as M. Gruel tells you in the note enclosed) if an Irish Priest were appointed as director of the school that you propose to establish in Dublin, as it is very difficult for the Religious alone to conduct an establishment of this kind : besides, the poor children must have a confessor, and although the confessions are made in writing, it is very important, notwithstanding, that the confessor be initiated in the knowledge of signs, and even in the instruction of the deaf mutes, in order to understand them when they are not as yet sufficiently instructed to express themselves in a manner clear and correct. Moreover, are there not many deaf mutes, who have not dispositions enough, or who have not been left sufficiently long at school, to be able to express themselves in a manner altogether correct ? But, it is especially for the purpose of teaching them to confess properly, that the knowledge of the instruction is useful and even necessary for the confessor. Once accustomed to confess, the deaf mutes, even though very little instructed, can express themselves in a manner so as to be understood by any Priest : but, it is always necessary, for this very purpose, that they should have had, at the commencement, a confessor initiated into our method of instruction.

“ You need not occupy yourself, however, with this charge at present. The two Religious, whom you will send to us, shall be very well able, on their return to Dublin, to prepare a Priest for the direction of their instruction, by communicating to him that which they shall have seen and learned at ‘ Le Bon Sauveur.’

“ I think that he could do the same for religious men, who would wish to charge themselves with the training and direction of the school of Boys. It would suffice for them to see the Religious employed, to become initiated in their method, in order to be able, together with the aid of their own thoughts, to qualify themselves in training their deaf mutes in the knowledge of those things that are of importance for them to know.

“ I await with impatience the letter in which you have promised to communicate to us the precise period of the arrival of your two dear Sisters. You may be assured that everything shall be ready for their reception, and that the hearts of all the members of our numerous community shall be open to them, at the same time as the gates of the establishment of ‘ Le Bon Sauveur.’

“ Receive, Sir and dear Brother, with my kind wishes for the new year, the assurance of my entire devotion.

(Signed),

“ FURON.”

The Report thus continues :—

It is further due to this admirable community to add, that nothing could exceed the personal attention and regard they rendered to our Irish nuns during their sojourn amongst them, admiring and encouraging the zeal which induced them, for the time, to become exiles from their sisterhood and their country, in order to qualify themselves for the enterprise of charity they had so zealously and meritoriously undertaken ; and, on their return, the Rev. M. Furon, extending his kind services as far as possible, accompanied them and their two young pupils, till he saw them restored to the bosom of their own community.

Having thus provided for the instruction of one branch of this Institution, your committee had to deliberate upon the best mode of commencing the good work. Considering the amount of funds in hand, and looking to their prospects, clouded by all that was gloomy in the calamitous state of the country ; finding also a difficulty in procuring a suitable establishment for the Institution, and, finally, thinking that they would be better consulting for good order, as well as the educational improvement of their pupils, by receiving a small number in the first instance, your committee deemed it more advisable to avail themselves of a provisional arrangement proposed by the community of St. Mary's, at Cabra, to accommodate, in connexion with their convent, a limited number of pupils, until a permanent establishment could be provided for the Institution.

By reference to the list of the children received by your committee, it will be observed, that they were admitted without any local preferences, your committee having solely in view the Catholic and national character they were so desirous to impart to the Institution.

Your Committee have, therefore, the great satisfaction of reporting that, through God's blessing, one branch of the Institution has been put in operation, and that fifteen of these poor creatures, whose sad condition enlists universal sympathy, are already in course of training, under the happy auspices of a religious community.

Looking forward to the prospects of this Institution, your committee confidently trust that it will every day engage increasing interest and support. There are FOUR THOUSAND deaf mutes in Ireland!! This simple announcement should seem enough to arouse a nation's sympathy. There are FOUR THOUSAND of our fellow-creatures living amongst us, who are debarred the advantages of social commerce with their fellow-men, though capable to a great degree of enjoying them. But if their social disabilities entitle them to public commiseration, how much more are they to be pitied on account of their spiritual miseries! Created by the same God as we, destined for the same glorious end as we, redeemed by the same adorable blood as we, they are doomed, alas! to remain "seated in darkness and the shadow of death"—(Luke i, 79) unless public charity shall stretch forth the hand of deliverance!

But this infant Institution has a further mission of charity to perform.—It has to combat a system of proselytism, that is aimed against these poor souls, a system, as unprincipled as it is comprehensive and effective, extending its operations over the entire country, and employing every effort of terror and imposition to bring every individual deaf mute throughout the land within its grasp. Your committee have collected their information from numerous facts, that came under their own observation since the commencement of their labours, and from undoubted reports that have been made to them from various parts of the country. These facts and these reports go to prove that the unhappy children who become the victims of these proselytising endeavours, are taught more the specious objections founded upon a misrepresentation of the Catholic Religion, than they are taught the principal truths of Christianity, and more pains are taken to infuse into their hearts a horror for all that is held sacred and venerable in Catholicity, than to train them up in the love of God and of their fellow-man. As an illustration of the soul-destroying effects of this nefarious system, your committee have been furnished with the following report of a case from one of the remotest parts of Ireland:—

"We cannot avoid giving an instance to establish the justness of our remark regarding the Deaf and Dumb Institution for some time established in Dublin. A pupil of that school returned to the residence of her parents in Westport: her health was declining so fast, her parents thought it proper to send for their clergyman to see their dying child. On the arrival of the Rev. gentleman, she asked (by writing on a slate) who that was: when told, (in the same manner), she said she knew it, for he had the mark of the beast on his forehead; and that he was Antichrist! that the Priests would not allow the Bible to be read, &c."

The donations for the year ending May 1st, 1847, amounted to £1,298 9s.; the annual subscriptions received were £116

5s. ; and the collections by cards came to the large sum of £95. 5s. 3d. ; making the total receipts £1,509. 19s. 3d. The travelling expenses, of going to and returning from France, of the two nuns and two pupils, with the cost of support there, amounted to £92. 0s. 6d. ; and the entire expenditure for the year, was, including this latter sum, £477 11s. 3d. ; leaving a balance of £1,032 8s. 0d.

Fifteen girls were admitted from the 11th of January, 1846, to the 19th of April, 1847 ; of these the youngest was eight years old, the eldest eleven.

Well might the committee write, referring to the woful times in which they commenced their labors, and in the midst of which £1,509. 19s. 3d., were subscribed to save the faith and to improve the condition of the Catholic Deaf Mutes:—

“Your Committee deem it unnecessary to observe, that the difficulties which under ordinary circumstances should have encompassed so arduous an undertaking, have been vastly heightened and multiplied by the awful calamity with which it has pleased the Almighty to visit this country. Due regard, however, being had to this appalling visitation, and the consequent pressure upon all charitable resources in order to save from perishing, as far as it was possible, our famishing poor, your committee conceive there is much reason for congratulation on the progress they have been enabled to make.”

During all the years since its establishment this institution has made the most remarkable progress, and now the original idea of the founders is completed, by the establishment of a Male School, at St. Joseph's, Cabra, under the care of the Christian Brothers.

The twelfth annual meeting was held the 2nd of July, 1858, Sir John Bradstreet, Bart., in the chair ; the Very Rev. Canon Grimley, acting as Secretary.

The Report read to the meeting is so very admirable, and so extremely interesting, that we shall, with some little condensation, place it before the reader:—

Let the friends of charity recollect that so late as twelve short years ago, so lamentable was the condition of our deaf mutes, that there was not an asylum in the British dominions in which they could be taught the Catholic faith ; and now look for an instant at this noble building, this monument of the charity of our people, and surely they will acknowledge “the finger of God is here.” Since within twelve short years so much has been accomplished for the glory of God and the salvation of his destitute children, what, with his divine aid, may we not expect for the future? But twelve short years ago and we had neither house, nor teachers, nor pupils; to-day, we impart the knowledge of eternal life to 167 deaf and dumb children. Anxious that the supporters of the Institution should have an accurate idea of the state of each branch, we will, in the first place, enter into the details of St. Mary's, Cabra*.

Your Committee need not report that our female mutes enjoy the singular privilege of being educated by the nuns of Cabra Convent. Under the ever-watchful eyes of those angels in human form, can we be surprised at progress in literature or advancement in virtue? Alluding to the unceasing labours of the good nuns, we only regret that words could not convey even a remote idea of the debt of gratitude this Institution owes to those indefatigable ladies. As it is only to another world they look for their reward, it is our consolation to believe that brilliant indeed must be their crowns of justice. The Institution at St. Mary's now numbers 80 females, 21 of whom were admitted during the past year. On the feast of the Good Shepherd, eight mutes had the happiness of approaching, for the first time, the most Holy Eucharist. There are now 28 monthly communicants. Twelve received Confirmation. Your Committee are exceedingly happy to state that the most gratifying accounts have reached them of the children who have left the Institution; many of them continue to correspond with the nuns and with their former companions. The following letters are specimens of the affection which the pupils who have left still entertain for the Institution to which they are indebted for the inestimable blessings of education:—

" MY DEAR MRS. M——

" I received your kind letter, which gave me great pleasure. I was so glad to hear from you and all the nuns and pupils. You must excuse me for not writing before now, but mother was not very well. I wrote some time since to Maria Kieran. She did not answer me yet. I go to Confession and to Holy Communion every month. All the girls that go to school to the sisters of Charity (and I am one) received Holy Communion at Easter; we all had white veils and medals with blue ribbon. There are no deaf-mute girls at school with me. Father Lynch is very kind to me. My mother is sorry she did not leave me another year at Cabra; for there is no deaf-mute school in this State except a Protestant one, and she would not put me there. I help mother in the house, but she does not like to send me out for anything. It troubles her to think something would happen to me. I am most thankful for the very nice picture you sent me. My dear Mrs. M——, my sister Rose is married, and has got a baby son. I am sorry my sister Anne did not come here with me, and we would be altogether then. I like to live with my mother. I enclose a picture for Anne M'Closkey, and hope you will let her write to me. I send my fondest love to all the nuns and to all the deaf-mutes. How is Rev. Father Burke? I hope he is in good health. My mother and sister send their regards to you. Pray for me, your affectionate child,

" SARAH CAHILL.

" P.S.—Please write soon again. '

" Kilkenny, June 8th, 1858.

" MY DEAR MRS. M——

" It is a very long time since you heard from me. I am very uneasy, because I have no pious person to instruct me in religion the same as you used to do. I am very much afraid. I have confidence in your prayers. I know you like to hear from me. I met a deaf mute named Helen Haly about a month ago. I was astonished to see her make the same signs as I make, and I thought she had learned at Cabragh, but it was Miss O'Sullivan who taught her. She spoke to me about Mary Hartnett, Anne M'Carthy, the nuns at Cabragh, &c. &c. I wish my sister Ellen had gone to Cabragh three years ago. I hope she is quite well. I will write to her in a month. Will you please tell me about Jerry and Ellen? My mother is uneasy about them. She is so fond of them. I will continue to pray for you and all the nuns. I am most unhappy now because I would like to remain in the convent for ever. I often think of God, and take great care in my prayers. You will ask Mary Mahony to study religion well, and teach me when she comes home to Cork. I love poor persons very much, because they are the same as our Lord Jesus Christ. I wish to imitate Him. I hope you will write to me soon, and tell me all the news about Cabragh. I remain, your affectionate

" HONORA MURPHY."

Since our last meeting, one of the mutes, who had been a pupil teacher, departed this life. Her companions wrote a sketch of her life, one specimen of which will be gratifying to the benefactors and friends of the Institution.

“ A little Sketch of the Life of one of our dear companions, who died on the 4th of last May, in the 18th year of her age.

“ I was not in the Institution when dear Anne Smyth came to it ; she was one of the first pupils ; but two or three of my companions, who were here, have told me she was a nice little girl, with blue eyes and auburn hair. She was born at Annamoe, in Wicklow, and lost her speech and hearing by scarlatina, at the age of three years. Father Clarke, then Parish Priest of Annamoe, took a great interest in her, and got her admitted into the Institution when she was eight years of age. She was then very wild, and often told many funny things she used to do at home. Her greatest amusement was to stand before a looking-glass and make signs, being quite sure her reflection was another little deaf and dumb child. When her mother brought her here, she thought this place was a prison, and that she would have to remain here for ever ; therefore, she fretted when her mother left her, but her sorrow was soon forgotten, and ever after she liked Cabra very much. She was greatly surprised to see that there were four other deaf mutes here, for she thought that herself and the little girl in the looking-glass were the only deaf mutes in the world. After one year and a half she was so steady, and knew her catechism so well, that she was permitted to make her first communion on the feast of Corpus Christi, 1848. Nothing could equal her joy on that happy day, when she received, for the first time, our Divine Lord in the Blessed Eucharist.

“ In a few weeks after she was confirmed by the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, and was invested in the blue scapular. About five years ago she was promoted to be a class teacher. She taught her pupils very well. We shall never forget how sweet-tempered, gay, and obliging dear Anne was, and how she used to make us laugh at recreation. She took great pleasure in assisting the nuns when she saw them busy. Last summer she became very delicate, and was sent home for some months, which time she spent most happily. On the feast of St. Kevin she went to Glendalough with her sisters, and amused herself on the beautiful mountains there. Her native air having made her much better, she returned here after vacation. Last January one of her sisters died ; Anne felt it greatly ; and though she bore it with great resignation to the Divine will, I remarked that from that time she began to look very delicate, and was no longer as active and cheerful as before. She was obliged to give up teaching her class in February. On the 18th of March she went home with her father. The day she left us we cried much, and she too was very sad ; she said she thought she would not live long, and asked the nun who has care of us to teach her some aspirations to say, when she would be receiving Extreme Unction, and said she would not forget to have the indulgenced cross and blessed candle in her hand when dying. Her health did not improve at home, and she shortly after received the last sacrament, and was invested in the scapular of Mount Carmel. Her sister wrote an account to the nuns of her death, and said that she suffered very much for about a week before she died, but was most patient, and never complained; and when asked was she able to pray, she said—'Yes; I am praying; I am making acts of the love of God, of contrition, and of resignation.' Her sister used sometimes say to her—'Are you resigned to die?' She would answer—'I am resigned to whatever God pleases.' Rev. Mr. Coleman, her Parish Priest, was most attentive to her during her illness. She presented to him a large statue of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which she had bought previous to her leaving Cabra. Her death was a most happy one. It had been her constant prayer that she might die in the month of Mary;—her request was granted. Our dear Immaculate Mother took her to herself on the evening of the 4th of May. In a composition which she wrote on heaven, a few months before she left the Convent, she said—'The first thing I will do when I enter heaven will be to prostrate myself at the feet of the B. V. Mary.' I trust she is there now listening to the sweet voice of our Blessed Lady, and praying for each of us. We will all try to imitate our dear companion, who was so pious, docile, and gentle; we will not complain that we are more afflicted than others, and deprived of many enjoyments in this world, because we know that the most afflicted of God's children here will be the nearest to Him and to the Comfortress of the Afflicted in heaven.*

"CHARLOTTE MARY KELLY."

* This last paragraph reminds us of the very exquisite lines by Mrs. Sigourney, entitled Alice, in Heaven, to her Family, left on Earth. The poem was composed on the death of a highly interesting deaf and dumb young lady, of rare intellectual endowments. Her attachment to her father was remarkably ardent. Immediately after his death, she said, in her own strong language of gesture, "her heart had so grown to his that they could not be separated." In a few days she was suddenly called to follow him. She is here represented as having arrived at the mansions of bliss, and, meeting her father, thus apostrophises those fond objects of her affection, whom she had left on earth:—

I.

Sisters! there's music here!
 From countless harps it flows,
 Throughout this bright celestial sphere,
 Nor pause nor discord knows:
 The seal is melted from my ear
 By love divine,
 And what thro' life I pined to hear,
 Is mine! is mine!
 The warbling of an ever-tuneful choir,
 And the full deep response of David's sacred lyre.
 Did kind earth hide from me
 Her broken harmony,
 That thus the melodies of Heaven might roll,
 And whelm in deeper tides of bliss, my rapt, my wondering soul?

In the Male School there are eighty-seven boys, under the care, as already stated, of the Christian Brothers, who give the following valuable Report :—

St. Joseph's, Cabra, June 20th, 1858.

GENTLEMEN—At the close of this the first academic period, through

II.

Joy! I am mute no more ;
 My sad and silent years,
 With all their loneliness, are o'er ;
 Sweet Sisters! dry your tears.
 Listen, at hush of eve—listen, at dawn of day—
 List, at the hour of prayer—Can you not hear my lay?
 Untaught, uncheck'd it came,
 As light from chaos beamed,
 Praising his everlasting name,
 Whose blood from Calvary stream'd,
 And still it swells that highest strain, the song of the redeem'd.

III.

Brother!—my only one!
 Belov'd from childhood's hours,
 With whom, beneath the vernal sun,
 I wander'd, when our task was done,
 To gather early flow'rs,—
 I cannot come to thee,
 Though 'twas so sweet to rest
 Upon thy gently guiding arm,
 Thy sympathising breast,—
 'Tis better here to be.

IV.

No disappointments shroud
 The angel bow'rs of joy ;
 Our knowledge hath no cloud,
 Our pleasures no alloy ;
 The fearful words—to part,
 Are never breath'd above ;
 Heaven hath no broken heart—
 Call me not hence—my love !

V.

Oh Mother ! He is here,
 To whom my soul so grew,
 That when Death's fatal spear
 Stretched him upon his bier,
 I fain must follow too.
 His smile my infant griefs restrain'd ;
 His image in my childish dream,
 And o'er my young affections reign'd,
 With gratitude unutter'd and supreme ;
 But yet, till these refulgent skies burst forth in radiant glow,
 I knew not half th' unmeasured debt a daughter's heart doth owe.

which we have conducted our afflicted but highly interesting charge, in compliance with your wishes, and according to the usual custom, we submit the following resumé of the proceedings of the past year for your consideration.

The very limited experience which we have had in Deaf and Dumb education, since the commencement of our connection with the Male Department in May, 1857, induces us to hope, with the Divine assistance, for the satisfactory accomplishment of the difficult undertaking in which we are now engaged.

Convinced that an acquaintance with the system pursued in the management of the several departments, educational and domestic, of both branches of the Institution, was necessary, and demanded our special attention, we commenced an attendance at Prospect and at St. Mary's, which extended over a period of six months, and afforded ample time for a good preliminary training.

To the good community of St. Mary's we are deeply indebted for the handsome manner in which they placed every facility at our disposal for acquiring a knowledge of all that related to the Deaf and Dumb which their excellent establishment afforded.

Our thanks are also, in a special manner, due to the Rev. J. B. Burke, of the Vincentian Fathers, for his efficient aid, which he was so well qualified to impart from his long experience of the Deaf and Dumb.

The absence of a systematic course of instruction, as well as the many other disadvantages which the pupils of the Male Institution laboured under, must have rendered their education an extreme difficulty; and the gifted conductors of the Female Department, having acquired their knowledge of the system in France, will account for the similar want of a suitable educational series for the Deaf and Dumb, which they too regretted. But few works of British Institutions, were available, and, of these, none could be procured of a sufficiently elementary character to render them generally useful. In French, indeed, no such want could be said to exist; for the very excellent works of Sicard, Bebian, Jamet, and others, afford a great variety from which to select; but without incurring the expense of producing translations of these, or similar publications, in this country, no graduated course of instruction for Catholic deaf mutes could be procured.

Judging of the system pursued in the New York Institution, as exemplified in its "Course of Instruction," we have no hesitation in allowing its superiority as an elementary course, to any other in our own language which we have become acquainted with, though some objections are to be found to adopting it generally in our Institution. The expense of such adoption might also deserve consideration, as, for about an equal amount, a similar "Course of Instruction," specially adapted to all our wants, could probably be produced in this country. The production of such a work, should it meet your approbation, could only be accomplished after such mature preparation, as would enable us to hope that in incurring the attendant responsibility, you were securing to us an object worthy of the considerable outlay which it would demand.

Of the very many interesting French publications for the Deaf and Dumb, as well as those published in connection with the Doncaster Institution, we have temporarily availed ourselves, though only to a limited extent; but should the initiatory system of the latter Institution approach in completeness its more advanced course, a knowledge of it would be desirable.

As in other similar institutions, the instruction of the pupils in all that is implied in affording them as great a facility in the use of written language as they can attain to, forms the leading object of our efforts; and this facility once attained, the other branches of ordinary education are open to them.

While occupying your attention with what concerns the condition of the Deaf and Dumb, we may be permitted, for the gratification of those who feel so particular an interest in the subject, to introduce the following observations of the President of an advanced existing Institution.

"The natural desire of parents and relatives to restore a deaf child to hearing and speech, certainly the best, and regarded by uninformed people as almost the only means of social intercourse and moral and religious cultivation, has ever been a fruitful source of quackery. It may be safely affirmed that there is no child deaf by disease or accident, or whose deafness is hoped to be curable, on whom twenty different remedies have not been tried, most of them absurd, some very painful, and some even dangerous. But the success has been far below the average in cases of empiricism. You all know that multitudes of cures, due solely to the recuberative powers of nature, have been ascribed to the last quack remedies that happened to be employed; but in cases of deafness, so marked as to occasion dumbness, recovery, spontaneous or otherwise, hardly happens once in ten thousand times."

"Nor hardly has better success attended the efforts of the profoundest science and the most enlarged experience. Obstructions in the auditory passage; may be cleared away; the tone of the nerves and of the system generally may be improved; and by these and other means partial deafness is often relieved. But as the internal parts of the ear lie beyond the ken of the physician, attempts to remedy the diseases or malstructure of those parts must be made very much in the dark, and the result, in a great number of instances reported, has been one case here and there more or less relieved, to some hundreds in which useless suffering was inflicted."

“ I believe post-mortem examinations, to ascertain the immediate causes of deafness, have been rare in this country (America), and comparatively few such are recorded in Europe. Dr. Itard, the late able and most distinguished physician of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb of Paris, who, perhaps, made more such examinations than any other man, believed that in most cases of profound deafness, the cause was paralysis of the auditory nerve. In other words, in most deaf mutes, the nerves of hearing are dead, and MEDICAL MEANS HAVE NO EFFECT ON THE DEAD.”

“ Still, there are generally to be found men who have full faith in the mysterious operation of certain remedies of their own, which, like a charmed gun, shooting in the dark, shall hit the mark; and there are still seldomer wanting men who have a much juster confidence in human credulity. Between these two classes the anxious parent will never want remedies, and flattering promises of cure to his deaf child, till the most tenacious hope and patience being at length wearied out by constant failures, he at last returns to the point, which, for the good of the child, should have been attended to long before, the means of alleviating its misfortune by education.”

After warning the parents and friends of deaf mutes against empiricism, the writer goes on to say, that “ they ought to pay more attention than they have yet done, to the far more important and infinitely surer means of remedying the misfortune of the deaf and dumb, by making their other senses, and especially that of sight, supply the probably irremediable loss of the hearing.”

The adoption in this country of the course intimated in the following paragraph, would deserve your consideration.

“ It is most true that the early education and training of deaf mute children, before they reach the proper age of entering the Institution, is too much neglected. Efforts have been made to remedy, in some degree, this evil, by publishing and widely circulating brief and plain directions to parents and friends of deaf mute children, for their early management, and for the first steps in their instruction. The advice, moreover, has been repeatedly given, and I would here again repeat it, that where the parents have not the leisure or ability to begin the deaf and dumb child's education at home, it should be sent along with its brothers and sisters who hear, to the district or primary school, where it may at least easily acquire the habit of order, the ability to imitate letters correctly with a pen, and the names of many common objects, which can be explained by pictures, or by merely pointing to them.”

Our morning exercises, commencing with prayer, include lessons in written language, Christian doctrine, and arithmetic. Resuming studies at half-past nine, till twelve A.M., object lessons, written language, grammatical and geographical exercises, with simple outlines of globes and astronomy, occupy the time. A few are occasionally exercised in simple algebraic propositions. Dictation by signs is occasionally introduced, and original composition is specially attended to.

The Afternoon Exercises, commencing at half-past twelve P.M., and ending at three P.M., are devoted to explanations of Christian doctrine, arithmetic, &c., and a continuation of initiatory lessons, and lessons in written language. The Evening studies are chiefly a preparation for the business of the following day.

The literary exercises of the day commence and conclude with prayer, in the language of signs. Prayers are also signed at other stated hours.

Only a few alterations were necessary to adapt the ordinary distribution of time to our present routine; according to which the pupils at

Wednesdays and Saturdays, being half days, a walk is substituted for the afternoon exercises of the former day; the latter is allotted to domestic arrangements.

On Sundays and Holydays the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass is offered in the domestic Chapel, and every facility is afforded the pupils for approaching the holy sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist.

Immediately after Mass, religious instruction is imparted in the Chapel by a Brother, in the language of signs. Religious instruction is again resumed on these days from 10 to 11 A.M., in the School; after which, lunch and a walk fill up the time until 3 P.M. Evening studies and devotions are resumed from 5½ to 6½ P.M.

Daily visits to the Library are also allowed, where the pupils are encouraged to make every effort to overcome those difficulties of language which usually deprive the deaf and dumb of all the pleasure to be derived from reading. For this purpose illustrated works are most suitable; and when arrangements are completed for procuring, at short intervals, such interesting publications as would be likely to excite the curiosity of the young, much will be accomplished towards rendering this department the great aid which it ought to become in the education of our mutes.

Cricket, football, two ball courts, a large play ground, and the gardens, afford ample opportunities for that physical development which is so justly a prominent consideration in the training of youth.

For recreative walking excursions we are left nothing to desire. The healthful advantages of the Phoenix Park are within a few minutes' walk; and the freedom of access to the Zoological Gardens, so kindly allowed to Institutions, has been repeatedly availed of. The other environs of the city, as well as the beautiful country surrounding the Institution, afford everything that could make such excursions gratifying.

As an encouragement to merit, on a recent festival, twenty-five of the most deserving boys were indulged in a short railway trip. They proceeded to Kingstown, and after enjoying all the beauties of that favored locality during the day, returned in the evening deeply grateful for the enjoyment which had been procured them.

On a recent occasion, the following expression of thanks was conveyed to the Very Rev. Mgr. Yore, by a pupil in the school of the Institution:—

St. Joseph's, Cabra.

VERY REV. AND DEAR SIR,

We return you thanks for the very nice altars which you have given us. You are always very kind to us. We will often pray that God may grant you many graces, and that our Blessed Lady may also take care of you.

Asking your blessing and share in your prayers,

We remain, Very Rev. dear Sir, most gratefully,

Your obedient servants,

THE DEAF MUTES OF ST. JOSEPH'S.

During the past year the following pupils made their first Communion:—J. Carlan, Wm. O'Shaughnessy, Edwd. Tighe, Jn. Hornsby, Jas. Doherty, Pk. Kenney, Chr. Fitzpatrick. And of these, the following received Confirmation at the hands of his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Cullen:—John Hornsby, Edward Tighe, Chr. Fitzpatrick, Wm. O'Shaughnessy. George Lacey and Bern. Loughran, having completed their education, left our Institution within the year.

In conclusion, Gentlemen, while gratefully acknowledging your considerate attention to all our suggestions, we have great pleasure in being able to state that the happiest evidences of physical, as well as mental and moral improvement, have already manifested themselves in our Mutes; a small earnest of the total reform which we hope to see effected in them, when the remaining desirable facilities in the management of the literary and domestic details of the Institution, which a more extended experience will enable us to introduce, shall have been completed.

We remain, Gentlemen, respectfully, &c.,

THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

The following letters are specimens of the boys' compositions:—

" St Joseph's, Cabra, June 22nd, 1858.

" MY DEAREST FATHER—On the 4th of January, the Very Rev. Canon Grimley, the Rev. Mr. Burke, Mr. Manning, Christian Brother, and the three boys, left the terminus of the Galway railway. The morning, though dark, was fine. We left at seven o'clock, and were glad to go in the train. We travelled very quickly, but as it was very dark we could not see anything until we were some miles from Dublin. The train stopped at Maynooth, where the great Catholic College is situated. We arrived at Mullingar at nine o'clock, where we stayed for a short time. Mullingar is remarkable for being an excellent wool market. At eleven o'clock we arrived at Athlone, where we saw the Shannon flowing through the town. Athlone is called the centre of Ireland. I saw my native town of Ballinasloe, in the County Galway. About twelve o'clock we arrived at Galway, and attended the examinations shortly after. We had the pleasure of seeing the Right Rev. Dr. McEvilly, the Catholic Bishop of Galway, at the examination. We were examined in a great many things; in Christian doctrine, geography, grammar, arithmetic, &c. All persons present were much surprised at the manner in which we answered. We remained one night in Galway, and returned to Dublin by the train on the following day. We were much pleased at seeing Galway, its railway hotel, and its fine bay, but were surprised to see all the stones that were in the country about Galway.

"I remain, my dearest Father,

"Your affectionate Son,

"PETER PAUL QUINN."

"St. Joseph's, Cabra, June 23rd, 1858.

"MY DEAR FATHER—The boys rise every morning at 6 o'clock, and assemble in school for morning prayer at 6½ o'clock! At 8 o'clock all breakfast, and after breakfast the boys go to the playground until 9½ o'clock. At 9½ o'clock we all assemble in school and remain there until 12 A. M. We learn a great many things; grammar, composition, geography, globes, astronomy, &c. At 12 o'clock we sign the Angelus Domini and get lunch, and are allowed to play till 12½ o'clock. School begins again at 12½ o'clock, and lasts until 3 o'clock. We dine at 3 o'clock, and visit the library or play until 5 o'clock. Evening studies commence at 5 o'clock, and end at 7 o'clock, when we get supper and have play until 7½ o'clock. We then sign evening prayer and go to bed. We are allowed to walk on Wednesdays and Sundays. We often see the Phoenix Park and the Zoological Gardens. We can see the city, Howth, and the bay and mountains of Dublin, and we often see many ships and steamers coming in the bay. The railway passes very near to the Institution, and we often walk along the Royal Canal. The country about St. Joseph's is very beautiful, and the boys are very happy in having such a fine Institution.

"I remain, my dear Father,

"Your affectionate Son,

"JOHN WHELAN."

In concluding their Report, the Committee thus refer to the late lamented John O'Connell:—

"Your Committee, while submitting to the dispensations of Divine Providence, beg to express the great loss sustained by this Institution, in the death of one, who, as Hon. Secretary, assisted us by his advice, and cheered us on by his example in labouring for the amelioration of the deplorable condition of the poor deaf mute children of Ireland. In the annals of our Institution the name of John O'Connell must always appear among its best benefactors.

“ It is our consolation to hope that his Christian and edifying life has merited for him the crown of justice ; and that in heaven his happiness will be consummated in seeing around him our poor deaf and dumb, for whose salvation he laboured so assiduously.”

The charge, as pension, for each Mute is £10 per annum, but the total average cost of each is £18 per annum. The youngest girl is 8 years old, the eldest 16 years : the youngest boy is 8, the eldest 15 years of age.

We have already given the tables showing the employment of time in each Institution ; the following are the Dietary, and abstract statement of accounts for both schools :—

What these Institutions may yet become, time alone can show, but judging of the future by the experiences of the past twelve years, we may reasonably expect that managed as they are, they will become world-known and approved as are the great Schools of the Christian Brothers. Already the advantages offered are fully appreciated in the United States, and in the British possessions on the American Coast; and we understand that young children are sent hither from Canada for instruction. The male school at Cabra is one of the architectural sights of Dublin: but even whilst admiring its beauties, even whilst applauding the efforts hitherto made, and marked by so glorious a success, we should not forget that there are 4000 Deaf-mutes in Ireland, and that hundreds, anxious for admission to St. Joseph's and St. Mary's, are sent away desponding and disappointed; there are no funds to support a larger number than that already accommodated.

With these considerations, and with the facts above stated before him, we beg the earnest attention of the Catholic reader to the following, which is a copy of the circular just issued by the Committee:—

CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

“ Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful.”

LUKE vi. 36.

The Catholics of Ireland are respectfully informed that there are 4000 Deaf Mutes in Ireland; that without an education, suited to their wants, those poor children of affliction must live and die without knowing that a God exists. There are 200 poor children in the Institution, educated, supported, clothed, &c., &c. There are hundreds seeking admission, who, alas, must be excluded for no other reason than want of means to educate them. Will we permit those hundreds to live as heathens in the midst of us? Who will refuse to contribute to enable the Catholic Deaf Mutes to attain a knowledge of salvation? The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass is offered up every month, for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the Subscribers to this most useful Institution. Also, the Holy Sacrifice is offered up every month for the repose of the souls of deceased Benefactors. On the first Sunday of each month, the Mutes who approach the Sacraments, offer up their holy Communion for the above intentions. Each morning and evening the Deaf Mutes pray fervently for their Benefactors.

Mr. JOHN COGHLAN has been appointed to call on Subscribers and receive their contributions.

SECRETARY.

ART. VII.—POETICAL BOOKS.

1. The O' Donoghue of the Lakes, and other Poems. By Nicholas J. Gannon. London : Bosworth and Harrison. 1858.
2. The Traveller's Dream, and other Poems. By Henrietta, Authoress of "Poetical Pieces on Religion and Nature." Dublin : John Robertson ; London : Simpkin, Marshall & Co. 1858.
3. Poetical Pieces on Religion and Nature. By Henrietta. Dublin : Samuel B. Oldham. 1856.

Genius is the standard of the human intellect, and by which alone the operations of the mind can be accurately determined. The productions of genius are the only criteria whence they can be properly judged : there they are discovered in their excellence and consummation to the enquiry of the philosopher. It follows, then, that in reasoning of the powers and the faculties of the mind of man, genius and its works constitute the legitimate head and spring of demonstration and argument. But perhaps genius itself is only competent to the task. Be it so. Were this sentiment, however, to be adopted in its full extent, as it would be extreme vanity in any individual to assume to himself the given qualification and character, no matter of great moment would be undertaken, and the sublime efforts of mind must be fatally discouraged. Singularity would be the height of presumption, and no one could pretend to be original ; and by this the world would infallibly lose much. Many a discovery, many an invention, is indebted to a good guess. Singular opinions, if they do nothing more, produce scintillations of original thought, which by any other collision had never been emitted ;—and this is something ; not a matter of the most indifferent importance, but an object worthy of prosecution and regard. 'Tis a step to knowledge ; and "Fancy, ever the mother of deep Truth," may nurture her well even at the breast of Fiction.

But some will deny the possibility of an original idea. To them the mere assumption will be ridiculous. Locke affirms, that "all those sublime thoughts which tower above the clouds, and reach as high as heaven itself, in all that great extent wherein the mind wanders in those remote speculations it may seem to be elevated with, it stirs not one jot beyond those ideas which sense or reflection have offered for its contemplation." We shall, nevertheless, contend for the creative faculty of genius in its literal signification, and assert its power of creation in the most extended sense; not only in the combination of ideas, but ideas themselves, primarily and underived, as its own absolute and independent production. "Ideas are things," says Berkeley. But we profess not metaphysics. If we did, and his position be correct, the creation we claim for genius is absolute indeed.

What is genius? Dr. Johnson defines it thus; "A mind of large general powers, accidentally determined by some particular direction." This position has been well combated by D'Israeli in his Literary Character. Seneca says, and, after him, Montaigne, that equality is the soul of equity; and it is so. We are all the same in the first principles of our conformation; but circumstance, "that inspiritual God," whose tyranny commences even before our birth, enlarges and contracts, develops and destroys. Education does much, and habit more. So far, and no farther, nature vindicates, without justifying, her universal justice in every diversity of body and of mind. As one body is weak, and another strong, so it is with different minds; there are gradations and characters in each. There is an idiosyncrasy of mind as well as of body; and as D'Israeli well observes, "If Locke or Newton had attempted, and persisted in the attempt, as some have, unluckily for themselves, to prevail in poetry, we should have lost two great philosophers, and obtained two supernumerary Poets."

Genius is an abstract term, and formed, as all abstract terms have been, from individual appellations. Certain individuals discover a genius or aptitude for certain particular attainments, and which in many instances, develops itself to a predominant character of intellectual power. Hence the term genius was adopted to express this aptitude in general, always implying the successful and predominant development. Dr. Johnson forgot the process by which we arrive at general terms, when he constructed his definition. Had he recollected this process, he would not have confounded the terms "mind" and "genius," and would have reversed the definition thus—"a determination in some particular direction, accidentally developed by a mind of large general powers." But how the mind of Johnson dilated and expanded, when, in the Life of Pope he describes the power of genius, and swells once more into that Ionian freedom and nobility of speech which marches to such sublime music, in that magnificent passage where, forsaking for a moment his jealous prejudices, he walks abroad in his soul's strength, to grasp the master mind of Gray, and point out to the world the pre-disposition and secret propensity of his ambitious genius! In the Life of Pope he describes "genius as that power which constitutes a poet, that quality without which judgment is cold, and knowledge is inert; that energy which collects, combines, amplifies, and animates." Common sense would say, that genius is what a man is born with; and perhaps, after all, we shall not improve the definition by explaining and amplifying it. We shall, however, define it thus: "That germ of native aptitude, born with, and borne in, the constitutional disposition of the human mind, which develops itself to a predominant character of intellectual power, breaks forth in the temper, moulds the habit, and is connatural and connate with the individual." This gift of Heaven—this incommunicable faculty—this preternatural conformation, indeed of the faculties of the soul, has ingenious and presumptuous sophistry endeavoured to create by accident, and originate by education,—influences that partake in its developement, and are themselves the creatures of the mind of man. It has appropriated to itself all the gifts of Heaven, and claimed the power of exerting whatever talent it elects to acquire. The phenomena of genius it has resolved into mere outward circumstance, forgetting that circumstance, though it may contract or enlarge, can never produce; and with Promethean audacity, deemed, by adopting the same means, to create the same aptitude; but its professors soon feel that they still want the spark of animation—that divine energy which pervades and exalts the inert materials of art, and gives life to its slumbering elements; and which, if they attempt to possess by dishonest violence, the vulture and the rock are but feeble emblems of their vexation and dismay! The same sophistry which would thus deprive genius of its original, and underived existence, would also deny to it its power of creation. Nothing is more common than to speak of its creative power. Appeal to Philosophy, and she denies the fact, and metaphysicians define it all away into sensation and reflection, perception and combination. With them, the sentient is all—the spiritual nature of man, nothing. They profess to treat of his mind, and they confound it with the corporeal; they cannot conceive it abstracted from matter, and removed from sense. With them, all ideas are derived, and fancy and imagination phlegmatic imitators, or, at best, but quick collectors and appropriators of the good of others, the treasures of antiquity, the knowledge of the world; they communicate nothing, but derive all. According to them, the sublime and eloquent Barry mistook the operations of his own mind and the nature of art, when he vehemently broke forth, “Go home from the academy, light up your lamps, and exercise yourselves in the creative part of your art, with Homer, with Livy, and all the great characters, ancient and modern, for your companions and counsellors!”

Akenside exclaims,—

“Mind—mind alone! bear witness,
Heaven and Earth!
The living fountain in itself contains
Of beauteous and sublime!”

And so the mind does contain all these wonders in itself, and is truly the “vital spark of heavenly flame,” but every mind is not a poetic one, that is, poetic in the creative faculty. An age which, like the present, has produced several great poets, must be full of the spirit of poetry. Byron, Wordsworth, Scott, Southey, Coleridge, Campbell, and Moore, are above all this era, only by an excess of that power, in which many thousands participate. They are not beautiful and solitary flowers breathing in the desert, but are only conspicuous amongst other products of the soil by their richer bloom, and their finer fragrance. The whole of our worthy literature is more pregnant with imagination and passion. There seems to be at present a mingling and interfusing of the thoughts, sentiments, and opinions of men, of all kinds and degrees of power, that perhaps never existed before in this, or in any other country. Poets walk not in the light of their own imagination alone—but in the light shed around them, by the imagination of their brethren. Peculiar as was the genius of each of those poets we have named above,—peculiar as is the genius of our living poets, to himself, and opposite to each other their several theories of the art, yet may we observe frequent gleams and flashes of the one in the pages of the other, as they unconsciously lend or borrow splendour : however various their creed and professions of faith, yet they are all priests of one religion.

This stir and communion of thought, feeling and passion, is observable throughout that part of our literature which in former times was uninteresting and contemptible—we mean that poetry which is created by minds not in the first rank of poetical power. Our merest versifiers, now a days, may be set on an equality with men whom a former age considered true sons of Apollo, while we have among us not a few poetical writers, who, without aspiring to the very highest honors of the art, exhibit a familiar and profound knowledge of much of its subject matter, and are permitted, at times, to behold glimpses of the glory revealed in full only to the mightier prophets. To this interesting class of poets belong Mr. Gannon and the fair authoress of The Traveller's Dream.

We can fancy Mr. Gannon before us now, stepping out from a good breakfast at the Lake, upon that emerald lawn sloping down to the glorious sheet of water whence the hotel has its name. We can fancy him, with four oars, Kerry O'Leary for guide, and Mat Foley for bugler, not "doing," but actually studying the Lake. We can hear his shouts of laughter at Kerry's jovial stories of the "Killarney wake" and "the Quaker's hunt for a dinner in the Famine year;" and then we can fancy him sitting down to write the Legend of the O'Donoghue, not the member for Tipperary, but his great ancestor of the Lakes, and personifying those pretty chamber maids who dance such rattling jigs in the smoking-room, as descendants of the old chieftain's Eva, of whom he tells us,—

"The hue of the raven her dark ringlets show,
The blue violet sleeps in her eye;
The snow's softest tint, and the peach's pink glow,
Have pilfer'd her cheek for their dye."

"Henrietta" has a pretty name, a pretty fancy, and is, we are sure, a good, honest-hearted Irish girl. She has written two very charming poems in the larger volume before us; and in her little book, entitled Poetical Pieces, particularly in her poem on "The Death of John the Baptist,"— but from which we shall not extract, as it should be read entire to be appreciated as it deserves—she has given us a specimen of her poetic ability most creditable and promising. In each and all of these she shows how fully her mind is imbued with the noble epigraph which she selects from Wordsworth,—

“ In every part,
Spirit Divine through forms of human art.”

We would ask Mr. Gannon why he selected for his longer poem the metre of The Lady of the Lake? But, let us take things as they come, and, thanking the gods for what we get, wait, like Mr. Macauber, for something to “turn up.”

The first thing turning up worthy of special note, in Mr. Gannon's O'Donoghue, is the first meeting of the Chieftain and Eva:—

Her anxious sire, while yet the maid
In childhood's simple garb had played,
Deem'd her coy ways and bearing shy,
The proof of native modesty.
But when maturing years had shed
Their crowning roses on her head,
With radiant bloom her cheek had grac'd,
And on her lip their vermill trac'd,
He thought through pleasure's magic thrall
To tempt the girl in festive hall.
Then did he spread the banquet gay,
Then flocking came in rich array,
The youthful nobles of the plain,
With warrior vassals in their train.
Full many a chief the maiden woo'd,
Full many in falt'ring accents sued
To win her hand; and gems and gold
Before her father's eyes unroll'd.
But useless all their wily art
To gain the lovely Eva's heart;
And when her sire in suppliant voice
Besought his child to make a choice,
Of all her suitors rich and proud,
She turn'd her head and wept aloud!
The holy nuns who oft had seen
Fair Eva, and had mark'd her mien,
When now they heard the wondrous tale,
How wealth and rank could not prevail
To win her heart, would gravely say,
“The veil is her's no distant day!”
But those more shrewd had watch'd the care
With which she bound her raven hair,
Had caught the blaze of em'rald green,
The gems and diamonds glitt'ring sheen,
Whose brilliance well might grace a queen,
And vow'd no veil that face would hide,
Save such as decks the sparkling bride!
Her maidens wond'ring much the while,
Were wont to shake their heads and smile,
As though they wish'd that each should know,
They would not treat their lovers so.

But Una, she whose locks of jet
Like Eva's, down her shoulders met,
Her chosen friend, companion dear,
In all her mystic wand'rings near,
With solemn brow, and silent tongue,
The livelier maidens sate among.
Sometimes fair Eva and her maid,
Would walk adown the flow'ry glade,
Or in a gold-embroider'd barge,
Skim o'er the broad lake's mimic surge.
The awe-inspired fishermen,
When Eva's boat had met their ken,
Plying the dripping oar, would leave
The maids alone their dreams to weave;
Then when o'er hill, and lake, and plain,
The night commenc'd its drowsy reign,
Along the silv'ry path where shines
The moon's calm light in twinkling lines,
Una would row the bark, and there
The maids would sing some plaintive air,
Or meditate till early day
Appear'd above the mountains grey.
One eve as fickle April's sun,
His latest course had well-nigh run,
Tinging with beams of crimson hue
The quiet lake's translucent blue,
Eva, in accents soft and clear,
Pour'd these grave words in Una's ear;
“Beloved friend, let balmy sleep,
To-night your grateful senses steep,
Let winged dreams your mind delight,
With glowing scenes, with visions bright,
That in the arms of rapture borne,
Your soul may feast on joys till morn.
For when to-night the wolf will howl,
And o'er the lake shall whoop the owl,
When the wild fox shall roam the dell,
I mean to work a wondrous spell!
My potent charm will seek to make
The glorious spirit of the lake
From out its breast his form unfold,
And converse with a mortal hold!”

Fill'd with surprise and secret dread,
 The trembling Una nothing said;
 But when the evening reach'd its close,
 She press'd her couch and sought repose.
 The fluttering at her anxious breast
 Deterr'd the coy approach of rest;
 And wild fears coursing through her brain,
 Made every hope of slumber vain.
 With noiseless footstep Una glides
 From out her couch, and down the sides
 Of Glens, speeds her quick pursuit,
 Till she had reach'd the mountain's foot;
 When there arriv'd and crouching low,
 Beneath a broad Arbutus bough,
 She saw fair Eva on the strand,
 Waving aloft a starry wand.
 Eftsoons a noise came thund'ring on,
 Like mountain waves, when tempests strong
 Sweep the blue surface of the sea,
 And lash it in their savage glee!
 Nearer and nearer came the sound
 Which made the mountain cliffs rebound,
 When lo! a scene unearthly bright,
 Burst on astonish'd Una's sight!

First o'er the tide from crystal bowers,
 The lake-Sylphs came enwreath'd with flowers,
 Then mountain Sprites with crowns of heather,
 Came tripping o'er the waves together,
 And then a band of Elves arrive,
 As thick as swarms around a hive,
 And Phooka's wild, and gloomy Ghouls,
 Filling the air with hideous howls,
 And sprightly Fays from raths and dells,
 From wooded slopes and mountain cells.
 But last a noble Knight there came
 With brow of pride, and lip of flame,
 More radiant than the light which shone
 Upon the fam'd Hyperion!
 His armour lac'd with flashing gems,
 Brighter than monarch's diadems,
 Seen through the pale moon's silv'ry haze,
 In quenchless splendor seem'd to blaze.
 His plumes were whiter than the speck
 Of foam upon his charger's neck,
 Or e'en than that which on the lake,
 In breezes fresh the wavelets make.
 A sable steed the knight bestrode,
 With nostrils spread, and eye so proud,
 As conscious of its princely load:
 A flood of varied lustre pour'd
 From the rich gems that deck'd his lord,
 And all around the trappings wide,
 Stream'd in a broad and brilliant tide,
 Till Una deem'd, so mix'd the glow,
 The knight's brave steed was Iris' bow!
 When the procession glitter'd nigh,
 Glad sounds of festive melody,
 From fairy harps, fill'd all the air
 With softest strains and hymnings rare,
 Till e'en the dusky brow of night,
 Relax'd its frown in grim delight.
 Arriv'd upon the tawny strand,
 The graceful leaders of the band,
 With figures bow'd in regal state,
 A passage for the knight create;
 Who, as his bounding courser stood
 At the white margin of the flood,
 Leap'd to the earth, and o'er his mane,
 Flinging the richly jewell'd rein,

Left the steed panting by the tide,
 And sprang to lovely Eva's side!
 At the first impress of his tread
 Old Glens mountain bowed its head!
 And to their prince in homage low,
 Each tree bent down on Glens's brow!

'Twas now that Una's eye survey'd
 The pure ennobling fire that played
 O'er that tall knight's majestic face,
 And marked his lofty, martial grace,
 His manly form, his bearing high,
 The speaking language of his eye,
 Which own'd the power to kill with fear,
 Or draw the sympathetic tear,
 To shine a star when battle calls,
 Or melt to love in festive halls,
 To burn with matchless eloquence,
 To beam a grand intelligence,
 To flash in scorn, or passion wild,
 And gaze as mildly as a child!
 Such was the knight that Una viewed,
 With all a man can boast endued,
 A type of those whom long since gone,
 Poor Erin mourns so sad and lone!
 Of princely mien, of giant size,
 In battle brave, in counsel wise,
 Ardent in love, though quick to feel,
 And draw in hate th' avenging steel,
 But swift to quench fell rancor's brand,
 And give the foeman friendship's hand!
 Frank in each feature, warm in heart,
 Possessing that untutor'd art,
 Which made him first among the free
 For generous hospitality,
 His faith's, his country's joy sublime,
 An Irish chief of olden time!

First Eva gazed upon the knight
 With wonder mingled with affright,
 As though her strange, and mystic course
 Had stung her heart with late remorse;
 But soon her groundless fears had flown,
 So soft his looks, so mild his tone.
 Una, conceal'd not far above,
 Could catch the words which told his love,
 Could hear sweet Eva's charms obtain
 The knight's high praise in meekest strain,
 And listen to the pledge he made,
 As forth he drew his polish'd blade,
 And calling hill, and lake, and shore,
 To hear the solemn oath he swore,
 That, "If for seven successive years,
 On each May morn this maid appears
 To meet me here, and loves but me,
 She, on the seventh, my bride shall be!"
 What anguish fills poor Una's heart,
 What gives the girl that sudden start?
 What mean those tears, that drooping head?
 Eva has given the promise dread!
 And Una weeps to think that earth,
 Which gave this lovely creature birth,
 Must one day to the waters blue,
 Consign that form, that heart so true!
 Eva in answer scarce did speak,
 When on her beauteous, dimpled cheek,
 The knight impress'd a kiss, then flew
 To where his charger stood in view,
 And as he vaulted to his seat,
 The Sylphs and Elves their master meet,
 And all that strange, unearthly train
 Resumes its former ranks again.

Now o'er the wide lake's snowy foam
Its glowing monarch seeks his home,
Then rose from myriad tiny throats,

In swelling strain, aerial notes,
And as his steed careers along,
The banded spirits chaunt this song.

The following description of Killarney is a very admirable word-painted panorama of a very glorious landscape :—

What dreamer borne on airy wings,
In all his wild imaginings
Amid the starry realms of space,
Did ever in his wand'ring trace
Such picturings of loveliness,
Such matchless gorgeoussness of dress ;
Or ever shew'd each wond'ring sense
Such blending of the light intense,
With all the mellow hues which grace
The lines of beauty's sparkling face,
As he on Mangerton who stands,
Viewing the vale below, commands ?
The musing eye should gaze upon
These scenes when up the sky the sun
Reaching its noon, hath pour'd a blaze,
Which glitt'ring in a golden haze,
Paints with a bright, transparent glow
The isles, and lakes, and plains below.
Then can the keen observing eye
Enchantment's wizard charms descry,
And revel in the harmony,
That with a brilliant brush imprints
Its form o'er all in deathless tints,
Till spreading wide its drowsy links,
In sleep the soften'd landscape slinks.
What sombre, silent shadows creep
Along the lake-defending steep !
What lazy mists are rising o'er
The pebbly margin of the shore !
Now doth the isles which gem the tide,
Adown the waters seem to glide,
And on their breasts the tufted grove
Resembles those dark clouds above,
Which with their edge of silver dye,
Are floating o'er the azure sky ;
And farther on see ocean laves
The rock-bound coast with angry waves,
Crowning each crag, and summit grey
With garlands of its snowy spray ;
And stretching far its myriad arms,
In wild diversity of forms.
Till melting dimly from the view
It mingles with the heaven's blue !

Upon a more entrancing scene
No mortal ever gaz'd I wean,
Whether he roved 'mid Norway's pines,
Or where the Alpine torrent shines,
Or by the Rhine's fair banks had stray'd,
And e'en Italia's plains survey'd ;
The rosy colour'd streak that glows
At set of sun on Jura's snows,
The crystal glacier's dazzling light,
Seen on some star-resplendent night,
The dread Niagara's mad foam,
The crater rending the earth's womb,
The sunrise in a southern clime,
All that the earth contains sublime,
Hath never struck the rapturous chord,
Which swells the bosom of the bard,
With mightier force, or sense more keen,
Than would these hills and lakes serene !
A land where shine such scenes as these
Is not a land alone to please,
Nor was it meant by nature's God
That its bold shores and em'rald sod,

In tranced sleep should ever lie,
To feast the passing stranger's eye.
'Tis one with love's undying heat
To make her son's strong hearts to beat,
To fill their breasts with proud desire,
And kindle there each noble fire,
To rouse their minds to active good,
And make the quickly-bounding blood
Assist the energetic soul
To reach prosperity's fair goal,
And with a strong, determin'd power,
Unheeding all the clouds that lour,
To show the isle that gave them birth,
They do not shame their native earth !
On lofty Glenna's tufted head,
The summer's crimson blooms are shed,
And all the mountain's purple plumes,
The gorgeous summer sun illumines ;
Now flowers the yellow daffodil,
And od'rous honeysuckles fill
The air with perfume, hollyhocks
Are glitt'ring on their sturdy stalks,
The ever climbing jessamine,
Its tendrils with the rose intwine,
And out upon the dizzy crag,
The poppy lifts its blood-red flag.
The woods re-echo to the notes
Of music, from ten thousand throats,
On ashen branch, or apple's spray,
The speckled thrush outpours her lay ;
From out some thorn the blackbird's song,
In mellow flood is borne along,
The robin on the hazel sita,
Or nimbly o'er its branches flits,
While sailing placidly on high,
The eagle cleaves the liquid sky.

Amid these scenes with cheek more fair
Than all the flowers that scent the air,
Sat Eva in a pensive mood,
Gazing upon the lake's bright flood.
The solemn shadow on her brow
Assum'd a darker colour now,
And even the mystic air she wore,
Seem'd to have deepen'd more and more.
At times a bright, though transient flush,
Of wild unearthly joy would rush
Her features o'er, and light her eye
With a quick flash of ecstasy ;
Then fly, and leave behind no trace
Upon her calm and pensive face !
 Oft-times, as though in gloomy sleep,
Her looks were fasten'd on the deep ;
Then suddenly the eyeballs roll'd,
And her pure soul would seem to hold
Converse with those bright forms that glide,
And have their home beneath the tide.
Her harp again the maid would take,
And all the neigh'ring echoes wake,
Then while the strings her fingers swept,
And on the air sweet music crept,
Lifting her voice in silv'ry sound,
These strange, wild words went floating round.

The next extract is the bridal of the Chieftain and Eva, and is one of the best and most fanciful in the poem :—

The evening sun has long gone down,
Behind the Toomies' mountain brown,
And midway up the starry sky
The night's dark coursers swiftly fly.
Within the chief of Glena's tower
The bell's loud peal proclaims the hour
When mirth, and song, and harmless jest,
Shall fill with joy each happy guest.
And in the halls what lustre streams !
What pleasure in each visage beams !
What gorgeous flags are floating o'er
The groined arch above the door !
What pomp of spears, and helm, and shield,
Along the walls becomes reveal'd !
But who could count the viands rare
That lay in princely order there ?
Name all the fishes of the lakes,
Or all the birds that haunt the brakes,
And heath, and fen, that met the sight,
Pill'd on the chieftain's board that night ?
Who could describe the nobleness
Which stamp'd each guest, or paint their dress ?
Whose splendor mock'd the rays that pour
From famed Golconda's glitt'ring ore !

High in the midst of that gay crowd,
Among her suitors rich and proud,
Sat Eva, rob'd in bright attire,
Beside her joy o'erpower'd sire !
And never since her natal day
Did beauty's fascinating ray
Illumine more that countenance,
Or add such sparkles to her glance,
As did it then in blending hues,
Over those features rare diffuse !
But 'twas not now that Eva shone
In matchless loveliness alone ;
There was a spiritual air,
Which, stamp'd upon her forehead fair,
Convey'd a sense of mystery
To every wonder-gazing eye,
And made each puzzled mind o'erfraught
With undefin'd and airy thought !
'Twas passing hard to reconcile
The cheerful looks and playful smile
Which wreath'd the maiden's lips, with all
That gloomy shade, which like a pall
At times (though rare) would shroud her face,
And every brilliant hue erase !
Una alone the reason guess'd,
And much it rack'd her trembling breast.
When wine and joy-inspiring song,
Had fill'd with glee that noble throng,
And when his claims to win the maid,
Each chief before her aptly laid ;
The hoary host, while not a sound
Was heard the dazzling board around,
To Eva gives his stern command,
To name the chief who owns her hand !
Now had arriv'd that mystic time,
Ere yet the morn was in its prime ;
When stars begin to fade on high,
And clouds are scatt'ring in the sky.
The aged Chieftain scarcely spoke,
When all the mountain echoes woke,
And thunder on the distant hills
Th' affrighted air with mutt'rings fills !

Now dying slowly on the ear,
Now swelling loud, then trav'ling near,
Till all the castle seem'd to shake,
And e'en the earth itself to quake !
Strick'n with sore dismay and dread,
Each guest uprais'd his wond'ring head,
And chiefs who blanch'd not in the field,
The hue of pallid fear reveal'd !
The gold-hair'd morning's earliest streak,
Began to light each tow'ring peak,
Nor did the torture of suspense,
Long captive hold each palsied sense.
For on the lake, and near at hand,
Appear'd a glorious glitt'ring band,
Whose radiance like the noon-day sun,
No eye could bear to gaze upon !
Each foremost Nymph had silver wand,
Which twinkl'd in her snowy hand ;
And o'er her drooping shoulders flung
A gold-embroider'd mantle hung,
Which just allow'd the eye to see,
A belt of figur'd ivory,
Inlaid with gem and precious stone,
Which form'd a star-resembling zone.
Next burst upon the view a troop
Of Maidens, in a graceful group,
Of beauty rare, with airy forms,
Bearing bright harps upon their arms ;
Which, ever as soft fingers swept,
Delicious music gently crept
Above, below, afar, around,
Breathing Enchantment in its sound !
Behind, the dazzl'd eye survey'd
Myriads of Sprites in rank array'd ;
Attir'd in motley colour'd dress,
The light form'd Fairies onward press,
And the gay Sylphs who live in caves
Far, far below the glassy waves.
Some wore as wreaths upon the brow,
The verdurous Arbutus bough,
While other Fays their temples dress'd
With spray that tips the waves' white crest ;
And every beauteous hue that glows,
And every bloom the summer knows,
To deck this train brought all their aid,
And heighten'd the charms it display'd !
Now on a steed as black as jet,
A noble Knight the vision met,
His aspect brighten'd by a gleam
Of kingly dignity supreme,
Whose blazing armor flash'd afar,
Like some intensely shining star !
Beside him tripping o'er the wave,
Whose crystal top her ankles lave,
Bearing a crown of sparkling sheen,
A lovely water Nymph was seen ;
Who, as across the tide she flew,
Brush'd from the crown the morning dew.
When Eva's eager glancing eye
Did in the throng the knight descry,
She rose from off her seat, and stood
In a majestic attitude !
Then, pointing to the waters clear,
Where cheek'd the band its swift career,
While glist'ning tears begemm'd her cheek,
Thus to her sire did Eva speak.
" Father ! obeying thy command
To tell thee who shall own my hand,
I answer, yonder chieftain brave,
Whose fiery steed disdains the wave,

Claims me as bride, his joys to share,
 And reign within his palace fair!"
 Thus ceasing, while each guest amaz'd,
 In silence on the maiden rais'd
 His eyes which (like that bird's whose gaze
 From off the serpent never strays),
 Fasten'd upon one object stay,
 Owning no power to turn away;
 Eva remov'd the gems which shone
 Upon her white neck, one by one;
 And calling Una, bid her take
 And wear the jewels for her sake.
 Giving her friend a fond embrace,
 As bitter grief convuls'd her face,
 She kiss'd her senseless father's brow,
 Whose head was bent in speechless woe!
 Then on her head a lily wreath,
 More fragrant than the morning's breath,
 She plac'd, whose cups like silver show'd,
 Whose threads in yellow lustre glow'd.
 And now her swift journey wending,
 By the spiral stairs descending,
 While still gaz'd on that wond'ring throng,
 The lovely Eva rushed along!
 More lightly nimble than the fawn
 Does Eva bound across the lawn,
 And soon the maiden's matchless charms
 Are sparkling in her lover's arms!

And now at last did fury fire
 And rage those warrior hearts inspire,
 For when the knight fair Eva clasp'd,
 Each hand a faithful weapon grasp'd,
 And rising up with one accord,
 The chieftains hurried from the board.
 But soon did soft Enchantment's spell,
 The wildness of their passion quell,
 And by its giant power enchain'd,
 Like statue dull each guest remain'd!
 When the strange band had lin'd the shore,
 The beauteous Nymph the crown who bore,
 Near Eva stood, and bowing low,
 Plac'd it upon her marble brow!
 And then the knight took Eva's hand
 And walk'd adown the tawny sand,
 To where his courser's silver shoe
 Scarce seem'd to touch the waters blue!
 Now placing Eva on the steed,
 He bounded on his back with speed.
 Swifter than sunbeams from the sky,
 Athwart the waves the lovers fly!
 And as outrunning the fleet wind,
 The glitt'ring train swept on behind,
 In tones of fairy melody
 These words were heard to mount on high.

The shorter poems in Mr. Gannon's book are well worth perusal; we specially commend The Abbey of Mayo and The Fairy Well. These pieces prove their author to be a thorough Irishman, and a graceful and elegant versifier of our national legends.

The Court of Apollo, and a Remembrance of the Rhine, are bright and fanciful. These poems, and The O'Donoghue, make up the greater part of a volume which we recommend to all our readers.

Henrietta tells us, in her preface, that:—

"In submitting this little volume to the notice of the Public, the Authoress desires to state, that her design in the principal Poem has been to shew the relative influences for good—of Music, Art, and Poetry. In the first tale, that represented as being told by the personification of Music, she has introduced some reference to the history of the Tyrol in the time of Napoleon Bonaparte; and for her description of the conduct of the wars and the character of the peasantry, she has taken the authority of Sir Archibald Alison, in his History of Europe. In the third tale, any allusions made to the persecution of Christians under the Roman Emperor, Diocletian, are in accordance with Gibbon, and also with the Church History of that period. The Authoress fears that her purpose has been but feebly carried out, and, for the sake of the Arts, whose triumphs she attempts to narrate, could wish that the subject had fallen into better hands."

Into more experienced hands the subject might, doubtless, have fallen, but time, patience, and perseverance, will strengthen Henrietta's wings; and, although she sometimes droops, yet she never comes down too suddenly, and when she does reach the ground, she rises gracefully again ; so, we say—courage, Henrietta—" Il monde è, di chi ha pazienza."

Religion without cant, that is God, a God of Love, is the actuating spring of all our poetess' inspiration ; and she dwells with especial pleasure, both to herself and to the reader, on all those portions of the Redeemer's life, in which her own sex were actors. The following, which is almost the entire of a poem entitled The Women at the Cross, furnishes a very fair specimen of her powers :—

'Twas night in Salem's glowing land ;
The rose her dress had folded up ;
And zephyrs, with devoted hand,
Had shut the lily's incense-cup ;

When lo, there burst upon the scene
A night-flow'r of resplendent dye,
Of purer and more noble mien
Than all those dreaming blossoms nigh.

Alas ! alas ! that sunbeams fair
Might never bless that tender form,
Which stood alone, with bosom bare,
Ready to front the fiercest storm.

Yet freely did that stainless breast
The soft, nectarious dew inhale ;
And ev'ry breeze that was its guest
Bore freights of perfume down the vale.

Yea, such was Mary's holy Child,
That now at starlight's noon was born,
A night flow'r, meek and undefil'd,
Whom pleasure's sun might ne'er adorn.

Though lovelier than the sons of earth,
He stood exposed to grief and shame ;
Yet o'er him—even from his birth—
The Spirit's genial fulness came.

His love some precious gift bestow'd
On all who sought it at his hand ;
Who, while their hearts with praise o'er-flowed,
Display'd that treasure through the land.

O Mary ! as thou standest there—
His cross of agony in view,
Thyself a lone one, bow'd with care—
Say, have old Simeon's words come true ?

For has not sorrow's icy steel
Pierced to thy bosom's shrinking core ?
Doth not each severing heart-string feel
That misery's cup is foaming o'er ?

Yet cannot He, whose holy spell
Came o'er thee in thy virgin spring,
Now gently whisper, " all is well,"
And suck the poison from the sting ?

Can he not say, " 'tis glory's price,
A rock to curb death's endless flood,
The great, long-promised sacrifice,—
'Tis Pity with a veil of blood ?"

But now, O gentle Mercy ! canst thou tell What form is that thou seem'st to love so well,

That form o'er which thy soft, enshadowing wing.

With bright, seraphic joy, is fluttering ?
Thou, fairest child of Heav'n ! and thou alone,

Canst rightly make that drooping weeper known.

Hark ! in what dulcet accents she replies,
" O 'tis a long-lost daughter whom I prize !
A jewel found on sin's dark, desert strand,
Now polishing for yon celestial land ;

'Tis one who late was cloth'd in burning shame,

O woman ! blush not when thou hear'st her name ;

'Tis one receiv'd by God, though spurn'd by men,—

Angels rejoice ! 'tis Mary Magdalen."

O Mary ! have thy scorers ever read
The star of fame that hangs above thy head ?

Now brief the time till that inspired star
Shall have its melting light diffused afar ;
For 'twas thy pardoning Master's bold command

To tell thy touching tale in every land ;
O yes ! where'er his dauntless champions tell

Of Heav'n and holiness, of sin and hell ;
Whether 'mid hoary mounts whose long-flown youth

Was woo'd not by the manly voice of Truth,
But who, ev'n now in this their aged time,
Leap and rejoice to hear that noble chime ;
Or valleys, surfeited with sweets intense,
And flowering out in wild magnificence,
With fields all hallow'd to the Rose's reign,
And shades that cradle plants of choicer stain ;

Or mid those rainbow spots that softly rest,
Like bridal gems, on ocean's throbbing
breast,

Those coral isles where savage chieftains dwell,

And Superstition digs her lampless cell ;
Or where the desert breeze is wand'ring free
Along the rosy sands of Araby ;

Where the wild forest shouts an awful hymn
O'er red men, couch'd amid its cloisters dim ;

Beside sweet fountains, lov'd by Greek romance;
Or on the lake's cerulean expanse;
Yea, whether in the bright and palmy
East,
Where Nature freely spreads her daintiest feast;
Or, 'mid the youthful glories of the West,
Whose giant pow'rs still slumber in her
breast;
Or where the Southern zephyr's genial wing
With a voice like pleasant dreams is murmuring,
That wing whose sweet caresses oft delay
Ev'n warrior Death upon his gloomy way;
Or where, all cowering 'neath his load of snows,
The North his flaring borealis shows;
O Mary! even there they'll speak of thee,
Thy penitence, thy love, thy constancy.

Behold! far off in some benighted land,
A little group of dark-brow'd list'ners stand,
While, with surprise, they hear thy blessed tale;
But mark! yon aged warrior's cheek is pale;
Oh! there's a frozen fountain in his breast,
That now is waking from its chilly rest;
Thy burning love has thaw'd its stubborn ice,
And soon 'tis clear as streams in Paradise;
While o'er his heart its healthful waters bound,
Refreshing all that thirsty desert ground;
Till, flowing o'er, it bursts upon the sight
In one resistless show'r of teardrops bright;
For the fountain, thus unseal'd by Heaven's decree!
Is that of tenderness and sympathy.

But now another scene absorbs our eye;
Lo! 'tis a Christian temple, fair and high;
Many are there whose heart-gush'd tones
ascend;
Many are there whose voices idly blend;
Yet soon on one alone is turned our gaze;
She calmly listens to the song of praise;
Yet not with feelings of entranced despair,
Like some doom'd captive, when the morning air
Brings to his cell the early cuckoo's call,
Or the clear gush of mountain waterfall;
For oh! his boyhood loved such music free,
And bitter is that sigh, "'tis nought to me:"
But her deluded mind endures no pain
At its own discordance with the saintly strain;
Her careless ear finds not its swelling soul,—
Just like some empty sound it seems to roll.
'Tis over now; and hark! the gracious call
Of the glad gospel seeks the hearts of all;
The preacher's voice is soft, expressive clear,
Its touching thrill alone might start a tear;
But what rich words are those that gently flow,
'Mid the strange hush? why rose that fervent glow,
That deep, warm flush of feeling which we see
Diffusing o'er his brow so tremblingly?
O list! he speaks of one who meekly crept
Unto her Master's feet, and softly wept;

Whose tears, combin'd with streams of fragrant spice,
Flow'd o'er those feet, a pleasing sacrifice,
Because they savour'd of that sweeter love
Which in her breast was flutt'ring like a dove;
He tells of how she wiped each drop away
Ev'n with the rich dark locks that round her lay;
Tells how her lips bestow'd their tender kiss,—
But leaves the heart itself to paint her bliss
When all her heavy load of sin fell down,
And Christ receiv'd it gladly as a crown;
And told the child of faith she was forgiv'n,
Bade her depart in peace, and hope for Heav'n.
But then his voice grows softer, deeper still,
And sinks into the heart with fuller thrill,
As he repeats the Saviour's firm decree,
(Which had been just fulfill'd so solemnly)
That o'er the world, where'er himself was taught,
There, too, those deeds of love which she had wrought
Should be reveal'd, and handed down to fame,
A sweet memorial of her lowly name.
The tale is done; he shuts the precious Book,
And gazes on the crowd with earnest look;
With strong, persuasive ardour doth implore Entreat, invite, each soul to come and pour its sins, its sorrows, on that gentle Lord,—
O yes! to come this night with glad accord;
To lean upon his strength, and fear no
frown,
Arm'd with the cross, to battle toward the crown;
He speaks of angel welcomes, endless
peace;
How tenderly he lingereth still to cease!
He is a stranger in that varied scene,
His own loved flock are fed 'mid valleys
green;
Yet his quick eye discerns the outcast's form,
And silent prayer sends up its heavings warm.
Few moments more, and then the parting hymn
Is softly soaring through the twilight dim;
But still for her that music lives in vain,
Still, as before, she scarcely heeds its strain;
Yet not, as then, with idle, passive breast,
For a strange pow'r hath broken on her rest,
She thinks, she feels; O Magdalen! like thee,
She lets her heart yield up its vanity;
And now, that bandage gone, it learns its need.
For the dark wounds glare out, and freely bleed,
Ah! that harsh covering had no balm to shed,
But poison was inwove with ev'ry thread;
With horror she reviews her former way;
She shrinks, yet hopes, and almost tries to pray;
She thinks if that sweet Saviour could be found,
Far off, or near, if but on earthly ground,

She'd fly, and, at his footstool bending low,
 Love him, like that blest Mary long ago;
 But he's not here, his face she cannot see,
 How then ensure his love's reality?
 Perchance on her he would refuse to smile,—
 Might not that penitent have been less vile?
 So speaks the wildering voice of unbelief,
 And still keeps back the sinner from relief,
 Forbids the infant Faith to lift her eye,
 And see that same Redeemer thron'd on high,
 Ready to welcome, pity, pardon all
 Who raise their hearts to him with humble call.
 But He who wakes a slumb'ring soul is strong;
 And, ere another Sabbath brings its song,
 O Mary! she has come with trust sincere—
 Thy tale has won for thee a sister dear.
 Then calm those weepings o'er thy bitter loss;
 Salvation's palmy wreath becrowns that Cross;

And thou, who hast the pow'r of evil known,
 Who feel'st almost as if thyself alone
 Was guilty of the loved one's wondrous woe, Canst thou not joy at Satan's overthrow?
 Oh! hast thou no faint vision of the morn
 When he shall burst the boasting grave with scorn;
 And thou, devoted one, shalt hasten there,
 While yet the dew-drops chill the drowsy air,
 And, gazing in, two sun-like angels see,
 Sitting in pure, exultant majesty?
 Has hope no prophet whisper of the voice
 That then shall bid thy faithful soul rejoice,
 When, like sweet honey dropping on thy heart,
 A fond, familiar "Mary" makes thee start,
 And turn thy weeping eyes with swift accord,—
 Then cry "Rabboni" to thy risen Lord?

The following lines from Rose and Eugenie, the first tale in The Traveller's Dream, refer to the blindness of the heroine:—

In early childhood's ruddy hours
 No veil was o'er her pleasant eyes;
 And mem'ry nursed a dream of flowers,
 And rich, star-dimpled azure skies.

But nought could e'er convince the maid
 That such fair scenes to earth were given;
 She said her infant soul had stray'd
 Back to its tempting home in Heav'n.

Again, we have an allusion to a well known custom among the Alpine shepherds:—

"Praise ye the Lord," shout the Alpine hills,
 As the evening echoes go;
 'Twas the shepherds that sit by the lofty rills,
 Who gave the word, and downward it thrills
 To their mates in the mead below.

All's still; but hark! from the verdant height
 That voice comes pealing again;
 "Goodnight, goodnight, till our fields are bright,
 Till God doth send us His golden light;
 Brothers, amen, amen;"
 And Echo takes flight with her wings of might,
 And repeats "goodnight, amen."

The following is a description of the Tyrolese army, when marching to battle:—

It is not the morn with her delicate hum
 That wakes to the heart each rustling valley,
 But the feet of the brave, as they come,
 they come,
 As from north and south they swiftly sally.
 By the Eisach, black with its passionate race,
 There passeth a nobler and mightier stream;
 In the valley of Inn they are marching apace,
 Where the shaded gold of the maize doth gleam;
 And the ardent sons of Adigé
 With banners of beauty pursue their course;
 Till soon, all form one shining display,
 As they meet their Kaiser's veteran force;

Then away, in glory and strength they go,
 And war's wild march is heard 'mid the mountains,
 Now thrillingly loud,—now mellow and low,
 Or coming from far with a concert of fountains;
 Hark! hark! its magnificent melody seems Like Liberty cheering her champions' array;
 And hearts bound up to the region of dreams,
 As trumpet and drum go rolling away,
 And the chiming treble rings over the streams,
 Like a host of tinkling fairies at play.
 Sweet tides of blessings and praises pour
 From the throngs that stand at each cottage door;

"Look, look, 'tis my son, how noble and gay!"
 Cries she with the locks so slender and grey;
 "O father! what brave new stories for me!
 When again at eve I sit on thy knee;"
 "God carry thee back to my lonely side!"
 Is the pray'r of the young and yearning bride.
 But the throb of sorrow is now no more Than an infant's song 'mid an organ's roar,—
 Not hush'd, not quench'd, but smother'd o'er.

The inspiring standard that floats overhead
 Is the eagle of hope with her pinions outspread;
 And, her steadfast eye of glory upturning,
 She beholds the sun of liberty burning;
 But hark to the leaping beat of the drum!
 And the stirring air 'tis grandly sounding;
 While the forests hum and the breezes come,
 And the startled flocks are friskily bounding.

Again, we have the scene which occurs in that part of the tale where the stranger finds Rose in a cave weeping over her dead brother. Having quieted her fears, he thus offers her his home and protection:—

Thou art not friendless, drooping Rose!
 Time, change and ease may soothe thy woes;
 I offer thee a beauteous bow'r,
 Made fragrant by thy namesake flow'r,
 Where still the voice of streams shall bless
 The mountains' warbling shepherdess;
 A father's love, a father's care,
 I ask thy stricken youth to share;
 But hearken, and I'll tell thee all,
 Ev'n though 'twill force me to recall
 Feelings that once were sunshine's cup,
 But now, deform'd by darksome woes,
 Are worn volcanoes, bellowing up
 A fitful blast of fiery throes,
 Whose quivering ashes wither o'er
 All that the sunshine cheer'd before.
 Yes, I've been buoyant, bright and young,
 And fond, fresh thoughts on mine have hung,
 And mellow bridal bells have rung;
 For our hearts were woven in that tie
 Which years and sorrow may not sever;
 But the pale-horsed victor pass'd us by,
 And our gordian knot was cut for ever;
 Ay, the sweet wife forsook my side,
 Murmur'd a low farewell, and died,
 She whose deep love could brave all woe.
 And, through each chance that life might bring,
 Still more refin'd and clear should grow,
 Just like her own pure golden ring;
 She left me, but her moveless arms
 Clasp'd a live babe of fairy charms;
 Yet searchingly I view'd its face,
 It seemed to lack some common grace;
 The shock burst out—it could not see—
 Afflicted girl! 'twas blind like thee."
 The father pauses, clasps his head,
 While heavy tears course down his cheeks
 Like fire-wrung drops of molten lead;
 And then all brokenly he speaks:
 "Those smileless lips—that passive brow—
 All dead as some still, lovely night;
 Child of my soul—Eugenie! thou
 Wast a cold burden on my sight,
 Just as a sad, forsaken maid
 Heeds not the gilding of the case
 Where her dead lover's heart is laid!
 Ev'n so the gems, the flow'rs, the grace

Which deck'd my costly palace hall,
 To me no cheer, no comfort gave;
 I saw them through my sorrow's pall,
 They seem'd to form one mocking grave.
 I could not bear it; and away
 To tents, and fields, and fame I fled;
 Yet I love not such bold array;
 Would that some lowly peasant shed,
 With social peace and bliss were mine—
 Such joys as but so late were thine.
 Methinks so hard a fate is strange;
 O 'tis not met in nature's range!
 The oak tree may be shorn of leaves,
 Its head may bear the wintry snow,
 But still the virgin ivy cleaves
 All greenly round its trunk below.
 Ah! could that ivy droop and die,
 The oak were then fit type of me,
 For my green thing is faded, I
 When stript of all my summer glee,
 Saw her who might have sooth'd my care—
 My clinging child—a stricken thing;
 O I am lonely, lonely! where Doth Comfort hide her fleecy wing?
 Maiden! I've come to seek it here,
 Yes, ev'n from out thy lov'd one's bier;
 Ah selfish words! yet listen on,
 Let not thy sympathy be gone;
 Once did my daughter's tears outswim
 At a wild snatch of mountain hymn;
 In hope I made her chambers float
 With ev'ry rich and melting note;
 It would not do; in vain, in vain
 I sought that strange, enchanting strain;
 And oh! there was no other lay
 That thus could charm her heart to play.
 Wild warbler of the Alpine hills!
 That strain within thy bosom thrills,
 I've heard it flowing 'mid thy rills;
 And in thy voice there is a tone
 The child of art may never own,
 Something that searches all the heart:—
 O come! arise! thou may'st impart
 To her some gleam of life and joy,
 Godlike may be thy song's employ.

Then, putting her simple faith in opposition to his own unbelief, he says:—

But thou, but thou, bright Alpine Rose !
Like some clear lake in meek repose,
Thy faith receives God's light—and glows.

The next passage we quote is that describing the fall of the avalanche on the French and Bavarian troops. The authoress, in her notes, gives an historical account of this circumstance :—

It was ordain'd that once again
Hope should illumine the Alpine glen :
There, where the gentle chamolais stirs
'Mid lofty labyrinths of firs,
The mountains' rough-trained guardians lie,
With gasping breath and straining eye ;
While boldly march the boastful foe
Down in the thread-like pass below ;
Proud casques show forth the daylight's streams,
Clear as the bright young soldier's dreams
Show tides of glories to be won.
Ere yet life's sparkling course is run ;
O'er blades, that seem like waving light,
The living sunrays flash their flight ;
Embracing them in quiv'ring play,
As if those swords were pure as they.
Like orient sunset's glist'ning train,
When zephyrs breathe a quick'ning strain,
That pageant sweeps its stately smile
Through the lone mountains' high defile ;
While martial symphonies are bounding,
And battle's tinkling trappings sounding ;
And many a laughing word of jest Springs up from the light and careless breast.
But hark ! the massive woods o'erhead
Are rent by sounds of mighty rushing ;
Down, down, with hot, impetuous tread—
Like now-born cataracts outgushing
From craggy wombs of darkness old,—
The mountains' daring legions leap,
And, with flush'd brows and bosoms bold,
Plunge into combat's deathful deep ;
Yet ere the struggle waxes warm,
That mount which volley'd down the storm—
As if inspir'd with furious zeal,
As if its granite heart could feel
A yearning for those champion bands,
Battling below with fervent hands ;
As if asham'd to stand serene
'Mid such a fierce, combustive scene—
First gives a rumbling heave which thrills
To the still depths of distant hills ;

Then, girding her huge loins with thunder,
And challenging eternal wonder,
The hoary mother with delight
Follows her children to the fight ;—
Lo ! 'tis the awful avalanche !
Away, away, with shivering knell,
As though a host of planets fell,
It reels into the quaking dell,
Crown'd with destruction terrible,
Making the very sunbeams blanch ;
And grasping in its ravenous grave
Two nations' blossom of their brave.
A grim, wild calm, a pulseless hush
Succeeds the nervous tragedy ;
Clear sounds the Eisach's gloomy gush,
On, on careering to the sea ;
An emblem of that solemn rush
Of life into eternity.
In sullen glory at their deed,
Like Amazons the mountains stand ;
" Man ! touch us not, or meet your meed,"
Seems trac'd in frowns along their band.
Prostrate within that fated pass
Lie youth, age, valour, love and joy ;
Crush'd small in one unheaving mass
The veteran clasps his dreamy boy ;
The pictur'd girl's unconscious smile
(The only smile that lingers here)
Sinks in that opening heart the while,
With fearful faithfulness ; just near
There shines a little braid of gold ;
Torn from the lover's bleeding arm,
And round those stones, so rough and cold,
Forced to entwine its silken charm.
O France ! within thy fields and bowers,
Bavaria ! on thy far-spread plains,
Your daughters' eyes shall give ye showers ;
And love shall rue the Tyrol's chains.
When pomp's vain vapour melts away,
When bursts the day-king's bubble gem,
O God ! may none be heard to pray
The mountain still to cover them.

The subjoined verses are sung by the blind daughter of the Tyrol when leaving her mountain home :—

Thou wildly glorious mountain breeze,
That ridest past my head !
So rich with rushing melodies
From the raving rapid's bed ,
I blend with thee my last farewell,
A playmate's fond farewell.

My old, soft-rustling evergreen,
I leave a charge with you ;
When flowers once more perfume the scene,
O tell them I was true !
That, though they slept, I said farewell,
Give them my lone farewell.

Perchance my nursing violets
Hear it beneath their clay,
And oft, when dew each bosom wets,
With pensive breath shall say
They had a dream of sad farewell,
Their Mountain Lark's farewell.

Sweet was thy shade, my lowly home,
So largely blest of God ;
Ah ! he was never wont to roam,
Who presses the soldier's sod ;
To thee, and many a friend, farewell,
Earth's homes must hear farewell.

And few whose hearts have warmly beat,
But know that sound, farewell ;
With memory's household words 'tis set,
And hath a life-long spell ;
Ye tender friends ! I weep farewell,
My heart bleeds out farewell.

My own, my noble fatherland !
Bold mountains of the brave,
Crowned by a tragic glory's hand ;

Scene of my brother's grave !
I linger yet to say farewell,
I cannot feel farewell.

Oh ! when on Heaven's aerial tide
I'm borne, with vision free,
I'll wave each wondering world aside
Till I've gazed down on thee ;
But list ! he comes, now, now, farewell !
Echo thy child's farewell.

The following images occur in the description of her journey :—

There was a ghost-like loveliness
Abroad upon the hills below ;
Like to a sleeping angel's dress
Appeared the glorious moon-rapt snow ;
Or if that fair, ethereal scene,
So softly cold, so brightly pale,
So meek in majesty serene,
Might have its like in earthly tale,

'Twould be a young and queenly bride
Who, in her love's delightful hour,
By some mysterious stroke had died,
And lay within her lily bower,—
Lay there in still and touching state,
With all her marriage garments on,
While death with tender reverence sate
On such a chastely beauteous one.

Rose, having by the power of her wild music succeeded in arousing the dormant soul of Eugenie, returns to her beloved land to die. In speaking of the glories which she hopes to have revealed to her in Heaven, she thus mentions the sea :—

But the sea, that mystery so dear,
That raver whose dreams I've longed to hear,
Ah ! it hath many a pass of death,
Can Heaven smile on its rolling breadth ?

Must its glory be lost to me ? alas !
Yet no ! by Thy Throne is a sea of glass,
And I'll catch the heave of a crystal wave,
Lo ! there it is,—and with not one grave.

The Picture is the title of the second story in The Traveller's Dream. We give the passage which describes the meeting of two hostile ships at night, and the death of Lucelle :—

The roar of a great majesty
Is lifted up, as the full sea,
Run wild with power, rears files on files
Of towering, glassy, ebon piles,
All pinnacled with curling snow,
Then, breathing thunder, lays them low.
Strong hearts lie captive in their quakings,
These boards have caught the aspen's shakings ;
With what rude raptute files the blast ;
But the worst hour is gaining fast :
It comes, for with the next fierce wind
The meeting crash is not behind ;
Both echo off with chorused sweep,
While blood's red stars drop on the deep ;
The gales, like rapt spectators round,
Now shout, now wail despair's drear sound,
Till, frenzied by the severed flush
Of strong impatience, in they rush,
And do a deadlier work than all ;
For hark ! why comes that piteous call
Of utter loss, that reeling shock ?
Ah ! the keel splinters on a rock,—
A leak is sprung, and with hoarse din
The black destroyer gurgles in ;
Babels of winds, words, waters swell ;
O where the artist ? where Lucelle ?

She's standing at the very bow,
And the loosed life-boat is below ;
Her half grey locks all stream astray,
Her garb is dripping with the spray ;
One leap would bear her safe away.

As one that in a nightmare dreaming
Runs from some pressing shadow foe,
To a safe height or depth's clear seeming,
Yet past the foreground cannot go ;
So stands she there, transfixed and numb,
Absorbed in terror's mute excess ;
The storm is hushed down to a hum,
Like the low lay of tenderness
Sung by a wandering idiot girl,
When sorrowing for days gone by,
And unrequited love's lost pearl
Still seeking with that lonely sigh ;
Who, with a look of eager pleading,
Stops short at every garden gate,
And begs one bough of Love-lies-bleeding,
For tassels to her cap of state.
But there Lucelle, with glaring eye,
And shut hands fastened to her sides,
Still puts not forth one nerve to fly,—
And now, away the life-boat glides ;
Once more the charging gust doth sound,
And with a worried panther's bound
Snaps her up from the trembling ground ;

O hapless woman! she is lost;
Down with a wheeling fling she's tost
Into a satiated cave;
And the great billow seals her grave.
But ere she's gone, lo! on her eyes,
What lightning shifted scenes arise?
A forest cottage—and a mother;
And then the face is of another,
'Tis night like now;—next comes the main,
With dull remorse and troublous pain;

But lastly, all dissolve away
Into one softly rosy ray,
Which glides up, bow-like, round her
form,
Widening in many a colour warm;
Aye, she had felt some shade of rest,
For lately hope within her breast
Had wove one fair, though secret fold
From threads of truth the artist told.

The following lines are from the Roman Bridal:—

The morn of pomp was come;
Yet tarried thy bark, young bride!
There were those that watched, with wondering hum,
By the beautiful Euxine tide;
It had gladdened the heart of Byzantium
But to look on the slaves at thy side.

Ah! what could thy ailing be?
That wave, which thou camest not o'er,
Seemed casting in wreaths of diamonds
for thee,
As it sunnily broke on the shore;
And on yonder gleaming board thou might'st see
A superb and bountiful store.

For the costly feast was made;
The falernian wine was brimming,
In the graceful cups of Greece displayed,

And with orient roses swimming;
While the couch of luxury was laid,
All rich with its golden trimming.

Were there not virgins fair
Well fitted to follow thy tread?
Had they not chosen out garments rare,
And tastefully tired the head;
They fluttered and sighed—they had fain repair
For to see the bright stranger wed.

Glad children had been in the field,
And returned half faint and oppressed,
With roses as soft as Italia could yield,
For the bed of thy mid-day rest;
O where could thy wonted pride be concealed?
For here might its dreams be caressed.

One more specimen, from the Miscellaneous Poems, and we have done with this volume. This pretty, graceful little poem is called The Wreath of the Hamlet:—

On a beautiful bank where the bird had mirth,
And the zephyr its sweetest sigh,
Where the sunshine of buttercups rose from the earth,
And welcomed the beams that from heaven had birth,
There were some who would say goodbye.

The morn still peeped from her cradle of gold,
With its curtains so rosily dy'd;
But the friends—the Wreath of the Ham-let's wold—
Should close to each other ere flowers do fold,
Should each have the dreams of a bride.

They sought for a rose, and with playful grief
'Twas laid in the locks of her
Who was going forth with a bright young chief;
It was red as his flag, when in high relief
It glowed on the martial stir.

They pull'd up a lily of melting blue
From the breast of the lucid lake,
As a gift for her who had vow'd to view,
Through life, the skies' and the billows' hue,
For her roving mariner's sake;

For one, whose flower of the wave she'd be,
And whose eye was a mystic star
That coldly looked on the field and tree,
But smiled in glory over the sea,
And down to the rocks afar.

They took down a spray of the hawthorn
sweet,
New bright on its branches blowing,
As a gift for the maiden whose lightsome feet,
Led on by the love of a bridegroom
meet,
To a life as wild was going;—

Was going away to the woodman's tent,
Where blossoms there none but the free;
Where vainly the emigrant's ear is bent
For aught but a song from the wigwam sent,
Or the dirge of the hoary tree.

From a quiet lustre of dew-tipp'd blades
They drew forth a violet fair,
For that girlish brow with the golden braids—
For the youngest of all, who in home's
dear shades
Would still have her pleasure or care.

For the heart of a playmate had crept unseen;
 And silently into her own;
 As the shoot of a plant, when its germs are green,
 Will band to its fellow, and mingle their sheen,
 None heeding till thus they are grown.

And her life, like that velvet flower she wore,
 Should be veill'd from the winds of earth;
 While the gentle sorrows that came to her door
 Like the blessed dew and the rain should pour,
 And from Heaven alone have birth.

But what intended these parting maids
 By their gifts of a diverse bloom,
 Culled from the bower and the wilding glades,
 From the sparkling lake and the simple shades;
 And yet all with a clear perfume?

'Twas to tell that though varied the paths
 they'd wend,
 And the feelings and forms which were given,
 Yet each flower of the Hamlet's Wreath would attend
 That the sweets of virtue and faith should ascend
 Unfailingly upward to Heaven.

We shall conclude with the following beautifully simple lines from the Poetical Pieces, entitled The Buttercup:—

Say, fairy-like queen of the meadow, —
 Who bids thy young being unfold?
 Who gives thee that emerald palace,
 And that raiment of glistening gold?

Who makes thy twin-sister, the Daisy,
 So fondly to dwell by thy side;
 And sends thee supplies of sweet honey,
 For the bees that around thee abide?

Who gives thee to Spring as a jewel, —
 As a crown for her virgin brow?
 So that all the dark remnants of Winter
 May own her dominion and bow.

Who makes thee inspire such rapture
 In the heart of the sportive child?
 And in him who has flown from the city,
 To see one so lovely and wild.

Thy breast as it gazes on heaven,
 Seems moistened with gratitude's dew —
 Seems oft to our question replying,
 " 'Tis the goodness of God unto you."

O yes, little eloquent wilding,
 In whatever region thou art,
 As a golden star of His goodness,
 Dost thou gladden the Christian's heart.

Far more than thy exquisite sisters,
 Who are born of the cultured sod,
 Thou teachest the beautiful lesson
 Of trusting dependence on God.

Sunny Buttercup, who does not love thee,
 And rejoice when he sees thee expand,
 Like a smile glowing over the meadow —
 Like a message from God to our land?

One of the dangers attendant upon the cultivation of a taste for the composition of what is called Religious Poetry, arises from the fact, that every body who can read a Bible thinks he can write poetry upon Bible subjects; and he is encouraged in this error by the vast number of hymns which he has read, or heard sung. Now, it is inconsistent with the history of literature, that any of its branches should be detached from the service of religion. The oldest literature which we have is in the Bible. "The human heart," it is said, "will always ask some higher expression for its feelings and imaginations, than the common language of life." Literature is this same higher expression; but of all the branches of literature, the poetical is the highest expression of the feelings and the imagination. The oldest poetry which we have is in the Bible. Poetry is the most ancient form of literature, and religion is the most ancient form of poetry. For what is the sublimest poetry, says a foreign reviewer, but religion, the truths of which, in all ages and countries, it has been its office to represent and embody in expressive symbols? And religion itself, though infinitely higher than poetry, by reason of its purity, and still more differenced from philosophy, as being itself the very principle of life, can only be suitably exhibited in those magnificent forms, by which it is the business of imagination to express, however mythically, the otherwise incommunicable ideas indelibly impressed on the human mind, by the hand of its omnipotent Creator.

“‘Twas God himself that first tuned every tongue,
And gratefully of him alone they sung.”

Hence the earliest poetry of which we have any record treats of theology and cosmogony—the generation of the gods and the creation of heaven and earth, furnish the sublime arguments of the earliest bards. And it is remarkable, that wherever literature has been revived after a long period of seeming death, its revival has been owing to an under current of religious reformation, which was seeking for its appropriate expression.

The examples of Virgil, of Tasso, and of Milton, sufficiently demonstrate the advantages of the connexion between learning and poetry; but of all poetry, to religious poetry is learning most necessary. A criticaster may probably think that it presents only fatal facilities. A certain class of religious poetry may possess such facilities, which are fatal enough both to author and reader. The class to which they appertain is that to which learning is not necessary, that which claims uneducated originality and inspiration, though maudlin, which is underived. It is that class of pseudo-poetry which is produced by ignorance, addressed to ignorance, and applauded by ignorance—Poetry originating in a state of factitious enthusiasm, or in a spirit of interested hypocrisy and sectarian cant—in fine, such poetry as Robert Montgomery's The Omnipresence of the Deity contains—a work composed wholly of centos from evangelical writers, and the ravings of religious bedlamites, unrelieved by the least suggestion of philosophy, and unredeemed by any manifestation of piety or truth.

Such is the religious poetry which presents the tempting facilities so strongly urged, and such as the poetry, such is the religion of which it is the expression. The sects that affect this style of sentimental devotion, despise learning in their spiritual teachers, and prefer the unintelligible ravings of ignorant enthusiasm. With such the profoundest ignorance is the mother of the truest devotion. This is a very common idea with those who have never felt the influence, nor attained that perfection of which the human understanding is rendered capable by education. Religion, they think, is entirely independent of any acquirements of science, and incapable of receiving either elucidation or aggrandisement from any of its speculative refinements.

When reason was clouded by prejudice, and the understanding darkened by ignorance, the exertion of the divine power in miracles, or immediate fulfilment of familiar and long expected prophecies, could alone be sufficient to establish the divine authority of the Christian religion. But when education and science have matured the understanding, and reason has discovered and felt the strength of its powers, it then wanders forth secure, in the labyrinths of enquiry—can trace the nature and attributes of the Deity in the perfection of his works, from observing its own freedom to will and do what is good, can discover its own deficiency in the purity of his sight, and, from the principles of natural justice, infer the punishment which such a defection from duty deserves, the need of expiatory services, and the inefficiency of human endeavours to effect them. From these and similar modes of reasoning, and an inability to arrive at any certainty, it at length perceives the want of some supernatural communication; and when, by means of the same faculties, it shall have investigated and approved of the dispensation offered, and been satisfied of its authenticity its purity, and perfection, from such internal and convincing proofs of reason, the soul becomes enabled to render to God the acceptable homage of faith in his promises, and the merits of his Son; of faith, not merely assenting, but quick and lively; productive of all that benevolence and good will to mankind, for which the advent of the Saviour was proclaimed to the world.

Religious poetry in this age of the world, should take this high point of philosophical endeavour. If learning be so necessary to the religionist, more especially is it necessary to the religious poet; for every poet is an enthusiast. The ignorant enthusiast acts from the dictates of internal conviction, and his internal convictions proceed (at least according to his own ideas) from the knowledge of truth ; but here he stops ; he enquires no further, either how he came by them, or how far they are consistent with, or contrary to the great laws of natural reason and justice ; his convictions, therefore, arise from no certain authority, nor are they confirmed by the decisions of cool and dispassionate judgment ; by what motives his conduct may be directed is left to the doubtful operations of prejudice or passion, and by what arguments defended, to the blind and partial system of inward feeling—like the madman, who reasons right from wrong principles, he also takes for granted the truth of certain principles, of which his mind, neither enlightened by science, nor strengthened by learning, is unable to detect the error, or, if detected, remove ; and on these he acts with all the impetuosity, and often real fortitude, which the occasion may demand. The poor man who fancies himself a king, and acts with the dignity which he is conscious should be attached to such a station, calls forth, indeed, more pity, but excites far less apprehension. To preserve the religious poet from this madness, and to prevent him from making others mad also, learning and science are indispensably necessary.

“Henrietta” has led us, through her genuinely sacred productions, into this disquisition upon “pious poetry.” We hope soon again to meet her and Mr. Gannon on new ground ; but let each remember a wise saying of Bulwer Lytton’s—THE THOUGHT IS THE MUSE, THE VERSIFICATION IS ONLY THE DRESS !

As we write of religious poetry, the following very exquisite lines may be here introduced as a specimen of what the writer of such poetry, when not of the highest class, may arrive at. The lines are extremely beautiful and thoughtful, and teach the grand moral, that although every man can know the sins committed, God alone sees the temptations surmounted. We may add, that the lines are by the writer of the new novel, Hills and Hollows, reviewed in our present Number :—

THE POOR FALLEN ONES.

Have we then no tears to shed?
 Are our hearts seared or dead?
 Humankind,
 Womankind,
 Saved from the snare?
 Shall we crush the fallen reed,
 Sisters—withal their need,
 Hideously,
 Piteously,
 Crazed with despair.

2.

Alas! they're a shameless set,
 But are ye blameless yet?
 Blighting them,
 Slighting them,
 Cank'ring their youth.
 Forget not—who spurn them now—
 Many's the burning vow
 Winningly,
 Sinningly,
 Stole them from Truth.

3.

A deeply degraded lot,
 Abject and aided not,
 Weary hearts,
 Dreary hearts,
 Lost to fair fame.
 Unpitied ills harden them—
 Bless God, and pardon them,
 Healthy folks,
 Wealthy folks,
 Spotless in name!

4.

Ignoble and low 'tis true,
 Blotting our social view,
 Paining us,
 Staining us,
 E'en with their sight.
 But think ye displacing them
 Serves for effacing them—
 Hiving them,
 Driving them,
 Far from the light.

5.

Oh ! what's to become of them?
 Try to save some of them,
 Healingly,
 Feelingly,
 Shaping their days.
 Afford them a biding place,
 Home—not a hiding place—
 Readily,
 Steadily,
 Teaching God's ways !

6.

'Tis blindly debasing them,
 Houselessly chasing them,
 Rushingly,
 Crushingly,
 Crowded in sin.
 Beware ! 'tis a crying curse
 When the Bad fly to worse ;
 Are they all
 Past recall ?
 Who sees within ?

7.

Woe's me ! there are glaring ones,
 Frenzied and daring ones,
 Tearlessly,
 Fearlessly,
 Reckless of Hate.
 But more are forlorn ones,
 Famished and torn ones,
 Whiningly,
 Piningly,
 Mourning their fate.

8.

Did each her dark wrongs unfold,
 Well might our blood run cold !
 Love believed,
 Love deceived,
 Anguish and Wrath.
 Sad mothers bemoaning them,
 Brothers disowning them,
 Cast away
 Fast they stray
 Down by sin's path.

9.

Not harshly abusing them,
No, nor ill using them, (Maddening some, Saddening some)
Makes them amend.
Instruct them to pray instead,
Earning pure daily bread,
 Bear with them,
 Share with them,
He will befriend.

10.

Poor Outcasts—for Peace they sigh,
Sure 'twere release to die !
 Who shall say
 Such as they Mercy ne'er found.
'Twere hard all their woes to tell,
Christ alone knows it well ;
 Judge no more,
 Once before
He wrote on the ground.

ART. VIII.—WARDS OF COURT AND THEIR RELIGION.

In the matter of The O'Malleys, Minors.

Important Judgment in Chancery,

(Extracted from The Daily Express, November 22nd, 1858.)

As a diseased state of the blood through the effects of time, good air, and wholesome diet, is restored to a healthful condition, so the acrid humors of sectaries in the body politic are gradually dispersed by time, converse with those of other sects, and the softening influence of an enlarged and liberal system of education. In this country religious differences which have so long blazed high and fiercely almost to the ruin of the country's best interests, are dying out, and although the smouldering fire is occasionally fanned into a flame by some religious topic, which brings the two great creeds of the country into antagonism, yet the materials for a conflagration are now sadly wanting, or to speak in plain English and not in figures, fanatics have become rare and are becoming rarer. When the educated men of the first quarter of the present century, might be classed at fifty per cent of bigots, the second quarter has not produced more than ten; and we have reasons to hope that the next quarter will diminish the number to the lowest average to which education can reduce bigotry—five per cent, an average below which as long as there are sects, and fools and knaves, we can hardly expect to find bigotry reduced. That the bitter blood of sectarianism is becoming gradually sweetened, is testified by the reasonable or nearly reasonable observations of the press, on the decision of the Chancellor in the case of the O'Malleys minors. There was not on one side a howl of indignation and abuse, and on the other one of triumph and recrimination, but party papers, albeit with more or less of the tone of self-righteousness, have approximated to the language and reasoning of ordinary educated men. It is in this spirit we approach the consideration of that case, and do not fear but that the soundness of the Chancellor's judgment may be questioned without accusing him of incompetency or bigotry, without using a disrespectful word or making a single injurious insinuation. We would deal with this case as the legal publications of the day might deal with decisions of the different Courts of Law and Equity, as they frequently do, and without importing more of the religious element than if the question were one of Real Property Law. Such a mode of dealing with this case is not likely to find favor with the non-professional reader, but we trust that from the interest which such a question as this, must excite in the mind of every individual in the community, not utterly destitute of family ties, albeit writing dry law, as we are, we shall make ourselves understood by every man of ordinary intelligence.

The main facts of the case, although we cannot admit that they lead to the inferences drawn by the Lord Chancellor, we shall give in the brief and lucid statement of His Lordship in pronouncing judgment in the case.

“It appears from these affidavits that Ellen O'Malley, the mother of the minors, was the eldest daughter of William Jameson, formerly a sergeant in the Constabulary Force. She had been strictly and carefully educated by her parents in the Reformed faith as a Protestant. She married John O'Malley, a constable of the force, but he was a Roman Catholic. They had eight children, five sons and three daughters. William, the eldest child, is twelve years of age; the three daughters are of the ages of ten, eight, and seven respectively; the others are of the ages of five years and two years; and the youngest is under two years. The elder portion of the family were regularly sent to school in the several places in which John O'Malley was stationed. In the National school of one of these places they were taught and treated as Protestant children, and were returned as such to the National Board by the master, who was himself a Roman Catholic. In the schools at the other places they were instructed, as well as registered, as Protestant children. They attended Divine service in the Protestant Church, and also the catechetical instruction on each Saturday, when the Protestant children of the church were instructed by the rector in the Church Catechism. The eldest boy attended the Sunday school in connexion with the church, and was sent to church by his father at a time when Ellen O'Malley was absent from home, a patient in the Galway infirmary. The family were visited by the Protestant clergymen, and the children were occasionally taught by their father at home out of the Holy Scriptures, and from the Catechism of the United Church. It does not appear that in any one instance their father ever had taken any of them to a Roman Catholic service, and with the exception of having all but the youngest baptized according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, he never in any respect treated any of them otherwise than as a Protestant parent ought to treat his child. It therefore seems to me, that it is satisfactorily made out, as a matter of fact, that in the church, the family, and the school, these children were, with the full consent of both their parents carefully trained up as Protestant children. The father died in March, 1857. After his death, their mother continued the same course of instruction as had been followed in the father's lifetime. She died in June, 1858, a pauper in the workhouse at Tuam, and whilst the children remained in the workhouse, until the 18th of August, 1858, they were visited, taught, and treated as Protestant children. To this no objection appears to have been made, before the 11th of August, when the aunt, Jane Robinson, applied to the guardians to get the children out of the workhouse."

The rules which govern cases of this kind, are not many or involved, and by throwing aside much evidence that really does not bear on the question on which the Chancellor decided, and by eliminating those rules without wading through all the numerous decisions in which they are recognized, and acted on, we trust to be able to express our views on this question within reasonable compass, and by our mode of treating it to leave it in the power of non-professional as well as professional readers to form an opinion on the subject.

Our desire is to simplify the consideration of this case, the surest mode of arriving at a just opinion of it. Going through a number of cases somewhat similar, which in some respects resemble the case for consideration, and in other perhaps essential elements differ from it, is the way in which the case has been for the most part treated in discussion—a mode perhaps not so objectionable when only lawyers are dealing with it, but in our opinion not the most satisfactory way either for professional or non-professional hearers. In justice to the gentlemen of the long robe, however, it must be admitted that it is not frequently possible otherwise to deal with a question, so involved are authorities and so irreconcilable with fixed or defined rules. This question however of the religious custody of wards is fortunately not so over laid by conflicting authorities. When so much utterly irrelevant, has been dragged into the case, so much evidence objectionable in point of admissibility and materiality, the most satisfactory way of dealing with it seems to be, to state the rules which govern a Court of Equity in dealing with such cases, to establish the accuracy with which these rules are stated, and then to enter upon their bearing on the facts of this case.

The wishes of the father on the subject of his children's religion override the authority of all other persons with exceptions we shall presently state. Where the father dies without any express direction on the subject, children are to be brought up in the religion of their father, because the court assumes such to be the father's wish. When the father dies in a state of transition, when his religious opinions cannot be well known, and gives a direction as to the religion in which his children are to be educated, that direction is to be carried out. Both these rules are subject to two exceptions, one settled by a number of authorities, the other by Talbot v. Lord Shrewsbury—That if from any cause the children have been brought up in a faith different from their father's or different from that in which he directed that they should be educated, and it should appear that they have attained such an age and received such an amount of religious or rather sectarian instruction, that they could not, without danger of becoming destitute of all religion, receive new impressions, the court considering a disregard of its own rule and of the father's wish preferable to destroying all religious principles in the minor, will not interfere, but allow the child to continue in the faith in which it has been instructed. The other that the minor will be entrusted to the charge of persons differing from the father's creed, and in which it is to be reared where the health or the preservation of the child renders it necessary.

With the exceptions above stated the rule is universal,—the religion of the father, or that in which he has directed the children to be educated, is to be that in which the child shall according to the rules of a Court of Equity be brought up.

Objecting as we do to the decision of the Chancellor, perhaps no course more satisfactory to those disposed to differ from us can be taken, than to confine ourselves to the cases referred to in the judgment, as from these as well as many others the rules which we have stated as those under which a Court of Equity acts in such cases will sufficiently appear. The first of these, Lyons v. Blenkin, Jacob's Reports, page 245, was a case in which the religious question was not raised, but the rights of a father to the custody of his children during his life-time were discussed. This case can hardly be considered a direct authority on the point, and we should not have referred to it but that for the purpose of satisfying our readers that we give the case the fullest and fairest consideration, we have determined to refer to every authority cited by the Chancellor in his judgment. In that case the mother of the children had been dead for some time; their maternal grandmother had bequeathed them a considerable property, and dealing with them as if they were her own children had given them in charge to an aunt, one of her own daughters; to this disposition the father of the children assented, and for several years they remained with the aunt. The father married a second time, and (as it would appear) from vexatious motives insisted on the children being given up to him when they had reached the respective ages of nineteen, fourteen and twelve, and for this purpose filed his petition. The father was a man of limited means, and the children had been educated and reared by their aunt in a mode of life superior to that in which the father could afford to maintain them, and it was in giving judgment in that case refusing the prayer of the father's petition that the Lord Chancellor made use of those expressions quoted by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in the case of the O'Malleys. "It appears to me that the father has so far given his consent to this course of education as to preclude him from saying that he shall now be permitted to break in and introduce a new system of education which cannot be consistent with the system to which they have been habituated." In this case the court went farther than ever it has gone before or since in interfering with the right of the father to the possession of his children. It can hardly be said to touch the O'Malleys' case at all, and as far as it does, it merely goes to shew that the rule recognising the father's rights is modified as we have stated it.

The next case (Witty v. Marshall, 1st Young and Collyer, C.C., 68,) referred to and quoted from by the Chancellor is directly in point as laying down and illustrating both the rule and the exception as we have stated it. In Witty v. Marshall, both father and mother had been Protestants. A short time before his death the father began to give evidence of approval of the tenets and practices of the church of Rome, and perhaps the most accurate way of describing his condition of mind would be to say he was in a state of transition. In his will, he speaks of himself as being a Roman Catholic, and desires that his son should be educated in the same religion, and appointed his wife and certain other persons guardians of his child. The mother after her husband's death became a Roman Catholic. (The Chancellor by mistake speaks of her as a Protestant, but the fact is quite unimportant.) When the case came before the court, the child was fifteen years of age, and had, it appeared, been brought up principally by Protestant relatives. The mother sought to get the child from her Protestant relatives for the purpose of rearing him according to the father's directions, in the Roman Catholic Church. The minor had, it appears, received what are called Protestant impressions, and the Lord Chancellor quotes the following passages from Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce's judgment in the case:—"With every respect therefore to what may be allowed to the feelings and wishes of the father on so important a subject, it is impossible not to see that great danger to the spiritual welfare and to the moral character of the infant may arise (I do not say will arise) from a change of religious education. On this ground and this ground alone, it is the duty of the Court to pause." He then says, "the proper course is to direct a reference to the Master. Rarely can the Court with propriety, withdraw such questions from the Master."

"On this ground only," says V. C. Knight Bruce, "can we interfere with the wishes of the father." We will take the liberty of adding some extracts from his judgment which will more explicitly state the rule.

"Upon the other part of the case the course which has been taken is unfortunate. It appears that the father of the infant, his lawful father, was a Roman Catholic; not only so, but by his will he has left strict injunctions that his son should be educated in his own religion. It appears to me therefore that it was the duty of all who had the care of the infant to cause him to be brought up in his father's faith. I am of opinion therefore, that however well intentioned the party might be, the non-compliance with the father's injunctions was a breach of duty both towards the father and the infant himself;" again: "I see no reason to think that they were not actuated by the best of motives; but the relatives of the mother did not keep faith with the dead: they might have brought up the infant in the religion of his father consistently with kind care and attention, and consistently with his residence in a Protestant family. This however has not been done, and it is alleged that the infant has been allowed to arrive at an important period of his life under Protestant impressions."

“But,” says the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, “the recent case of Stourton v. Stourton, which in the year 1857 came before the Lords Justices of Appeal in Chancery in England, puts the question beyond controversy in this Court.” We will not stop here to consider what is meant by “the question;” there are several in the case, and according to his Lordship’s own opinion, the children are to be divided into two classes; namely, those who have received “Protestant impressions,” and those who are incapable from their youth of having received religious impressions of any kind, each class to be separately considered and disposed of by a different class of cases. Neither shall we stop here to consider how far it “put the question beyond controversy,” but proceed as we have proposed to ourselves by stating the cases and the manner in which they were decided, and giving such extracts as will show the mode in which each case is disposed of. In Stourton v. Stourton both parents of the ward were Roman Catholics. The child was baptized in the religion of his parents at the instance of his uncle Lord Stourton, his father having died a week before the child was born. The mother became a Protestant, and educated the child entirely in the Protestant religion. In October, 1856, when the child was nine years old, Lord Stourton presented a petition to have him made a ward of court, and prayed that he or some of the child’s Roman Catholic relatives should be appointed guardians for the purpose of bringing him up in the religion of his father and family. The Master of the Rolls decided in favour of Mrs. Stourton’s claim to the custody of the child to have him brought up a Protestant, and from this decision Lord Stourton appealed. After the arguments of Counsel had concluded, their Lordships, Sir J. L. Knight Bruce and Sir G. J. Turner, desired to have a private interview with the minor; and afterwards delivered their judgment in favour of the mother’s demand that the child should be educated a Protestant. In the report of the judgment of Lord Justice Sir Knight Bruce, 3 Jurist, new series, page 529, we find the following passages. “The Master of the Rolls had substantially decided for the latter; (the Auglican church) but he did not appear to have seen the plaintiff, who was a boy of delicate constitution, born on the 30th May, 1847, and was the posthumous son of Mr. Stourton a younger son of the late Lord Stourton and there being no proof that Mr. Stourton intended his son to be brought up otherwise, than as a Ro- man Catholic he ought to have been brought up a Roman Catholic." He then goes on to observe on the remissness of Lord Stourton in having so long lain by and allowed Mrs. Stourton to educate the boy as she thought proper. "In his Lordship's judgment, there had been a failure in duty, towards the late Mr. Stourton. An application might have been made to the Court before the mind of the child had been religiously biassed, in which case his education in the principles of his father would no doubt have been ordered."

His Lordship then observes, that on examination the child appeared of more than ordinary intelligence, and that he understood more minutely than boys of his age generally did, the different points in controversy, between the two Churches—as transubstantiation, the attributes of the Virgin, the invocation of Saints, and the authority of the Pope, and then observes:—“The Protestant seed which had been sown, appeared to have taken such a hold on his mind, that the tares, if tares they were, could not be rooted up without danger to the wheat. The child’s tranquillity, health, happiness, and spiritual welfare, were too likely to suffer from an attempt to efface his Protestant impressions for such a course to be attempted.” In Sir George Turner’s judgment we find the following passages—“The principles by which the Court was governed in those cases, when no testamentary guardian had been appointed, were not open to doubt. When an infant became a ward of Court, the duty of the Court was to consult the welfare of the infant, and in so doing the Court recognized no religious distinctions. If consistently with the duty of the Court, the wishes of the father could be attended to, the Court paid attention to those wishes; but if they could not be carried into effect without sacrificing what the Court considered to be for the benefit of the child, they could not be attended to. The father here had died without expressing any wish; and if the application had been made at once, it would have been much of course that the child should have been brought up in his father’s religion: but when the application as here had been delayed, and the child had been suffered to receive other religious impressions, more serious considerations arose. The father’s wishes might be in conflict with the safety and welfare of the child; and it was necessary to see what religious impressions had already been made on the child’s mind.”

Having shown from the cases referred to by the Lord Chancellor, and without even going beyond those cases, that we have stated the rules of the Court in such cases correctly, let us now see how far the Chancellor has acted in conformity with these rules. We shall, for this purpose—even although, we might on the evidence, quarrel with the classification of the children, which places four of them as capable of, and having actually received Protestant impressions—admit that there was enough of evidence to lead the Court to suppose some impressions had been made on the children.

Let us take these rules, even strained to the extent that they have been by the Lords Justices in Stourton v Stourton, in which their Lordships went so far as to hold that a boy of nine years old had received such religious impressions, that they could not be modified or interfered with, without danger of destroying all religious opinions; and in which Lord Justice Knight Bruce seemed to be considerably influenced in his opinion by a Pascalite horror of the Jesuits' College of Stonyhurst, which was suggested as the place of instruction for the minor; taking we say these rules in the view most favourable to the Chancellor's decision, let us see how should these children have been disposed of. We need not scramble through the weak and uncertain evidence about religious education, perhaps the vaguest that ever was offered in a Court of Justice; but assume that there was a reasonable amount of evidence to shew that the children were capable of instruction, and had received religious instructions which would have opened the question as to whether they had received Protestant impressions. Was it not the duty of the Court either to have examined these children as had been done by the Lords Justices in Stourton v Stourton, or refer it to the Master as in Witty v. Marshall, to ascertain whether or not these children had received Protestant impressions? If the Chancellor, or the Master of the Court to whom the matter should be referred, could conscientiously say that four of these children had received such Protestant impressions, that there was a likelihood of rooting up all religion, in the effort to root out the peculiar tenets of the Protestant religion, we should have bowed to the decision which gave these elder children to Protestant guardians as being in accordance with the rules of the court, albeit, somewhat dissatisfied as to the metaphysical test, especially when applied by an earnest sectary.

As to the younger children, however, beyond a possibility of doubt or question, they should have been handed over to the petitioner, William O'Malley, to be educated as Roman Catholics. In their case there could not be a pretence for saying that religious impressions had been made on them ; there was evidence strongly corroborated, conclusive, that their father wished his children to be reared Roman Catholics, that he was himself a Roman Catholic, an unquestioned fact in the case, and one amply sufficient without an expression of wish or direction, one way or the other, for the Court to deduce that his wish was that his children should be reared in his own faith. As regards the elder children it may be said we are quarrelling about straws, as our only objection is that the minor detail of inquiry from the children themselves was not entered on, and that we concede the propositions insisted on by the Chancellor. We do so, because without quarrelling with the deductions his Lordship has drawn from the evidence in the case as we might do, it is sufficient for our purpose, and a much more satisfactory mode of dealing with the case, to take the lowest possible ground for ourselves, and conceding the most favourable to those who differ from us, to take his Lordship's statements of the facts, as the facts of the case, to take from his cases, and his only, our law, and show, even with the materials he furnishes us, that he has not dealt with these children as according to the well settled rules of the court, they should have been disposed of.

In dealing with the elder children, the Lord Chancellor referred to a certain class of cases which showed that when Protestant impressions were made the children so impressed should under all circumstances be reared Protestants. Why should not the rule recognised in all those cases as the unquestioned and unquestionable rule, a rule whose strict application can be escaped from only by the most imminent danger to the child's entire religious belief—why we repeat should not that rule be acted on and applied to the younger children ? In dealing with the younger children, the Chancellor goes to a different class of cases ignoring the rule which runs through those already referred to which are the most recent. In applying himself to the disposal of the younger children his lordship refers to three cases, one, a common law case, the other two, equity decisions —and after stating these cases goes anew into the evidence, for the purpose of bringing the younger children within those cases. The first case referred to is that of the Queen v. Clarke, 7 Ellis and Blackburn, 201. Now with regard to that and every other law case, we will venture on the sweeping proposition, that they can have no bearing, and can throw no light on the rule of a Court of Equity in such cases. We shall go shortly into the facts of that case to show that Courts of Law, on writs of habeas corpus, as in every other branch of their common law or statutable jurisdiction, can regard only legal rights. They have not the same machinery for acting as Courts of Equity, they cannot stand in loco parentis to the child of a deceased father, as the Chancellor representing the Sovereign stands. A Court of Law recognizes the right of a mother as nurture guardian, or the right of a guardian appointed duly by the will of the father, because by statute, fathers are enabled to appoint persons whose legal title to the custody of the children a Court of Law is bound to give effect to until the infant attain an age at which he can judge for himself. The accuracy of what we have stated will sufficiently appear on a reference to the case itself. The infant, Alicia Race, was brought up on a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, obtained at the instance of her mother, addressed to Maria Clark, under whose care the child had been placed by the commissioners of the Royal Patriotic Fund, and with whom she was willing to remain. Affidavits were used on both sides, and from these it appeared that the father who was dead had been a Protestant, and the mother who sought to have her child handed over to her was a Roman Catholic; the children (there were two) had been baptized, and during the father's lifetime had gone to church as members of the Church of England. By his will he appointed his wife executrix, feeling confident that she would do justice to his two children. There was a conflict of evidence as to what were the wishes of the father, and it could hardly be doubted but that if the wishes of the child were consulted she would remain with Mrs. Clarke, assigning as a reason that although she loved her mother she would not go to a school where she would be taught idolatrous worship of the Virgin and Saints. Lord Campbell, in a very long and able judgment, reviewing the cases, assigns his reason for holding that the child should be delivered over to her mother, her guardian by nurture, refusing to examine the child as to what her wishes were on the subject, and holding that the mother was legally entitled to the custody of the child, as it was not shown that she was not morally unfit to be trusted with the guardianship of the child, and that it was for no sinister or illegal purpose she obtained the writ.

a Roman Catholic and by permitting the children in his lifetime to join in the Roman Catholic prayers, he does not seem to have had the horror of Popery felt by many pious Protestants. Still if the proposition laid down can be supported, that it was her duty as guardian for nurture from the simple fact of the father having been a Protestant to educate the children as Protestants she would be contemplating what the law forbid by wishing to remove the children from a Protestant to a Roman Catholic School. But no sufficient authority has been cited in support of this proposition; and the mother becoming guardian by nurture on the death of the father no provision to the contrary being made by will, she appears to us to have in all respects the same parental authority which might have been exercised by the father had he survived the mother. . . .

The authority relied upon to show that the ward must invariably be educated in the religion of the father, is In Re Arabella Frances North before Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce. That case, arising jointly on a return to a habeas corpus and on a petition for the appointment of a guardian to children as wards of court of Chancery, it is difficult to distinguish what was done or said by the Vice-Chancellor as a common law and as an equity judge. He cannot be alleged to have decided anything upon this point, and he had only to consider it with a view of determining whether the children for a few days, till a guardian was appointed, should be in the custody of a Roman Catholic or of a Protestant nurse." . . .

Lord Campbell then observes on the inference which was drawn by the Vice-Chancellor from the father having been of a particular religion, and thus continuing:—" But this doctrine, if well founded, would only apply to the education of wards of the Court of Chancery, respecting whom an equity judge represents the Queen, as Parens Patriæ has a very large discretion, and may give directions beyond the scope of the duty of a guardian for nurture under the Common law;" and again at page 193, where his Lordship points out the mode in and the extent to which the Court can and does exercise its powers on writs of habeas corpus; "accordingly from the case to be found in the Year Book to the present time, it has ever been considered that the father, or whoever else on his death may be the guardian by nurture, has by law a right to the custody of the child, and shall maintain an action of trespass against a stranger who takes the child. See the authorities Comyn's Digest (Guardians) D.

The question then arises whether a habeas corpus be the proper remedy for the guardian to recover the custody of the child of which he has been improperly deprived. Certainly the great use of this writ, the boast of English jurisprudence, is to set at liberty any of the Queen's subjects unlawfully in prison, and when an adult is brought up under a habeas corpus and found to be unlawfully imprisoned, he is to have his unfettered choice to go where he pleases. But with respect to a child under guardianship for nurture, the child is supposed to be unlawfully imprisoned when unlawfully detained from the custody of the Guardians; and when delivered to him the child is supposed to be set at liberty." Here we see every consideration disregarded as to the father's wishes, as to the religious impressions of the child, and all those other elements taken into account by a court of Equity in appointing guardians. Lord Campbell sat in a Court of Law, and could recognise no person other than the guardian for nurture, the mother, or a testamentary guardian to whom legal powers could be given by the father pursuant to the provisions of the 12 Car. II. So much for the bearing of the Queen v. Clarke, and of the observations quoted by the Lord Chancellor from Lord Campbell's judgment on the disposal of the O'Malley case in a Court of Equity on a petition for the appointment of guardians. Neither must we lose sight of the important fact that even if the Queen v. Clarke were a decision of a Court of Equity, it could not apply in any way to the O'Malleys, as their mother the guardian for nurture was dead, and no person had been appointed by either parent to take charge of the children. Overlooking this vital distinction between decisions of a Court of Law on returns to writs of habeas corpus, and decisions of Courts of Equity on petition for the appointment of guardians, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, after quoting from Lord Campbell's judgment in the Queen v. Clarke as to the right of the mother to the custody of the children, observes:—

"This view of the right of the mother surviving when no testamentary guardian has been appointed by the father has a sanction in the judgment of Lord Hardwick in Villareal v. Mellish (2 Swanston 536 and 538) and in the case of Storke v. Storke (3 P. W. 52)."

These observations, whatever they may be, his Lordship does not give, but continues in the next sentence, passing away entirely from the rights of the mother, "I think however that it must be taken to be the accredited rule of this court that in whatever way the wishes of the father can be clearly ascertained, the court will respect them to the utmost, that is consistent with the welfare of the child, and this without any reference to religious distinctions." Under these circumstances we should be justified in passing over these cases, as his Lordship gives neither the substance of their decision or the dicta of the judges who disposed of them. We have said however that we should go through every case referred to by the Chancellor, and further that we should be content not to go beyond the cases referred to by his Lordship to establish the accuracy of our statements as to the rules under which the court acts. We need hardly go beyond the marginal notes of these cases for a statement of their effect. In Villareal v. Mellish, which is most imperfectly reported, the marginal note is, "V. the daughter and widow of a Jew having agreed with her father that he should have the care of the person and estates of her two infant children, and in the event of their death during minority should receive a moiety of their property, and having abjured Judaism and married a Christian, on the petition of the children the court ordered that they should be delivered to their mother, guardianship not being assignable, and the agreement not purporting to be an assignment and the right of the mother to be guardian continuing notwithstanding her second marriage. The only passage in the report touching this point is the following, and we will give the Lord Chancellor the benefit of it. "It has been said that the father of the children was a Jew. I see nothing to prevent the father from devising; but the father being dead, and not having disposed of the guardianship, the father's right devolves to the mother, and she is now of the religion of the country, and therefore there is no reason to take the right from her." In Storke v. Storke, a presbyterian who had three infant daughters, the eldest past sixteen years of age at the time of her father's death, appointed three of his brothers who were Presbyterians, and the Rev. Mr. Andrews, a clergyman of the Church of England, guardians. Previous to his death he had sent the eldest daughter to her uncle, one of her guardians, to be educated. The two others were taken by the clergyman, and placed at a school where they were being educated in the Church of England. On bills being filed, which brought all the parties before the court, Mr. Andrews insisted that the eldest daughter should be educated in the tenets of the Church of England, while the three other guardians sought to have the two younger girls handed over to them to be brought up as Presbyterians. The decision of the Chancellor was that parol evidence of directions by the father as to the religion in which his children should be reared should not be attended to, and he decided on leaving the children as they were. The eldest, in the words of the reporter, being above the age of sixteen years, it was ordered that she should be sent for immediately, into court, which being accordingly done, and she being there asked where she desired to be ; on her expressing a desire to continue with her uncle Samuel Storke, his Lordship declared she should continue there if she pleased.

Now with regard to these two cases it appears that the religious question was only incidentally raised. The decision in the first was that guardianship was not assignable, and in the second that a parol declaration of the father's wishes could not be received in evidence. The passage we have given from the judgment of the Chancellor in Villareal v. Mellish, if accurately reported is to the effect that no matter what the religion of the children might be the mother was entitled to rear the children in whatever religion she thought proper. With regard to this we can only say that it is not the doctrine of a Court of Equity, and that the decision or rather dictum of Lord Hardwicke, who heard this case so far back as 1737, has been overruled by every other case reported on the subject, and by the most eminent Equity Judges in England. To prove that we are correct in stating this, it is only necessary to refer to the passages we have given from the judgments in the Queen v. Clarke, in Witty v. Marshall, and in Stourton v. Stourton. To the same effect is the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, in re North, 11 Jurist, page 10. When his Honor says, "The rule of the court I apprehend is, that when the father has not left nor expressed any direction or instruction as to the religion in which his children are to be educated, it is to be presumed that his wishes were that they should be educated in his own religion ; and that I am of opinion upon the evidence before me as it now stands, and for the present purposes must be the presumption in this case." So well established is this rule now that we should not feel justified in accumulating authorities to establish it.

But even if these cases correctly stated the rules of a Court of Equity, they could be no assistance to the Chancellor in his decision. The case of Storke v. Storke decided nothing except that a parol declaration of the father's wish could not be attended to, a doctrine for which no lawyer at the present day would venture to contend. Villareal v. Mellish which set up a right in the mother to the care and education of the child, no matter what its father's religion might have been, is not in point. Mrs. O'Malley is dead, and the very brief notice of these decisions by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland (we have given all he said about them) shews that he placed no great reliance on their assisting his views of the case.

To what extent the Lord Chancellor was disposed to rely on these cases it is difficult to ascertain, as after referring to them briefly, for the purpose of showing that after the father's death, the mother may dispose of the children as she pleases, his Lordship, instead of applying such a rule to the facts of the case, addresses himself to the affidavits for the purpose of showing that the father's wish was that the children should be reared Protestants. Now it is worthy of remark, that his Lordship shrank from putting the case of the elder children on this ground. It would have been quite sufficient if the evidence satisfactorily led to that conclusion, to have rested the case on these grounds without resorting to the allegation, that Protestant impressions were made. The fact that the father lived and died a Roman Catholic, renders it, as will be seen from the cases we have cited, a matter of course that his children should be reared in that faith; the Court always assuming, in the absence of express directions, that such is the father's wish; and taking it at best for the case of Ellen Robinson, or rather of the Hon. Miss Plunket, the evidence of a direction is doubtful. But if it were necessary for the Roman Catholic uncle to have made out a case of direction in favor of his creed, which it was not, let us see what the evidence upon the subject was. The only direct evidence on the subject, was that of Mary Burns,* the servant of the Bishop of Tuam's (Lord Plunket) coachman.

As for the statement of the wretched mother to third persons of what her husband said, every attorney's clerk knows, that they are not evidence, and we must say that it excites our astonishment to find the Chancellor referring to a statement by Mrs. O'Malley, made a few days after her husband's death in a letter to her sister, when, as stated in His Lordship's judgment, she speaks of "how the priest and two nuns thought to come round me in presence of my poor dying husband, but I balked them completely. John did not blame me for what I told them, for after they went away he desired me to bring up the children in the way I always brought them up." What will be thought of the value of this kind of evidence, if it were to be for one moment taken into account, if we bear in mind that this despicable mother sought to gain favor at one time, with Rev. Mr. Seymour and her Protestant relatives, at another with her husband's Roman Catholic friends, by suiting her conversation to her hearers for the time. At folio 5 of the first affidavit, made by the Rev. Mr. Coyne, the Roman Catholic clergyman, who attended the father, we find the following passage—"That about six weeks before the death of Mrs. O'Malley, she called upon this deponent for the purpose of inducing him to employ an attorney to bring an action against a member of the Rev. Mr. Seymour's family, for libelling her character, and further saith, that upon that occasion Mrs. O'Malley stated that if anything could be done for the children, she would give them up to the Roman Catholic Faith according to the wish of her husband; saith he peremptorily refused to interfere in the matter between the Rev. Mr. Seymour and herself, and stated he could make no terms by way of inducement to her, to give up the children, but if they were given up according to the wishes of her husband they would be taken care of;" and again in the affidavit of Mary Burns, otherwise Vesey, a woman with whom she remained four days before going into the Workhouse, folio 2 and 3, "Saith that Ellen O'Malley complained in strong terms of the treatment received by her, from her sister Mrs. Jane Robinson, and that she refused taking any of the children, except one—Deponent saith, from the total want of means of the said Ellen O'Malley, she was obliged to seek relief in the Workhouse, and left this deponent's house for that purpose. Saith that during the time the said Ellen O'Malley was in the Workhouse deponent visited her several times; deponent saith that the said Ellen O'Malley, after she entered the house, requested of this deponent to provide for her some writing paper, for the purpose of writing to the brother of her husband, John O'Malley, to come to Tuam, for the purpose of placing the children under his care, as she mentioned to this deponent. Saith, she procured the paper accordingly, and gave it to the said Ellen O'Malley; deponent saith she believes the said Ellen O'Malley, in consequence of her immediate illness, never wrote said letter." This is the woman whose statements to third parties, the Chancellor has, it must be thoughtlessly, ventured to rely and comment on. If anything were wanting to shew the wisdom of our rule of evidence, that hearsay should not be admitted, the affidavits in this case abundantly show it. But we have the Lord Chancellor quoting hearsay in what he is pleased to speak of as a dying declaration, the only shape in which it could be legal evidence; and it must be borne in mind that it is not enough to make a statement evidence,—there is another very short, but perhaps not so simple a step, to be taken to render it valuable, namely, that it should be believed. His Lordship proceeds thus—"The Rev. Mr. Seymour states in his affidavit—That at the last interview with the said Mrs. O'Malley, a few days previous to her death, she indignantly denied the truth of the report that she intended to have them brought up in the Roman Catholic Faith; and alleged as one of her reasons, that her husband's dying wish was that they should be brought up in her own persuasion as Protestants; and that her husband frequently on previous occasions expressed the same desire. Here then we have," continues his Lordship, "the dying mother's account of what were the last wishes of the dying father; a double testimony given in the presence of death, and sealed with all the solemn sanctions of eternity." Now we object to the admissibility of this statement, as evidence in the shape of a dying declaration. No man who has attended or practised in Criminal Courts where such evidence is most frequently offered, and discussed, but must be aware that to make such a statement admissible as evidence, it must be shewn that the person making it, is actually in a hopeless condition at the time, and is aware of the fact. The rule is too well known by professional men to require authority to be cited to establish it; perhaps for non-professional readers, it would be as well to state it in the words of Mr. Taylor, the most eminent text writer of the day, in his book on Evidence, page 569, 2nd Edition—"It is essential to the admissibility of these declarations, first, that at the time when they were made, the declarant should have been in actual danger of death; secondly, that he should then have had a full apprehension of his danger; and lastly, that death should have ensued. All these facts therefore must be proved to the satisfaction of the judge before the evidence will be received."

Now where is there one scintilla of evidence either that this woman was in extremis at the time she made this statement to the Rev. Mr. Seymour, or that she knew she was in a dying state. As far as we can judge from the evidence the contrary is the fact. The woman was ill of fever ; we all know what a change twenty-four hours can and does make in such cases, and as the Rev. Mr. Seymour tells us, it was "a few days previous to her death." The evidence of Burns, the coachman's servant, contradicted as it is by so many witnesses, is out of the case. Indeed his Lordship never once alluded to it, although if it could be believed, it would have established as a fact that the father directed his children to be reared as Protestants. We have then a cardinal fact, the only fact in the case which would justify the Chancellor in giving those younger children to Protestant guardians, resting on two statements made by Ellen O'Malley, not admissible in any Court of Justice in these countries as evidence, not worth one straw if they were admissible, inconsistent as they are with other statements made by Ellen O'Malley, contradicted as they are by the direct evidence of the Rev. Eugene Coyne, and Anne Tiernan, the nurse-tender who was present when the father expressed his wishes that the children should be reared in the Roman Catholic religion, and opposed as they are to the deduction which the court always draws, that whatever may be the religion of the father, in that religion does he wish his children to be educated. We were wrong however in saying that the Lord Chancellor put the evidence of Burns, the coachman's servant, out of the case. To a very limited extent he introduces the name of this witness, who, if she is to be believed, would have proved the entire case for the Honourable Miss Plunkett. After commenting on the absence of affidavits from the Sisters of Mercy who had attended on John O'Malley, and who may or may not have been able to give any evidence on the matter if their evidence were needed, his Lordship observes—"but Mary Byrne has in her affidavit given a very remarkable account of what took place immediately after Mr. Coyne had left the house. If the proposal was to give up the children, nothing can be more natural or more probable in its substance than the account given by Mary Byrne of what she saw and heard." Nothing more natural truly, if a single word that Mary Byrne swore to could be believed, and if she were not contradicted by the evidence of three witnesses on most material points. It is with regret that we feel ourselves forced to go to the affidavit of this woman, whom we plainly accuse of wilful and deliberate perjury. We have not made one imputation on the veracity of any of the parties who have made affidavits in this case ; we have not made a single harsh observation on anything said or done by the Protestant clergymen who have been so active in this case ; we have not said, nor shall we say one word condemnatory of either their conduct or evidence, although they may furnish food for comment, and it is only because it is of the essence of the case that the character of Mary Byrne's evidence should be shown that we go into it. We repeat that from beginning to end of her affidavit not one word can be believed. Without going through the entire of her affidavit we shall refer to such parts as have met with a flat contradiction. In the commencement of her affidavit (folio 1, 2), she swears "that she frequently visited him (O'Malley), especially during his last illness in which she was in almost constant attendance on him up to his death; that she even dressed him when dead, and that the widow, Mrs. O'Malley, gave her, deponent, her keys, &c.," and the regulation of everything connected with the funeral, and that she remained in the house till after the funeral had left. Saith that on the day before that on which he died, she saw the Rev. Eugene Coyne leaving John O'Malley's house, and she went in immediately to see him ; when she entered she heard Mrs. O'Malley crying convulsively, and knew that something unusual had taken place, so she asked one of the nursetenders, Anne Tiernan, "what is all this about?" the nursetender answered, "there is murder here, the priest wants the children and she would not give them." Deponent replied, "would she not give them?" and Aune Tiernan answered, "no she would not." Deponent then went down to the room where the sick man was, and found his wife lying across him in the bed ; when Mrs. O'Malley saw her, deponent, she said, "my God, look at the way I am annoyed by these priests wanting what my own husband does not want me to do." And then turning towards her dying husband she said, "John dear, are you angry with me for what I have said?" he replied, "no, I am not;" she then asked, "do you wish me to keep them?" (the children) he answered, "I do, you have a great deal to contend with, but bring them up with yourself as they have always gone." She then goes on to swear that two or three hours before his decease, she was present at another conversation between O'Malley and his wife, in which precisely the same conversation took place—"John dear, are you angry with me?" in fact word for word a repetition of the previous statement, with some slight additions, and "after this deponent never heard him speak, and was then informed by the nurse-tender, Catherine O'Dea, who was with him to the last, that he never spoke more."

Now in almost every word of her statement, except when Mary Burns lays the scene between herself and the deceased husband and wife, she is flatly and specifically contradicted. In Anne Tiernan's affidavit, folio 3, 4, she swears, "that the said John O'Malley was washed and laid out by defendant and Catherine O'Dea, and by them alone, and saith that said Mary Byrne was not even present when this deponent and said Catherine O'Dea washed and laid out the said John O'Malley, and that the said Mary Byrne left the house of the said John O'Malley about 11 o'clock the night previous to his death, and did not return until after the said John O'Malley was washed and laid out on the following morning. . . . Deponent saith he frequently spoke, and up to within a few minutes of his death, which occurred at day-break about 6 o'clock in the morning; folio 5, saith that it is untrue as stated in the affidavit of the said Mary Byrne, that after the Rev. Mr. Coyne left the house of the said John O'Malley, that said Mary Byrne came in and found when she entered the house Mrs. O'Malley convulsively crying, and knew that something unusual had taken place, and that she asked this deponent what it was all about, and that she, this deponent, answered there is murder here, the priest wants the children and she would not give them, and saith that no such occurrence or conversation took place between this deponent and the said Mary Byrne, and that this deponent made use of no such words to the said Mary Byrne, and that she the said Mrs. O'Malley was not crying convulsively or otherwise, and that there was nothing unusual, as stated by the said Mary Byrne, or no noise in the house after the Rev. Mr. Coyne had left."

Catherine O'Dea, the other nurse-tender, has also given her evidence, and swears that no such conversation as that stated by Mary Byrne took place, "and that this deponent remained in the room by the directions of the said John O'Malley during the time that the said Mary Byrne was there," folio 7. In every other particular, Mary O'Dea corroborates the other nurse-tender as to the "convulsive crying," "the washing the body," the hour at which Mary Byrne left, and the hour at which John O'Malley died. At folios 9, 10, we find the following passages:—"Deponent saith it is utterly untrue, as stated in the affidavit of Mary Byrne, that this deponent informed her that the said John O'Malley had not spoken after the said Mary Byrne left the house up to his death; on the contrary, the said John O'Malley spoke frequently during the night, and almost always of his children, expressing his anxious wish that they should be reared Roman Catholics. . . .

"Deponent saith that she having seen some Protestant clergymen come to the house of the said John O'Malley, she asked him, the said John O'Malley, why they were coming, whereupon, the said John O'Malley replied, it was not to him the Protestant Clergymen were coming, but to his wife, who was ill, and that he had no wish that they should visit him, and deponent said that during the time of the said John O'Malley's illness and up to the time of his death, this deponent heard the said John O'Malley pray after the manner of Roman Catholics, and that he used the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary after the manner of Roman Catholics."

But it may be said we cannot implicitly believe the two nurses, any more than we may believe Mary Byrne, and there is a conflict of evidence between people of the same class in life, upon which it would require a jury after oral examination of the witnesses to pronounce. Be it so—but will any person venture to make the same observation upon the moderate statement of an educated gentleman, the Rev. Mr. Coyne, who appears all through this troublesome case to have behaved with singular prudence? In his second affidavit he tells us:—"Saith deponent was sent for to attend said John O'Malley at or about the hour of one o'clock on the day previous to the death of said John O'Malley. Deponent saith he was so called in by Daniel Coughlan, a policeman, wholly unsolicited by deponent, who had never previously spoken to said John O'Malley or known of his illness, folio 3. Saith it is wholly untrue, that upon the occasion of deponent's said visit to attend said John O'Malley, that there was any murder or altercation or crying whatsoever, as to the religion in which the said children were to be brought up, or that deponent used any importunities, whatsoever, with said John O'Malley, as to the religion of said minors, or that upon the said occasion the said Mrs. O'Malley made any objection to the desire of her husband expressed upon said occasion, that his children were to be brought up Roman Catholics." This brings us naturally to the statement of what did take place between the Rev. Mr. Coyne and John O'Malley on the occasion on which he directed his children to be reared Roman Catholics. In that affidavit, folios 1, 2, 3, Mr. Coyne tells us "that he attended the late John O'Malley, the father of the minors, previous to his death, and administered to him the last rites of the church. Saith that upon that occasion John O'Malley, in the presence of his wife and two policemen, namely, Daniel Coughlan and Patrick Mulligan, expressed a wish and desire that his children should be brought up in the Roman Catholic Religion, the religion professed by himself. Saith that the said John O'Malley's wife upon hearing this injunction said to him, 'John, you were always a kind and affectionate husband, I would wish to carry out your intentions, but what means have you left me for that?' whereupon, this deponent said that matters should be left in the hands of Providence."

The evidence of these two policemen, if it were thought necessary to corroborate or explain Mr. Coyne's evidence, might have been obtained. It was not Mr. Coyne's fault that their evidence was not produced, as he swears that he applied to them "to make affidavit of their recollection of what occurred, and of the direction given by the said John O'Malley," but the policemen could not give their evidence without their officers' leave, and their officer when applied to referred Mr. Coyne to the County Inspector, and there was not time to have got this leave before the case came on.

In a judgment so carefully prepared as that of the Lord Chancellor, we are not to suppose his Lordship would omit anything which would support the opinion he formed of the case. We have gone through these affidavits at length, and the only bit of direct evidence bearing on it not alluded to by his Lordship, we should not feel justified in keeping back. It is in the affidavit of the Rev. Mr. Fowler, and let those who would wish to make out that John O'Malley desired to have his children reared Protestants have the full benefit of it. At folio 10 that Reverend gentleman tells us that he "attended the late John O'Malley in his last illness, and spoke to him and prayed with him, that the said John O'Malley gladly received the visit of deponent, that he deponent, spoke to the said John O'Malley of such portions of the Holy Scriptures as involved the rejection as erroneous of the destructive doctrines of the Church of Rome, and saith, defendant spoke to him of faith in Jesus Christ as the only way of salvation, of faith in the blood of Christ as the only way of taking away sin, and that the late John O'Malley expressed his belief in those doctrines, and the consequent rejection of the teaching of the Church of Rome." We cast no imputations on the veracity of the Rev. Mr. Fowler. His evidence, whatever may be its value, goes not to prove a direction or wish on the part of John O'Malley, but to shew that he, if not a Protestant, had Protestant tendencies. We should have thought it more becoming if the reverend gentleman had forborne introducing into an affidavit subtle theological disquisitions. He had neither authority nor justification for swearing, that the assent, such as it may have been, of the sick man to certain religious propositions, involved the rejection as erroneous of what the reverend gentleman is pleased to swear, are "the destructive doctrines of the Church of Rome." This is a subject and a class of evidence into which we must decline following the Rev. Mr. Fowler, but whether or not John O'Malley assented to doctrines involving the rejection of the tenets of the Church of Rome, if we call to mind that of his own motion, O'Malley requested the presence at his death-bed of a clergyman of that church in which he had lived, and received these sacraments which no man who believed in Protestant teaching could look upon in any other light than as impostures, we shall assign to the Rev. Mr. Fowler's evidence its true worth.

The Lord Chancellor in his judgment, in seeking, not to throw discredit on Mr. Coyne's evidence, but to weaken its effect, observes that from a dying man by importunities a languid assent might be obtained. How much more applicable would this be to Mr. Fowler's evidence; what we rely upon, however, is the cardinal fact which can neither be explained away, nor controverted, that John O'Malley desired to receive the sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church, and did receive them, and we care not whether he directed that his children should be reared as Roman Catholics or not, the rule of the court is too well established to admit of question, that the religion in which he lived and died is to be assumed to be that in which he wished his children to be reared. We cannot pass from this part of the case without expressing our deep regret that the Protestant clergymen did not shew the same good taste and moderation as was exhibited by Mr. Coyne. They may have thought it their duty to force their attentions on the dying man, coming as described by one of the witnesses to visit his wife.

Holding to the strong points presented by the indisputable facts of this case, and the well settled rules of the court, we will not distract attention, and fritter away the strength of the Roman Catholic uncle's claim to these children by entering into the bye battles between Ellen Robinson and her hearsay evidence, and the opinions of a theological police sergeant that John O'Malley was not a sound Catholic on the one hand, and the religious impressions of nurse-tenders on the other. We cannot but feel that we have tasked considerably the attention and patience of our readers. Unless we are to disbelieve the three witnesses, the Rev. Mr. Coyne and the two nurse-tenders who are (Mary Byrne being out of the case) the only persons who give any evidence on the subject of the dying wish of the father, it was the wish of the father that his children should be reared Roman Catholics. The wish however could be dispensed with, as it was beyond controversy that the man himself lived and died a Roman Catholic. The fact that he allowed his children to attend Protestant schools has been explained by evidence which as it has been introduced so much into the case, we may allude to, namely, the explanation given to Mr. Martin Owens, who swears that in conversations he had with John O'Malley, "Saith he also complained of her interfering in the religion he wished his children to be brought up in, namely, the Roman Catholic religion, that he would put an end to such interference, but he feared to make a noise about the matter, as it might be injurious to him as a policeman."

After going at such length as we have done into this case, we should hardly be justified in going into the evidence to show how exceedingly slight grounds were shown for even raising the question as to Protestant impressions having been made. We have as far as possible kept to the admitted facts of the case to show that the Chancellor has not dealt with these children according to the recognised and well settled rules of a Court of Equity. That rule which treats the father as the head and governor of his family, possessing the absolute power of disposal of his family, as well as of his property, unless when some great necessity of state or of social policy requires the infringement of such a rule, it is not for us now to discuss; we believe it to be a sound rule of social policy as it is a well settled rule of our jurisprudence; be that as it may, wise or unwise, it is less objectionable, than leaving every case as it arises to be disposed of according to the Chancellor's will, without any rule to guide or bind him. It has been well said by an eminent lawyer, "that the discretion of judges is the law of tyrants," and for this reason we do most earnestly and respectfully protest against the course taken by the Lord Chancellor in dealing with these O'Malley children. His lordship has put very ably and eloquently at the end of his judgment, a case similar to that before him, transposing the religion of the parties.—"Had John O'Malley been a facile Protestant, and his wife a devoted member of the Roman Catholic Church, had he allowed his children from their earliest years to learn the language of its ancient ritual and impressive invocations; had he left his widow to fight the hard battle of life with a numerous and helpless offspring; if she had kept them together to the last until she had nothing to share but her prayers and her tears; and if she had left them in the Church, which hallowed the earliest lessons of their infancy, and if a board of guardians could be found who would consign them to a custody where Protestantism would be let loose upon them, and the interference of this Court should be sought for their deliverance, on the application of some humble but honest Roman Catholic relation, aided by any generous stranger; could I then shrink from a duty so sacred and so palpable? God forbid." His Lordship after putting this fanciful sketch asks the question, and to it we answer—Yes, a thousand times yes.

This is mere declamation, and declamation entirely beside the facts of the case. In what way does it appear to be a sacred and palpable duty to have those children reared Protestants? What sympathies are involved in the case? It was contrary to his duty as a lawyer to have so directed. Were the mother alive there might have been some colour for introducing sympathies into the case, and speaking of the pain of taking the children from their mother to be reared in a faith different from hers. His Lordship in such a case might have sympathies to appeal to, although he could not refer to authority to sustain him. It seems neither lawyer-like nor logical to speak of a sacred and palpable duty to have those children handed over to Protestant guardians as springing from the case put by his Lordship. Again we must repeat that we entertain the highest respect for the character, integrity, and great legal acquirements of the Lord Chancellor; in this case, he has unconsciously allowed his feelings of horror towards the Church of Rome, to affect his judgment ; it would be worse than weak, it would be criminal, to shrink from questioning the acts of a public man affecting public interests, especially when that man is presiding in a Court of Justice ; if we think the Lord Chancellor came to a wrong conclusion upon the case, and departed from the rules of a Court of Equity, we should deserve and earn the contempt of every thinking man in the community, if we allowed the high character or position of the judge to deter us from considering the soundness of his judgment. We do trust that this case will be taken to the House of Lords. It involves much more serious interests than the disposal of these children, than those of Protestant, or Roman Catholic, or Presbyterian sects ; it places on record a judgment which while it stands leaves every question of this kind at large, without rule or authority to guide us. It leaves every similar case to the uncontrolled discretion of the judge, a standard which Lord Camden thus justly defines—

“ It is always unknown, it is different in different men, it is casual, and depends upon constitution, temper, and passion ; in the best it is oftentimes caprice, in the worst it is every vice, folly, and passion to which human nature is liable.”

Anxious to be free even from the imputation of selecting the weak points of the Lord Chancellor's judgement and presenting a partial view of it, we give it in extenso, taken from the Daily Express.

IMPORTANT JUDGMENT IN CHANCERY.

IN THE MATTER OF THE O'MALLEYS, MINORS.

(Extracted from the Daily Express, Nov. 22, 1858.)

The Lord Chancellor delivered judgment in this matter, which was discussed in the early part of the week, and which has excited considerable interest. There was a large attendance of the members of the Bar and the general public.

His Lordship having disposed of some petitions under the fifteenth section, proceeded to deliver the judgment as follows :—

“ In this case of the O'Malleys, minors, an order was made on the 23rd of September last, on the petition of Jane Robinson. Her petition, which was supported by her affidavit, stated in substance, that the minors, being eight in number, were the children of the late John O'Malley, and of Ellen O'Malley, his wife, sister of Jane Robinson. That the eldest child was twelve years of age, the youngest of the age of one year. That so far as they had been capable of receiving instruction, they had been educated in the Protestant religion, with the consent and approval of both their parents. That their father died in March, 1857, leaving his wife, Ellen O'Malley, surviving. That in June, 1858, Ellen O'Malley was obliged to go into the workhouse of Tuam, with her eight children, and that all were entered as Protestants in the registry of the workhouse, where the mother died, leaving behind her the eight orphan children. That on the 11th of August the petitioner, Jane Robinson, applied to the guardians of the Tuam union to have the children given up to her, stating that she had made provision for their support, and that the consideration of this was postponed by the guardians until the 18th of August. That on this latter day the guardians, disregarding a direction from the Poor Law Commissioners, refused to give her the children, but gave them up their paternal uncle, the said William O'Malley, a Roman Catholic, who expressed his intention to bring them up in his own faith, and that she was unable to obtain the custody of the children. The petition further stated that she had means at her disposal for the maintenance, support, and education of the orphans, and that she was willing to undertake the office of their guardian, and also that she was prepared to invest a suitable sum for their benefit, that it was necessary they should be made wards of court, and that delay in making the order required might render it impossible to carry it into effect. It seemed to me that the guardians had done indirectly what they could not have done directly. It was not lawful for them to treat those children as of a religious faith different from that in which their names were entered in the workhouse registry, which the guardians were not at liberty to alter. I thought they committed a plain violation of their duty when they proceeded to hand over these orphan children to their uncle, William O'Malley, for the purpose of having them brought up as Roman Catholics, and that it was my duty to interpose for their protection, so as to secure to them the full benefit of the rights which the Constitution of this free country confers on every infant, without distinction of class or creed. The petitioner, Jane Robinson, is the maternal aunt of the minors, of the religious faith in which they had been brought up, and in which they were registered according to law. It therefore seemed proper to appoint her to be the guardian of the persons of the minors, for the purpose of retaking them out of the custody to which the board of guardians had unlawfully transferred them, and that I should make them wards of this court. I was thereby to have their rights settled by law, upon a reference directed to the Master, "to state in what manner it is proposed that they should be maintained and educated, and with whom they should reside." This was the substance of the order which William O'Malley now seeks to have set aside. It asserted in effect that the religious education of the children and the religious profession in they had been registered on the 18th of August, ought not to have been changed by the resolution of the majority of a board of guardians. It did not exclude William or any other party, from having the important question of right, as to the education of the children, decided by the proper tribunal; on the contrary, I do not see how such a decision could be had so beneficially as under an order such as I have made. But it is now contended, on behalf of William O'Malley, that upon the facts which have been disclosed in this matter to the court, on the affidavits which have been made and filed since the 23rd September, he has a lawful right to retain the custody of the minors, and to have them educated in the Roman Catholic faith. It appears from these affidavits, that Ellen O'Malley, the mother of the minors, was the eldest daughter of William Jameson, formerly a sergeant in the Constabulary Force. She had been strictly and carefully educated by her parents in the Reformed faith as a Protestant. She married John O'Malley, a constable of the force, but he was a Roman Catholic. They had eight children, five sons and three daughters. William, the eldest child, is twelve years of age, the three daughters are of the ages of ten, eight, and seven respectively, the others of the ages of five years and two years, and the youngest is under two years. The elder portion of the family were regularly sent to school, in the several places in which John O'Malley was stationed. In the National school of one of those places they were taught and treated as Protestant children, and were returned as such to the National Board by the master, who was himself a Roman Catholic. In the schools at the other places they were instructed, as well as registered, as Protestant children. They attended Divine service in the Protestant Church, and also the catechetical instruction on each Saturday, when the Protestant children of the church were instructed by the rector in the Church Catechism. The eldest boy attended the Sunday school in connexion with the church, and was sent to church by his father at a time when Ellen O'Malley was absent from home, a patient in the Galway infirmary. The family were visited by the Protestant clergymen, and the children were occasionally taught by their father at home, out of the Holy Scriptures, and from the Catechism of the United Church. It does not appear that in any one instance their father ever had taken any of them to a Roman Catholic service, and with the exception of having all but the youngest, baptized according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, he never, in any respect, treated any of them otherwise than as a Protestant parent ought to treat his child. It therefore seems to me that it is satisfactorily made out, as a matter of fact, that in the church, the family, and the school, these children were, with the full consent of both their parents, carefully trained up as Protestant children. The father died in March, 1857. After his death, their mother continued the same course of instruction as had been followed in the father's lifetime. She died in June, 1858, a pauper in the workhouse at Tuam, and whilst the children remained in the workhouse, until the 18th of August, 1858, they were visited, taught, and treated as Protestant children. To this no objection appears to have been made, before the 11th of August, when the aunt, Jane Robinson, applied to the guardians to get the children out of the workhouse. The learned and able counsel for William O'Malley insist that, inasmuch as it appears that his brother John was himself a Roman Catholic, and that his children, except the youngest, were baptized according to the Roman Catholic rite, and as they maintain that it appears on the affidavits, that John O'Malley, on his death bed, expressed a wish and directed that his children should be brought up as Roman Catholics, and that the consent of John O'Malley, during his life, to the bringing them up as Protestants must be considered as having been given from worldly and unworthy motives, and not from a proper sense of responsibility as a parent, it is now the duty of this court to disregard all that has already taken place, and to have the children hereafter educated in the tenets of the Roman Catholic faith. In Lyons v. Blenlein (Jacob's Reports, p. 263), where a father had allowed his children to be brought up by an aunt, and afterwards sought to withdraw them, and to change their course of education, Lord Eldon says:—"It appears to me that the father has so far given his consent to this course of education as to preclude him from saying that he shall now be permitted to break in and introduce a new system of education, which cannot be consistent with the system to which they had been habituated." In Witty v. Marshall (1 Y. coll. ch. Cas. 68.), the father, in his will, inserted the following words:—"I am desirous that my said son should be educated in the Roman Catholic faith, in which I live, and which I believe to be the true faith." He then appointed his wife and certain other persons guardians of his children, and enjoined them to cause his son to be educated in the Roman Catholic faith. The mother was a Protestant, and when the case came before the court, it appeared that the minors had received what the Vice-Chancellor called 'Protestant impressions.' Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce says:—"With every respect, therefore, for what may be allowed to the feelings and wishes of the father on so important a subject, it is impossible not to see that great danger to the spiritual welfare and to the moral character of the infant may arise (I do not say will arise) from a change of religious education. On this ground, and this ground alone, it is the duty of the court to pause." He then says, 'the proper course is to direct a reference to the Master. Rarely can the court, with propriety, withdraw such questions from the Master.'"

But the recent case of Stourton v. Stourton, which, in the year 1857, came before the Lords Justices of Appeal in Chancery in England, puts the question beyond controversy in this court. The minor was the only child of the Hon John Stourton (deceased) and of Caroline Emma, his wife, both of whom were Roman Catholics. He died on the 23rd May, 1847. On the 30th May, 1847, the minor was born. He was baptised as a Roman Catholic. His uncle Lord Stourton, was his godfather. Mrs. Stourton, some time after her husband's death, became a member of the Church of England, and educated her son accordingly. All his relations, except the mother, were Roman Catholics. On the 18th November, 1856, the Master of the Rolls made an order appointing the mother to be the guardian of the minor. Against this the appeal was taken. Lord Justice Knight Bruce, says:—"No doubt the boy might have been brought up a Roman Catholic had his father's relations interposed sooner, and not permitted the mother to take the course she has taken. He said 'permitted,' because no concealment or deceit was proved, or even alleged against her." Again he says:—"The child's tranquillity, health, happiness, and spiritual welfare were too likely to suffer from an attempt to efface his Protestant impressions for such a course to be attempted." This course was to have the paternal uncle made a guardian, and the child educated as a Roman Catholic. Lord Justice Turner, after adverting to the settled rule of the court, and to the fact that the child had been allowed to receive Protestant instruction, says:—“The father's wishes might be in conflict with the safety and welfare of the child, and it was necessary to see what religious impressions had already been made on the child's mind.” Having then stated that, from an interview with the child, the court was satisfied that impressions had been made adverse to the faith of the father, and having pointed out the danger of disturbing these impressions, he adds:—“Whether the consequences would or would not be such, the danger was one to which he durst not expose a child.” The order of the Master of the Rolls was affirmed. This child was but nine years of age. He had been baptised a Roman Catholic; his father and his uncle, and all his relations were Roman Catholics, until his mother, after his birth, had become a Protestant; and Lord Stourton, the uncle and godfather, was not allowed to be a guardian of the child, nor to change the religious education which he had, in fact, received under his mother. And why? Simply because, as a matter of fact, Protestant impressions had been made by a course of religious teaching which had been permitted without remonstrance, and which it might be dangerous to unsettle. The law recognises what all experience attests, that the earliest lessons of childhood, which are impressed upon the young and tender heart, are the latest to be forgotten. The law intrusts the father with the care and education of his children, because for natural affection he is considered as the proper person to discharge that duty. It is not a power, but a trust; and he who is bound to lay the foundation in the heart of his child is empowered by statute to select a guardian to whom he may confide the continuance and execution of the trust. In the several cases on the subject the impressibility of children of tender years is prominently noticed, and as the interference of this court is “for the benefit of the child, without reference to religious distinctions,” the important question must be whether in fact such impressions have been made that it might be perilous to disturb? Such are not to be treated like the characters traced upon the sand, which the returning tide effaces, but they are to be cherished with tenderness and care as a right vested in the child, which the law regards as sacred and inviolable. With reference, therefore, to the eldest son and the three daughters, it seems to me that upon the facts, which are beyond dispute, and by law, which I am bound to follow in this court, the order of the 23rd September ought not to be disturbed. I come next to the case of the younger children, and although no distinction has been taken in the course of the argument on either side, I think it is proper for me to deal with the two sets of children distinctively. In the Queen v. Clarke (7 Ell. Blackb., 201), Lord Campbell, in a very elaborate judgment, states the view of a court of law, where the father has died without having appointed a testamentary guardian. “The husband,” he says, “certainly was a Protestant; his children had been baptized in the Anglican Church, and he probably expected that they would be brought up as Protestants.” After stating that nothing was to be found in the husband's will on the subject, and that he seemed to have confided in his wife, who was a Roman Catholic, the Lord Chief Justice says:—"Indeed, by marrying a Roman Catholic, and by permitting the children in his lifetime to join in Roman Catholic prayers, he does not seem to have had the horror of Popery felt by many pious Protestants. The mother becoming guardian by nurture on the death of the father, no provision to the contrary being made by will, she appears to us to have in all respects the same parental authority which might have been exercised by the father had he survived the mother." "The question," he adds, "must be the same under the actual circumstances of this case, as if the father had died a Roman Catholic, and the mother surviving had been a Protestant; would it in that case have been unlawful for the mother to have brought up the children as Protestants?" This view of the right of the mother surviving, where no testamentary guardian has been appointed by the father, has a sanction in the judgment of Lord Hardwicke in Villareal v. Mellish (2 Swanst., 536 and 538), and in the case of Stroke v. Stroke (3 P. Wms., 52), I think, however, that it must be taken to be the accredited rule of this court, that, in whatever way the wishes of the father can be clearly ascertained, the court will respect them to the utmost that is consistent with the welfare of the child, and this without any reference to religious distinctions. It may, perhaps, be asked, where nothing has been done under the sanction of the father in his lifetime, and where he has not appointed a testamentary guardian, how could it be for the welfare of the child, without reference to religious distinctions, to compel the widowed mother to educate her infant offspring in a religious faith which her own conscientious conviction compels her to disbelieve? This is a grave question. In the present case, however, it has been assumed on both sides that, as both father and mother are dead, the ascertainment of the genuine wishes of the father should decide the question which is substantially at issue between the parties now before me. This could not be allowed in a court of law, and so far the intervention of this court on petition is an advantage of Wm. O'Malley. It appears from the affidavit of the Rev. Mr. Coyne, the Roman Catholic clergyman, that on the day before John O'Malley died, Daniel Coughlan, a policeman, came for him to attend on John O'Malley, whom he had not spoken to previously, nor did he know of his illness. Mr. Coyne states that before his visit John O'Malley "was attended by the Sisters of Mercy." It does not appear how soon before Mr. Coyne arrived, these ladies had been in attendance. Mr. Coyne says, that upon this occasion he administered "the last rites of the Church," and upon the same occasion, "John O'Malley, in the presence of his wife and two policemen, Coughlan and Pat. Mulligan, expressed a wish and directed that his children should be brought up in the Roman Catholic religion." That Mrs. O'Malley said to him, "John, you were always a kind and affectionate husband; I would wish to carry out your intention, but what means have you left me for that?" Whereupon Mr. Coyne said:—"That matter should be left in the hands of Providence." Mr. O'Hagan most earnestly and eloquently urged that this was a solemn dying declaration, and referred to the rule in our criminal law, which admits a dying declaration in evidence. But with what cautious circumspection is it admitted? The death of the party who makes the declaration must be the subject of inquiry, and the circumstances of the death the subject of the declaration, which in some cases may be indispensable to identify the murderer. I could not but remember the prudent suggestion of one of our most learned and experienced judges, who, in Fitzgerald's case (Irish Circ. Cas., 169), says:—"Every one knows that in the state of languor in which dying persons generally are, their assent would easily be got to statements which they never intended to make, if they were but ingeniously interwoven by an artful person with statements which were actually true. That such has been the case here I do not mean to say, but at the same time, were I to admit the declaration which is now offered in evidence, I should be opening a door to great abuse."

Mr. Coyne has stated that he did not use any importunity; but if he considered himself conscientiously bound, in the discharge of what he must have felt to be a sacred duty of his office, to put questions and make suggestions to the weak and dying man which might not be easily parried without the energy of health and the vis inertiae of undisturbed conviction, I can well understand how, under the peculiar circumstances in which Mr. Coyne then stood, he may have succeeded in obtaining a languid assent, which would not have been volunteered. Mr. Coyne himself, not John O'Malley, answered the objection of Ellen O'Malley to her husband's alleged injunction. Would not this indicate, either that Mr. Coyne naturally considered himself as the interpreter of John O'Malley's wishes, or that the latter was too weak to deal with the objection, or did not desire to prolong the discussion? In any view, the scene is imperfect, the termination is abrupt. And indeed, in another part of his affidavit, where Mr. Coyne charges this afflicted widow with a readiness to barter the faith of her children, he says he told her "if they were given up according to the wishes of her husband, they would be taken care of." These are the very words of Mr. Coyne himself. The wishes of the dying husband were, he says, to have the children "given up." According to the previous statement, such a wish was not expressed by John O'Malley to his wife, and this is made more conclusive by her objection to what was expressed. How is this to be reconciled? Mr. Coyne has obviously mixed up what he may have suggested to the dying man under a solemn sense of duty at the critical period of the administration of the sacramental rite. It may have been proposed by the Sisters of Mercy that the female children would be received into the convent, where William O'Malley has now placed them. We have no account from those ladies of what took place when they were present. But Mary Byrne has in her affidavit given a very remarkable account of what took place immediately after Mr. Coyne had left the house. If the proposal was to give up the children, nothing can be more natural, or more probable in its substance, than the account given by Mary Byrne of what she saw and heard. The husband was at the point of death; the wife, with one little infant, the new-born babe, baptized in her own faith, and all her children of tender years. None as yet had been withdrawn by her confiding husband from the influence of the mother's teaching and the mother's love—that now, when she would be left a widow, she should give up her children, each and all, to ecclesiastical custody! Whatever may have been said or done in the presence of the priest, or of the Sisters of Mercy, when nature resumed her sway, and at once appealed to the heart of the husband and the father, I cannot disbelieve the pithy account, condensed in one sentence of the affecting letter to her sister, written soon after her sad bereavement, where she speaks of “how a priest and two of the nuns thought to come round me in presence of my poor dying husband, but I baulked them completely. John did not blame me for what I told them, for after they went away he desired me to bring up the children in the way I always brought them up.” The Rev. Mr. Seymour states, in his affidavit,—“That at the last interview with the said Mrs. O'Malley a few days previous to her death, she indignantly denied the truth of the report that she intended to have them brought up in the Roman Catholic faith; and alleged, as one of her reasons, that her husband's dying wish was that they should be brought up in her own persuasion as Protestants; and that her husband frequently, on previous occasions, expressed the same desire.” Here, then, we have the dying mother's account of what were the last wishes of the dying father: a double testimony, given in the presence of death, and sealed with all the solemn sanctions of eternity. If doubt there were as to the true import of his dying wishes, the consistent course of his life in the training of the elder children, and the remarkable fact of his having so recently allowed the youngest child to be baptised in the Protestant faith, would furnish the best comment for the guidance of a court of justice, which looks to actions and conduct as the best key to the discovery of intentions. Could he have intended that she should hand over the babe, which he did not even require to be baptised a Roman Catholic? It struck me as somewhat remarkable that from the month of March, 1857, when the father died, until the month of August, 1858, neither the Rev. Mr. Coyne nor any other person came forward to assert that the father of these children had on his death bed expressed his dying wish that all or any of them should be educated in the Roman Catholic faith. Mr. O'Hagan suggested to me that he understood some application had been made at the Tuam workhouse on the subject, and that the answer was that they had not power to alter the registry. It thus appears they knew their duty. But this does not consist with the explanation given by the Rev. Mr. Coyne. He says “From the course which Mrs. O'Malley pursued after the death of her husband, deponent thought it useless to interfere further in the matter.” This is quite intelligible, if the children were to be “given up;” but if they were simply to be brought up as Roman Catholics, why should no application have been made before the 11th of August by Mr. Coyne, who was a chaplain of the workhouse, or by William O'Malley, the anxious uncle? Why should the guardians have been then set in motion to violate their known duty, and set the registry and the law at defiance? I have not adverted to some topics which have been imported into the argument of this case, and have much increased the pain and pressure of the trying duty which has unavoidably devolved on me to discharge. It has been said that Jane Robinson is only made use of by Miss Plunket, in order "to buy up the custody" of these orphans. It is enough for me to see that Jane Robinson is so nearly related to the children that it is proper for me to interfere for their protection, and that her interference is bonâ fide; and on the reference for which the order provides, the way in which she proposes to have them maintained and educated, will be investigated by the Master. The custody of the children remains under the care of the court, and is neither to be obtained by wealth nor to be denied by poverty. It is the free gift of the law, to which all must do homage, "the least as feeling its care, the greatest as not exempted from its power." In the case of Alicia Race, with the details of which I have been furnished by the kindness of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, the provision made came from benevolent strangers, who desired to give the child the means of asserting her English right, and the court acted on the undertaking of counsel to have a maintenance provided. It is obvious that William O'Malley himself has neither the means nor the inclination to support these children without the aid of strangers. But in the case of orphans so situated there must at least be the power of having them publicly maintained as destitute poor, entitled to be secured in their Constitutional rights, as infant subjects of the Queen, if no relative can be found able and willing to support and educate them under the court, and subject to its control, or if no stranger can be allowed to extend the hand of charity without being subjected to harsh and ungenerous imputations.

In cases where the religious issue is open, it is a rule which I always adopt, to put the case with the religion of the parties reversed, and consider then the decision I should pronounce. Had John O'Malley been a facile Protestant, and his wife a devoted member of the Roman Catholic Church; had he allowed his children from their earliest years to learn the language of its ancient ritual and its impressive invocations; had he left his widow to fight the hard battle of life with a numerous and helpless offspring; if she had kept them together to the last, until she had nothing to share but her prayers and her tears; and if she had left them in the Church which hallowed the earliest lessons of their infancy; and if a board of guardians could be found who would consign them to a custody where Protestantism would be let loose upon them, and the interference of this court should be sought for their deliverance on the application of some humble but honest Roman Catholic relative, aided by any generous stranger: could I, then, shrink from a duty so sacred and so palpable?—God forbid. It is a satisfaction to me to know that if I have erred in the view which I have taken, my decision can be reviewed by the Court of Appeal, both here and in England. I must refuse this application, with costs. William O'Malley has availed himself of the assistance of Poor Law guardians to deprive these children of their lawful rights. He asks of me to believe that his deceased brother was a hollow hypocrite, who bartered away the faith of his children for some unworthy but undefined motive. I have no authority here, without and against evidence, to impeach the motives or conduct of either the living or the dead. The children have a property in their father's good name, and, so far as it may be in my power to secure, I will see that they be taught to respect the memory of both their parents, and not to learn that either has been a castaway. John O'Malley, in his life, was, as it appears, an affectionate husband and a tender father; on his death he received reverently from the priest of his own church her last sacramental rite; with the minister of his wife's church he joined in fervent prayer, and confessed a faith which Mr. Lynch insists to be Roman Catholic, Mr. Fowler asserts to be Protestant, and of which I will only add, it was the simple faith of a Christian. In this responsible jurisdiction I feel how solemnly I am bound to act without fear, favour, or affection. The duty, on the present occasion, invidious as it is, has been made the more painful to me from the contention of the parties having been too much leavened with the bitterness of controversy, and too little with the kind and gentle spirit of charity, so suited to the case of poor destitute orphans. The religion of the Redeemer is a religion of love, and not of strife or hatred. Like his seamless garment, the trembling touch of faith may from the very hem extract a healing virtue. In the true spirit of this religion, I trust these children may be educated, so that the law of this land may be honoured, and the last wishes expressed by both the parents righteously fulfilled.

ART. IX.—MONTALEMBERT ON ENGLAND AND INDIA.

1. A Debate on India in the English Parliament. By M. Le Comte de Montalembert. Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange. London: 1858.
2. The Trial of M. Le Comte de Montalembert and M. Douniol before the Paris Correctional Tribunal on the 24th November, 1858. Effingham Wilson. London: 1858.
3. The Political Future of England. By the Comte de Montalembert of the French Academy—from the French. John Murray. London: 1856.

The English people are so much accustomed to bespatter themselves with their own praises, to laud themselves and their institutions, and proclaim them to the rest of the world, as the freest on the face of the globe, that any responsive echo coming from abroad is hailed as a right due to their own excellence, no matter what may be the source or motive, from which it emanates. Their gullability is of the most facile, their devotion to flattery of the most servile description; they swallow with a peculiar avidity, everything which tends to feed their most consummate selfishness and egotism. Thus it is that the English press has seized upon, and heaped with the highest eulogiums the article by the Comte De Montalembert on the India debate, merely because it teems with the most fulsome adulations of their country. One paper, the giant in print, goes so far as to say, that this production, "is a noble and passionate eulogy of English freedom; the language of which extraordinary composition is a stream of unpausing eloquence," ignoring altogether the purpose for which these papers were written. We do not mean to assert that it is not an able performance, skilfully designed and executed, but any one who scans its paragraphs ever so lightly, will at once perceive that it was not written either as a panegyric, or a lesson in history.

The artistic design of this picture is too transparent, the colours too highly wrought and unreal, not to fail in producing the effect intended by the painter. It is impossible to hide from ourselves, that notwithstanding the Anglo-French

Alliance, which has lasted through many trials for the last five or six years, there still lurks within the breast of each nation, a strong germ of the ancient rivalry, which so often set Europe by the ears, and deluged her plains with human blood. This rankles still in the minds of the great mass of the French people, who cannot regard anything English as excellent, except her riches as a fitting prey for plunder and vengeance. Therefore anyone who extols the power, liberty, or institutions of "perfidie Albion," or contrasts them with those of France to the disadvantage of the latter, is regarded more as a spy, or secret enemy in the camp, than as a person anxious to instruct his fellow countrymen, or improve their social condition. The Imperial government might have allowed this writing to eat itself out in silence, being contrary to the instincts of the great French Public, and only serving the objects of the Red Republican, or Monarchists, who at all hazards are desirous of changing the present order of things. The army, which is the great engine of the ruling power in France, is more thoroughly imbued than any other portion of the public, with a supreme contempt for the English as a military nation, and consider it as an insult to be put in comparison with them. From this spirit arose the fracas of the colonels after the dismissal of Lord Palmerston, and if the Imperial dynasty is ever driven to its last resource to maintain its grasp upon the throne and sceptre, it has but to let loose its "dogs of war" upon England and her allies, in order to regain a complete hold of power, and to re-awaken the attachment of the people.

Montalembert has been for that reason extremely injudicious in carrying to such extravagant lengths the contrast, which he draws between the present position of his own country and that of Great Britain. The French do not wish to have thrown in their face the futility of their efforts for liberty and constitutional government, or to be placed so low in the scale of civilization, as to be designated the grovelling slaves of despotism. They despise many of the mannerisms, money-making, plodding systems of the English public, and are proud of many of their own national idiosyncracies, which are cried down and laughed at on this side of the Channel. They glory in their military power and discipline, regard themselves as irresistible in arms, and cannot at all feel flattered, when they are told by M. Le Comte—"When I am stifling in an atmosphere loaded with the exhalations of servility and corruption, I set forth to breathe a purer air, and to take a life-bath (bain de vie) in free England ;" which sentence forms one of the leading paragraphs of his Essay on the India Debate. In fact Montalembert is one of those Royalists, who by adroit and prudent conduct have hitherto endeavoured successfully to keep their places, but, as has been often said by the followers of the present dynasty, constituting the great mass of the people, these men will never learn that their time has passed away. They hope that by disgusting the minds of the French with the government in power, they may be able to produce some change, and trust to Providence in the result.

He says again ; " I write for my own satisfaction, and for that of a small number of invalids, of prying, curious people—of maniacs, if you will have it so, like myself. I study contemporary institutions, which are no longer ours, but which once have been, and which still seem worthy of envy and admiration to my mind, behind hand as it is "—But maniacs may become very dangerous, in proportion to the extravagance of their notions, and their opposition to the received usages of the society in which they live. Then how can he compare the constitutional representation in England, to that which existed in France, either during the first Revolution, or under the first Empire, or under the modern Bourbons. The first was a grinding tyranny of democracy, more blood-thirsty and cruel, than that of the most absolute despot ; the second was overridden and extinguished by military control, the third could only boast of its utter servility and corruption. France never can enjoy a representative government for any considerable period without abusing it, and the direst anarchy is sure to follow in its footsteps.

Having opened with these and other remarks, which sufficiently show, that his aim is not to praise England, but to lower the French in their own estimation, he proceeds to discuss the Colonial policy of England- and her conduct towards India in particular. He points to Canada in triumph, where he says a French Catholic population has been fostered and increased in wealth and numbers by the care of the parent country, forgetting altogether that the threatened dismemberment of that part of her possessions has alone checked the illiberal dealing of the Home Government with the descendants of the French settlers. He further asserts that every colonial extension made by the British opens up "immense vistas" to the preaching of the Gospel, and the spreading of the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church, putting out of sight altogether the immense sums yearly subscribed in Great Britain for the foreign extension of the establishment, principally by the talismanic cry of opposition to Popery—France, Spain and Portugal are attacked, as Catholic countries, for not extending the dominion of the Gospel, or allowing it to die out where it had been formerly planted. This has arisen more from the degeneracy of the race, and the want of activity of their modern governments, than from the insufficiency of the teaching of their religion.

As to the general foreign and colonial policy of England he says ; " I may boldly affirm, that no one knows better, that no one has more loudly signalled than I, the backslidings and deviations of English policy during the few past years. I was certainly the first to denounce, previously to 1848, the policy of Lord Palmerston, but too often imperious to the weak and truckling to the strong, in the highest degree imprudent, illogical, and foreign to all the great traditions of his country." * * * " It would be besides the height of folly and of iniquity to regard England as solely culpable, or as the most culpable, among the nations of the earth. Her policy is neither more selfish nor more immoral than that of other great states, which figure in ancient or modern history." This is the only portion of his essay in which he does not act the Panegyrist ; it shews however his consistency, as it agrees almost word for word with what he wrote on the same subject in 1856. In 1848 he " already saw in Lord Palmerston—in the champion of Pacifico in Greece ; and the oppressor of the small country of Switzerland—a great contempt for the rights of the weak, and a ready ally of revolution against liberty. * * * * The English people have been it must be confessed his too faithful accomplices. * * * * The insupportable arrogance of the English diplomacy towards the weak, and of the English press towards everybody, has raised the just indignation of a vast number of reasonable men. Still more does the intrusive, aggressive and dissolving influence exercised by the British government, with respect to the rights and the faith of the Catholics in Switzerland, and in the south of Europe, deserve the reprobation of every sincere Christian."

Here some wholesome truths are allowed to burst forth in spite of his general purpose of praise, although he does not give many examples of these "backslidings and deviations." We can point to some, which may serve to illustrate more effectually these tendencies of British policy. During the Crimean war, entered upon in order to check the threatening aspect of Russia in Asia, and to curb her growing influence, which endangered the north west of India, and the trade of the East, the western powers made use of every available means within their reach to effect their objects; among the rest they enlisted the services of the Circassians, treated with them as allies, and supplied them in some cases with arms and ammunition. When the war was brought to a close, these allies were forgotten, left to their own resources, not included in the treaty of peace; no effort was made to shield them against the indignation of the humbled enemy, who would be sure to wreak his vengeance on their defenceless heads. Such an example of the selfish abandonment of a brave people, when the opportunity for making use of their services had gone by, does not exist in history, and England will hereafter regret her conduct in this affair, when the plains of Asia Minor and Persia are overrun by the rapacious Muscovites. The chain of the Caucasus might have been easily maintained as a barrier or fortress to check the advance of aggression; when that is swept away, as it must sooner or latter, it is scarcely possible to conceive how the onward wave of Russian absorption is to be arrested. Again, very lately our old ally Portugal, whose plains and hills have been dyed by the best blood of England, when she made her last stand for vital existence on the map of Europe, was compelled at the cannon's mouth to abandon the safeguard of treaties, and yield to a show of force by France in a case of manifest injustice. England never raised her voice even in protestation, or if she did it was in such an humble tone, as to proclaim either a complete inability to support her ancient ally, or an unwillingness to risk a disagreement with a new and more powerful friend. The whole question of the deportation of free blacks into the French colonies, against the spirit of the slave laws, and under the colour of a hiring for a limited number of years, may be cited as another example. England is mute or looks on with indifference, enters no protest, while a commission is enquiring into the best means of effecting this legalized traffic. Then she endeavours to bully Naples, because this latter is a Catholic Power, and in consequence of the turbulence and revolutionary spirit of her people, fostered by the press, money and arrogance of England, is obliged to use strong measures of repression. What right has Protestantism to interfere with the internal affairs of a Catholic state, or to cry out against intolerance, when but a few years ago her own votaries in Ireland were the most intolerant of religionists, and in the north of Europe lately the zealous followers of the Reformation, furnished a most inhuman example of history?

England is lauded for her rapacity in seizing upon the dominions of the native Princes in the Indian Peninsula, and the Company extolled because it has governed "at a distant of 2000 leagues from the mother country, nearly 200,000,000 of men by means of 800 civil servants; and an army numbering from 15,000 to 20,000 men." All this is certainly a glorious page in history, far surpassing the achievements of Alexander, or the successes of the Tartar monarchs. But is it not another example of the rapacity of the human race? The insatiable desire to possess the fable riches of the East has caused the representatives of the English nation in Hindostan, to give the fullest reins to their avidity. They have stopped at nothing to possess themselves of the land, the produce thereof, and to hunt out the recesses, in which the storied treasures were kept. They have dispossessed on one plea or another every king or prince, who held dominion in the Peninsula; their last act of spoliation has brought about what has been termed by choice the "Rebellion," in order that the foul name might be made a successful pretext for the more complete extinguishment of every native claim, and the resumption into the hand of the government of a vast amount of forfeited property. The Indian war certainly commenced by mutiny of the native soldiers in the pay of the company, in consequence of a military order trampling upon one of the most sacred dogmas of their religion. Those, who have assumed the sovereignty in India have no right to dictate to the different races and castes, what they are to believe or what form of worship they are to observe. It is only in the case of something revolting to humanity, such as the suttee, or burning of widows, that there may be some title to suppress a rite,

But where so harmless a dogma exists as that of abstaining from touching or eating animal food, surely the prejudices of the natives ought to be in all conscience respected, and not crushed out under the penalty of rebellion. The landholders of Oude stand upon a different ground, they must be looked upon as the defenders of the rights of their sovereigns, and if their country is to be annexed and conquered at all hazards, it must be conceded to them at least that they are not rebels, but the resisters of aggression.

It is true that in the commencement of the war many grievous atrocities were committed by the sepoy, wholesale massacres calling to heaven for vengeance. We do not wish to palliate or defend these in the slightest degree, although we believe that they have been in many instances greatly exaggerated by the press of England, and the promoters of confiscation. Let the perpetrators be punished, amply punished as they deserve, but in the name of all that is good, let not the fair fame of the British arms be stained by that truculent cry for blood, which has arisen throughout the land, and has been already partially executed. Letters and accounts have been received from India, in which the writers dwell with savage delight upon the wholesale slaughtering of whole regiments of unfortunate, misguided men. These and other acts perpetrated under the name of retribution, will hereafter stamp the deepest stain upon the name of England in the page of history, only to be placed in comparison with the extirpation of the Carthaginians and Jews by the Romans.

That such is the opinion of Montalembert himself, will appear from the following passage :—

“ After having thus allotted to the defence of a great people, unjustly defamed, so much of our space, our motive being that it enjoys, almost alone, the honour of representing liberty in modern Europe, it is fitting to testify to the just indignation, which the excessive rigour of the chastisements inflicted by the English on the vanquished insurgents, who have fallen into their hands, ought to evoke. I am aware of all that can be said to excuse reprisals, only too legitimate, against savages guilty of the most monstrous excesses committed on the persons of so many officers, surprised and disarmed, and especially so many noble women, innocent young girls, and poor little children, slaughtered in hundreds, without any provocation for such horrid deeds. I can well understand the battle-cry of the Highlanders at the assault of Delhi, ‘ Remember the ladies ! Remember the babies ! ’ I admit, moreover, that the severe punishments inflicted on soldiers, taken with arms in their hands, all of them voluntarily enlisted, and bound, under an oath taken of their own free will, to respect the commanders whom they have massacred, cannot be compared with the chastisements inflicted on innocent and hospitable populations, by the conquerors of the new world, nor even with the rigorous punishments decreed by our generals of the French Empire against the populations of Spain and of the Tyrol, engaged in the most legitimate of insurrections ; still less to the horrors committed in La Vendée, by the butchers of the Convention. But for all that, I am not the less convinced that the just limits of repression have been overpassed, and that the executions, en masse, of the defeated Sepoys, systematically continued after the first outburst of grief caused by unheard-of atrocities, will fix an indelible stain on the history of British rule in India. This is no longer justice, but vengeance. A people really free should leave the sad privilege of being cruel to slaves in revolt. A Christian people ought to know that it is at once a thing forbidden and impossible for it to struggle against Infidel races, with such arms as mere punishment may supply. It is the part of English "gentlemen" (sic.) who direct military and political operations from the Indus to the Ganges, to know how to resist the odious incitements of the Anglo-Indian press. They have before them the example of the chivalrous Havelock, who in a proclamation addressed to the soldiers, whom he was leading against the cut-throats of Cawnpore, declared that it did not become Christian soldiers to take Pagan butchers for their models."

As far as regards her colonial policy in Australia, North America, and the Cape of Good Hope, Great Britain has reason to be proud of a moderate, wise and beneficent course of action. The consequences of an opposite conduct in the instance of the United States have left an indelible impression on the minds of her statesmen, by which they learn that anything in the nature of oppression will not be tolerated by those who have once tasted freedom. At the first sign of undue coercion by the mother country, any or all of these colonies may throw off their allegiance, and arrogate to themselves a right to independence in the scale of nations. It is different with India and China. There the Europeans are either so much connected with the governing power, or so much interested in oppressing the natives for their own emolument, that any chance of right being done to the aborigines is out of the question. Philanthropists may lay schemes for the improvement of the population, for the irrigation of dry land or the draining of swamps, for the spreading of Christainity by the sale of millions of Bibles, or the suppression of Bhuddism and Castes, but that the main aim and object of all parties will ever be the extraction of the greatest amount of wealth, the increase of the commerce of the merchant at home, and the draining off to Europe of the fat of the land, cannot for a moment be doubted. How can it be expected, that a government at the other side of the globe, will rule for the benefit of the aborigines, and not for that of their spoilers.

The same system is about being carried out in China. A footing is got at Hong Kong; a miserable pretext of the seizure of a smuggling lorcha is made use of, to take violent possession of a rich city, numbering more than a million of inhabitants. Then a trade is forced upon the Chinese, by which sooner or later the English will gain vantage ground upon their territory, and enact over again the scenes of India, the slaughter of the inhabitants, trying to free themselves of their pestilent invaders, and the violent seizure of successive portions of territory. Can it be said for a moment that the unfortunate subjects of the celestial Empire have not a perfect right, if they wish, to exclude all foreigners from their boundaries. It is contended that they have no right to refuse trade which will be for their own benefit, or the blessings of Christianity, which may dawn upon them at a future time. In fact it is the old argument of the end justifying the means; but a more plain instance of filibustering on the part of the great English people cannot be imagined. So much are our continental neighbours impressed with the reality of this idea, that they have determined not to be behind hand, and that if Asia is to be seized upon and divided among the European powers, they at least shall have their full share. France is only taking a leaf out of the book of England's system of aggrandizement, by appropriating to herself the territory of Cochin China. She sees what strides the Islanders are making in commerce by the possession of foreign lands, which serve as points d'appui for their trade. She has endeavoured to imitate them in Algeria, but finding that district to be up to this, a barren, losing speculation, she has turned her attention to more distant climes, where there can be no interference from dangerous neighbours. All this is a portion of the same wholesale appropriation, spoliation and robbery, which has been dignified since the world began, with the high-sounding title of conquest.

The assumption of supreme power in India, has been defended chiefly upon the grounds of the many abuses and cruelties of the native princes, the state of subjection and misery in which they kept the population, while they themselves wallowed in the grossest or the most refined luxury, and the substitution for all these of the blessings of European rule and civilization. In the first place, this was not the original reason for the extension of territory. The Company sought alone a wider field for the pursuit of riches, and took every opportunity to increase their wealth and dominion by spoliation. Besides, what trust can be placed in the rectitude of conduct of a set of merchants, who cultivate upon a gigantic scale, a baneful drug, and in the teeth of the laws of a neighbouring country, smuggle it into the territory, to the destruction of the minds and morals of the inhabitants. If they were capable of vending poison to one nation not under their control, and contrary to express agreement and treaty, surely they may be fairly suspected of wrong dealing with another people, who are completely under their control, and wholly unable to help themselves. It is to be hoped, that the new Government emanating from the supreme power in these realms, will root out this destructive policy, and rule the country, not merely for the interests of the few European settlers, but for those of the countless multitudes, who are delivered into their hands. The Panegyrist himself allows a certain amount of culpability in the now defunct Company, when he says :—

“ Admitting, even, that the immoral selfishness of a corporation of merchants has but too often signalized its debuts in the Peninsula of Hindostan, still, for more than fifty years, its generals and principal agents, the Wellesleys, the Malcolms, the Munroes, the Bentincks, fully displayed all the zeal and all the activity becoming their high functions, to expiate the evil deeds of their predecessors, and to lead every impartial observer to avow, that in the present state of things, British domination is at once a benefit and a necessity for the inhabitants of India.”

In the next paragraph, however, he is forced to admit, that the annexation of many states, which had been formerly allies or only subject to suzerainty, especially in the case of Oude, forcibly deprived of its native government by the Marquis of Dalhousie, is a just subject of reproach, and the latter instance a legitimate pretext for insurrection. He draws a parallel in the case of Algeria, and palliates, both by the difficulty of dealing with Eastern races, "either as allies or auxiliaries," and the necessity of complete subjection before they can be brought to reason. This is only an excuse for spoliation, and an argument for seizing with armed hands half the territory in the Eastern Hemisphere, following out the iniquitous policy now adopted in China, and Cochin China.

Incidentally to this question of the policy of the English in India, he touches upon that of the influence of the press, and the part it bears in the social system of these Islands. He calls it "a universal and permanent indictment against every one and every thing," but contends that it afterwards rectifies its own mistakes in time and makes up for its coarse vituperation, by the public good effected by open discussion. This is putting out of sight altogether the immense mass of private injury, which is done by intemperate writing on the affairs of individuals, the misrepresentations and lies which are daily and hourly practised upon the general community, and the hostility which it evokes in foreign nations by the absurd, ignorant, and arrogant views which it often takes of their internal affairs. The Press of England may be said rather to be a necessary evil, than a permanent good. It may be called the "safety-valve of the democratic element," by which discontent and faction are allowed to evaporate, so as not to injure the machine of the body politic. The contrast in this particular with the restrictions on the French prints does not at all hold good, because the natural tendencies of that people are widely different from those of the phlegmatic Britons. They are a nation easily excited to acts of desperation, and cannot calmly read for even a short space incitements to insurrection without carrying them out in the reality. It is a matter of history that in the time of the old Revolution the Press in France was the most demoralized, and savage instigator to bloodshed and massacre. If the same amount of freedom of discussion were allowed there, as there is in England, a succession of revolutions would be sure to follow each other at short intervals. The temper of the public is not equable, it cannot bear strong stimulants without being excited to frenzy. It is another question, however, how far the liberty of publication should be extended, and where the work of repression by the executive should commence. A certain amount of elasticity should be allowed to public opinion, so that the various phases of it, the different elements of political party, might neutralize one another, and result in a harmony innocuous to the Sovereign power. If any one of them is unduly kept under pressure, it will find an opportunity to explode in some other direction, more dangerous to its opponents. Such has been the consequence of the present injudicious attempt to stifle this harmless Brochure of M. Le Comte de Montalembert. Had it been allowed to pass unobserved, most probably it would have only excited some criticism on its anti-Gallic tendencies, or some praise for the excellence of its construction ; but when an undue amount of influence is ascribed to it by the very party, which it seeks to condemn, it obtains a weight in proportion to the resistance given to it, draws attention to restrictions on liberty, which the French people might have otherwise passed over in silence, and rouses a slumbering indignation, which it will take years of artful treatment to allay.

So far the matter of this pamphlet is merely introductory, serving as a foundation for subsequent opinions. He next proceeds to consider, first, the causes and the fact of the fall of Lord Palmerston, and secondly, the Indian debate with the actors therein. It is quite evident, that the noble Lord, who was at the head of the late government, is no favourite with M. Le Comte. The principal reason seems to be, that he has always been one of the most strenuous supporters of the Imperial Government, and was the originator of the Anglo-French alliance, which bids fair to prevent any considerable change on the soil of Europe for many years to come. Certainly a minister was never thrown out of his seat of power for such a futile and groundless reason, or with less show of justice by the British public, than was the late premier. In consequence of an atrocious attempt on his life and that of his consort, the Emperor makes a request couched certainly in strong terms, but grounded upon the very amicable relations, which had been for several years subsisting between the two people, that assassins and murderers should not be sheltered and fostered within the realm, and under the shield of the laws of Great Britain. The French had poured out their blood upon the same plains and in the same cause, as the English, their indignation was naturally roused to the highest pitch by the nefarious nature of the crime, and by the excessive danger, which not only their sovereign had passed through, but which had menaced to throw them back into anarchy and revolution. All this is taken no account of by England, the ties of friendship and alliance are forgotten ; instead of making allowance for an excited state of feeling, the request is rudely flung back by ejecting the minister, who had not returned an answer of defiance within twenty-four hours. The question was not one of the right of asylum, it was simply that of the harbouring of murderers, but for the sake of party purposes, this was all overlooked, the alliance of years disregarded, and a new element of discord sown between the two nations. A more impolitic, and it must be said a more ungenerous course of conduct, could not be pursued by one great people towards another.

The fall of Lord Palmerston was not due to this cause alone, or to the influence of party opposition. His own friends and adherents had for some time been growing arrogant and self-confident of their hold on power ; many of them considered themselves independent of their leader, and the chief himself found it very difficult to regulate their action, or to retain them obedient under his sway. He too became somewhat vain of his position, and from the flattery of the liberal press, the triumphant issue of the Crimean war, and the general easy aspect of governmental affairs in the kingdom, considered his lease of office almost as a perpetuity, at least such as would give him high position for the greater part of his remaining days. These causes roused a spirit of independent freethinking among many of his followers, especially those inclined to radicalism or the Manchester school. They conceived that a good and safe opportunity had arrived for showing their strength to the head of the liberals, and in an unguarded moment they shipwrecked their own hopes of advancement, by helping to thrust out of the cabinet the only man, from whom they could expect an amalgamation of parties.

No sooner however were the ministry out, than their partizans saw the mistake they had made, and sought the earliest opportunity for rectifying their error. This did not present itself until two months later when the famous proclamation of Lord Canning to the population of Oude, and the dispatch of Lord Ellenborough condemning it, were brought before the House. Here two questions were raised, whether the proclamation condemning almost the entire territory of the revolted country to confiscation was to be upheld, and the dispatch withdrawn : and whether the Derby ministry as a body were not implicated in the act of Lord Ellenborough, who condemned Lord Canning before he had been heard in defence, and transgressed the rules of official propriety, by publishing the dispatch so condemning him. The first was adroitly evaded by the opposition, who wished to pass a vote of censure on the cabinet for an act of their colleague, who with manly boldness resigned, choosing rather to give up his place and emoluments, acknowledging his error, than draw down ruin on his party. The ministerialists supported the broad ground of the impolicy of confiscation, and a battle of sections ensued. Opinions were divided among the different small schools, while the mass of the liberals were still split up into independent thinkers, who had not yet learned the value of holding together under a leader to defeat an antagonist. Lord Palmerston perceived that they were impracticable and abandoned his position, withdrawing his shattered forces, in consequence of the defection of some of his adherents.

Montalembert in treating of the way in which this debate was got up and conducted, shews how much the peculiarities of English manners struck upon his mind. After Lord Derby had obtained a majority in the House of Lords of merely nine votes, all sides were of opinion that he could not hold office for many days. The Times, that great organ of public opinion, perpetually grinding antiquated humdrum airs, but never prophetic ones, vaticinised that "before a week the Derby ministry will have ceased to exist." The strife of parties became hot and furious, in the press and in the House, but never exploded in indecent rancour or ill-feeling in private. Such was not the case in France, when questions of public moment were formerly made the subjects of party contest in the assemblies. M. Le Comte ascribes this difference between the two people to the fact, that in England all are of the same way of thinking at bottom, and consider a public fight only a fair warfare between factions. This however is not the true reason ; the English are of a far different temperament from the French, pride themselves upon their coolness, calmness and impassiveness in conducting business, and when they leave the public arena cast aside all thought of strife or disagreement. Our Gallic neighbours, on the other hand, carry the animosity of party into their private relations, and hate one another cordially as political opponents.

The debate was carried on under the most admirable tactics on both sides ; in fact it may be cited as a reproach to the administration of public affairs in England, that the lives, liberties and property of many millions of men were hanging upon the decision of a party question. Sir Hugh Cairns, the Solicitor General, is praised by M. le Comte for the able speech, in which he reverted to the general topic of confiscation or not, and rated Mr. Vernon Smith for having withheld a letter of Lord Canning from Lord Ellenborough. Lord John Russell's adhesion to the opposition revived somewhat the debate in Lord Palmerston's favour, until the next day when Mr. Roebuck rose to support the dispatch. The vehement declamation and incongruous doctrine of this leader of radicalism seem to have struck the foreigner, as something very peculiar, and the tolerancy of the House in paying attention to him as something wonderful. Sir Robert Peel's personal and just remarks excited also his attention, chiefly because he alluded to the likelihood of a dissolution, and the impending danger to the Liberal party from the new elections. Here however lay one of the secret and most effectual causes of the final result of the debate. Captain Vivian moved the adjournment of the House during the Derby races, which was acceded to as usual, shewing that no matter how urgent or important are the public interests engaged, the English gentlemen composing the Commons have no idea of giving up their enjoyments of life. But during the interval they had leisure to consider the various consequences, which would arise from a defeat of the ministry. Many a poor and needy member looked forward with dread to the chances of presenting himself before his constituents with an empty purse, and perhaps a shattered political reputation. Dissatisfaction spread through the ranks of the opposition, many of whom were still wavering in their allegiance to their leader, not being sufficiently long out of office to gain a keen relish for its sweets.

As an episode Montalembert gives a description of the Derby, interesting from its peculiarities.

“It has been well said, that he who has not seen the Derby has not seen England; and for that reason people are less in the right who incessantly repeat, that an Englishman does not know how to amuse himself; or at least to amuse himself with spirit, and with order and decency at the same time. Whoever has seen 200,000, or 300,000 inhabitants of London, and its neighbourhood, assembled under a fine spring sun on the green slopes of Epsom Downs; whoever has wandered among all those equipages of every possible class, among these sheds, these bands of music, these open-air theatres, these tents with their fluttering streamers, this sea of bipeds and quadrupeds, returns home thoroughly convinced of the truth of two things generally but little received; first, the honest and communicative gaiety of the immense majority of the numerous throng; secondly, the great degree of equality which brings together, for this day at least, conditions of society usually the most distinct and apart from each other. Princes of the blood, and peers of most ancient pedigree, elbow grooms in the crowd and others of low degree, and even take part in the popular games, which occupy the irksome intervals between the races. Nowhere—not even among us in France—is seen a greater mingling of ranks; nowhere else too a gaiety, good humour and decency, resembling more the same qualities which distinguish in so honourable a manner our popular masses, when they abandon themselves to their periodical and official amusements. In the midst of this joyous and animated throng, one might believe oneself in France. But this illusion speedily vanishes, when one remarks the absence of everything like an official programme, of all interference on the part of the authorities. It is individual industry, which has done it all—announced everything, foreseen everything, regulated everything; the subscriptions collected to repay all expenses are spontaneous. A mere handful of policemen, without arms and lost as it were in the throng, reminds one of precautions taken against the interruption of order. By these features we instantly recognize England.

“On the way to Epsom, as during the preceding days, every conversation turned on the odd coincidence between Lord Derby’s political destiny and his luck as a racing man. As on the evening before, his name was on every lip; and in the issue of the race about to come off, people took pleasure in accepting an omen of his victory or defeat in the division to take place the day after. An opinion, rather generally credited, circulated to the effect, that the noble lord was far more solicitous for the success of his horse, than for that of his party. * * * * After some insignificant interludes the crowning race commences; twenty-four horses start together. How shall I paint the devouring anxiety, the tumultuous swaying to and fro of the crowd, the forward spring, the rustling of the hundred thousand persons, whose eyes and hearts are concentrated upon a single object? The disinterested stranger involuntarily recalled his Virgil to mind, and the immortal verses of the fifth book of the Æneid, which have familiarized every one of liberal education, and every cultivated mind, with so many insignificant details for ever ennobled by the epic muse. The race, which was run over a space of three quarters of a league, lasted less than three minutes. For an instant, thanks to an inequality of the course, all the horses disappeared from the view of the spectators; when they again came in sight, the different chances of the rivals began to decide themselves. One moment more of devouring anxiety, a hundred thousand heads turned towards the winning-post. Fate has decided. It is not Lord Derby who has won. His famous horse is only second. The "blue ribband" escapes him; the cup has been won by the horse of a baronet unknown, who has realized at a stroke something like £40,000."

It is evident that near the commencement of this passage he seeks to draw a comparison between the quiet civil police of England, and the political guardians of the peace in France. The allusion however is carefully made, by no means strong, and leaves an impression, that the writer was apprehensive of entering too deeply into such a delicate subject. He ignores also completely the new body of sergents de ville, who have been introduced into the streets of Paris by the present ruler. The only difference between them and our own is twofold, that they wear a cocked hat and sword, which give them a less civic, and more military appearance, but more in accordance with the idea of force and order present to the minds of the French populace.

To return to the debate, which had been interrupted for the purpose of witnessing the national "olympics," as Lord Palmerston once called the Derby races. The newspapers had been strenuously writing up victory at one side, and defeat on the other. Never was the Times more at sea in its calculations, than on that occasion, simply because it was a matter to be foreseen, predicted, and not one in which public opinion could be followed. It attacked the ministry and the dispatch, with a virulence commensurate with the expectation that the former should be defeated by a considerable majority. Still there were signs of doubtful omen, Mr. Bright, speaking strongly in favour of the cabinet, and flinging in the face of Lord John Russell his vituperative language in the Durham letter. Here Montalembert has passed a curious eulogy upon a deceased Irish member, which sounds very strange and flat to our ears. He says: "Mr. Bright is a member of the quaker sect: he is brother-in-law of that Frederick Lucas, who, born in the same sect, became a Catholic, and in addition, the most energetic advocate of his new faith. Hardly had he entered the House of Commons, when Lucas there took up a position beyond the reach of rivalry ; everything predicted in him an orator and party leader, who should equal, or perhaps surpass O'Connell ; a premature death left behind the remembrance, still vivid, of the invincible charms of his language, and of the energetic uprightness of his convictions." That Frederick Lucas was a man of talent may be conceded, but that he ever possessed the genius or eloquence of the great Repeal leader, is rather too much to assert. It is only one of these Gallic manners of talking of men, who happen to agree with, and perhaps happily express their own opinions. Lucas would never have got beyond his newspaper, even that was fast slipping from under him, as did that of Charles Gavan Duffy. They both attempted too high a range, and like the unlucky ærcnaut of old, only left their name upon the sea of troubles wherein they fell.

Sir James Graham's speech had certainly a great effect in deciding the issue. He began by declaring that the resignation of Lord Ellenborough was satisfaction enough for the mistake committed by him, in forwarding the obnoxious dispatch, at the same time condemning the confiscation system, and bringing forward the protest of Sir James Outram, who had been the former occupier and pacificator of Oude, when it was annexed under Lord Dalhousie. This produced a very powerful effect upon the House, so much so that the next day several of the opposition members requested Mr. Cardwell, the proposer of the resolution against the ministry, to withdraw it. Lord Palmerston, who saw how the wind lay and that his adherents were about to desert, chose rather to retreat with skill, than to suffer an ignominious defeat. The motion was withdrawn, and the cause of justice and good government triumphed.

Thus was the future fate of millions of inhabitants of a province of Hindostan decided, by the result of as skilful a series of party manœuvres, as was ever adopted on any petty question for harassing a ministry. The meetings of the Liberal party beforehand at Lord Palmerston's house, the appointing of proposers and seconders of the motion both in the Lords and Commons, the able speeches on both sides evading the main question and endeavouring to outwit their opponents—all this was brought to a happy conclusion by the intervention of the Derby day, and the time so given to the Liberal and Independent members to consider the position in which they would be left in case of a defeat of ministers and a dissolution of Parliament. A more ridiculous cause for deciding a great question could not be assigned.

M. le Comte praises highly the tact of D'Israeli, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the manner in which he followed up the retreat of the discomfited forces of Lord Palmerston. He ascribed the success of the division to the action of the different independent sections of the House, who were too much actuated by fair policy and a love of justice to allow such a question to be decided by a mere party manœuvre. The leaders of the several liberal and radical independencies, Mr. Gladstone, Lord John Russell, Mr. Bright and Roebuck, congratulated the Commons and themselves on the issue, not foreseeing that this was the very thing D'Israeli aimed at, and their adhesion to the ministerial ranks was somewhat pledged by that line of conduct. Montalembert's impression from the whole debate seems to have been, that persuasion had worked its way by the mere force of speaking, and that the ministry gained by strength of argument. Lamentable shortsightedness of the foreigner, who knows not the ins and outs and tergiversations of English party politics! He left England with a very exalted notion of the freedom of speech used in the House and its effects on the members. The contrast with France seems to have struck him very forcibly, for he says :

“ While these reflections encompassed me, I quitted their great spectacle full of emotion, and contented, as ought to have been every man, who sees in a government something else besides an antechamber, and in a civilized people, something more than a flock of sheep, docilely indolent, to be fleeced and led forth to pasture, under the silent shadows of an enervated security. I felt myself more than ever attached to those liberal hopes, which have always animated, through the most regrettable phases of our history, the élite of honest men, whom neither disappointment nor defeat has ever bowed down, and who, even in exile or on the scaffold, have always preserved enough of patriotism to believe that France could, quite as well as England, endure the reign of right, light and liberty. Noble belief! well worthy to actuate the most painful sacrifice, and which, although betrayed by fortune, deserted by the crowd, and insulted by cowards, does not the less retain its invincible empire over proud souls and generous spirits. When I returned to France, I read in the leading organ of the clergy, and of the new alliance of the Throne and the Altar, that all I had just seen and heard was 'a farce played with great display of scenery,' such as are often found in the history of deliberative assemblies. Happy country, thought I, and still more happy clergy, to whom such excellent information is given in such noble language."

That France might endure a little more liberty, especially in the affairs of the Press, than she does at present, may be fairly conceded, but that such a debate could have been enacted in the Chamber of Representatives under the Bourbon dynasty, is a physical impossibility. The genius and temper of the French people is of a different stamp, the influence of the Crown had too direct an effect upon the deliberations of the deputies. In Louis Philippe's time the Throne exercised too corrupt and coercive a supervision upon the votes to allow of any extensive freedom of speech or opinion. The writer of this will never forget a discussion at which he was present in the year 1841 in the Chamber of deputies, on the conduct of the Spanish authorities of the Pyrenees towards some inhabitants of the French valleys, who had broken out into marauding parties, and pillaged some of the villages beyond the frontier. M. Guizot, who at that time held the reins of power, got into the tribune, and leaning on his elbows like a schoolmaster, lectured his audience in the most perfect manner, and was listened to in the most undisturbed silence. The scene impressed the mind of the writer at the time, with the idea of a pedagogue laying down the law, chapter and verse, to his pupils, who received it without dissent or approbation. Surely this is not the deliberative liberty, which M. De Montalembert hints at as having formerly existed in Constitutional France. The passage above cited is one of those, which formed the subject of the recent prosecution in Paris; it is not strong, but it reminds one very much of some of these parts of Junius, which were made in former days in England the grounds of indictment against the Morning Advertiser. At that time it was not considered unconstitutional for the crown to proceed against a newspaper containing matter which cast aspersions on the head of the state, and brought the government into disrepute. It is idle to say, that such a power should not be conceded to the supreme authority in every nation; it is another question whether in the case of M. De Montalembert, it was judicious or not to exercise it.

Having finished his description of the debate, M. le Comte proceeds to eulogize many of the institutions and peculiar manners of England. That of the capability of every citizen to complain against any official personage for grievances, whether real or fancied, he looks upon as something peculiar. He says it is, "a guarantee of British liberty, of enormous importance and but too little known, which contrasts with that inviolability of the pettiest officials of France, created by the constitution of year VIII, which people were simple enough, even under the constitutional régime, to place among the Conquests of 1789." Certainly there cannot be a greater cause of complaint among the inhabitants of a free country, than that the very people, whom by their public voice they place over themselves to manage either the magistrature or the affairs of the state, should be those from whom they receive the least civility, and that no redress can be had against the many petty acts of injustice of which they may be capable. The great remedy for such an evil exists in England in the Press, which may be brought to bear at any moment upon the offender, and show him up to public indignation. In France such a tribunal of opinion is not heard or dreamt of; there is no satisfaction for injuries done, except by some round about ordeal, which completely fails in its effect. The constant dread in which our employés are kept of their actions and dealings being exposed, is one of the greatest safeguards we possess, for the inviolability of the constitutional liberties.

M. de Montalambert rejoices in the defeat of Lord Palmerston, evidently on account of the foreign policy of that minister, and the support which he gave to the present ruling power in France. He congratulates himself also on the discomfiture which the Times, an overgrown organ of manysided views, received by the unexpected issue of the debate. The check given to this "immense engine of publicity" restored the "equilibrium of constitutional powers," and demonstrated the superiority held by the House of Commons over the Press in ruling public opinion. All the efforts of that journal were vain, to bring back its favorite premier, against the sense of justice and honesty residing in the bosoms of the representatives of the people. He attributes the great force of our form of government to the influence of the middle classes, who really rule the state through those permitted to hold the reins, not quarrelling with the aristocracy on account of their birth, or the rich man on account of his riches. He says the middle class "willingly consents that that the aristocracy by birth, which for ages, is recruited from its ranks, shall represent at home and abroad the public authority and the national grandeur, just as a powerful sovereign, reposing in the tranquil and simple majesty of his power, willingly leaves to great men and lords the care of displaying the pomp of distant embassies, and obtaining the honours of onerous missions." This is but a portion of a more general idea, which he announces elsewhere, in his Essay on the Political Future of England, that there exists a come-and-go movement between the people and the peerage, by which the latter attracts all the notabilities of the nation, in law, in arms, in diplomacy, &c., and sends back its collateral branches to form connections with those beneath them in the scale of society. The nobility of the present day owe their principal influence in the community, to the care which they take to cultivate popular connexions, mix themselves in popular questions, sympathise with the lower classes, and very often take the lead in subjects of public interest or improvement. What ruined the ancient noblesse in France before the first revolution was its overweening pride and exclusiveness, its insouciance for the rights of those beneath them, its claims of exemption from many burthens cast upon the lower ranks, and the contempt it shewed for anything roturier. Such feelings are now happily nearly extinct, but such a consummation has been brought about by the almost total destruction of family property.

No considerable opposition to the influence of the nobility in England has been shewn since the days of Wat Tyler and Jack Cade. Two reasons have mainly contributed to this ; one arises from their exercising the general right of thought and speech, mixing in parliamentary government, and consulting the interests of the people, like any other constituent part of the commonwealth. The second resides in the influence of property preserved to them by the laws which allowed entails and family settlements, and preserved them from the consequences of confiscation by the crown. On this latter account there were found among the ranks of the parliamentary leaders, in the time of the civil war, almost as many of the aristocracy, as on the side of the Royalists. As a contrast to this the law of "morcellement" or parcelling out estates among children, introduced into France by the Code Napoleon, has had a beneficial effect in beating down the power of the nobility, but it has done away altogether with a salutary check, which might have been used against the too democratic tendencies of the population. The crown is perfectly helpless, when left by itself to battle against the encroachments of revolutionary opinions, a counterpoise would be required in the influence of a large landed proprietary and titled families, who should have a large stake in the preservation of settled government.

There exists however in England a very grievous evil, threatening at some future time to wear out the machine of self-government, and crumble into ruins the whole edifice of the state. This is the increasing growth of pauperism, the mass of immense wealth to be compared with it, and the clashing of the two in the community. The amassing of riches and property to a very large amount induces a feeling of confidence and security, which leaves the party possessing them open to the insidious designs of those having an interest to dispossess them. On the other hand, poverty and want produce discontent, commensurate with the contrast afforded by an opposite state of luxury. A great mass of our labouring population, especially in large cities and manufacturing districts, are very easily roused by the cry of wages being too low, and that masters and landlords do not give sufficient value for the labour of the poor. The Poorhouse system has also become an overgrown grievance to the owners of estates, who are obliged in many cases to make use of harsh measures to check the spreading of the evil. The strictness of the rules of parish settlements presses very heavily upon the lower classes, and create a bad feeling between them and their superiors. All these causes operating together must in the end produce some movement, in which the working men will endeavour to overcome the too oppressive preponderance of wealth, and throw off the yoke of the millionaire. The only way, in which the progress of the evil can be checked, is by the government and entire country watching over the moral and material well-being of the working classes, and not allowing them to fall either into ignorance or indigence.

Montalembert considers that the military prestige of England is gone for ever, that the acquirements of her generals and officers are not equal to the exigencies of the age. The only ground for such opinions, is the fact, that she does not keep up such a large standing army as France, Austria, Russia, or even Prussia, and may be considered as only a third-rate power, in relation to the number of her soldiers. But what necessity could she have for maintaining such an immense body of men in arms. It is sufficient for her purposes, if there are enough of troops at home to recruit those, which are out on foreign service, and to keep up military knowledge in the minds of her officers. The actual force in time of peace, is but the nucleus of that which may be raised in time of war, but from this arises a serious consequence, that in the commencement of any campaign, from the rawness of the levies and the inexperience of the leaders, reverses are very much to be apprehended. Then M. Le Comte asserts that though her naval strength is very great, still that it may be yet equalled by that of France, as it was in the time of Louis XIV. and Louis XVI. Certainly the introduction of steam into ships of war will produce an enormous revolution in naval tactics, and dispense very much with the skill of sailors. But it cannot supply the hearts and hands of British seamen, who are in their element on the sea, and delight in a sea fight, while the Frenchman, no matter how much accustomed to the waves, never feels at home upon them, and curses the day he gave up the firm land for the unstable ocean.

There is so much lavish praise poured in the pages we are perusing, on the subject of the institutions of this country, that it is some relief to meet with a little censure, as a contrast. This is found in the antipathy aroused on the continent by the unsatisfactory manner of dealing in our political relations. M. le Comte treats of it in the following manner:—

“There exists, besides, against England, in the minds of many, a moral repulsion, which of itself alone, constitutes a serious danger. The English regard in the light of an honor, of a decoration, the abuse of that press which preaches fanaticism and despotism; but they would be far wrong in believing, that there exists against them in Europe, no antipathies other than those which they are right in considering an honor. Count de Maistre, whom they ought to reproach themselves with not knowing sufficiently well, who never saw England, but who divined it with the instincts of a genius, and admired it with the freedom of a great mind, has penned this judgment :

 ' Do not believe that I do not render full justice to the English, I admire their government, (without, however, believing, I do not say that it ought not, but that it cannot be transplanted elsewhere); I pay homage to their criminal law, their arts, their science, their public spirit, &c. ; but all that is spoiled in their external political life, by intolerable national prejudice, and by a pride without limit and without prudence, which is revolting to other nations, and prevents them from uniting for the good cause. Do you know the great difficulty of the extraordinary epoch (1803) at which we are living ? It is that the cause one loves is defended by the nation one does not love.'

" As for me, who love the nation almost as much as the cause which it defends, I regret that M. de Maistre is no longer living, to stigmatise with that anger of love, which rendered him so eloquent, the clumsy effrontery which British egoisme has manifested in the affair of the Isthmus of Suez, whose gates England would fain close against all the world ; although, prepared in advance, she holds the keys at Perim. He would have been quite as well worth hearing on the subject of the ridiculous susceptibility of a portion of the English Press, regarding the Russian coal depôt at Villafranca ; as if a nation which extends every day its maritime domination in every part of the world, and which occupies in the Mediterranean positions such as Malta, Gibraltar, and Corfu, could complain with a good grace that other peoples should endeavour to extend their commerce and navigation. On one side, then, the legitimate resentments, excited by the imprudent and illogical policy of England in her relations with other states ; on the other, the horror and spite with which the spectacle of her enduring and prosperous liberty fills servile souls, have created in Europe a common ground of animosity against her. It will be easy for any one, who may wish it, to turn to good account this animosity, and to profit by it, for the purpose of engaging England in some conflict, out of which she runs a great risk of issuing either vanquished or diminished."

He has here resumed two subjects, on which the ship of England's constitution may hereafter be wrecked. The selfishness of her external policy, which sets nearly every state in Europe against her, and will one day raise them all to crush her in her hour of need. Unfortunately, she has sought every means, right and wrong, to extend her trade and commerce, and amass wealth, even at the expense of those who, though weak, had been once her firm allies and friends. Witness the destruction of the fleet of Denmark by the great Nelson, because it might fall into the hands of the French, and be made use of by them for a descent upon the northern coasts ; then, the desertion of Portugal recently, and the winking at the illegitimate traffic in slaves to the French settlements ; and now, very lately, she has abandoned the right of search, for which she had entered into a war with America in 1811, merely because to insist upon it may endanger her amicable relations with that continent, whose trade produces her the most considerable returns. As to her military power, or rather weakness, descanted upon by M. le Comte in the above passage, it is idle to suppose that she can ever expect to be rated as anything but third-rate in point of numbers. In fact, to keep up such an army as those maintained either by Austria or France, would be preposterous; it would only serve to create a national bankruptcy, and could not be for an hour tolerated by the British people; neither is there the same necessity for it with her as with them. The incoherent elements of the Austrian Empire could never be held together but by an overwhelming force. The army in France also serves to check open rebellion, and to draw off the most dangerous part of the community within the range of discipline and employment. With England her wooden walls are certainly her best defence, but, as in the case of Athens of old, the time may come when they will no longer be an impregnable bulwark. Carthage was once the most prominent naval power in the Mediterranean; her pavilion swept the seas without challenge or rival. The perseverance, however, and growing strength of Rome, enabled her soon to contest the prize with the Queen of Africa, and Carthage was crushed in the encounter; not one trace of her very existence remains, except the name. We do not mean to complete the comparison, but it is senseless to rely upon too great a feeling of security, or shut our eyes to the effects of the revolution carried out by the application of steam to the navies of Europe. Ships of war will soon become nothing more than floating batteries, requiring no peculiar skill or hardiness of sailors to work them; and then comes the danger of England—she is too rich a prize not to excite the avaricious longings either of the Northern Tartar or the Western Celt.

This desire for overpraising the institutions of this country seems to have been growing on Montalembert for some time—to have become in him a kind of passion. He indulged in it before, to a large extent, in his Essay on the Political Future of England, of the greater part of which the present brochure is only a repetition; but he did not institute the same amount of comparison with France. On this account there are many instructive matters in the former, now omitted in the latter, to which it may be useful to draw the reader's attention. He notices an undercurrent of revolutionary spirit existing in the middle classes, shewn by a strong discontent at the commencement of the Crimean war against the incompetency of the administration, and in the columns of the radical newspapers. Criticism and depreciation of the aristocratic classes, and of the time-honored customs of the nobility, have become very common. Some have gone even so far as to denounce the House of Lords as a bore, and to hint that the crown possessing no real power in the community should be deposed from its rights altogether. Happily, those opinions are but of the very few, and directly opposed to the inclinations and common sense of the whole realm. They denote, however, a certain amount of discontent, which deserves to be taken notice of, and watched carefully so as not to allow it to corrupt the body politic. Then, the merchants of England have fallen of late into very great disrepute all over the world, on account of the gigantic frauds practised in their names upon unsuspecting individuals. Enormous bank and other failures have disclosed a system of carrying on trade, which makes it doubtful how much of the fabled wealth of the island is real, and how much based merely on credit or speculation, vanishing into thin air at the touch of the accurate investigator. It is impossible to say what amount of corruption exists under that cloak of riches and religion, business and bigotry, where one hand is distributing bibles or building churches, and the other thrust into the pockets of the widow or the orphan. All these symptoms of corruption and discontent shew that there is still a great deal of amelioration to be effected, and of humbug and hypocrisy to be guarded against.

On the subject of the spread of Catholicism in England, Montalembert has said nothing in his last production, but in his former there is a good deal of instructive matter. He shews how the true faith has been gaining ground there by degrees since Emancipation; how the Puseyite element has been growing in the University of Oxford, and has produced its fruits among the Protestant clergy, who are every day approaching nearer and nearer to the observances of the Roman ritual; then, the animosity which has been aroused among the Protestants, and the sense of terror they feel at the falling off of many of their great lights; how, in order to prevent the influence of the Church of Rome from working too rapidly amongst them, they refused to receive, as nuncio from the Papal See, any ecclesiastical dignitary, and attempted in vain to carry out the bill brought in by Lord John Russell, in pursuance of his Durham Letter policy, for the prevention of the assumption of titles among the Catholic Hierarchy. All these he discusses with peculiar felicity, and without any ultramontane or sectarian views, ending with the following passage:—

“Alas! the Church is wanting to England and England to the Church. What would not the English, if they had remained true to the old faith, have done for it with their indefatigable activity, their indomitable energy, the propagandising influence of their commerce, their fleet, the munificence of their contributions, now so profusely given to error. . . . The most venerated institutions of England, her best and purest glories, are connected with Catholicism. Trial by jury, the Parliament, the Universities, date from the time when England was the submissive daughter of the Holy See. It was Catholic Barons got Magna Charta from King John—Irish Catholics contributed the principal strength of the English armies in the Peninsula and in the Crimea. Except Queen Elizabeth, the only surviving sovereigns, of whom the people have kept the memory, are Catholic kings—Alfred, Edward the Confessor, Richard Cœur-de-Lion, Edward III., Henry V. The cathedrals, the churches, the castles, all those ecclesiastical and feudal edifices—which was an English taste before it was ours, and which they preserve or restore with such pious care, are exclusively the work of Catholic generations.”

Every day shows more and more the insufficiency of the Established Church for the wants of the lower classes in England. All those rich livings, rectories and bishoprics, are only of use to those scions of the aristocracy or gentry, who get promoted to them, and leave the work of curing souls to unfortunate half paid curates. The solemn, hard, dry style of service adopted does not touch the heart of the common people or affect their imagination. Christianity should be not only a religion of belief and doctrine, but also of feeling, charity, and awe-inspiring observance. In France, among the educated classes, there exists a vast amount of infidelity and deism, or disregard altogether of the outward forms of religion, acknowledging indeed the actuality of the Divinity, but avoiding all worship. In England the reverse is the case, it is the lower classes and some of the middle, who make no observance of religion, are plunged in complete ignorance of all faith, and act only according to their natural instincts of moral good. This is a species of Heathenism in the midst of Christianity, showing how insufficient is the teaching of the Establishment for the religious education of the masses. A servant girl in London being asked on a Sunday why she had not gone to Church, replied; "Law Sir, Church wasn't made for the likes of me"—meaning thereby, that one should have a carriage or fine dress to show oneself off, before he or she could have a right to appear before the fashionable congregation. There is nothing more striking in the worship in Catholic countries on the continent, than the mixture of poor and rich, kneeling near one another under the lofty venerable aisles to worship the most High. Such a contrast is never seen in this country; it would outrage the aristocratic notions of the upper classes, and the lower portion of the community would find itself altogether out of place.

It is abundantly evident, from many passages already cited, or others not brought forward, of this last publication of M. de Montalembert, that his object in writing was to depreciate in the eyes of Frenchmen, their present constitution and form of government, and to criticize, in many cases very strongly, several of the recent laws. Such a thing cannot be done in France, without exciting a great deal of public attention, and arousing many other kindred spirits, who might take occasion to propagate the same opinions. We must not judge in this country of the effect, which may be produced by such a publication, merely by the tame phlegmatic manner, in which a crowd of English artizans, labourers, or factorymen, may listen to a long and violent harangue. Speaking or writing has not the same influence upon them as upon the fiery volatile Frenchman, who one day may dance at the jardin mabille, and the next throw up barricades and fire on the troops from behind them. The Imperial Government, judging no doubt, that if such a style of composition were tolerated, the license of the press would very soon know no bounds, decided upon bringing M. le Comte before the Tribunal of Correctional Police, in order to put a stop to the evil in its inception. It must be conceded, that the composition itself was not worthy of prosecution ; so far the authorities acted foolishly in ascribing to it too much weight. It would never have been much noticed, except by opposing journals, which might reply indignantly to the wholesale attacks on the French people contained in it. There was however a further object gained by the government, in instituting the prosecution before the court of quasi police magistrates, who are very subject to the control of the executive, and in treating the offence as one to be punished by the most ordinary tribunals, taking away thus much of the dignity and importance to be assigned to the accusation. This failed to a certain extent, on account of the great public excitement attending the trial, the high position of many persons, who were present at it, and above all by the advocacy of the celebrated Maitre Berryer lending all the effect of his imposing eloquence to the scene.

The charges made against the accused seem to us, so much accustomed to the exact statements of indictable offences, to be of a very general and vague character. "Exciting to hatred and contempt of the Emperor's Government"—"attacking the respect due to the laws, the rights of the Emperor under the constitution, and the principle of universal suffrage"—"endeavouring to excite the contempt and hatred of the citizens against each other"—appear to be accusations of such a wide compass, allowing so much latitude to the imagination of a judge, that they could never be tolerated in a court of justice in this country. They resemble however very much a species of crime, which was invented specially for the benefit of Ireland some ten years ago in the troubles of '48, when treason-felony, a constructive offence formerly unknown to the common or written law, was added to the Statute book. Several of our fellow countrymen were convicted under it, when the country was ripe for rebellion, and the minds of the common people aroused to an apprehension of civil troubles. It was then considered a wholesome and necessary enactment, notwithstanding that it violated the spirit of the British constitution, and all the preconceived rules of law on the subject. The French code seems to be nearly identical in its provisions, merely that it is more general in its terms, and must be kept in force at all times on account of the excitable character of the population. The application of it however may be very much moderated, and the punishment mitigated, as occasion may require. From the nature of the charges made, it is quite plain, that it lay altogether with the judges on the meaning of the passages cited, whether they came within the law. No proof was required—M. de Montalembert having admitted the authorship. The Procureur Imperial, who opened the case, laboured very assiduously from English history to show, that the statements and conclusions in the brochure were not accurate, that they were an outrage and insult to the Institutions of France. The only portion of the report of the trial worthy of notice as given in the pamphlet, second at the head of this article, is the speech of M. Berryer, who both as friend and advocate appeared to support M. de Montalembert.

He commenced by identifying himself completely with the conduct and opinions of his client through his political career, a most dangerous ground for an advocate to take, for it does not exculpate his client, while it condemns himself. He said; “yes, in the midst of political terrors, we were fully united—we had the same feelings—to save society, but to save liberty likewise, and it is with the same motto, the same battle cry, that I am come here to repel an unjust, unfounded, imprudent, and ill-timed accusation: I was going to add—rash.” He next proceeds to draw a sketch with great eloquence of the past services of M. de Montalembert to his country.

“He was still young when France escaped from the sufferings and disgrace, which the three tyrannies of the Convention, the Directory, and the Empire, had inflicted on her, and was resting under a constitutional monarchy—a government strong and free. It was in the midst of this work, of this movement, of these jealous apprehensions, that the intelligence and conscience of M. de Montalembert developed themselves. Brought up in the traditions of a noble and Christian family, he felt himself from his youth called upon to defend the institutions, the principles, the liberties, for which France sacrificed and suffered so much; and soon, in obedience to these noble inspirations, he declared himself the defender, the friend, of the religious and political liberties of the country. Inconsistencies have been sought for in his words and in his writings. Ah! I, too, have my memory; he presented a noble spectacle in 1830; in the midst of the Chamber of Peers, this young man, hardly twenty, coming to justify his attempt to open a school of liberty at Paris. That does not constitute a passing remembrance; all were profoundly affected at hearing this young gentleman, of an old, liberal, and Catholic race, publicly making this profession of faith—‘Faith is not dead in every heart; it is to that I gave early my heart and my life—the life of a man. To-day, especially, it is but little; but this little, joined to a great and holy cause, may grow greater with it. When a man has consecrated his future to such a cause, I have ever believed, and I still believe, that he should not fly from any of its consequences, any of its dangers.’ And who can say that since then he has once broken his word? Seventeen years later (the body of the magistracy would be truly ungrateful if it forgot it), he defended, in the tribune of the National Assembly, the principle of judicial irremovability. It was he again, in 1855, who energetically defended the liberty of the press, at a time when rigorous measures were called for against it after the commission of a great crime. Are you going to ask of a man, whose conduct and language were such, if on a solemn occasion, in presence of great questions, he has wished to have recourse to the daily puerile, and lying resources of the pen of a libeller and pamphleteer? No. It is with more dignity that, faithful to himself, he takes up subjects of this nature; he has seen the tribune fall, he has seen the press chained—yes, chained, that is the word. You said it yourself, adding that it was the wish of the country.”

Here the whole royalist breaks out, he recalls the constitutional liberties of France, which existed merely in name under the Bourbons, and hints strongly at the usurpation of the Emperor; another dangerous ground, most likely to injure his client. He next alludes to his visit to England, the impression made upon him by the debate on the Indian question, the regret he felt at the lost liberties of his country, and his indignation at some Catholic writers, who had attacked the English for their revengeful reprisals against the Sepoys. He denies then that there is any libel against France.—“But,” says the prosecution, “a direct attack is not in question—you know the ability of the language—the attack exists in the perpetual contrasts which you establish between the liberties of England, and the present condition of France;” and is about to repeat and endorse some of the expressions made use of when the president of the tribunal interrupts him, and reminds him of the oath he had taken, when called to the Bar in 1811, to respect the laws of France. Berryer then continues—“I remember my oath, but you make me shudder, M. le President; you carry back my thoughts to a time, when the praise of a good man, the approval of a virtue, of a good sentiment, of a good law, was not considered a crime. No, I do not wish to recall that period to my memory, “legimus capitale fuisse.”

This is certainly very bold, worthy of the character of the great advocate, but most injurious to the interests of his client. He then endeavors to show, that Montalembert has always upheld the alliance between England and France, in order that the latter might gain something of the liberties of the former by contact with her; that he deplored the lost colonial greatness of the former, and tried to prove, that she was as capable of being free.

He next considered the question of the applicability of the laws of 1848 and 1849 under which the prosecution was instituted. They were passed at the commencement and during the progress of the last revolution, in order to protect the press and the government, but since that regime has passed away, the advocate argues that the laws are extinct. "The law of 1848 was enacted on the morrow of the days of June, at a time when, in seeking to quell excesses, it was sought also to guarantee free discussion, a free tribune, and free press; and do you believe, that the sentence which should be based to-day on such a law, would not excite in society universal stupefaction?"—In fact that because the Emperor had been chosen by the people, to hold the supreme dominion with a strong, dictatorial hand, the laws previously passed were to be of no avail. This is to uproot the very foundations of society in France, if at every change of government all the former decrees or statutes are ipso facto abrogated. He then applies himself to each of the passages, subject to accusation, in detail, the first of which compared the executive of the Empire to an "antechamber" full of flatterers, &c., whom he had known to exist under every rule, and had therefore become moderate in his opinions and in his support of monarchy. "I have seen these men, at the beginning of 1814, wish to monopolize Royalty; six months had not gone by, when they prostrated themselves at the threshold of the government of the Hundred Days. These are the men, who people antechambers, who are their chroniclers, and who are the curse of every régime. These are the men whom M. de Montalembert addresses, those who conspire against the dignity of our Church and against that of France." But it is notorious, that in the time of the monarchy, especially under the last branch of the Bourbons, there was more backstair influence and sycophancy made use of, than existed at any time under the new or old Empire. This argument is much keener against the cause of M. le Comte than for him.

The passages, in which France is said to be insulted, by stating, that she has allowed these institutions to be taken from her, which still exist in Canada, and that she is held in a condition of pupillage unworthy of her antecedents, he does not seek to palliate, but boldly asserts they are facts not to be gainsayed, and therefore not libellous. That they are so, might be easily contested, and that France has very much improved in her condition and constitution, since these colonies were separated from her, might be shewn without difficulty; therein however does not lie the point of the accusation, which applies only to the insult cast upon the government, the intent to make the people discontented, and the motive, to bring back their minds to the former rule and dynasty.

The third offence is that relating to the press, where he attacks the interference of the government, and calls it an official gag. This part of Berryer's speech is so characteristic, that it must be given in full.

"First, can M. de Montalembert be reproached with having recalled to mind, that in France, the journalist, the writer, the editor himself, ought never to divest himself of the salutary terror of a warning. In truth, gentlemen, I ask how can there be in that an offence? Warning is legal. The government may say at any moment to a writer, 'I warned you once, twice, and pay attention, the third time I suppress you, I annihilate your journal; the idea of your property in it will not stop me.' The warning is then salutary, which can prevent such a suppression; but in the eyes of a man, who knows the state of affairs,—and here I must give full expression to my thoughts, for in a judicial discussion one cannot speak with a double meaning, and in a low voice, as if one were in a sick room,—the official gag is something other than the legal warning; there is not a journal which has not, one day or another, received a visit from a gentleman in a black coat, possessing sometimes the exterior of a respectable man, who, sent in pursuance of an official order, comes to say to the editor, 'In such a trial you will not say this—in such a discussion you will not reply to such and such an attack, you will be so good as not to publish such or such a document.'

The President. You spoke a moment ago, M. Berryer, of the sick room; you deceived yourself, but now you think yourself in the tribune. You have forbidden yourself the mere thought of attacking the laws, and that is precisely what you are going to do.

M. Berryer. It is precisely what I was not going to do. For the official gag, which intervenes to prevent the journalist from venturing on dangerous ground, is not the legal warning; it is the official warning, the government warning, which although illegal ought to inspire salutary terror; and we may well be permitted, without fearing to be accused of attacking the laws, to call that warning a gag. That does not constitute an attack against the law. It is at most only a censure passed on certain acts in the administration; a censure, which even in the terms of the laws which you invoke, is expressly authorised."

There certainly the advocate is right in the distinction he draws between the legal warning, an absolutely necessary check on the licentiousness of the press in France, and the police terror system, which prevents the discussion of all matters of a public nature clashing with the views of the Executive. The great utility of the press, as an engine of opinion, consists in the pressure it brings to bear upon officials, the detection by it of malpractices and incompetency, and its watchfulness in guarding public rights and liberties. All these are done away with by the command of authority; it becomes a mere chronicle of facts, often distorted and untrue, by the suppression of those most material for the elucidation of opinions and events. If the present Imperialism desires to preserve its popularity, its hold on the affections of the people, it must find out some method of allowing greater latitude to free discussion. It has nothing to fear from the advocates of the passed state of things, except that the people may become restive under a too absolute and coercive stretch of power or restraint of liberty. The day of the Bourbons is gone by; they can never regain the attachment of the middle or lower classes, who are too much wound up with the fate and fortunes of the reigning dynasty, and look up to it too much, as the creature of their own will, the product of their revolutionary ideas, to suffer for a moment that it should be cast down, or a substitute provided except by themselves.

The last heads of accusation are those relating to the attacks on universal suffrage, and the rights which the Emperor holds under the constitution. The first he deals with in a few words, by shewing that M. de Montalembert respected the right of universal suffrage, at the same time that he disapproved of many of the consequences following from it. The second, the most dangerous ground of all, he treats in a noble style, identifying himself with his client, attacking the conduct of the Emperor in the boldest manner, and advocating the cause of monarchy.

"The prosecution has recourse, in order to punish the pretended offence, to the laws of 1848 and 1849. Those laws had for object to maintain the respect due to the trustees of public power in the terms of the constitution of 1848. This constitution has been violated. Have you any other laws? You accuse M. de Montalembert of having attacked the rights and the authority, which the Emperor holds under the actually existing constitution, and this by virtue of a law, which had for end to defend the constitution, which was violated in 1851. Is it by analogy, that you would wish to extend this penal provision to M. de Montalembert? But to proceed by analogy in the case of penal offences is unheard of and monstrous. The law of 1819 had for object, to punish attacks against the person of the King and the constitutional authority with which he is clothed. The law of 1825 modified this provision by protecting against attack the rights which the king held from hereditary birth. After the Revolution of 1830, it was felt that these provisions were no longer applicable, and on the 29th November of the same year, a new law, having for end, to protect the new rights of the Royalty of July, was voted by the Chambers. In 1848, the sovereignty passed into the hands of a single Assembly, and the law of the 11th of August, 1848, assured the respect due to Republican institutions. A few months afterwards the constitution of 1848, confided the executive power to a responsible president, and immediately the law of the 27th of July, 1849, offered its protection to the President of the Republic, such as it was defined to be by the republican constitution. Did anything similar take place on the day of the accession of the Empire? Where then is the law which protects the rights which are vested in the new Emperor? I do not know of such a law, and what signify to me the causes of such a blank? Is it not quite enough for me to declare its existence? Even if M. de Montalembert had attacked the rights attributed to the new Government, by the constitution which the Emperor has made, you cannot make use against him of the laws passed for the protection of the constitution, which the Emperor has violated. I have done, gentlemen, and it only remains for me to sum up, in a few words, what I should have said for the defence of M. de Montalembert. Swayed by the great memories which penetrated the soul of M. de Montalembert, I have sometimes yielded to all my emotions, and thus weakened the arguments for the defence; but I hope that you will not forget, that you will not for an instant lose sight, in the course of your deliberations, of the character and of the whole life of the man whom you are to judge. M. de Montalembert holding so elevated a rank, not only by birth, by the ineffaceable dignity of the Peerage, but still more and above all by his sentiments, his talents, and his soul, is not a libeller, a pamphleteer. He has obeyed a twofold inspiration,—he wished to express his regret for the liberties we have lost, and to protest energetically against self-styled religious writers calling themselves Catholics, who set at naught all the principles of religion, of humanity and honour, not fearing to insult England, and to applaud the massacres of Delhi and Cawnpore. In glorifying England M. de Montalembert has not committed any offence—this is admitted—and as for the contrast brought into relief by the incriminated article, between the institutions of the two countries, my client did not seek it—he found it.

To say that this contrast ought to cease, to wish and hope that it may, is not to insult France, but to honour her. As for the laws, which you invoke, they have been passed to defend the institutions, which M. de Montalembert defends and regrets. You would not wish then to apply them to him, and you cannot, since in penal accusations recourse is not had to analogy. Ah ! Gentlemen, do not regard as a crime our legitimate regrets. We are already far advanced in life, we have but a warmth which is passing away, allow us to die tranquil and faithful. We are sufficiently unfortunate in seeing our holy and glorious cause betrayed, vanquished, denied, insulted ; suffer us to believe, that we can preserve for it an inviolable attachment in the bottom of our hearts—suffer us to think so—suffer us to say so ! Allow us to preserve and to recall the remembrance of those great combats of eloquence which have made known to us, and have caused us to love, the generous institutions which we have defended, which we will always defend, and to which we will be faithful to our very last hour."

Here we have the gauntlet thrown down to the Imperial Government, not only on the part of M. de Montalembert by his advocate, but on M. Berryer's own part. For a lawyer to attack the existing laws, and thereby to exculpate his client, is absurd ; therefore it is quite plain, that the same intention was carried out in this speech as in the Brochure itself, to find fault with the institutions of France, and to direct the attention of the French people to the defects in them, amongst the rest the usurpation of the Emperor. That this is the speech of a Royalist, and on behalf of a Royalist, cannot for a moment be doubted, merely that the different phases of opinion of the two persons do not appear to be the same. One may be a Legitimist, the other a constitutional Royalist, but that both are opposed to the present form of Government in France, and so to the will of the people there, is abundantly evident. From the Constitution of the particular Court before which he was tried, it was very easy to predict from the first what would be the decision in the case. The article was prosecuted by the executive, as a mere newspaper effusion, and treated as such in the sentence.

When it first became known in this country that this Brochure was to be prosecuted, the press took the matter up very warmly, praised M. le Comte up to the skies, because he had flattered themselves, and glorified English affairs to the highest. The object of the publication was altogether lost sight of, the Imperial Government was attacked for its want of liberality in suppressing the publication of opinion, and the accused sympathised with in every shape and form. But when Montalembert would not accept the pardon from the Emperor, ostensibly because it left behind a sort of temporal punishment hanging over his head, and thereby shewed that he hoped to enlist the sympathies also of the French people, and to cause an impression on the public mind abroad; then some of the English newspapers began to turn their backs upon the unfortunate writer, and to exclaim against the absurdity of contesting a point of etiquette or law with absolute power. The Times, which at first declared Montalembert to be "a sort of martyr in our cause," when it perceived the end of the publication, and that it was merely written for a Royalist purpose, and after the Cour de Cassation had refused to reverse the sentence except in part, then that mighty organ of public truth was obliged to admit, that M. le Comte had placed himself in a false position, had justly incurred the censure of the Imperial Government, and been fairly dealt with by it according to the laws. It would now appear that the conduct of the Executive in Paris has been straightforward in the case, that they have only made use of a prudential measure to give a general warning, to all persons desirous of having the present dynasty changed, that they will not suffer any attempt to raise a disturbance, or to make the people discontented with their rule. France requires a strong Government, prompt to act within the range of the law, more dictatorial than our own, because the people do not reason so much, nor wish to interfere so much in the administration of affairs. The peace of Europe depends on the security of the throne in France; is it to be endangered in order that a few Royalists may express their opinions without restraint.

As to M. de Montalembert himself, it must be admitted that he is nobly consistent to the opinions which he always expressed regarding the affairs both of church and state. Perhaps the best trait in his public character is his opposition to the spread of ultramontane or other bigotry into the hitherto liberally disciplined church of his country. One passage of his publication is eminently expressive of this feeling, and, as such, merits to be cited here. "For my own part—I say without circumlocution—I hold in horror that orthodoxy which makes no account of justice or truth, of humanity or honour; and I am never tired of repeating the significant words, lately expressed by the Bishop of Rochelle:—‘Would it not be well to give to many Catholics a course of lectures on the virtues prescribed by the law of nature, on the respect due to one’s neighbour, on upright dealing even towards our enemies, on the spirit of equity and charity? The virtues of the natural order are essential, and from their exercise the church herself has not power to dispense.’” This is, no doubt, a strong hint to the writers in l’Univers, whose doctrines and sharp practice in ecclesiastical matters threaten to do more damage to the interests of the Roman Catholic church, not only in France, but over all Europe, than the influence of all the freethinkers. The political ideas of M de Montalembert cannot be approved of to the same extent, except in this, that he adheres to them manfully, and desires a constitutional government for his country. We are afraid, however, that this is very much mixed up with the return of the Bourbon race to the soil of France, a thing at present impossible according to all political prospects, and anything but desirable considering the revolutionary tendencies of the people. That unfortunate family has twice lost the throne through their own imbecility and weakness; they have learned nothing by adversity, they are completely unfit to govern such a warlike and excitable nation. The constitution which they did give the people at one time, was frequently found insufficient; Louis Philippe himself was obliged several times to resort to “coups d’etat” to master his difficulties, and finally tried an underhand process of corruption to maintain his hold on the sceptre. He might have held on much longer but for his vacillation of purpose, and his consciousness of having lost the affections of his subjects. Still there were some bright days under that effeminate government; there were some men, such as Montalembert and M. Berryer, respected, honoured, and allowed to announce their opinions. Hence we can understand the expression of regret which the able advocate so feelingly put forth both for his client and himself, and feel some sympathy for the consistent patriot and politician even though somewhat in the wrong. These men are in the same position as the Scotch Jacobites of the last century, whose devoted adherence to a lost cause every one admired, but lamented that their talents were thrown away to such a useless purpose.

The publication of this brochure, the trial and speeches of the advocates, shew most forcibly the difference of public opinion and feeling in France and England. Any person in this country, who should undertake to write down almost every institution in it, would be looked upon as a pitiable "maniac," as M. le Comte has chosen to designate those of his own phase of opinion, whereas in France he is regarded as a dangerous theorist, playing with an edged weapon, which may prove destructive to himself and others. Again, if an advocate of our courts, especially of such standing as M. Berryer, dared to call in question the right of the sovereign to the throne in such an open undisguised manner, and to strike at the very foundation of the government, he would run a great risk of having his gown stripped from his back by the Lord Chancellor, and be incapacitated from further practice. In one of these cases there exists less liberty of discussion in France, because it threatens directly the public peace; in the other there is more license permitted, because free scope is given for every argument calculated to benefit or prejudice the accused. But with respect to public feeling, it cannot be doubted that very little sympathy exists among the great body of the French nation, for the upholders of what they designate a constitutional monarchy, on the model of English institutions. The Empire is their beau idéal of government, and the antipathy re-aroused by the insulting rejection of the Imperial dispatch of last year, has only served to increase their attachment to a rule, which has been always the antagonist of the British monopoly of trade, and the egotism of the British foreign policy.

ART. X.—HEALTHY MUSHROOMS.

1. Checkmate, a Tale : London : Bentley. 1858.
2. The Coquette, by Biddulph Warner : Dublin : William Robertson. 1858.
3. Hills and Hollows : London : Newby. 1858.

The great and good St. Francis of Sales, deep versed as he was in the science of souls, was but an indifferent adept in natural history. Yet it is probable that if ever the pure-minded and humble servant of God felt a temptation to vanity, it would arise from his quasi-respectable stock of information concerning the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Among passages breathing of heart-felt piety, profound theological science, and deep skill in the direction of souls, you will be surprised into a smile by some amusing mistake concerning the habits of animals or properties of plants, quoted from Pliny, Aristotle, or some lazy naturalist, who preferred hearsay to actual observation. One chapter is devoted to a parallel between mushrooms in the physical order, and amusements in the moral order (so to say); and as he probably knew as much about that shy and discreet production of nature as Dr. Goldsmith at all events, we do not scruple to make a quotation in order to help out our own design.

“I say of dances, Philothea, as Physicians say of Mushromes;* the best of them are nothing worth; yet if you will needs eat Mushromes, be sure they be well drest.—If you must go to a Ball, &c. Eat but seldom and little of Mushromes (say the Physicians); for be they never so well dressed, the quantity makes them poysonous.—Dance but little, and very seldom, &c. Mushromes, according to Pliny, being spongy and porous, easily draw infection to them; so that being near Serpents and Toads, they receive venom from them.—Masques, Dances, &c., attract the vices and sins of the time, &c. But above all, they say that after Mushromes we must drink wine;—and I say, that after dancing it is necessary to use good and holy meditations, &c.”

. Taking the liberty of classing Novel and Romance-reading with the dances and other amusements quoted from Philothea,

we require the reader's respect for the admonition of the Saint, in the selections he makes at the circulating library, which since the days when George the Third was king, has become a kind of necessary evil.

Requesting the reader advanced in life, to recal how interested and engrossed he was, more than one time in his youth, even to the neglect or bad execution of necessary duties, by the perusal of an exciting work of fiction ; let him lay hand on heart, and say if indiscriminate and unrestrained novel reading can possibly be a healthy occupation for the young heart or the young understanding. If the book can be merely taken up to pass an unoccupied or weary hour during a journey, or after mental fatigue, and if the work is innocent of inculcating false doctrine or unsound morality, there is nothing to be said.

Compared with the corresponding class of literature in France, we may be said to possess a sound and healthy crop of fictitious literature, but still it requires the utmost care in the pulling up of weeds and noxious plants, before we can let our youth wander at will through the garden, and pluck up and eat at random.

Checkmate is a vigorously written and interesting book, and when read from beginning to end, of an edifying tendency. This we say advisedly, for if the reader leaves off in the middle, or with two-thirds of the number of pages accomplished, it will not be a bit more edifying than any other exciting story of the ordinary run. Indeed one particular incident may be fairly objected to, where a conscientious lady consents to use her influence in a manner directly the reverse of what her conscience approves, in order to save her scamp of a brother from an imminent danger.

It is probably the first production of the author. There is a surprising absence of decision in a war of wits between the good presiding genius and the evil character for the time. One is determined to gain his selfish object, the other equally determined to frustrate his designs ; yet each merely watches the other's motions, and seems as ignorant of what the next move may be, as of the quadrature of the circle. It reminded us how “ Lord Chatham with his long sword drawn,

Was waiting for Sir Richard Strahan :
Sir Richard, eager to be at 'em,
Was waiting for the Earl of Chatham.”

In a later stage of the story, the person who represents the hero, and who has both penetration and resolution, has to perform two exploits, the second depending on the success of the first. He takes time enough for reflection on the connection of both, but when the first step is won, he is completely at fault as to how he may place his foot on the second, though character, fortune, and happiness are at stake.

Again, the chief incidents of the story are powerfully and spiritedly narrated, but the reader does not clearly see the natural connection of each with its predecessor: and he finds that after the good genius already mentioned has outraged her own conscience, engaging herself to do such and such things, she still remains with folded arms, and does——nothing. She acts with as much energy as Box or Cox, we forget which, who with the wish fathering the thought, and anxious to get a few minutes' sleep, hoped the rasher of bacon would considerably give itself a turn on the coals.

The work more resembles a number of scenes and situations with the connection and the disposing causes very slightly indicated, than a compact story.

The proofs do not seem corrected with the care which the merit of the work and the good appearance of the volume ought to require.

Whoever goes through the book, will not be at a loss to feel that the author is a Catholic; but there is no controversy, nor sketching of Protestants in Indian ink, or sepia, or bistre, nor any conversion,—these processes so dear to Mrs. Sherwood and Charlotte Elizabeth, as applied to Catholics. Whatever villany occurs is perpetrated by a Catholic who has discarded his early religious impressions. In the excellent novel of Mount St Laurence there is a fault in our eyes: among all the members of her Protestant family, there is scarcely an estimable character. Very probably there are Protestant families so circumstanced: would to God they had no counterparts among ourselves.

But a person in fault will bear a reproof from a relative or friend, which will only make him angry when coming from an indifferent person or a stranger. Our author is certainly wrong in allowing the sincere and unselfish Julia Manners, a Protestant lady, to consent to a wrong line of conduct, even under the terrible circumstance alluded to.

In the opening of the work we have a graphic sketch of the family and home of a French nobleman, an Emigré, settled in the North of England. The early part of the day is spent by him in the dress and occupations of an English country gentleman: in the evening he resumes the tongue, and manners, and "garb of old Gaul." We suspect our author to have spent some of his life east of the Manche, from the spirit of many passages in his work. The daughter of this gentleman, Lucy Deguseau,* is the Ingenue of the story. Julia Manners, an elderly maid, cherishes her with the love of a mother. These, with the dissipated Lieutenant Rawson, Julia's half brother, and Ernest Deguseau, Lucy's cousin, who has forsaken his early devout practices, and squandered his property, make up the principal personages of the story.

The Count has lost his beloved wife, and a cloud has in consequence fallen on his daily life. We will here use our author's words.

"For some years his existence was very melancholy, until gradually his affections became absorbed in his daughter. As she grew up into youth and loveliness, he found himself imperceptibly weaned back to the world, engaged in its interests for her sake, bound to life by a fresh and natural tie.

We men are always clumsy at feminine descriptions: though we may sometimes succeed in drawing a caricature, a vindictive old maid, a managing mother, yet it must be some revolting monster, a 'campaignre,' or a Becky Sharp. Maidenhood, fresh, blue-eyed, laughing maidenhood,—anything really feminine, requiring quick sight, and delicate pencilling, is utterly beyond our reach, mere hevers of wood as we are.

If I tell the reader, that Lucy Deguseau was fresh-colored, had blueish eyes, a neither very long or well-formed nose, that she generally dressed in light-colored airy fabrics, and that her expression was bright and pleasing, I have given nearly all the information I possess. . . . The Misses Smyth of Smythgrove, said she was unformed, vulgar, had no manners whatever: how could she, with her fondness for poor people, and her disgusting habit of kissing their nasty children? The rich manufacturer's lady . . . had much pious commiseration for the poor little creature, brought up in Popish darkness; and took care to keep her supplied with the newest editions of the Rev. Ebenezer Glyde's remarks on the Bishop of Rome and other improving publications. . . . Experience forces me to believe that even the most perfect feminine hearts are not always invulnerable to jealousy. Indeed there are moments when my judgment will ungallantly insist, that if a good looking young person be universally spoken ill of by her own dear friends and acquaintances, she must necessarily possess some very estimable qualities which would render it most desirable to love, win, or run away with her, as the case may be."

Our reader will hardly require to be told after reading the above extracts, that we have before us, a writer of an agreeable, lively, and observant turn. The under quoted will show that he has seen or heard of the disagreeable relations of dissipated, unprincipled young gentlemen and their victims of the various guilds of trade.

" 'Once for all you can't see him : he is not up yet.' 'I insist upon it, I must.' 'Tis as much as my place is worth to take your message at this hour.' 'Make way then, and I'll take it myself. Your place indeed ! We'll find your master a safe place enough, if he don't pay honest folk their own. Give way.' 'Can't you leave your note ! I'll deliver it when he comes down.' 'Leave my note !—leave my note indeed !' . . . said he, turning to the half dozen people who were waiting with him in the hall. 'Gentlemen he wants me to leave my note.' (They make a rush, and Hawks the valet, slips on the door chain and addresses his besiegers.) 'If you think gentlemen's doors are to be invaded by a set of greasy, beer swilling tinkers, the police shall teach you better manners.' . . . 'Here is the devil to pay,' said Hawks to his master : . . . 'they will force open the door.' . . . 'Nothing for it but a bold face,' said Deguseau decisively, after a moment's thought. 'Must let them in.' He pointed to the door, and re-entered his dressing room. (Hawks ad victimas loquitur,) 'A pretty din to make . . . you must be proud of your morning's work. May I enquire your worships' business ?' . . . 'Of course you couldn't guess,' said Bilton with a grin. 'Here, my fine fellow, take this note to your master, and tell him we'll none of us leave without an answer.' 'Go o' your own messages. You pay me no wages.' (Now when the way is free, they dare not go up stairs, but depute Bilton to speak for them.) 'Come in, you booby. Why don't you bring my boots ? I rang a dozen times.' Bilton opened the door. 'Here get some chocolate, and be smart about it.' . . . 'Ahem ! 'tis me,' said Bilton, timidly. . . . 'Ah Mr. Bilton, excuse me ! a thousand pardons. I thought it was my man. Pray take a chair. Have some breakfast. A cold morning. Perhaps you would prefer something better than this. I have capital brandy.' . . . 'Nothing for me, thank ye. Fact is : come on business : have a large family to support (lays down his own and associates' bills) . . . We are resolved to have our money.' 'And I assure you,' said Deguseau lolling back, 'none of you wish you may get it more sincerely than I.' . . . 'If you don't pay me freely, I'll have it the best way

I can.' (An oath is here pretty freely implied, for which and other instances of bad language we censure the writer. Things unfit to be read aloud are unfit to be written, when the expression is liable to fall under the eyes of young and old.) . . . 'I'll get out an execution, and sell the very shirt off your back, and (an oath) if you drive me to it I will.' . . . 'And your dividend out of the sale would amount to something like four-pence; . . . and if I be imprisoned, my uncle would not leave me six-pence, and your claim not be worth the paper it is written on. Pshaw! you can do nothing. . . . What right have you to come battering at my door? I might put you all in the tread-mill for storming my house.' 'I'm sorry about that, sir,' replied the man, with his head bent, fumbling at the leaf of his hat, 'we want our money—what are we to do?' 'I'll tell you what you, Bilton, must do,' continued Deguseau in a friendly tone, as he applied a light to the bowl of his meerschaum: 'I shall be married, let me see, somewhere about Christmas. Bring your account in February, and it shall be paid. . . . Meanwhile, here is five pounds, not on account, but as a kind of interest till then. Now you will go down and dismiss the people below.'"

That our author is successful in personal description, will be evident from the following passage:—

"This Miss Manners was a quiet lady-like person, slightly made, over the average height, and of that settled age when women give over all thoughts of marriage. In her youth she had been a belle, and was sought after . . . She had still remains of beauty; but her dark restless eyes and high, well developed forehead made the expression too hard, too intellectual to please in a woman. It was said she had suffered an early disappointment; . . . and an attentive observer would easily perceive that her life had been lived; that she had passed through some great trial, whose traces were still visible. When in repose, the face assumed a saddened interesting expression that tempted you to a prolonged gaze, until you turned abashed from those flashing eyes, sentinels that never slumbered, ever on the watch to baffle scrutiny, and guard their secret."

Apropos to the weak fondness she felt for her worthless half-brother, Lieutenant Rawson, we get this apostrophe.

"Old maidens—kind hearted old maidens, the most exemplary portion of the community! unselfish, miraculously patient, meekly enduring wrong and cruel ridicule, often from those for whom your pure lives are sacrificed, how understand your bizarre weakness for all sorts of bad characters! Is it a desire to reform the sinner, or simply a love of contrast that renders you so partial to all suffering from their own wickedness or folly? If Master Tom is sentenced to a whipping for robbing the garden, whose intercession does he seek? If Mr. Bob runs into debt, or away with a ballet girl, who goes to soothe his offended parents? O ye venerable sisters, ye maiden aunts! to obtain your sympathy and assistance, we only need be unworthy of either—ye domestic guardian angels, how little do we know your worth!"

Now for a bit of landscape word-painting.

"The rays of the morning sun absorbed in milky vapour, spread their light evenly over the landscape. It was one of these mornings peculiar to the North, no strong shadows, no bright prominent lights: all abrupt and rugged outlines were lost in a thin pearly glaze. The ladies were in capital spirits as they passed the park gates; so was our hero: fresh air was a luxury to him.

'Compare town to this!' he exclaimed, inhaling the frosty breeze. 'Now, Lucy, I understand your love for the country. See the sparkling glory of that hedge, the diamond drop glistening on each thorn! This bracing air makes one young again, Cockney that I was, to think the country dull! Ah! if in common gratitude we delayed our mad chase after the miserable vanities of the world to enjoy the wealth nature places at our feet, how much happier we should be!'

The religious element is only sparingly evident through the volume: we must, though limited for space, give room to a devotional gem.

"One extremity of this passage shone with rich colored light; a mere spot of color it seemed at a distance. On nearer approach, it resolved itself into a semicircular oratory built outwards from the walls of the house. . . . Pushing the curtains aside, . . . you raised your eyes. The walls were painted in deep blue, richly gilt, decorated with fleurs-de-lis and sacred monograms. A top light of stained glass shed around a solemn splendor; and there, pure, bright, and transparent as a sunlit cloud, a figure of the Virgin stood floating in the mellow light, her gentle hands outspread, the seraph head bent in lowly loveliness; it was breathing marble. For a moment your eyes fell with involuntary awe; for a moment it seemed, indeed, the very person, the ever blessed presence of her, before whose radiant holiness, even Gabriel—Gabriel the Archangel—knelt."

Probably some Protestant reader may think this smacks of idolatry; but let him not be frightened. In the course of a tolerably long life we have never met a genuine pagan, though we have questioned and catechised to some extent: so it is probable that the number is very small through the Christian world.

Readers who enjoy scenes where intense feeling or passion is exhibited, will find pabulum to their taste in this volume. Provocation to a duel by the smashing of a glass on a gentleman's forehead, introduces us to a fire-eating stage Irishman, enjoying the Welsh appellation of Morgan; and we have details of the miserable preparation of next morning calculated to disgust even a duellist by profession.

If the talented author comes again before the public, let him by all means take the roomy suite of three volumes to develope his constructive powers: he will thereby make a more compact story than he can do in one. Let him give more space to scenes of humor which he can manage right well if so inclined. Our private opinion is that if a young lady with a vocation has a fond father advanced in life, she may without sin defer her vows till his decease; and as the general prejudice of novel readers naturally runs in favor of happy marriages, let us by all means have one in the next three volume novel.

The same fault applies to the Coquette as to Checkmate, as far as the want of a connecting medium is in question; but in the Coquette the relation of every part to the preceding one is seen without trouble. It has a resemblance in this respect to a comedy or domestic drama; and as the story is interesting, the characters varied, the scenes of humor, and passion, and feeling, and plotting, not few, we wonder that some play-wright has not taken the very little trouble it would give him to mount it for the stage, as they say in the Green Room.

But the author does not enjoy the name of Charles Dickens, Charles Reade, or Charles Mathews, and has not a London reputation. He is a mere warm-hearted, talented, and patriotic young Irish gentleman, rejoicing in the yet unrenowned name of Biddulph Warner, and must bide his time.

We have for Dramatis Personæ a brusque and benevolent Doctor, under whose cloak we think we recognise one who not only deserves well of his own circle, but of the country at large, by the efforts of his patriotic and benevolent pen; a large-hearted Mrs MacAdam, a broken-spirited, reduced barrister, and his amiable, affectionate daughter; the Coquette (a coquette in the worst sense of the word) and her mother, (daughter and mother worthy of each other), the ~~lover~~, a humorous jackeen of Dublin streets, Lieutenant Galopade, and the keeper of a very low lodging house, who knows everything and every body. Whoever wishes to inspect the structure of the web, in which the fortunes of these people cross and mingle with each other, may easily gratify their curiosity, as the book is well printed, on good paper, and very moderate in price.

We have registered a vow never to shock an author's nerves by exhibiting to himself or an indifferent public, the skeleton of the comely child of his brain and heart. So we will only present glimpses of the line which connects the rounded cheek to the delicate chin, or that which joins neck and finely formed shoulder, the fair forehead defined by the waving hair, the straight nose, short upper lip or dimpled hand with its taper fingers. If the reader can set the whole symmetrical figure before his mind's eye from our partial sketches, as Dr. Owen would give you the whole animal by the help of a bone or two, let him gratify himself; he has our full permission and entire sympathy.

The characteristics of our author's powers are sprightliness, distinctive marking of character, facile command of language, dramatic spirit, and genial humor. We know not by what process, course of study, or intuition, he has been able to depict the two terrible unprotected females, who compose the dark portion of the picture; but his forte lies in pleasing sketches of genuine good nature in a husky envelope. True religion, in his view, must be strongly imbued with sympathy for our fellow mortals. Whatever makes us think proudly of ourselves, and despise or dislike our neighbour, may be what you will, but is not Religion.

Mrs MacAdam, the Lady Bountiful and good genius of the book, has been on her round of good offices to her poor neighbours. She foregathers with the newly imported rector, and finds him bestowing his hearty contempt on some vulgarians, who were not well up in the cosmogony or use of the globes. By the way, the young folk catechised are more ignorant of Scripture history than they need. Mrs. MacAdam loquitur.

“ ‘Here, boy’ (to a youth with an Ass and a Creel of Turf.) ‘Pr-r-r-ew! yes, my lady.’ ‘Is that good turf?’ Bedad is it, your ladyship never seen such turf.’ ‘What do you want for it? Stay, Mr. Absolute: what ought I give for this load of turf?’ ‘Load of turf! Why—a—really I have not the slightest conception. In fact I hardly ever saw any before.’ ‘Bless me! don’t you know how much a creel of turf’s worth? Why! every child here knows it.’ ‘They have heard it a hundred times. You seem amused, my good madam.’ And so she was, for the good old soul laughed, till the tears threw a haze over her spectacle glasses. ‘Well, well, well, oh, dear me!’ said she, wiping her spectacles, ‘how illiterate you must be, never to have heard the price of turf! don’t look shocked.’ You

* Mrs. M^cAdam allows English poor children to be better grounded in religious and secular knowledge than the same class in Ireland. If better acquainted with rural life in England, she would find the reverse to be the plain fact. As to submitting to oppression, commend us to the English man, who will not submit to hunger or nakedness with the same resignation as his Irish brother has so often done.

English don't understand our people. They have been accused of being insubordinate—the reason is, the Irish are almost the only people who won't submit to oppression. You may think their grievances light; but a man with a large family to support, and ten-pence a day to feed them with, is very easily oppressed. No! don't give that boy anything. He knows that if he wants any work, I'll get it for him: and he has no excuse for begging, since he is not ill. Even if he were, he would be taken care of."

Let the ladies decide on the truth of the following sketch of the Coquette.

"Adaline Marsden was a coquette, she was not a flirt. You may think the terms synonymous, they are not."

She was about five-and-twenty years of age, and under the middle height. She seemed even less tall than she really was, so perfectly proportioned and exquisitely modelled were her members. Her face, shaded by dark glossy hair, wore an expression of melancholy, which was heightened by the almost entire absence of color. But when excited, a slight flush would spread over her entire face and neck, suddenly appearing, to disappear as quickly.

Had she been very fair, this absence of color, together with the darkness of her hair, would have given a disagreeable palor to her features; but this was not the case, for though not a brunette, a slight olive tinge was perceptible. She had dark hazel eyes, and long dark lashes, which she generally kept down, so that when she raised them and looked at you, the effect was heightened. She spoke very little, but what she said was to the purpose, and she was an excellent listener. But then, so seldom, so very seldom, did she suggest an idea, that to talk to her required considerable ingenuity, and would have been rather a weary task, were it not that she encouraged you now and then with those soft liquid eyes. To others there was no apparent coquetry in her glance, but there was a light, which unobserved, hidden from the rest of the occupants of the room, fell on you for a moment, and sent the blood faster to your heart. A dangerous young Lady! you think so: so do I. With this fair creature Henry Leslie was in love.

"Adaline Marsden lived with her mother, who was a lady of weak nerves but strong principles; she was a great manœuverer, and managed with a small income, to live or appear to live well. She was a great patroness, and a small subscriber to charities innumerable. For a woman who looked on this world as a thing of no consequence, and its inhabitants generally as several degrees worse than those before the flood, it is truly astonishing what struggles she made for its good opinion. . . Tall, thin, and angular was Mrs. Marsden, with a hooked nose and a pair of black eyes. Her manner was sometimes so sweet that it was quite painful; partly because it was so palpably put on, and partly because on such occasions, she displayed her teeth in a very unpleasant manner."

Rev. Mr. Sadly is one of the aspirants to the hand of our coquette: we wish him a safe deliverance. He pays a visit, sits far enough from his heart's object, drops his hat, stoops for it, and ends by scrutinising the pattern of the carpet.

"Mr. Sadly was a clever man as far as Greek and Latin went. He wrote a good sermon and read it well ; but alas he was shy, and could no more succeed in small talk than he could preach extempore. He was a good-hearted man and a wise one, except where worldly wisdom was concerned. He had a good property, was consequently a catch, and Adaline the silent talked in order to catch him. She did not wait to permit him to become embarrassed, . . . but said, looking up quietly, 'I have been thinking of a remark I heard made the other day, that we Irish are of Carthaginian origin. I longed to ask you about it. He said that the people inhabiting the Pays Basque near the Pyrenees speaking a language quite distinct from French or Spanish, one most difficult to acquire, are descended from the same source, and speak a kind of Irish : so much so, that an Irishman from the west can understand many of their words. Now do tell me all about it ; pray do, for I know you understand all these difficult questions. Indeed I am rather afraid of you ; people say you are so clever.' Here she looked at him in a half timid, half trustful manner, saw him redden with pleasure ; and as soon as she heard him 'hem,' a signal that he was about to launch deeply into the subject, took up her work, and began to think of something else, looking up encouragingly now and then, and asking the meaning of some difficult word."

To the work itself we refer for a most exquisite picture of the reduced gentleman, Simon Denning, despairing of comfort in his old age, and incapable of making any exertion towards acquiring independence. And if in the gallery of fiction, there be an amiable female character more finely imagined, or better drawn than Mary Denning, taking the size of the canvas into account, we have not met with it, that's all.

We go back to the country to scrape acquaintance with the parish priest who ruled conjointly with Mrs. McAdam.

"Father Murt did not look as if fasting injured him : his face was ruddy and expressive of unalterable good humor and philanthropy.

* * He loved his people and understood them, for he was the son of a farmer. He was by no means formed to shine in society : His rusty black clothes were generally more or less travel-stained ; he shaved twice a week, and his waistcoat exhibited frequent traces of snuff. He was deeply read. . . . Since the day Mr. Absolute had determined to shine in Ireland, a mighty bug-bear had loomed in the distance for him, and that bug-bear was a popish priest."

On coming into Father Murt's presence he feels the chivalrous energy experienced by St. George on meeting the dragon, while the dragon looks on him as a well-dressed, elegant-looking rector with a handful of parishioners to look after. He receives the stranger cordially and presents his snuff-box, but Mr. Absolute smells the cheese baiting the Romish trap, and keeps a freezing distance. The priest is anxious that secular instruction should be in common between the Catholic and Protestant children of the school, and that their respective clergymen should give them separate religious instruction at convenient times; but Mr. Absolute will not agree, and much good is prevented.*

The scenes of passion, of antagonism, of pathos, must be sought in the book itself. Mrs. McAdam will, of course, endeavor to turn the eyes of Young Waverley from the heartless coquette to the true hearted and good Mary Denning. Our author has not listened as sharply as he ought to have done (not being to the manner born), to the peculiar phraseology of country lad or Dublin jackeen, or he would not allow them to say, "the man as has no music in his soul," or something similar. But we can't expect everything even in the world of imagination. May our author's health allow him to write as many volumes as Mr. G. P. R. James or Mrs. Charles Gore.

We suspect the author of the third book on our list to be a lady. She has given herself room to develop her plot and characters, and has consequently presented a more acceptable treat to the ordinary run of novel readers than Mr. Warner or the author of Checkmate. Though a considerable portion of the work relates to occurrences in London and Jersey, we guess our authoress to be a native of our isle from her evident sympathy with the people and the native gentry, and the very few mistakes that occur in the pronunciation and idiom of the peasantry. She is as sparing of conversions or of discussions as the author of Checkmate, though evidently of a sincerely religious spirit. Considered from the Catholic point of view, the work will probably do more good than if written with a controversial turn. She merely commends her faith by shewing its healthy effect on the personages of the story who are not ashamed of the Cross of CHRIST. The others are good or bad according as the exigencies of the tale require, and the reader is full as much interested about them. On one point she has very strong prejudices indeed. She will not admit into our graces under any circumstances, those regenerators who throw down whole villages, and send the poor, the naked, and the dying, out into the wintry day without shelter or resource, merely to have a wide extent of grazing land under their eyes. There are perhaps too many personages introduced, but they do not jostle each other out of the reader's memory, as much as in other works of the kind, and each is kept very distinct by delicate though decided touches of the pencil. Readers who are tired of striving to fix the outlines of the numerous landscapes in works of fiction in their minds, and to remember the peculiar grouping and hues of the clouds, when Ada the houseless sunk down exhausted on the heath, will feel much refreshed among these Hills and Hollows, for they are not even required to pass through a rustic gap in a hedge through the entire history, much less to keep on the mind's retina, the intersection of the outlines of distant hills, nor bear in mind how much of the valley side was encumbered with old thorns, nor where the tangled copse ceased, and the heath commenced.

We strove from beginning to end to tolerate Donald as the prefix to O'Neil in the appellation of our Irish gentleman, but with small success. We also felt some qualms at Raymond O'Neil, but with some exertions got over them. If the loving husband who left his amiable partner to make a fortune for her at the gold fields, without previously mentioning his purpose, had nothing for it on his return but to lament over her tomb, whom would he have to blame?

Nothing is more grateful to the gods and goddesses of the "Royal" or the "Queen's," when their nerves are wrung by a picture of family distress, than to see the respectable, heavy, old merchant or gentleman with his brown overcoat, cocked hat, breeches, shoe buckles and cane, enter at the centre of flat, walk down the stage, look pityingly on the distressed occupants of the garret, pull out his well-filled purse (of Counters), and change the woful spectacle to a scene of joy and gratitude. We find in the work under consideration, something of this kind, where we would prefer to see comfort and independence wrought out, with God's blessing, by the heads and hands of the vigorous young people about whose fortunes we are anxious. Now, with a hint to the corrector of the press that he has not thoroughly satisfied us, we make an end to fault finding.

We have no character from the ranks of the peasantry living through the work, and amusing or interesting the reader. They merely form a group on occasions, and though their dialogue is characteristic and applicable, they do not help the plot much more than the chorus in Antigone, except that they have brought, and will still bring, in one or two scenes, tears to the eyes of those who can feel pity for misery and suffering. We defy any writer of the "Spasmodic" School to produce a more painfully interesting passage than that, where Lady Hampton flies from her Lord's house. What a delightful mist, confusing the boundaries of right and wrong, would not some of our literati raise between our eyes and the circumstances of this rash step, if they held the pen! but as here related, every thing is made to promote sound principles of moral conduct. The young hero is in a cockle-shell of a boat with two ladies; for one he feels the most earnest attachment, for the other high esteem and friendship. They are about being overset in a sudden squall; he can only save one at best—which shall it be? The account of the peril, and of the conduct of the personages, is most spiritedly given. The forte of our authoress however lies in pictures of social and family relations, in characteristic and lively dialogue and repartee, and in her delicately though firmly-tinted female portraits. Her gentlemen are respectably painted, but beside the living and breathing faces and figures of the ladies, they are only men of wood and canvass such as we find in studios.

While going through the volumes we were strongly reminded of the Changeling and Canvassing, by Miss Martin; but this lady loved to conduct her peasant or peasantess through her book, and amuse us with their native wit and idiomatic phrases, to dwell on the quiet or sublime features of a western landscape, or a little tempest in a tea-cup,—the small politics of a village coterie; and none could excel her in her felicitous way of presenting these things. We are disagreeably reminded by the mention of this lady's name, of one at least of our old Irish gentle families, who to save their poor dependants from starving during the awful years of famine, reduced themselves to poverty, and are now strangers to the old feudal homes, where they once ruled absolute in the affections and attachments of their devoted dependants.

The story begins with the marriage of two sisters, one to an elderly English nobleman, the other to an Irish gentleman. One consequently moves in the exclusive circle of the aristocrazy, the other rules her little Connaught kingdom, improves her dwelling, and its accompanying gardens, but is ignorant of the meaning of the word "Economy." The splendid misery experienced in the lordly palace, and the worldly reverses, and trials, and exertions of the Irish family, form the chief interest of the plot. The young O'Neil is everything that a patriotic, warm-hearted, young Irish gentleman, and a good son and a good Christian, should be. We might wonder how his sister should turn out so heartless and worthless, with such a father, mother, and brother, encircling her young life, were we not convinced by experience, of many a young person taking to vicious courses in the bosom of families where devotion and family affection formed the very atmosphere of their abodes.

Lady Hampton has a refined mind, pure literary taste, a keen sense of moral dignity as apart from religious influence, and pride is not wanting. Mrs. O'Neil's happiness is concentrated in the love of her gallant husband and her children. Then we have the rich Leonora Eden, sincere, independent, rash, seeking for religious light after receiving an infidel education; her delicately nurtured, sentimental, and false mamma; the old campaigner, Mrs. Selwyn, and other female personages, every one well worth the reader's acquaintance. We beg to introduce Lady Hampton. She finds no congeniality with her tastes in her stately, proud lord, and there is no one to understand her or converse with her on her artistic or literary favorite subjects, but a worthy early friend, Mr. Ernest Bland.

"It was when she found herself in solitude of mind once again, that Isabel Hampton experienced the loss of some friend to whom she could utter even the mere passing ideas suggested by books or contemplation. She was essentially a pure-minded but undisciplined woman. She thought and acted virtuously, and was refined from choice and habit of life; but religion was not her actuating principle, any more than was salvation her desired goal. She loathed doing all evil, but only did as much of good as was agreeable."

Mrs. Selwyn (the old soldier) is enlightening a peasant's wife in the country.

" 'You should never marry at all—you poor Irish,' remarked Mrs. Selwyn in a law-giving voice, 'filling the country with paupers. The English are not such fools.' 'Well, sure, 'tis no sin any how,' retorted the woman, nettled at the tone of the stranger. 'I'm tould them in England are quare enough—that's the poor sort; they don't trouble the priest often at any rate.' 'The priest!' echoed the lady scornfully. 'They have none of your priests there: they are nice clean, clever people that go to church decorously, and never tell lies.' 'I'm sure your ladyship is right if you mane the Quality, or them that's got schooling and good feeding,' responded Nelly Flynn: 'but my husband's brother is living in Manchester these eight years, and he came over this Patrick's-tide with his two children to lave them with his father till they get some edication and religion. He tould us the eildher in them big towns is all as one as haythens.—Lord save us! and as for prayers, he says they never say any.' What an impudent woman! exclaimed Mrs. Selwyn, unable to defend her cause in that line: 'she contradicts me as if she knew how to read the Times.'"

They say the Devil keeps a hard service: so it appears does the genius that rules the high caste folk in London that have nothing to do—but mischief.

"The season had begun anew with its tyrannical enslavement of time, energy, and health. Existence was seemingly bestowed for the one engrossing aim of wasting it all in London! Day and night, the self-constituted minions worked on at the great tread-mill of fashionable toil; the rich and noble (men and women), for so-called pleasure; the artizans and needle women for bread—all consuming their lives in the pursuit. Lady Hampton followed in the perfumed, prosperous concourse, still escaping censure, and still indifferent to all."

Young Grantley, a precocious lordling yet in his teens, and his first cousin, Raymond O'Neil, become acquainted. Alas that there should be so much untimely depravity among young lordlings in London, and their example so closely imitated by the unhappy crowd of shop boys in the monster houses of Dublin, and the unthinking creatures they drag into ruin along with them!

"Although of the same age, Raymond was much stouter, more muscular, and high colored: his fine beaming countenance, full of sense and spirit, looked doubly so next Grantley's pale face and blasé expression. One was a manly boy, the other a boy man. . . . The boyman whistled up an Italian air, and touched up his locks at the pier-glass: Raymond was soon deep in a book of prints of the Peninsular war. . . . 'Shall we look up the general (their grand father) at his club, O'Neil?' asked Grantley (he liked surnames best, they sounded mannish), and he buttoned himself in his top coat. 'With all my heart. Why do you muffle—have you a cold?' 'No; but is this muffling? You are a hardy cove (would a young nobleman use such a slangy expression?): you Irish bear anything good or bad,' observed Grantley with a smile; he fancied O'Neil was a muff. 'We know what to bear, depend on it,' he answered coolly; 'it is rather good fun to pitch into a fellow when he is insolent.' 'I say, shall we try a sherry cobbler? it is killing cold,' returned the Viscount as they went out. 'I do not know what it is,' said Raymond, 'it sounds funny.' 'I shall initiate you,' was the patronising reply, 'and shew you a pretty girl into the bargain.' The boy-man winked as he had seen others. 'I do not care a straw about your pretty girls,' retorted the manly country-bred boy contemptuously. 'I hate girls, they are so prim. Do you think I am such a Miss Molly?' The boy-man felt ashamed somehow and inferior too. 'You are a great big child, O'Neil,' he sneered: 'here we are.' . . . Lord Grantley had melted jelly and a biscuit, and then called for half a glass of liqueur. 'There's brandy in that,' suggested O'Neil with dislike. 'I should rather think there is. . . . Now for the cobbler:' he was pedantically knowing, he exhibited for the other's instruction. O'Neil tried it, and not feeling amused, nor caring for wine, he threw it by. . . . 'I wish I had you at Eton, old boy; they'd make a hare of you for your greenness.' 'Would they? they didn't at Oscott.' 'Oh! they are a slow set—all papists there.' 'I'll tell you what, my young lord: you may try your wit and your fashion on me to a certain point, and welcome; but if you were the Prince of Wales, and sneered at my religion, I would pummel you into a pancake.' He looked as if he could: the Viscount stammered an excuse. 'Have a cigar,' he added as they passed a shop. 'No, thank you,' replied Raymond smiling, 'I have no taste for aping big chaps; it does not amuse me.' 'What do you like then—marbles?' asked the other. 'No, I like riding, and shooting, and fishing, and reading, and music. Now you have all my pursuits,' said Raymond playfully: 'tell me yours if you have any.' 'I am tired of a good many things; but I like billiards and betting and horses best. . . . My governor keeps me cruelly tight every way; so I am always on the sly, and hard up!' 'Do you mean your master or your father?' asked Raymond."

We admit the following colloquy, as we know that a very large proportion of well educated and sincere Protestants are very far from approving of the proceedings here censured. Two peasants are conversing.

" 'Mr. Barlow is a good civil gentleman; he is a hard honest man. What do we want but that and a civil word? but them ladies of his is the mischief. They are ever and always stopping to lay down parables, and making little of themselves in every poor man's kitchen, pretending to be mighty free with us, but all the while as disdainful as you plase, afeard of the pig, and the gander, and the ebincough, and not letting their feet to the flure past their toes.' 'Yes, and then drawing down the religion, and puttending to read their foolish little stories, but always bringing in some sliver agin the priest or the Holy Catholic Church, and praising the jumpers. Faix, I'll keep them new turncoat preachers out of this village any how. Bad manners to them! it was the meal that brought them.'

" 'Tis thrue for you, Mick. 'Tis no fit thing to come into any man's house to offend him and his family, jibing about the Blessed Mother of God, and what we'd die for, and did evermore. I'd sooner lose the sight of my eyes, than listen to the impudent tormenting talk of them mean jumpers. What brought such intruders into our parish at all? thank God we're not starving. Let them go to the big facthory towns and them mines under ground full of haythens. We had priests, and prayers, and patience enough without going to thim for it. If we hadn't the true faith, how could we come through the starvation time without plunder, and murdher, and every other villany? Didn't I see stout men wither away into thrawnecans, and their wives and babbies gasping for death th' other side of thim, 'till the hair grew out of their bodies; and they never laid a wet finger on sheep, nor cattle, nor corn, tho' the land was teeming with them.' 'Tisn't that same,' rejoined the other, 'but they never turned an angry face up to heaven, nor said, 'why was it,' nor begrudged them that had enough (and good they were about it), but took it all from the GREAT God, for they knew it was for their good, and that HIMSELF had suffered.' 'And why did we bear it?' asked Mick. 'Was it for fraid of the magistrates? no. What had we in jail, but better feeding than we had at home, and we waiting for death all the time? 'Twas because we had the rale thrue faith, and the hopes of heaven, and because it was the will of God. Arrah! do you think the English would sit down empty and hungry, and have beef and mutton in the next field?' 'And sure if the bread is only any way small or dear over in Manchester, arn't they rising like bees in a swarm, and smashing windies, and tearing away loafis from the bakers? It's long till they'd wait till the life dropped out of them, and then be ashamed to own they were empty. Oh! they ought to larn their own side first, before they'd be tazing the likes of us. I'm not saying a word again the rale ould ministhers that war in it formerly, that minded theirselves and came honest by their flocks, and had civil manners for the poorest in the parish, and kep a good house: them had every one's good will. But now whoever turns from our side, and puts on a white handkercher, is as good as a rale parson, and has no manners nayther. 'Twas poverty done it.'"

Being embarrassed with the number of passages worthy of being presented to the reader, we take the first at hand, and introduce Mrs. Eden, a widow of forty-three, with "wonderful hair unstained by one silvery streak, but with skin roughened by many beautifying applications."

"This lady's air was usually sentimental, although in moving about she indulged in gay little hops now and then, such as growing girls are seen to practise, when on some joyous expedition with an amiable governess who walks a trifle too fast. She idolised two or three delightful doctors and pathetic parsons, and 'worshipped genius' even in petticoats! Mrs. Eden insisted on calling herself 'Eve' (having been christened 'Sarah'), it was so tempting with 'Eden,' and she imagined herself the type of her too irresistible first mother. (Mr. O'Neil is presented to her). 'I am indeed most happy to behold him again' (he had rescued herself and daughter from insult on a former occasion), she uttered with affected rapture. 'Mr.

O'Neil, I only regret it did not occur in some woodland glade where the vesper hymn of birds falls sweetly on the ear; and that they were not real daring bandits that you put so boldly to flight. Fine fellows are those brave banditti, with their black beards, and plumed hats, and glittering daggers! I should like to be a bandit's bride dwelling in some forest cave, gorgeously attired—'In stolen goods,' added her daughter, contemptuously. 'You are too downright for your mother,' said Mr. Bland. 'She views things fancifully, poetically.' 'Yes, that is my bane: I am ever taking the graceful views; my feelings rule me: I am a slave to sensibility. I found a wounded pigeon yesterday in the park, and kept my maid up all night, nursing the dear dumb thing. It looks up into my face like an answering spirit; I am sure it has a human soul.' 'Your maid is very ill all day,' said Leonora, 'her cough is much worse. I would have put the useless pigeon out of pain, and allowed the sick maid to lie down in bed. I wish people had human souls for one another. Why didn't you sit up yourself?' "

No marriage-disposed young lady need lay the work aside for fear of finding all the heroines immured in convents towards the end of third volume. One only (and she not reared up in any belief) out of half-a-dozen, devotes herself and her property to the works of the Sisters of Charity. Our extracts are not from those parts of the work that interest the most by human interest, or evince the sound judgment, and deep-seated religious convictions and philanthropy of the writer. She has written another novel, Blanche and her Betrothed, and we hope that these are only the first of a score at least.

A fitting conclusion of this paper will be to give a list of unobjectionable works of modern fiction, as far as our experience goes, beginning with those known to be written by Catholic authors. Geraldine, Rome and the Abbey, by Miss Agnew; the Pope—Isidora the Neapolitan—Modern Society in Rome—the Alcazar, by J. R. Beste; Bertha, Florine, Queen Adelaide, the Robber Chief-tain, by W. B. Maccabe; Alban, the Forest, by J. V. Huntingdon ;*

* This gentleman conducts a Catholic periodical at Baltimore, U.S. His first work was "Lady Alice or the New Una," the scene being laid chiefly in Italy and England. The Catholic hero of the tale being in danger of death, declines the aid of his own clergymen, and becomes an Anglo-Catholic in a style that would for ever endear him to Dr. Pusey. The talented author had at the time the fearful example of poor Blanco White before his eyes, and might have known that when a Catholic pitches himself off the platform, he will not halt on the next step with the earnest, truth-seeking Anglicans: he tumbles down to the lowest level of Christianity, or rolls off into the outer void of unbelief. Before his next work, "Alban" was published, he had furnished a practical proof of the correctness of his views when writing "Lady Alice," by becoming a Catholic himself.

Shandy M'Guire, the Spas Wife, by Rev. Mr. Boyce; Ellea Middleton, Grantley Manor, Lady Bird, the Countess of Bonneval, by Lady G. Fullarton; the Mussulman, by Dr. R. R. Madden; John Bull and the Papists, by Edgar; the Tudor Sisters, Kate Devereux, Florence the Aspirant, Hidden Links, by authors whose names are as yet unknown to us; Mount St. Laurence, the Witch of Melton Hill, Margaret Danvers, Mary Star of the Sea, by Mrs. Thompson; Palmario, and Tales of an Arctic Voyager, by R. P. Gillies, whom we suppose to be a Catholic; Lizzie Maitland, edited by Dr. Brownson; Pauline Seward, by Dr. J. D. Bryant; all the novels by Miss Kavanagh, Hendrik Conscience, Banim, Griffin, and Carleton, the Nowlans, the Station, Tales of Ireland, and the Lough Derg Pilgrim excepted; generally, all the works published by Burns and Lambert, Duffy, Dolman, and Richardson, at the head of which stand Fabiola, Callista, Antoine de Bonneval, and Alice Sherwin. From the Italian we have Marco Visconti, by Tomaso Grossi; the Betrothed Lovers, by Manzoni; the Nun of Monza, and the Convent and Harem, by Rossini; this last translated by Mme. Pisani (Mrs. Col. Gardiner), herself the authoress of the Banker Lord, and Vandeleur.

'The Citizen of Prague' from the German is an excellent story of the days of Maria Theresa.

The following works, mostly of an excellent character in their way, are from the pens of writers of high Anglican principles.

The Heir of Redcliffe, Heart's Ease, Daisy Chain, Little Duke, Lances of Linwood, Henrietta's Wish, Dynevor Terrace, by Miss Yonge; Ivors, Margaret Percival, the Earl's Daughter, Amy Herbert, Katharine Ashton, Cleve Hall, Experience of Life, Ursula, by Miss Sewell; the Fortunes of the Falconars, Sir Gervase Grey, King's Connel, Musgrave, by Mrs. Gordon; the Story of a Family, the Maiden Aunt, the Use of Sunshine, and Nina, by Mrs. Smedley; Eastbury, by Miss Drury; Dorothy, Still Waters, Uncle Ralph, by Miss Colville; Anschar, by Mr. King; Everley, the Owlet of Owlstone Edge, the Curate of Holy Cross, Mignonette, Lady Una and her Queendom, these last by anonymous writers. We have heard 'Emily Howard,' by Mrs. Dunlop, a story of Portugal, very well spoken of. Mrs. Gore, Mrs. Grey, Mrs. Burbury, and our countless Galaxy of novel writers,* will excuse our apparent neglect of them. A writer in Blackwood or some other periodical, once gave minute instructions as to the dressing of a cucumber: the process was intricate and long, but the final direction was to raise the window and throw out the delicacy untasted. We will not be so cruel to our article of cookery, merely requesting our friends, in the words of the Saint quoted above, 'to eat seldom and in small quantity.'

* A list of our chief female novelists will be found in the paper on Delphine Gay, in our NUMBER for last October.

QUARTERLY RECORD OF THE PROGRESS OF REFORMATORY AND RAGGED SCHOOLS, AND OF THE IMPROVEMENT OF PRISON DISCIPLINE.

In our last Record we referred to the establishment of the Cork Agricultural Reformatory, and in our present Record we are enabled to present to our readers the following most interesting Report of a visit to English and Continental Reformatories, by the President of the Cork Reformatory Committee :—

I have thought it desirable to lay before you a report of the visit which I have just paid to several Reformatory institutions in this country, in England and on the Continent, accompanied by Mr. Edmond Paul Townsend, of the Presentation order. I shall not in this, trouble you with arguments in favor of Reformatories, nor adduce statistics to prove their success. Of the necessity for such institutions I know that you are deeply convinced, and as to their success, it may be sufficient for me to state that in no instance have the conductors of those which I had the pleasure of visiting, ever thought of the possibility of failure. They may have had, and they have had, great difficulties to contend against and many troubles to overcome ; but in patience, firm resolve, entire devotion to their labour, and confidence in God, they have striven on, and conquered. In no one case have they failed ; they have all had their difficulties, and all have surmounted them. May we not hope, that with the Divine assistance, a similar success awaits our undertaking. We, too, shall have our trials, but we shall overcome them, if we earnestly use those means by which others have triumphed.

I shall then confine myself to a simple narrative of what we have seen, and a statement of any suggestions that may have occurred to Mr. Townsend or myself.

The first institution which we visited was the Female Reformatory at Golden Bridge, near Dublin. It is intended for females of all ages, selected from the several Convict Prisons, for whose maintenance 5s. per week are paid. It contains 40 inmates, all of whom appear to be under excellent discipline, and to perform their work diligently and cheerfully ; their sole employment, at present, except the house duties, is washing for private families in Dublin : at this they are fully occupied—a small sum out of their earnings is laid aside for each woman, to be given to her on her discharge. The establishment is managed by the Sisters of Mercy, and I had the pleasure of conversing for a short time with the Superioress, who appears to be eminently suited for the work she has in hand. Her manner, which is gentle and winning, yet evidences a decisive and energetic will, cannot but exercise a powerful influence on those whom she has to control, which in fact it does, as she told me she never finds much resistance to any thing that she wishes to have done. She shews the inmates in a calm and firm manner, that she is determined it should be done :—she takes great pain to convince them that what she directs is for their good, and she has thus gradually obtained so great a mastery over them, that now, at the meeting which is held every evening for instruction and prayer, the women accuse themselves openly and before all, of any transgressions of the rules of which they may have been guilty during the day. At first this was difficult, they were apt to bring stories of one another—the result of prison habits. This she was resolved to suppress, and so mentioned the circumstance at instruction, saying that on the next occasion she would tell the fault, the person guilty of it, and her informant, but recommended, in order to avoid this, that each woman should confess her fault herself. This plan, however, effectually put a stop to tale-bearing, and now the women say to each other, if they notice any fault, “mind you tell that at instruction.” There is now no trouble with them, they observe the rules rigidly, and are anxious to give every proof that they are worthy to be given back to society. In many instances, indeed, it is necessary rather to encourage hope, than to enforce humility, so deeply are they impressed with their faults, and so desirous to retrieve them. The superioress said that she found the most rigid discipline, tempered by kindness, to be necessary. She recommended that new inmates should be brought in gradually, that they may be broken by those long in the Reformatory; for instance, on the day I visited, she was informed that there were ten women to be sent from the prisons; she requested that they may be sent in groups of five each, with a few week’s interval between. The buildings at present occupied are not sufficiently extensive for the number of inmates, nor were they originally intended for their present use, so that the arrangements cannot be said to be perfect. The grounds are unwallled and unguarded, but there is no attempt at escape. Every thing is perfectly orderly and clean, and I have no doubt, that when the suite of buildings, now in progress, shall have been completed, this institution will, under its excellent management, become a model for all such establishments.

We next visited Newgate and Mountjoy prisons, as they are both Reformatories, so far as prisons can be. They are conducted upon the separate system, the only plan by which a prisoner may be saved from the contamination of vice, although he may not be brought back to virtue. Newgate is an old structure, adapted, as far as it could be, to the cellular plan; it is occupied by females, and appears to be admirably managed. The Mountjoy Model Prison is a magnificent building; it contains 499 separate cells, and is so constructed that the entire prison lies under your eye at a glance. It contained 300 prisoners at the time of my visit, and although the discipline is necessarily most strict, and is rigorously enforced, there was not a single person confined in the punishment cells, a circumstance most creditable to its management.

This is the first prison to which convicts are sent, that they may be broken to discipline: they may be retained here for nine months, but seldom require to be kept so long. They are drafted from it to the several depots, such as Spike Island. It is impossible to over praise the admirable arrangements of this prison. Every thing appears to be attended to in the most careful manner, but however worthy of examination in many points, and suggestive of instruction, as it does not immediately bear upon the subject that we have in view, I need not enter into further details. In these visits we were accompanied by Dr. Lentaigne, and Mr. J. Murray, and through Mountjoy prison by Mr. Netterville, its able governor, from each of whom we received the greatest kindness and attention.

Our next visit was paid to the Reformatory of Mount St. Bernard, in Leicestershire, within about six or seven miles of Loughboro'; it is by far the largest Reformatory in these countries. It contained at the time of my visit about 300 boys, of ages varying from 5 to 15 years. It has been established nearly four years, and its success is stated to be very satisfactory. The entire establishment is now in a transition state, most of the old building having been pulled down, and new ones in progress, but still quite unfinished; it would be therefore, unjust to form any conclusions from present arrangements, which are only temporary, and such as necessity compelled its managers to adopt; but when the projected plans will have been completed, it will possess all the means and appliances for carrying into effect the most perfect and effective system of training, both educational and industrial. A much larger number of boys were sent to the institution than had been at all anticipated, or than there had been time to make preparations for, and this occasioned the superiors the most serious embarrassment; so great, indeed, as to have made them all but despair. That is a feeling unknown to religious in the cause of charity. They labored and succeeded, and their success under such difficulties and embarrassments as they have had to encounter, is a lesson and an encouragement to all engaged in similar undertakings. Although the superiors are the Trappist monks whose abbey is about the eighth of a mile distant from the Reformatory, and both the lord Abbot and the Prior constantly visit the colony, its immediate management is confided to eight Brothers of the third order, who are assisted in the industrial education of the boys by several master tradesmen. The former are unpaid and wear the religious habit; the tradesmen are paid, but only a small sum, as the object is to get men who have a desire to engage themselves in this sort of life, and who do not embrace it for merely pecuniary consideration. The boys address their teachers, as they do one another, by the title of "brother." This is one of many expedients used to try and gain their confidence and affections, to which all the efforts of the superiors appear to be directed, and they seem to have succeeded wonderfully, for the boys address them in a frank, kind and fearless manner; affectionately, but by no means wanting in respect; and go through their work diligently and cheerfully. I was much struck with a young fellow about 14 years of age, who was working in the smith's forge, making a screw, and working as hard and as well at it, as if he were paid largely. I noticed his industry and skill to the brother superior who was with me. "Yes," said he, "he is now one of our very best boys, and promises to be an excellent and intelligent tradesman; his application is unceasing, and his name is inscribed on the Tablet of Honor for his uniform good conduct; yet that boy was at one time the terror of Yorkshire, as a pickpocket and burglar. We had a good deal of trouble with him at first, but he is completely changed, and I should have no hesitation to recommend him to any one to-morrow. We have not had him three years." Another boy of about the same age he pointed out to me, as the model boy of the whole colony; the first in all that was good; who for two years past had not incurred a reprimand even for a breach of rules, who was looked up to and respected by his fellows, and held the highest position of confidence entrusted to a colonist. Still, that boy had suffered three or four convictions, his father was a robber and a drunkard, a man of the most infamous character; he mentioned his name, which, he said, had a bad notoriety. The poor child had been turned out upon the streets, by his bad father, to beg and steal, when upon his third or fourth committal he was transferred to Mount St. Bernard, and now is what I have described. Cheering facts these!

During work, meals and instruction, and also in the dormitories at night, strict silence is enjoined: but at recreation they are allowed perfect freedom, and they certainly enjoy it. The Brothers are always with them, by day and night, sharing even in their sports. They are gradually introducing military discipline, and have a tolerable band of drums and fifes; they get the boys to march in order and to go through some evolutions, but they evidently do not wish to be too rigid, they must keep the boys in good temper, and manage them by kindness. There is a large quantity of land, some 300 acres, in connection with the colony, and by far the largest number of boys are employed upon it. There are also taught tailoring, shoemaking, tin work, smiths' work, carpentering, clog making, joining, sawing, mason work, brick-laying, stocking weaving and book-binding. All the boys wear clogs, with leather uppers, and their week day dress is a blouse, just the same as the French peasant or labourer; they have besides a Sunday dress, which has the honorary distinction, such as Lieutenant, Sergeant, Corporal, to which they are entitled marked upon it. They have adopted the division into families, but do not carry it out very strictly; the boys sleep in large dormitories, each in a separate bed, and the superior sleeps in the same room with them. The clothes of the boys are taken from them each night, and placed in a press under the superior's bed. This is a precautionary measure, which I hope present circumstances alone render necessary, and which may soon be discontinued, for it is not in conformity with that confidence and trust which all their training and education should tend to inspire. A small sum is put aside out of their earnings, and bearing a proportion to their industry, not to its profit, which is funded for them until they are leaving the colony, or if they are very well conducted, and that the privilege of corresponding with their relatives or friends is awarded to them by their superiors, they are sometimes accorded to send a little out of their fund to a parent or near relation; but this is a great favor, and must be earned by distinguished good conduct. On the whole, we were greatly pleased with our visit to the colony of Mount St. Bernard, every part of which we examined most minutely, and received the fullest information and kindest attention both from the Father Prior and Brother Superior. I look forward to the time when it will bear comparison, as I am sure it will, with the noblest institutions of the Continent.

In order to close my report on the English institutions, I may now depart from the order of time in which I made my visits, and speak of the two Reformatories at Hammersmith, near London, and the Home for outcast boys, Belvedere Crescent, near Hungerford bridge.

The Reformatory at Blythe house, Brook-green, Hammersmith, is superintended by five Monks of the order of Our Lady of Mercy; four of them are Belgians, from the house of St. Hubert, where they have a Reformatory, and one, the brother who accompanied us, an Irishman. This house was established in 1855, and they represent the results of their labors as satisfactory; so also have they been spoken of by the Press and from the Bench. The superiors are assisted by two trade masters, a shoemaker and a tailor. There were at my visit 78 inmates; there is no land attached, and the only training which the boys receive, besides literary education, is instruction in either of the two trades mentioned.

There is a large play-ground where the boys enjoy themselves very much. The arrangements of the house, &c., do not seem to be very suitable, and as they are about to remove to a larger place, with land, the superiors do not care to make any changes now. The dormitories are divided into separate cells, latticed all round, into which the boys are locked at night. This is a transplant from the prison system, with which I think it had much better have been left. The superiors, however, say that the boys with whom they have to deal are a very difficult class indeed, the experienced London pickpocket, and that they require precautions which with any others would not be needed. I can well believe this, for nearly all their boys are 14 or 16 years of age, and one can easily imagine how much of vice and craft boys of that age must become acquainted with in London. They all appear to be under great control, and look cheerful and contented. The family system is not adopted, but the boys' manners to their superiors is very affectionate. In this, as well as in Mount St. Bernard's, 7s. a week are paid by government for the support of each boy; the diet is very good; they get three meals a day, and meat is allowed four times a week.

The Female Reformatory at Hammersmith, managed by the Sisters of the Order of the Good Shepherd, is only an infant institution. They have at present but six inmates, who are very young, and the superiors desire to increase them gradually; they have made preparations for about twenty. All the arrangements are most admirable, exquisitely neat and orderly. The time of the children is occupied by literary instruction, vocal music, recreation, and needle work; there is ample ground attached, and I cannot but anticipate the greatest success from the labors of the good sisters. There is a house of refuge for female penitents in connexion with this establishment, which is excellently managed; the inmates are employed only in washing and domestic duties.

The Home for outcast boys at Belvedere Crescent, near Hungerford bridge (Surrey-side), is a most interesting institution. It is superintended by Mr. Driver, a man of great intelligence, and thoroughly devoted to his work. I do not know any place that affords stronger hopes or greater encouragement to those interested in Reformatories than this little Home, the success of which is undoubted. At first Mr.

Driver used to go out at night, and take the poor children out of door ways, from under arches of bridges, and such other "Tom all alones" as afford night shelter to the London outcast; but now, he says, he has come to be known, and that parents and benevolent persons bring children to him, who are taking to bad courses, or who picked up with bad companions, and whom they cannot control. Sometimes boys come to him of their own accord. He is all in all to them—the head of the family—the industrial teacher—the school-master—the religious and moral instructor—the companion and friend. In the evening the boys sit with himself, his wife and child; they work, read or write—they have evening prayer and instruction, and sometimes he accompanies their songs and choruses on the harmonium, which he plays with considerable skill. He has now twenty boys under his care, whom he treats quite as members of his family. I thought it probable that he would have had some Irish boys amongst them, and I asked him if he had; he had not. I was curious to know how that had arisen, "Well," said he, "I refuse them when they apply." I asked, "Why so?" "To say the truth," said he, "they generally are not 'first-raters' amongst us, though I had one Irish boy and he turned out very well; that is he" (pointing to a photograph of a boy in rags, one of many that hung round the room). "But my principal reason is, that they are Roman Catholics; and, though our teaching here is as little sectarian as is possible, we read our Bible and try to be Christians, still, I feel somehow, that whenever I may find it necessary to explain many portions of the sacred text, he may suspect and doubt me; he has been thought to believe what, I trust, is as true for him as what I believe is for me; he loves that belief, and I feel that, in this matter, I do not possess his full confidence, without which I cannot succeed. If I do not obtain the full and undoubting confidence of my boys, the power for good which I should have over them is lost. This is my experience, and I therefore prefer to have boys, as I easily can—as many as I can manage—with whom this difficulty does not exist."

Their only industrial employment is making band-boxes and ornamental card-boxes for soaps, perfumery, &c. The boys receive only their support and clothing, for their labor, and they work very hard for 12 hours a day. To some he gives 6s. a week wages, 5s. of which they pay him back for their support, and also leave the other shilling in his hands to purchase clothes. There is a large play ground attached, where the boys are obliged to exercise twice a day. They never go out; the door is on the latch, but for years past not one has attempted to desert. The object which Mr. Driver has, is to train the boys to habits of order and industry, to make them handy, to impress them with strong religious principles, and to educate them in the practices of a Christian life. After one or two years the boys are either taken into employment by gentlemen interested in the home, or assisted to emigrate to the colonies, Canada principally, from whence most gratifying letters have been received. Relapses, Mr. Driver assured me, were very, very rare. Is not the success of this little colony, in the very heart of dreadful London, full of promise, of hope, and of encouragement? In this we have proved how much even one earnest, intelligent man can do.

I shall now describe to you, as briefly as I can, our visit to Mettray, as you are aware of many of the details of that invaluable establishment. We spent two entire days there from morning till night, minutely inspected everything, and saw each detail of their every-day life, from getting up in the morning to going to bed at night, in actual operation. The colony is about four or five miles from Tours, and consists of ten separate houses, five at each side, and the church in the centre, closing the view. Each house is named after individuals or a locality that had largely contributed to its erection, such as Maison de Courteilles, the Maison d'Ourches, the Maison de Tours, &c., and is devoted to the use of a family. It contains three floors, the lower being used as a workshop, the first and second as refectories and dormitories. The number in each family vary—40 is the number assigned, but it ranges from that to 60. M. de Metz advised us in our arrangements, to limit our families to 25. "Do not," said he, "fall into the error which I did, in making my families too large; 25 is sufficiently large to give variety and not cause difficulty in its management." Besides the 10 houses at the colony, there are four large farm houses on the land, each of which is fitted up for 50 boys. The whole now consists of 700 boys, 500 being at the colony and 200 on the farm. They are superintended by 50 employés—who are engaged as chefs de famille, agriculturists, masters of trades, and literary teachers. There are, besides, the sous-chefs, pupils of the preparatory school, who are not paid, but who are supported and educated, and elder-brothers, who are selected from the colonists themselves, two for each family. The families are selected principally according to age, but upon this I was much struck by an observation of M. de Metz,—“In the formation of my families,” said he, “I endeavour to produce a moral chemistry, by bringing together opposite dispositions—mixing with the quick and lively people of this south, the less excitable youths from Brittany and Strasbourg, and thus check and calm them.”

There are 270 hectares (nearly 700 acres) of land attached to the colony; one-third of this is free, and for two-thirds a rent of 50 francs per hectare is paid. The entire is admirably farmed; the principal crops are grain, and green crops for the feeding of cattle, of which they have a very fine stock. They have also some vines, but not many; they endeavoured to promote the cultivation of the silkworm, but the climate was found to be too cold, and they have had to abandon it. Almost every trade is taught at the colony, and they manufacture the greater part of what they require for their own consumption; they grind their own corn, make their own bread, and manufacture nearly all their own clothing. The boys are comfortably dressed; each wears sabots and blouse, and in winter a short cloak, which of course they lay aside at work. In the washhouse, however, there are some women who assist, and the hospital and room for repairing the clothes, &c., are superintended by the Sisters of the Order of Our Lady of the Presentation. This assistance has not been found necessary at Buysselede, where the boys do all for themselves, and I think if it can be dispensed with, so much the better. Everything is done with military precision, and to sound of trumpet. They have a nice band of eight brass instruments, on which they perform very well. The employment of their time each day in winter, is thus distributed: They rise at six, breakfast at half-past six, labor at seven, dinner at 12, recreation at half-past 12, labour at 1, instruction at half-past 5, supper at half-past 7, and prayers and bed at quarter past 8 o'clock—there is of course some change for summer, but not much. Before each employment, they are paraded in the court yard; at word of command the boys for agriculture or for each trade form in front, and to the sound of trumpet they march with perfect precision to their respective destinations—the discipline is perfect. I never shall forget being present when a family of the youngest children in the colony were going to bed—even in this they carried out their order and discipline. When the little fellows marched upstairs, they ranged themselves around the room, keeping up the military tramp. At the command, “a genoux,” each was in one instant on his knees, and from a corner of the room came a weak, tiny voice beginning, Notre Pere, que es aux cieux, the response of the fifty was spoken as if one voice, “Ainsi.” After prayer the order was given to arrange hammocks, which was done in three movements each at the same second; they now put off their clothes, as commanded, and hung them on the hook beside their hammock, and at the last order, all were in bed. This will give an idea of how everything is done.

I had the pleasure of two interviews with M. de Metz, who received Mr. Townsend and myself with the greatest kindness. He appears about 60 years of age, dark complexion and eyes, and of most prepossessing appearance and manner. He speaks with great fluency and singular eloquence, and displays the liveliest interest in his subject and a thorough mastery of it. The points upon which he principally advised me were the following:—

1. To commence with a small number, say 12—he thought that a good number, as it would not be too many to manage, and would be sufficiently numerous to prevent any feeling of solitude on the part of the boys.

2. To limit the number of the family to, say, 25. It was an error, he said, on his part to have his families so numerous as 50, with which he commenced—25 was more easily managed and gave sufficient variety.

3. In answer to a question of mine, as to whether it would be of much importance to take land either with or without buildings on it, he said, by all means, if you can, get your land without building. Any that you may get, you will have to alter, at perhaps considerable expense, and they will never be quite what you would wish; do not let stone walls make laws for you; make your own laws, and let the walls be obedient to them. The building may, of course, be as light and inexpensive as possible.

4. He was especially impressive in recommending the family system. I recommend it, he said, after an experience of 20 years, and if there be anything which this long experience has convinced me of, it is the excellence of the family system, especially with a small number, such as 25, which I now adopt, if it were in my power. The system of Mettray, said he, is embraced in three principles—religion for its foundation, military discipline, and family culture—(Le fondement religieux, la discipline militaire, le culture de famille.)

5. He also spoke of the great advantages of the Société Paternelle, and of the desirableness of having some such organisation to patronize the boys and look after them, after they had left the Colony. He found it of great use to allow the boys to come back to the colony, when they may be out of employment, so that they may not be tempted to fall again into crime. I urged the usual argument, that this facility may have the effect of preventing the boys from making sufficient exertion for their own maintenance in the world, that they may be indifferent about employment. if they were always sure of a shelter, and that this may destroy their spirit of self-dependence. To this he answered, that he received back none but good boys, of whose conduct he was sure, and that he found, in fact, that no boy would return to the diet, the hard work and the rigid discipline of Mettray, who could get any employment outside. He did not allow the slightest wages to any boy so received back. He said that after his long and extended experience, he did not find that this rule, which he strongly recommended, produced the slightest ill effect upon the boy's characters, or injured their principles of self-reliance; on the contrary, said he, this feeling gives them confidence and prevents them from falling back into crime; it gives them as it were wings, which sustain them in their good intentions. In fine, he kindly said, that if difficulties should at any time arise, he would be most happy to answer any question, and afford me every information in his power. We left Mettray deeply impressed with the conviction of the success that must necessarily attend an institution, so beautifully conducted, and under such enlightened management. We were accompanied through the colony by M. Arnaud, head of the Preparatory School, and through the Farm by M. Warren, the sous-chef of the Agricultural Department, both of whom afforded us the fullest information.

The last Institution which we visited was the Reformatory at Ruysselede; it is within 4 miles of the station of Bloemendaal, between Ghent and Bruges. It is under the superintendence of M. Poll, assisted by eight employes and a chief superintendent; it is entirely supported by the Belgium Government, which allows 70 centimes a day for each boy; in Mettray 14 sous are paid by government.

The same system prevails here as at Mettray, but in consequence of the form of the building which the government bought and repaired, it is differently applied. The family system is fully recognised, but the children are not kept in separate houses. They sleep in four great dormitories, each containing 125 beds. They eat in the same refectory, and receive instruction in the same school-room; but they are divided into 8 families, each under its chief. The teachers here are also chefs de famille, and a considerable number of officers is thus spared. There is the same perfect military discipline as at Mettray. They have also a band which numbers 40 performers—they played several pieces for us, and played them excellently and with great precision. So well are the boys trained to music, that there is quite a contest for them amongst the different regiments, and M. Poll told me that there are now in one of the regiments stationed in Bruges 12 of his boys in the band, and in another, 10.

There are 500 boys in the colony, and in a house situate at a short distance, 100 more, who are destined for the navy. They have a three-masted ship built by themselves, in front of the house ; it is surrounded by a large pond, and here the boys are exercised in naval tactics, and instructed in the technical terms in Flemish, French, and English. There is a vessel also at Mettray, but it is not much attended to, except in Summer, when the boys are exercised at it. In the parent house, the boys sleep in neat iron bedsteads, but in the naval establishment in hammocks, certainly the neatest, cleanest, and most orderly I ever saw. In fact, the perfect neatness and order that prevail in every part of Ruyselede, is beyond all praise. I did not think it possible that any establishment could have been kept in such condition, and everything is done by the boys themselves without any help. There are 250 hectores (about 600 acres) of land attached, for which no rent is paid, the government having given the entire plant, buildings, land, cattle and implements. It is all admirably farmed by the boys ; the stock of cattle is very fine, and they are excellently kept.

Pleased as we had been with Mettray, we were infinitely more delighted with Ruyselede ; the order, neatness and cleanliness that prevailed were quite unequalled, and we left it with the full conviction that of all the establishments we had seen, it was indeed the model. We were shown the entire colony by M. Poll, for whom we received the greatest kindness and attention.

The result of our visit has left the conviction on my mind, and what is of far greater importance, on that of my friend Mr. Townsend, that there is nothing to be feared in undertaking our work here. It is a serious responsibility, but it is one which we may accept without dread. It will be more expensive than we had anticipated, but we have no fear that the public will permit a good work to perish for want of funds. With then a firm resolve, a thorough earnestness of purpose, and an unbounded confidence in God's fostering aid and blessing, we joyfully and trustfully anticipate success.

This is a most admirable report, and in the passages referring to Mettray the writer, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, shows that he has fully caught the spirit of M. Demetz. An English friend, who knows M. Demetz thoroughly, and with whom he has conversed oftener, and more fully, than with any other in England, states, that he has heard M. Demetz "say the same things related by Mr. O'Shaughnessy, frequently."

There are, however, two points noted by Mr. O'Shaughnessy to which it is right we should draw attention. He refers to the "Société Paternelle" as a Patronage Society. This is not a patronage society, but it is the society which established Mettray, and it was founded by M. Demetz and M. de Courteilles in order that the sixty-sixth article of the Civil Code might no longer be a dead letter.

The second particular which we must note is that in which a reference is made to the numbers in each "family." We do not think that M. Demetz has made the numbers in each of his "families" forty through any mistake of his own. He has always told us that he would wish the number to be twenty-five, but that the smaller the number the more expensive is the maintenance of the "family;" and as he depends upon subscriptions for this maintenance he cannot increase the expense of his "families" beyond a certain point.

These are very small errors in the Report, and the promoters of the Cork Reformatory may well feel proud of their President, and of the noble example shown by them, and by their good city, to Ireland.

The Bristol Ragged School, on St. James's Back, is well known to most of our readers who are acquainted with Miss Carpenter's labors in the Reformatory cause. From the Eleventh Annual Report, that for 1857, we extract the following passages. The Committee of Council have given just £50 to this school, when from its requirements, and through its services, it should have received at least £150.

THE Managers of this School regret that in the twelfth year of its action and efficient operations they should be compelled to make a special appeal to all who take an interest in the cause for liberal pecuniary aid, not only to pay a large balance due to the Treasurer for the past year, but to insure the existence of the School in its present condition, one which they believe has never been exceeded, or even equalled in past years.

The cause of this most unexpected position of the pecuniary state of the School is as follows:—

It was stated in the last Report, that on June 2, 1856, the Committee of Council on Education passed a Minute in aid of "Ragged and Reformatory Schools," by which liberal assistance was offered, adapted to the needs of such Schools.

As Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, three of whom had in succession closely examined the School, had uniformly borne a high testimony to the Master and Mistress, and expressed great satisfaction with the efforts made to enforce obedience, cleanliness, and order in the School, and the result of those efforts on the children, the Managers proceeded at once to act on this Minute. They increased the salary of the Master, which they considered due to one who had for ten years zealously devoted himself to the School, and on whom its efficiency mainly depended; they engaged an Assistant Master, especially with the view of carrying on better the Industrial department of the School, on which the Committee of Council judiciously lay great stress, and of throwing regular help, which was greatly needed, into the Evening School; and they engaged as Assistants in the Juvenile and Infant Schools two young women, who were desirous of preparing themselves to be Teachers, in the place of the two Pupil Teachers, whose discontinuance had been recommended by Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools. In his official report he says,—“ I think it a dangerous place for training Apprentices, especially when the Pupil Teachers reach a critical age ; but I believe it to be as good as any Ragged School can be made.” Such increase of staff necessarily involved considerably additional outlay, but it was calculated that this would be fully met by the increased aid promised by the Council.

But to the surprise and perplexity of the Committee, early in the present year, the following minute was added :—“ If the establishment has not been licensed by the Secretary of State, the following Certificate must be signed by two Justices of the Peace :—

“ We, the undersigned, being two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for * * * * * have satisfied ourselves, through the Police, and by other means, that the young persons received into this establishment have either been legally convicted of crime, or have been accustomed to begging and vagrancy, not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, and having no lawful or visible means of subsistence.”

It is evident that the Committee could not ask any Justice of the Peace to sign this Certificate. A Free Day School cannot maintain children who have “ no visible means of subsistence,” nor supply a home to those who have none ; and though many children have been received into the School who have been convicted of crime, if they have manifested a desire to change their course of life, yet it is evident that it cannot take the place of a Reformatory. And however deficient we may consider the parental care exercised over a large proportion of the children, we should not be prepared to ask Magistrates to declare that they have satisfied themselves “ that the children had no proper guardianship.”

Existing Minutes under which the St. James's Back School had received aid in former years, having now been cancelled as regarded Ragged Schools, the Committee were thus virtually excluded from any aid from the Parliamentary grants. After some correspondence, however, on the subject, Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools, under the Minutes of June 2nd, 1856, Jelinger Symonds, Esq., Inspector of Union Schools, was sent to inspect that at St. James's Back. Though he reported that the School is under fair discipline, and containing the class of children contemplated by the Council, yet his report did not satisfy the Council of the general claims of the School to receive aid under the Minutes of June 2nd, 1856. Her Majesty's Inspector having requested that the grants might not be altogether withdrawn for the current year, a grant of £45 was made to the Infant department of the School, the mistress being certificated, together with £13 for the rent and Industrial Implements, but the Secretary of the Committee of Council thus wrote to the Managers :—“ The rest of the School does not fulfil the conditions of any Minute now in force. It is neither a Feeding School for outcasts, nor an Elementary School of the common kind. In order to prevent misconception, I am to state expressly that if the School continues to be organized as at present, it will not receive any grant for the year ending April, 1858. The grants now allowed are not strictly regular, and will not be admitted as a precedent for others."

Under these circumstances the Committee immediately dismissed the Assistant Master, substituted an Assistant for the Infant School Mistress, and gave up the Evening School, placing the Industrial Afternoon School under the management of Mr. Andrews, thereby lessening the expenditure of the School, but greatly diminishing its usefulness.

Yet the Committee could not contemplate the diminution of the usefulness of the School, which must be the result of this unexpected withdrawal of pecuniary aid from the Committee of Council, without a strong effort to obtain some modification of existing arrangements, especially as they considered that the present position of the St. James's Back Ragged School involved a most important general principle, viz., that the benefit of education should be brought to bear on a large class of the population hitherto untouched by any other agency than Ragged Schools, and that these, carried on by a larger amount of voluntary, pecuniary, and personal effort than any other Schools, are entitled to a fair share of the Parliamentary Educational Grants. The Managers of this School had striven for nearly ten years to fulfil the conditions of the Minutes framed for Elementary Schools of the common kind. They had done so as fully as the peculiar nature and condition of the children permitted, and valuable testimony to this was borne by three successive Inspectors. But their utmost efforts had proved that those Minutes were utterly inapplicable to the Ragged Schools, which were now excluded from the new Minutes. It appeared a fit time to bring the whole subject before the Privy Council Educational Committee. A Memorial was therefore prepared, developing this principle. It was signed by every member of the Committee, and forwarded to the Managers of other Ragged Schools. It was signed by those of Liverpool, Manchester, Hull, Ipswich, Gloucester, and Cardiff. This Memorial was presented to the Lord President on the 4th of December, by a very influential deputation headed by Sir John Pakington, and supported by Lord Shaftesbury, with the Secretaries of the London Ragged School Union. The courteous and favourable manner in which the deputation was received, and the justice of our cause, give every hope that ere long arrangements may be made enabling such Schools to receive their fair share of aid. But the result cannot of course be as yet known, and the Committee must therefore strongly appeal to their friends and the public for the means of enabling them to carry on the School. The annual outlay for the Day and Evening Schools in an efficient state cannot be less than £300; the present subscriptions do not exceed £140; there will therefore be a deficiency of £160 on the current year, unless prompt and efficient aid be given; and the Managers do not feel that it would be right again to encounter a large adverse balance.

The nature and operations of the School are as follow:—The scholars are gathered from the lowest parts of Bristol. A portion of them are simply extremely poor, and unable to pay for schooling, but the larger number are so low in habits and character, that when seen in their ordinary condition in the streets, it would appear almost impossible to bring them under good School training, yet when in the School they make such efforts to improve their condition, and are so orderly and attentive, that inexperienced visitors usually imagine that they must belong to a higher class. About 220 children are taught in the Day School, with an average attendance of from 70 to 90 in the Juvenile School, and from 80 to 100 in the Infant School. Of the nature of the instruction given the Committee can speak with satisfaction, from the reports of three successive Inspectors, as well as from their own personal knowledge and the observations of visitors.

The Industrial occupation of the Afternoon School forms a considerable item in the expenditure ; but it is a very important part of the education, as infusing both the ability and the will to work. The completeness with which these departments are conducted will be seen from the accounts of the respective Treasurers. Many of the children bring their dinners with them, and others are provided with them by a small payment during the winter months ; these remain in the play-ground in the interval between the Morning and Afternoon School, and are consequently withdrawn from the bad influences of the streets, from 9 a.m. till 4 p.m. Notwithstanding the very uncertain resources of the School, the Committee felt that a larger and more airy play-ground would be very important ; they therefore accepted the offer of the proprietor of the four adjoining houses to remove them, greatly enlarging the play-ground, and rendering the premises more complete, on an addition of £10 per annum to the rent. This alteration is a very great improvement, not only by giving more space, but by the withdrawal of continual annoyance and bad influence, arising from the tenants of the houses. There are also outhouses for bathing, washing, and wood chopping. The Evening School has been temporarily carried on at private expense, with the sanction of the Committee, and has considerable influence for good on a class of boys too old for the Day School. The Girls' Evening School has been discontinued for want of funds.

Such is a brief sketch of the general working of the School. Its actual results it is of course impossible to state, but it is certain that numbers are now useful, self-supporting members of society, who owe all to this School ; that numbers are thus brought under Christian influences who were living entirely cut off from the respectable portion of society ; and that when the children of any family have continued for some time in the School, a decided change is visible in their habits and character. In many cases where the elder children have been convicted delinquents, the younger ones, being kept at School, have turned out respectable members of society.

If our reader is a conventional "gentleman," or a fully developed, i. e. crinolined "lady," we advise him or her never to go near our honored friend, Miss Mary Carpenter. She will first of all make our lady or gentleman think himself so small, and worthless, and will, secondly, shew him how much he could do if he liked, that he, unhappy mortal, can never again think of himself as he thought before. Mary Carpenter is not Martha, nor yet is she Mary, but she is what was best in each. Her's is an active, not "a cloistered virtue:" in the beautiful life of a Christian woman she shows all that a genuine Christian woman may, and can do ; and she may say, in the noble words of Jeremy Taylor to Lord Carbery—" My work here is not to please the speculative part of men, but to assist the penitent, to strengthen weak hands and feeble knees, having scarce any other possibilities left me of doing alms, or exercising that charity of which we shall be judged at dooms-day. It is enough for me to be an under-builder in the house of God, and I glory in the employment. I labor in the foundations ; and therefore the work needs no apology for being plain, so it be strong and well laid."

All our readers are fully acquainted with Miss Carpenter's School at Bristol, the Red Lodge Girls' Reformatory, and from the Third Report, that for 1857, we extract the following passages :—

The financial condition of the School is very good ; £300 have been vested from the year's income towards the eventual purchase of the premises. The whole outlay, including the alterations and furnishing of the adjoining Cottage, is only £831 1s. 6d. The average number of girls during the year is 56 ; the whole expense of each therefore is only £14 16s. 9d., and deducting the alterations and additional furniture which cannot fairly come under the year's expenditure, is only £13. When therefore a sufficient sum is vested for the eventual purchase and present rent of the premises, it is evident that the School may be well supported by the Treasury allowance of £18 per annum for each girl. Under these circumstances it has been thought right to decline with thanks any further aid from the Committee of Council on Education, trusting to the additional help of voluntary contributions alone to place the Institution on a permanent basis.

The Cottage has formed a very important addition to the establishment. It is calculated to hold eight or nine girls with a Matron ; it is provided with a wash-house and oven for baking bread, and is, in all respects, furnished and arranged like any small house for an ordinary family, without peculiar means of punishment or confinement. Into this are drafted by degrees older the girls, in whom most confidence can be reposed, and who are best prepared for domestic service. They all live as a family, being occupied as much as possible in the various departments of housework, besides baking all the bread consumed by themselves and the girls in the Lodge. They are also taught to cut out and repair their own clothes, and they take as far as practicable the position of young servants in a family.

The Matron does not lock up her stores and private property more than would be done in an ordinary house, and sends the girls out on errands, or occasionally leaves them alone in the house, without having had to complain of a breach of such trust.

The increased liberty allowed at the Cottage has in some instance developed evil which had been kept in check under the stricter discipline of the Red Lodge, but generally a decided improvement is perceived in the girls, when they find that a greater responsibility rests on them, and that their future prospects are directly dependent on themselves. The residence in the Cottage is at the same time so true a test of fitness for entering into the world, and a preparation for it, that it will generally be advisable for all the girls to pass through it before leaving the School. No girl once settled at the Cottage after a month's probation has made any attempt to abscond, nor has any one been obliged to be sent back to Red Lodge for persevering misconduct. The difficulty of placing the girls out at service has been greatly lightened by a clause in Sir George Grey's recent Reformatory Bill, permitting young persons in Reformatories, who have gone through half the time of their sentence, to be put out on trial for a month, before application is made for their discharge. This has been done in the case of five girls up to December 31, 1857, and no one of these has abused the privilege, or committed any dishonesty. Indeed the applications for young servants from Red Lodge are becoming more frequent than can be supplied. Small families, where the Mistress herself superintends the work, are found the most suitable.

Before entering on a brief sketch of the chief points of interest in the School during the year, a few incidents may be mentioned to prove that the Reformatories are not regarded either by the honest poor on the one hand, nor by the criminal class on the other, as a "premium on crime." In a neighbouring Day School the young daughters of two very poor families, where the mothers with difficulty found for their children the needful sustenance, were detected in pilfering half-pence, which it then appeared they had been in the habit of doing for some time, making excuses at home to account for the possession of money. The thought occurred to the Managers of the School whether these two little girls should be prosecuted, with a view of having them sent to a Reformatory, which it was thought would be a great boon to both parents and children. It was ultimately determined to retain the girls in the School, inflicting suitable punishment on them and to summon the mothers to chastise them, which they did, grateful that their children were not expelled. A short time after, the Red Lodge girls were permitted to be present at an examination of this very School, and their neat appearance, orderly demeanour, and physical condition betokening abundant food, might naturally have excited envy in the minds of these parents, and regret that their children had not been placed where they could enjoy similar advantages. Instead of this the mothers afterwards expressed to one of the Committee the gratitude they felt when they looked at the fifty poor girls in the Reformatory, that their children were not, like those, prisoners. No persons have expressed greater interest in the School or desire to serve it, than these very industrious, honest, poor persons, who, it is supposed, are aggrieved by what is done to rescue these outcasts. While they acknowledge that they should gladly have secured for their children similar advantages of training and instruction, they have expressed warm satisfaction that these unfortunate children were so cared for, and have proved their sincerity by such small gifts of money or services gratuitously rendered as lay within their power. The "honest poor," daily toiling for their own children, have even a deeper feeling of compassion for these misused and neglected young creatures, than those whose social position places them entirely beyond their sphere,—and show a generous sympathy with those who are working for them. They are greatly belied in this matter.

With respect to the criminal class themselves, it is generally forgotten that those have long been living a wild and unrestrained life, prize this liberty, law-less as it is, and accompanied with every kind of privation, even more than those who are habitually accustomed to the restraints of society. This is especially the case as regards children. In the case of the parents, even where their general conduct would betoken rather brutal neglect or savage hatred, there exists also a strong instinctive affection, (if such it may be called, which would never deny itself for the future or even present good of their children), and a strong sense of the possession of property in them. These two feelings are greatly mortified by having their offspring taken forcibly from them and placed under other guardianship, however good that may be ; and when, in addition, they are compelled to pay for this unwilling abdication of nature's rights, the punishment is severely felt. A domiciliary visit to the homes of many of the Liverpool girls during the autumn, was a strong proof of this. Though the parents were generally in the lowest condition, in no one case was the removal of the daughter spoken of otherwise than as a severe domestic calamity, which, in some instances, had left permanent ill effects in the family ; at the same time grateful appreciation was expressed of the kind care bestowed on their girl, and with one exception, an earnest desire that she should not return to the scene of her misdeeds, on the expiration of her sentence. The same feeling is generally manifested in the letters to the children from their homes. But the notoriously bad woman, whose withdrawal of her daughter (not under sentence) from Red Lodge was spoken of in the last Report, writes of her children as "incarcerated in durance vile," i.e., under sentence in Reformatories, though in the same letter she says, "I should feel highly satisfied if my daughter Jane was under your kind protection ; her age is 8 years." So very great a degradation is a magisterial sentence to a Reformatory felt by those who hold a decent position in life, that some tradespeople who are utterly unable to manage an orphan child, or prevent her from being taken before the bench, begged admission for her as a volunteer, they themselves undertaking the whole cost of her maintenance, which has been faithfully paid in advance every quarter.

Nor is compulsory detention in the School less disliked by the very poor, whom some persons most erroneously suppose likely to incite their children to crime, to obtain shelter in such an asylum. Last summer a wretched little street-sweeper, having been through motives of compassion taken into domestic service, committed theft, and after a second gross and daring act of the kind, ran away. In the hope of saving her from a life of vice, she was prosecuted and placed under sentence at the Red Lodge. In a few weeks she ran away and was known to be in her miserable home. The parents absolutely refused to give her up, alleging that she had been punished for the offence by being sent to Bridewell, and that the Magistrates had no right to punish her twice for the same offence. No arguments or entreaties availed, and at that time there was no law against harbouring runaways from Reformatories. The parents preferred to keep her at home in vice and starvation. Within a week, however, she was discovered begging with the younger children, and was apprehended and sent to Bridewell, for a month, to prove to both parents and child, the power of the law. Now the poor girl is thankful for the benefits thus bestowed on her, and entreats for the admission of her younger sister:—A girl was sent a year ago to Red Lodge on conditional pardon; her former character had been very bad; after a previous imprisonment for picking pockets, she had been sentenced at Sessions to a year's imprisonment. The father is a cab-driver. The girl's improvement, and a change in his domestic circumstances, rendering it probable that she should now maintain herself honestly, she was, at his desire, recently sent home in florid health, great strength, and with respectable, useful clothing. The father thus writes after receiving her,—“I was told when she went there, she would have the best of everything; I find it quite different * * as to her living and clothing it quite disgraceful * * I have a cat in my house as better vittles every day one is left and what the child has had ever since she has been there and if I have known it she never should have went there I was quite ashamed to see her,—Please to answer this letter as soon as possible if not I have a friend that will write for me to Sir George Gray and will state to him every particular [particular?] about the child.” This shows the importance of compelling payments from parents, many of whom are living, as this one describes himself, in plenty and luxury; also it proves that such a man as the writer of this does not esteem it a boon to have his child in a Reformatory even instead of a prison, nor is the fare in it considered luxurious, or as abundant as might be enjoyed at home. The girl herself had spontaneously written the evening before she left:—“Dear Miss C., you have been very kind to me, and I am very sorry for all the trouble you have taken with me, but I hope you will forgive me. I shall be very sorry to leave you.”

The past year has not presented as great an amount of obvious progress in the order and discipline of the School as was hoped at its commencement. The School had been very rapidly increasing in numbers; and though the staff was abundantly equal in size to the number of the girls in the School, averaging a proportion of one Teacher to ten Scholars, yet the newer members of it were painfully feeling how impossible it is to imagine, without actual experience, the difficulty of inducing habits of willing obedience, on those who had never before submitted to controul.

In April, the Red Lodge Cottage was opened with four girls, and these were gradually increased, until in August they amounted to eight. For some time it was rather difficult to make these girls understand their exact position, especially as their kind Matron made them feel as a family, rather than a School; but gathering experience from every failure, a gradual improvement in tone of feeling has been manifested, until at the present time they appear quite sensible of the advantages they enjoy, and grateful for them. It is found advisable to keep these girls as much as possible distinct from those in the Red Lodge permitting them to join their former associates only on special occasions, and at the Sunday afternoon religious instruction; they have also trifling distinctions in dress, &c., which are prized by girls, and in various ways greater privileges. Thus, promotion to the Cottage is an object of great ambition, especially as it is a certain step towards being placed out at service, six having been placed out from thence on trial during the latter part of the year. This separate house affords also the very desirable power of giving a temporary home to girls who have been placed out, when obliged from ill health or other causes to leave service, without causing inconvenience in the large establishment. This has frequently been done, particularly in the case of girls who had left during the former year.

The death of two little girls before alluded to formed a solemn and important epoch in the School. The first sickened in the early spring. She was a gentle good child, beloved both by Teachers and Scholars. It appeared as if filial obedience only could have led to the theft for which she had been exposed to a public trial, for she left her mother and sister in gaol, and many were the secret tears she shed for them. She did not play with the other children, but spent her little earnings and her leisure time in knitting socks for her brothers and sisters. Her illness was long and painful. She had always taken special delight in the Word of God and in prayer, and now these were her great comfort. She was very patient and quite resigned, though she wished to live, if it should be God's will. She was tenderly nursed by a girl who was full of violent passions and vicious inclinations, but who had still a loving heart. While she was on her dying bed, the other received an unlooked for summons. She had always shown a peculiarly low, vicious nature, very lying and at times spiteful; she had been sent for arson after three months' imprisonment. She had complained of slight indisposition and had been medically treated, but expressed herself as quite able to accompany her companion on a long promised excursion. Happily this was refused. In two days peculiar symptoms appeared; she soon became senseless, and on the third day breathed her last without the slightest suffering. The dark, low expression gave way to a sweet serenity, and an almost heavenly smile diffused itself over those features which had seemed formed in earth's coarsest mould. Never did the Angel of Death release a prisoner more gently, or enter a household more benignly. "The Heavenly Father has taken your companion's spirit to Himself," was the one feeling impressed on the minds of the children. All the arrangements were so made as to inspire solemnity, without superstitious dread, into their minds. At their most earnest entreaty they carried her themselves to her grave in a quiet and beautiful cemetery at no great distance, followed by all her Teachers and school-fellows. They sang their favourite hymn, "Heaven is my home," with faltering voices round her open grave, when the solemn words of prayer had been uttered over the closed coffin, on which the falling clods had painfully resounded. The other little sufferer's end was evidently approaching; the mother of the departed one, though dwelling in the county, made no effort to give one last look at her child;—but the prison walls prevented this one from having a loving mother's arms around her; for the period of the sentence had not yet expired. The case was represented to the Secretary of State, with an earnest entreaty for pardon, and an intimation that unless that were granted speedily it would be too late. With most kind sympathy in the Home Office the prayer was granted, and within a week the poor mother's arms were around her child. She did not long survive;—her looks had said, "Now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace." The funerals were conducted with the greatest simplicity and economy, but the kindness of friends put some black crape on the children's bonnets that the solemn impression might not soon be obliterated, and a card was given to each in memory of their lost companions, with an appropriate text chosen by themselves.

These peaceful scenes of mourning were soon to be succeeded by very different ones. The Mistress, whom they greatly loved, and who had shown peculiar tact in controuling and influencing them, as well as devotion to the work, was about to leave England for a distant home. Their grief was excessive; and manifested itself in very rebellious conduct to her successor, who had been very highly recommended, but who showed herself unfit for her post, as well as utterly incapable of managing their difficult and peculiar tempers. Though another was found, who in different circumstances had shown considerable power of influencing, yet a month's misrule had sown many tares which could not easily be uprooted. Added to this, many young girls who, when they first came, had fallen into the general order, now laid aside the controul which they had at first imposed upon themselves, and displayed the natural bad dispositions which they had at first striven to conceal. This will not eventually be injurious; for it is only as the actually existing evil is fairly grappled with, that ultimate reformation can be hoped for; but for the present much trouble and inconvenience must arise when these repressed mischiefs reveal themselves. The rebellious feeling of the older girls showed itself in a tendency to abscond. A first offence of two older girls was forgiven, on their returning penitent, as well as an attempt on the part of some others, but at the end of October three of these again absconded, and when brought back in a few hours by the Police, showed such extreme violence and insubordination that it was considered necessary for the welfare of the household, as well as right for themselves, that they should be taken before the Magistrates, who sentenced them to three months' solitary confinement. These are among the painful trials connected with a Reformatory. The numberless encouraging and touching incidents which occur in it and relieve the minds and hearts of those who are giving to it their daily labour and constant watchfulness and anxiety, cannot be easily described. Nor, indeed, can a stranger enter into the joy of seeing the first awakening of true penitence, or of receiving the yearning of grateful love from these once forsaken ones. These are the soul's secret which cannot be revealed. Yet it may be mentioned what deep sympathy the children felt when they heard that the house of a mechanic, who had worked on the premises, had taken fire, his wife and children escaping utterly destitute in the middle of the night. They subscribed from their little earnings above 30s., and made a number of pretty and neat articles of clothing for the family. They felt amply rewarded by being permitted to present them when finished, and their bright looks shewed that they understood, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." The children shew great delight in their Scripture lessons, and manifest great attention during the services of religion. Many of the girls who for sometime were very unsatisfactory, now manifest an evident determination to improve; one of these, indeed, whose mother was in prison when she came in on a second offence, is now giving much satisfaction in service. Altogether it is felt that decided progress has been made in the general stability of good order and right feeling in the School; that the actual results have more than ever surpassed our hopes, and that those who are interested in the work have reason to thank God and take courage.

MARY CARPENTER,

SUPERINTENDENT.

Bristol, Feb. 3rd, 1858.

We have frequently referred in our Record to the Park Row Asylum for Hopeful Discharged Female Prisoners at Bristol. We visited this Institution last October, and were extremely pleased with its details. Our satisfaction was certainly not lessened in discovering that the Lady Superintendent is a Tipperary woman. By the way, we may add, that the master of St. James's Back is an Irishman, and the mistress of work an Irishwoman. From the Fifth Report of the Park Row Asylum, that for 1857, we extract the following:—

The Park Row Asylum, as we stated last year, is not a "Reformatory School," under the controul of Magistrates or of Government, but a Refuge where the Hopeful Discharged Female Prisoner (above sixteen years of age) enters by her own free will, at her own desire, and under a willing promise to submit to the rules of the house, whither she comes direct from Prison. She undergoes at first a probation of three weeks or a month in her dormitory, associating gradually during this time with the other inmates, first at prayer in the chapel, then at lessons, and lastly at meal times. If after the time of probation she is still willing to remain in the Asylum, she is then fully admitted, and receives the clothes of the house. Much benefit is derived from this time of semi-seclusion, as the candidate is daily visited by the Lady Superintendent, and by the Ladies of the Committee; and great moral influence is thus obtained before any free intercourse takes place with the other inmates.

The employment of the inmates consist of all sorts of household work; washing, cooking, baking, needle-work, knitting stockings and socks; boys' caps are also made. A few hours are daily devoted to religious instruction, reading, and writing; the first elements of arithmetic and geography are also taught, and singing of psalms and hymns is daily practised.

Since our last Report family washing has been taken in at the Asylum, and proves to be a healthy and remunerative work; the net produce, after deducting payments for ironers, messengers, &c., having been in less than six months £19:6:7.

Seventy-three pairs of stockings and thirty-eight pairs of socks have been knitted in the house during the year, being principally an order received from the Visiting Justices at the Bridewell, for which we return our best thanks. The profit of the knitting has been £6:12, of other work above £11, during the year.

The anniversary sermon in commemoration of the opening of the Asylum was preached in the chapel on February 1st, by the incumbent of the parish, the Rev. W. Knight.

The Rev. Walter Marriott has continued his valuable services as chaplain, officiating in the chapel on Sunday and Wednesday evenings.

The Rev. H. Montagu has also continued his visits to the Asylum in the absence or indisposition of the Chaplain, and has often very kindly conducted divine service twice on the Sunday.

With much satisfaction we may mention to our friends that on the day the anniversary sermon was preached at the Asylum a £5 note, folded up very small, was picked up by our youngest inmate, and immediately handed over to the Lady Superintendent, by whom it was restored to the owner on her calling to enquire for it a few hours afterwards.

Also a small gold brooch having been drooped by a lady, while visiting the Asylum, unknown to her, it was found by one of the inmates while cleaning the room, and given to the Lady Superintendent, who after many enquiries at last discovered the owner. These two incidents will, we trust, speak favourably of young women who may through want of education or other causes, have deviated from the paths of honesty, but who with care, kind advice, and persevering good instruction, do not prove irreclaimable. Ten young women have had respectable situations provided for them this year, and in two instances a second has been sent to the same place, at the special desire of the mistress. Of these ten not one has been accused of dishonesty, or again brought before a court of justice.

Since the opening of the Asylum forty young women have been sheltered; in this year twelve new cases have been admitted.

Seven from Bristol Gaol,

One, for a week, from Bristol Gaol,

One from Bristol Bridewell,

One from Shepton Mallet Gaol,
One from Taunton Gaol,
One from Gloucester Gaol.

Twelve have been provided for, and ten remain in the house.

At the suggestion of the Rev. W. C. Osborn, Chaplain of the Bath Gaol, an offer has been made by our Committee to leave two or four dormitories at his disposal, if sufficient subscriptions could be secured in Bath. The proposal was taken into consideration, and Mr. Osborn attended a meeting of our Committee, and expressed his hope and that of the Magistrates of Bath, that it might be so arranged, as no such institution as ours exist in Bath.

At the General Meeting of the Ladies' and Gentlemen's Committees, held on the 20th of January last, presided over by W. Miles, Esq. it was agreed to purchase a piece of ground offered for sale, at the back of the Asylum and to raise the requisite sum by donations. If a sufficient amount could not at once be obtained, it was resolved to accept a loan offered by a friend, at 4 per cent. interest, redeemable whenever funds should permit. The cost of the ground was nearly £600; donations then promised, and a few afterwards obtained, amounted to £248: 14; a loan of £340 was therefore required to effect the purchase, and has been obtained. An old house stood on the acquired premises; this after much careful thought and deliberation it was resolved to pull down, and sell the materials, thus avoiding all expenses, whether for repairs or taxes, which the low rent obtainable might not always cover; and the still more grave objection which letting might involve, namely, intrusion upon the privacy of the Asylum; the principal motive for the purchase having been to secure a large garden adjoining the Institution, for cultivation and for exercise.

Accordingly the sale was advertised in the newspapers by private tender, the Committee excluding the pumps, cisterns, outside boundary wall, and other matters which it was thought desirable to retain.

Considering the bad effect of the ensuing winter upon so old an house, as well as the danger of the lead being stolen, which had happened to some neighbouring houses, it was resolved that no time should be lost.

Mr. Tucker's offer of £60 was considered the most desirable, and we are glad to record that all the conditions named to him have been faithfully carried out; so that we have now our premises clear, surrounded by a boundary wall, and including the large addition to our garden ground, so much desired.

From the foundation of the Calder Farm Reformatory, we have placed its history and progress before our friends, and from its Second Report, that for 1857, we extract the following useful and interesting passages:—

From the last year's Report, it appears that up to 31st December, 1856, 26 boys had been received under detention; 24 more have been received up to Decr. 31st. 1857;—50 received altogether;—besides 9 not under detention, as mentioned in the last Report.

As regards Instruction, the state of the 50 was, on admission, as follows:—

15 could neither read nor write; 9 could read imperfectly, but not write; 12 could read and write imperfectly; 8 could read well, and write imperfectly; 3 could write well, and read imperfectly; 3 could read and write well.

As to social condition, 19 had lost one parent; 4 both; 27 neither. 16 were more or less without parental control; 21 had drunken or otherwise disreputable parents. As to age, 21 were under,—29 above—14 years. Of the 50 received, 1 absconded immediately after admission. Since the last Report it has been ascertained that this boy was re-convicted at Liverpool, and sentenced to penal servitude. 7 were removed to other Schools, by order of the Secretary of State, viz.:—2 to Market Weighton; 1 to Carlisle; 4 to the Reformatory Ship, Akbar, Liverpool. 42 belong to the School 31st December, 1857, making with 1 not under detention, 43—the present number.

Of moral results, it is yet premature to say much. The earliest admission of a boy under detention, dates from March 19th, 1856. The periods of detention vary from 2 to 5 years, the average being above 4. Hence, no boy under detention has yet been placed out. The Managers believe that the improvement apparent in many of the boys, will justify an application to the Secretary of State for their discharge before their full period of detention shall have expired. But they feel it incumbent on them to exercise the utmost caution in thus seeking to shorten the time during which boys are committed to their care. In all attempts to infuse good moral and religious principles, time is requisite that they be thoroughly wrought into the character, so as to be acted upon habitually, and withstand temptation. Time is needed, even when the seed is sown in soil under favourable conditions, to bring it to maturity; much more is it needed when, as in the Reformatory School, the fallow ground has to be broken up, and weeds resulting from long neglect, bad counsel, or worse example, have to be eradicated.

On the other hand, as soon as there is reasonable ground to hope that a boy's good impressions are confirmed, and he shews himself trustworthy, handy, and likely to be useful to an employer, it is desirable that he should be placed out, both to make room for others, and that he may get into the way of earning his livelihood more independently; and also on higher moral grounds,—to test and strengthen his good principles by engaging in the actual conflict of life.

The object sought in the School is to prepare him for this conflict, not by cutting off all access of temptation, but by letting the trial come upon him by degrees, as he seems able to bear it. Kept at first under strict surveillance, he is gradually, as he shews himself worthy of confidence, trusted out of sight, sent on errands to less or greater distances, entrusted with money, &c. In no instance of the last kind, and very rarely in any other, has the confidence thus reposed been abused. One boy thus employed, having found half-a-sovereign which had been accidentally dropped, immediately brought it, though his office as messenger gave him peculiar facilities for otherwise disposing of it, and though he was a boy of whom his master before he came, said, that he could not trust him with anything.

In order more fully to carry out the principle of gradual re-admission to the temptations and responsibilities of common life, a very useful discretionary power has been vested in the Managers of Reformatory Schools, by the Act of last Session (20 and 21 VICT. c. 55). By § 13 of this Act, they are empowered, when a boy shall have been half his term in the School, to place him with an employer for a month on trial, before applying for his absolute discharge; retaining, during that period, the same power over him, in case of misconduct, as if he were in the School; and the power to recall him in case he should prove unfit for the situation, or it for him.

There are several boys to whom, during the ensuing year, this course would be applicable; and a most valuable service would be rendered by any one who would kindly look out for suitable situations for them,—particularly as farm servants,—and would communicate thereupon with the Head Master.

The chief employment in the School is farm and garden labour, and the boys are found, with scarcely an exception, to take to it, with a cheerfulness and heartiness which, considering the very different course of life which most of them had previously led, is surprising and most encouraging. Willingness to work may be said to characterize the School as a whole; and new-comers, though often lazily inclined, catch, more or less quickly, the prevailing habit.

From the first, each boy was allowed to have a small garden of about 2 perches, to be cultivated by him, in his play time, for his own advantage. Several felt the benefit of this so much, that they applied to have more land, paying rent for it. This was allowed on certain conditions, as to good cultivation, &c., and at the rate of 6d. a perch, or £4 an acre. Three-fourths of an acre have been occupied in that way since the harvest.

The chief characteristics of the criminal class being indolence and the reckless expending of their unlawful acquisitions on immediate sensual gratification,—this small allotment system affords a direct corrective, in that it requires and habituates them to labour and forego present gratification (except that found in work itself when freely undertaken), with a view to a remote future benefit;—a step, less trifling perhaps than it may seem, towards initiation into that course of discipline which this life is designed to be to them and to all.

The more immediate advantage is considerable. The boys, having a direct personal interest in the bit of ground, and the little agricultural operations thereon, which they feel to be their own, acquire a general interest in such operations, which carries them on when working for the School, and tends to form in them that real liking for work, and that notion of doing something for themselves, which are such valuable characteristics of the honest labourer. The last—the sense of independence—is one which requires the greatest care to foster, as it might otherwise be weakened, in an institution where, from the nature of the case, much must necessarily be done for the inmates.

The work done by them for the School is as follows:—It is found that, taking the average of the older and younger boys, each one digs over, during the working day of eight hours, of the land in occupation, which is moderately light, from 4 to 7 perches, according to its previous state of cultivation, and the depth required for the intended crop.

In the Spring of the present year, 29 acres of land were taken, in addition to that previously occupied by the School, making in all—36A. 2R. 26P.

This has been cropped as follows.—Wheat, 8 acres and 3 roods; Beans, 1 acre and 1 rood; Barley, 1 acre and 1 rood; Oats, 3 acres; Clover, 4 acres and 2 roods; Potatoes, 3 acres and 2 roods; Turnips, 2 acres and 2 roods; Mangold, 2 acres and 2 roods; Lucerne, 1 acre; Scotch and other Cabbages, 3 roods; Carrots and Parsnips, 2 roods; General Garden Crops—Beans, Peas, Onions, &c., 2 acres; Boys' Gardens, 26 perches; Pasture, 3 acres; Meadow, 2 acres.

On entry to the new land, $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres of it were sown with wheat, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ acres in clover. During the season, all the rest was sown, and all the crops gathered, by the boys, under the charge of an additional Labour Master for the farm, with these exceptions. On taking the additional land, it was thought advisable to keep one horse for carting coals, manure, &c. It seemed also desirable that boys intended chiefly for farm labour, should learn to attend a horse. The season being advanced when the additional land was taken in hand, horse labour was used to some extent in getting in the seed. The hay and the first crop of clover was also mown by hired men, the boys being employed in making hay for hire on neighbouring farms. The second crop of clover was, however, mown by them, and all the other work of the farm done.

Since harvest, fifteen acres have been dug over by them, in preparation for the Spring; in addition to 14A. 1A. 26P. prepared and sown with Winter crops.

The School was visited during the Spring by M. de Metz, who spent a day in examining it with the minute attention to details suggested by his vast experience; and who says of it, in a letter since received—

“Compliment apart, I declare to you that it seems to me impossible to be placed under conditions more favourable to success, either as regards the choice of your Head Master, or of local position.”

To this strong testimony as regards the Head Master, the Managers add their own, founded on another year's experience of his efficiency; and also express their great satisfaction with the way in which the Schoolmaster, Mr. Crowther, and the two Labour Masters, have performed their duties.

From the Cork Examiner of April 2nd. we take the following report and Editorial notice. This is really to advance, it is the true way by which to succeed in juvenile Reformation and protection, it is the heart and soul of the Reformatory system—The Patronage Society.

BENEVOLENT APPRENTICING SOCIETY.

The first annual meeting of this Society was held yesterday, at twelve o'clock, in the Dispensary House, Grand Parade. Amongst the gentlemen present were, John F. Maguire, M.P., N. Mahony, Isaac Julian, Professor England, Dr. O'Connor, Dr. Townsend, Robert Scott, George Purcell, W. P. Harris, Edmond M'Carthy, R. J. O'Shaughnessy, Thomas Hayes, Patrick Hegarthy, James Hogg, J. T. Cleary, G. Smith, William D'Esterre Parker, Thomas Gallwey, &c.

On the motion of Dr. O'Connor, seconded by Mr. N. Mahony, the chair was taken by.

MR. WM. PRITTIE HARRIS.

Mr. R. J. O'Shaughnessy read the following:—

Report of the Committee of the Benevolent Apprenticing Society for the year ending 31st March, 1858.

In making their first annual report, the Committee of the "Benevolent Apprenticing Society" have great pleasure in being able to congratulate the subscribers on the complete success of their humble undertaking. About twelve months since, a few gentlemen acquainted with the condition of the orphan children reared in the workhouse, their good conduct and intelligence while in school, and their exposure to contamination should they pass to the able-bodied class, conceived the idea of apprenticing these children, while they were still innocent, and of becoming their guardians for a few years, till their acquaintance with the world might enable them to act for themselves. This proposal being warmly advocated by the local press, was readily adopted by the citizens of Cork and its vicinity, and a sufficient sum of money to carry out its objects was soon subscribed.—However, it must be admitted, that many who aided the undertaking, despaired of its success, from a conviction that boys reared in comparative idleness would not be got to submit to systematic labour. We are happy to be enabled to state, that this very natural apprehension has been proved, by experience, to be groundless. Of twenty-one boys apprenticed more than twelve months since, not a single complaint has been hitherto made by their masters. In one instance two apprentices suffered great privations, their master being reduced by domestic misfortune, from comparative affluence to distress. Nevertheless, they were willing to bear everything rather than return to the workhouse, even for the short time in which we might procure for them another master, such was the spirit of independence created in these boys by so short an experience of its value.

These facts are creditable to the guardians for the excellent training and education which procured these results; and they put bevond question the practicability, as well as benevolence, of this society. It is probable, however, that slight differences which occasionally arose between master and apprentice would have passed into one open rupture, but for the interference of members of the committee, whose visit at once reconciled the parties. This practice of visiting the homes of the apprentices periodically, we consider the main feature of utility in the society. It ensures justice from the master, and tends to control the conduct of the apprentice, as much by respect for his benefactor, as by his advice and counsel.

This duty has hitherto devolved on a few, but in future it is proposed that it be divided between the whole committee, each two members undertaking the patronage of a certain number of apprentices; and we are convinced that any trouble resulting to them will be compensated by the pleasure of witnessing so much good realised at so small a cost.

Seeing the good which has already resulted from this experiment, we would recommend that a similar effort should be made to rescue the Female Orphans from the lethargy, which a long residence in a workhouse is sure to generate. That they are entitled to consideration at our hands is proved by the fact, that the Inspector of National Schools was so pleased with their answering at a recent examination, that he selected four of their number to become Mistresses of National Schools. Whether the remainder, nearly their equals in school learning, and not their inferiors in good conduct, shall remain prisoners for life in a Workhouse, or purchase their liberty at the expense of virtue, or wait for the arrival of some speculator from Caffraria or Australia to export them as live stock useful to the new colony, depends upon the subscribers to this Society.

The Committee are confident, that by a little personal exertion on the part of some few ladies, aided by a small pecuniary assistance from the Society, many of those children will find a virtuous home in their own country, where their intelligence and industry, as in the case of the boys, may reward the benevolence that gives them shelter. The details of this plan will be submitted by a member of the Committee.

If we failed in everything else, we have succeeded in conferring a good name, not undeserved, on the poor children of the workhouse; and if without it the highest in rank are degraded, and the most successful in trade are sure to decay, how can the poor rise out of the difficulties which surround them, when divested of it?

We might urge many arguments derived from principles of economy, to recommend the objects of this Society to public notice, namely, the cost of support in a workhouse, the cost of emigration or the cost of punishing or reforming a criminal; but we would prefer that the citizens of Cork should have the full credit of uniting, from feelings of Christian philanthropy, unmixed even with justifiable selfishness; and we feel confident that from this motive alone, sufficient charity will flow to confer on the Society ample funds for its objects.

Mr. Maguire said that he had been just called upon to propose the adoption of the report; but so full was it of information and of interest, that it really left nothing for him to add. However, he might be permitted to express his satisfaction at the authoritative proclamation of the fact, which the experience of the last twelve months had established, that although a poor child might have been reared in a workhouse, he yet was not entirely beyond the pale of society, or the hope of social redemption (hear, hear). There was at that moment, and had been for some time, a general and earnest feeling throughout the city, and amongst all classes of its citizens, in favour of Reformatories—a feeling most creditable to the citizens of Cork (hear, hear), who did not despair of redeeming the criminal child, and restoring him to society as a useful and valuable member. And, surely, if they did not despair of reforming the child who had fallen into crime, there was no reason to doubt of the social redemption of the child whose only crime was his poverty, caused perhaps by the loss of a parent, and not by any fault of his own (hear, hear). Crime brought one child to the reformatory; poverty brought the other to the workhouse. They did not despair of the criminal; why, then, despair of the pauper (cries of “hear, hear”)? On every ground, of common sense, economy, humanity, and charity, he was of opinion that the Benevolent Apprenticing Society was one of the most useful, practical, and benevolent institutions that could possibly have been organised in the city. It was right to make some effort to prove that a residence in a workhouse, often compulsory, was not degrading and debasing, or that it unfitted the child for any useful or creditable occupation. The moment the human plant, that was feeble and declining in the barren soil and uncongenial atmosphere of a workhouse, was transplanted to the vigorous soil and the genial atmosphere of freedom, it was certain to expand, and develop itself in health, in strength, and in energy (cries of “hear, hear”). For his part, he had always maintained the opinion, both at the Board of Guardians and elsewhere, that the best money expended was that expended in the industrial and literary education of the children in the workhouse (hear, hear). Some persons might cry out for economy when an attempt was made to improve the training of those children; but the economy which would reduce the number of schoolmasters or schoolmistresses, was a criminal economy,—it was folly—it was madness—it was an injury to the children, an injury to the ratepayers, and a heavy infliction on society (applause). The more that was done to form their habits, to improve their morals, and to add to their knowledge, the more certainly were they rendered discontented with their dependant position, the more anxious were they to leave the house, and, once having quitted its walls, the more determined were they to remain outside, supported by their own industry (hear, hear). The fact that some of the twenty-one boys who had been rescued from the workhouse by the society, had submitted to the severest privations, and perhaps to the harshness or even the tyranny of those to whom they had been apprenticed, proved their anxiety to leave the workhouse. If indeed our respected secretary reported the same of those boys who had not turned out well—if he had to say that there had been four, or six, or even ten failures, we should not still have been surprised, nor ought we have been disappointed (hear, hear); we should have attributed those failures to the imperfection of our common nature. But there has not been a failure at all (hear, hear). The masters were not perfect, nor were the boys angels; still there was not a single instance in which the society had to record a failure. Under those circumstances, the report was the most cheering that could by possibility be presented to the society; and with such a report before them, the public were bound to assist the present effort, and, by contributions as well as by active co-operation, advance the objects of the society (hear, hear).

Mr. Thomas Hayes briefly seconded the adoption of the report, which was unanimously carried.

Mr. Robert Scott said he had been requested to propose that "The thanks of this meeting are due to the committee for the past year for the attention which they have given to the business of the society, and for the exertions which they have so successfully made to effect the objects for which the society was constituted." It was scarcely necessary for him to say anything in support of that resolution. The report which had been read, spoke sufficiently of the efforts made by the committee; and the success that attended those exertions was a matter of congratulation, and should excite the public to a deeper and greater interest in so laudable an institution (hear, hear). It was a very pleasing fact that after having apprenticed twenty-one poor children, none of them had acted in a way to bring discredit upon themselves or upon those who had taken an interest in them (hear, hear). If twenty-one of a better class of children were apprenticed, it would not be surprising if they turned out unsatisfactory, and when they found a number of boys, who were confined for a considerable period in a workhouse, distributed amongst different parties, and all turn out well, it spoke very highly not only for themselves, but for the description of training that fitted them to fill their situations. The humbler persons were, the more ought their desire for advancement be encouraged (hear, here). The society was worthy the regard of every benevolent person in Cork, and Cork was famous for the exercise of benevolence. There was scarcely any cause worthy of support, that was not assisted (hear). He was sure then the object of the society required only to be known to command a larger share of public interest and subscriptions. He need scarcely dwell upon the importance of taking young persons out of the workhouse and placing them in a position of making a livelihood for themselves and becoming respectable members of society (hear). After some further remarks, Mr. Scott concluded by moving the resolution.

Mr. George Purcell seconded it.

It was carried unanimously.

Dr. Townsend said he had been requested to propose that the following gentlemen be the committee for the coming year:—T. G. French, president; R. J. O'Shaughnessy, Hon. Sec.; J. England, Dr. W. C. Townsend, I. Julian, T. Hayes, P. Hegarty, G. Purcell, T. Gallwey, N. Mahony, Francis Lyons, Dr. O'Connor, and Alderman Robert Scott." After the able speeches the meeting had heard, he need not say a word. Any one conversant with the interior of a workhouse must perceive with great satisfaction the prospect of getting the little boys out of it. He hoped an effort would be shortly made in behalf of the girls as well (hear). He could not see what crime it was to be poor, and he did not see why any one of these poor little boys should not aspire to high positions (hear, hear).

Professor England seconded the proposition which was carried.

Mr. Mahony stated that last year the sum of £90 was expended, leaving a balance of £60. This balance would not exactly pay the instalments coming on, but they would not be due before the end of two years.

Mr. Maguire—What is the amount of the fee?

Mr. Mahony—£5.

Mr. Maguire—Are they all at mechanical employments?

Mr. Mahony—Yes; we have got no suitable offers for farmers.

Mr. Maguire—Mr. Parker says he could get a few on board the Wizard. I got eight or nine from the Dungarvan workhouse on board her.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy—And there were six from our own workhouse.

Mr. Mahony thought that the boys who Mr. Maguire got engaged had a special advantage over the boys of the Cork workhouse.

Mr. Maguire—Well, they were certainly the sons of fishermen.

Mr. Mahony—They weigh the boys before they take them on board those vessels. Mr. French got a little fellow engaged, by putting a piece of lead in his trowsers in order that he might weigh heavier (great laughter). Mr. Mahony continued to say that it was the intention of the society to take up the girls, and they hoped to be able to hire them out as servants by the intervention of the ladies of Cork, whose aid the society solicited (hear, hear). There was to be an examination of the girls on Thursday, at which there would be a large attendance of ladies, and he was certain the moment they saw the little girls, so clean and nice, they would forward the view of the society, (hear, hear).

Mr. Hogg said there was a great want of domestic servants, and from what had been seen and heard of the boys, he was sure any effort to advance the girls would be successful. There was no employment that could be obtained but that contemplated, every mechanical business, such as shirt making, being done away with. He (Mr. Hogg) knew the men to whom the boys had been engaged, and he could say it authoritatively that it was surprising there should be no complaint.

Dr. O'Connor—Though we could not say there was no fault on the part of the boys, still there was no fault on the part of the men, perhaps owing to misfortune. We do not wish to overstate things.

Mr. Mahony said there would not be the same liability of failure on the part of the masters in future as there had been at first, because they were then afraid of the boys.

Mr. Julian—Indeed they turned out better than ourselves expected.

Mr. Mahony—As to the girls, a committee of the Guardians have it in contemplation to give the children of two years old, or just weaned, to well conducted girls in the first class to take as nurselings, and by that means they will be habituated to the care of young children (hear, hear). The particulars have not been arranged yet. There must be a ward for these girls. With regard to the male and female schools, the Christian Brothers are, I believe, the best, but I have never seen a poor school to equal the workhouse schools (hear, hear). As for the funds I have no fear on that point. There were many places that we did not go to at all last year, for instance, the Weigh-house, a very liberal place; and then we did not ask the professional gentlemen living on the South Mall.

Mr. Smith was pleased that the girls had been taken up by the society, for he perceived by the new law that when they came to the age of 15 they were obliged to leave with the able-bodied. This, therefore, was the time to make exertions, previous to the law being carried out.

Dr. O'Connor said he thought that even if the poor law gave the Guardians the power of apprenticing the children, the present charitable and benevolent system was better (hear, hear). It would raise the society beyond mere legislature. Still the poor law was undoubtedly charitable in the extreme. It was written over the work-house entrance, "no man need starve"; it was the citadel of the poor man; the place where the old man may obtain an asylum, where young women could be reared without contamination, where the sick are received and treated admirably (hear). Therefore, the poor law was a grand institution and failed only in one point, and here the society stepped in, and showed that poor children were not out of the pale of society because they were in the workhouse. The training of those children was admirable, but it would be fruitless had not the society stepped in. The ship-builder erected the ship but had not prepared anything to launch her—so the young inmates of the workhouse were trained by excellent instructors, but nothing was done to launch them into society (hear, hear). He was convinced the expenditure this year would be much less than that of last. The guardians would, he was sure, clothe the children to be apprenticed not in paupers' clothing, but as became young persons entering into life. It was the intention to place the girls in respectable tradesmen's families for twelve months without any wages, and ladies would visit them frequently, and ascertain how they conducted themselves. It was a source of astonishment that the farmers did not apply for the boys, because they would be most useful to them, both in keeping their accounts and instructing their children.

Mr. Mahony—The farmers are proverbially slow. Mr. Mahony then stated that last year there were only fifteen guardians on the subscribers' list, but at the board meeting on Wednesday he got eleven new subscribers.

Mr. Hogg—Allow me to ask whether you apply for a donation or subscription?

Mr. Mahony—A donation.

Dr. O'Connor—But it is virtually a subscription.

Mr. Maguire—What is the average cost of maintaining a pauper in the workhouse?

Mr. Mahony—£7 a-year; but that is exclusive of general charges.

Mr. Gallwey having taken the second chair, thanks were given to Mr. Harris, and the meeting adjourned.

THE Benevolent Apprenticing Society has already successfully vindicated its claim to the support of the citizens of Cork, whether they are likely to be influenced by mere motives of prudence and economy, or animated by the loftiest impulses of charity and benevolence. It has already rescued 21 boys from the moral stagnation and social death of the workhouse, and added them as so many useful and self-supporting members to the community. It has rescued these 21 children from the dismal fate that awaited them the moment they reached a certain age, and were drafted from the juvenile to the adult class; and it has relieved the rate-payers of the burden of their support, not for a single year, but in all probability for ever. We admit this latter is the smallest consideration with us; still we by no means deny its importance as an element in the consideration of the rate-payer, and upon pecuniary grounds. For instance, the annual cost of supporting these 21 boys was, at £8 a-head, £168. This cost was, as a matter of course, supplied out of the rates levied on the industry and property of the union, or electoral division, as the case may have been. Let us suppose that no such attempt had been made as that which has turned out so successfully. The result would have been simply this—that these 21 boys would have grown up in apathetic idleness, demoralised and contaminated by association with the broken down class technically termed able-bodied; and that ten years might have past over their heads before they relieved the rate-payers of the burden of their support. What would the cost of their support for these ten years have been? No less a sum than £1,680! Even if they remained but five years in the workhouse, the cost of their support, in food and clothing, would be £840. And yet, for a present outlay of £2 or £3 a-head, these boys have been removed from the heavily burdened shoulders of the rate-payers, and planted firmly on their own legs, as self-supporting members of the community. Here, at once, is an economical, a social, and a moral result of the highest importance to the individual, to the rate-payer, and to society. But let the promoters of this wise and most benevolent scheme be supplied with additional means of usefulness, and they will be enabled to diminish the load of the rate-payer's burden in a far greater degree, and add many more members to the ranks of reproductive industry. For every shilling they receive, they will return twenty shillings to the community. Like good seed in a rich soil, it will be certain to bring forth an abundant harvest. Even then, were it only on economical grounds, the society ought to be zealously supported by the public. But read the report, and see how faithfully these 21 poor boys have repaid the prudent bounty of their benefactors. In all cases they have done well—in some instances gallantly battling with misery and privation, the result of depression of trade, and dearth of employment. Now, let us ask, could more than this be said for the sons of people in decent circumstances—for boys delicately brought up, and carefully trained under the eyes of anxious and vigilant parents? Would there have been no single failure in their case? Surely, this almost miraculous success of an experiment which even the sanguine regarded with anxiety, ought to remove all further doubt from the mind of the public, and satisfy them that here is a practical means of diminishing the dead load of pauperism, and preventing the fatal growth of the pauper child into the pauper adult. It will be seen that the same plan is about being adopted with the female children of the house; and that, in order to render the experiment as certain as possible of success, a probationary training, suited for the future child's maid and domestic servant, is to be given in the establishment, so soon as arrangements to that effect can be carried out. There is one feature, however, in the scheme which we must not omit to notice—namely, the watchful care of the Society over the apprentice during the most trying period of his career—the influence which its members exercise upon the conduct of the master towards the apprentice—and the consciousness that the latter is made to have of his not being without kind and anxious friends in the world. In all other respects the scheme is wise, practical, and humane,—here it rises to the lofty height of Christian charity. We shall only add this single remark, that if the juvenile criminal be worthy, as he clearly is, of the sympathy and succour of the benevolent, who contrive all kinds of institutions for his conversion and restoration to the paths of virtue and the ways of industry; the poor child, who has never committed any offence whatever, and whose only crime is his poverty or his state of orphanage, is not the less worthy of sympathy and succour; and that, of the two, the innocent and guiltless child has the stronger claim upon the assistance and protection of the community.

CERTIFIED INDUSTRIAL AND RAGGED SCHOOLS.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 31st day of December, 1857, by the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education.

Their Lordships having had under consideration the Acts of Parliament relative to Reformatory Schools; viz. :—

17 & 18 Vict. c. 86,
18 & 19 Vict. c. 87,
19 & 20 Vict. c. 109,
20 & 21 Vict. c. 55;

also the acts relative to Industrial Schools; viz. :—

17 & 18 Vict. c. 74 (Scotland),
20 & 21 Vict. c. 48 (England and Wales.)—

Resolved,—

1. To cancel the Minute dated 2nd June, 1856, except so far as that schools already receiving aid under it might continue to do so on the same conditions until the 31st March, 1859, but no longer.

2. That after 31 March, 1859, no Reformatory School certified under the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86, should receive grants (except as provided in the 9th section below), from the Parliamentary Fund administered by the Committee of Council on Education, but that Industrial Schools certified under the Acts 20 & 21 Vict. c. 48, or 17 and 18 Vict. c. 74, and Ragged Schools, might be aided on the conditions set forth in the rest of this present Minute.

3. That their Lordships are prepared to consider applications for certifying Industrial Schools pursuant to the Industrial Schools' Act, 1857.

4. That the promoters of Ragged Schools, in applying for aid under this Minute, must state in detail:

Within what local limits they expect to gather scholars.

What day schools of the ordinary kind are maintained, or are about to be maintained, by charitable subscriptions for the education of children of the labouring and other poorer classes within the same limits. The name and address of a correspondent must be given for each school.

Why the school now proposed to the Committee of Council should be a Ragged School rather than one of the ordinary kind, and why it will not be likely to injure any of the day schools just named.

A map marked so as to illustrate the answers to these inquiries should be transmitted if possible.

5. That Ragged Schools must fulfil the following conditions:—

The title of Ragged School, or some other equivalent name of distinction, must be retained.

Both scholastic and industrial instruction must be given.

No fees must be received from any child attending the school or any of the classes.

Accurate accounts must be kept of all receipts and expenditure; and if the managers attempt other objects besides the daily instruction of children, the expenditure upon such other objects, and upon the instruction, must be separately stated.

The managers must certify and the inspector must report that adequate means are taken to confine the children attending the school to that class which cannot be associated with the children of respectable labouring men; that reading, writing, and arithmetic (as far as the first four rules, simple and compound), are well taught in the school; and that its discipline and moral influence are such as are calculated to benefit the special class of scholars.

6. Certified Industrial and Ragged Schools may receive grants equal per annum to—

One-half of the rent of the premises in which industrial instruction is carried on;

One third of the cost of tools and of raw material for labour;

Five shillings per annum per industrial scholar according to the average number under industrial instruction throughout the year preceding the date of inspection.

The ordinary rate for the purchase of books, maps, and apparatus;

The ordinary rate in augmentation of any certified teacher's salary.

Teachers in workhouse schools, who are rated in the first division of competency, and who, during the last three preceding years, shall have served continuously in such schools with rating not below competency, may take rank without further examination in Ragged or in certified Industrial Schools as certificated teachers, and may in those schools, but in none other, receive such augmentation as their salaries justify, on the usual conditions, up to £20.

Teachers who are at this date employed in Ragged or Industrial Schools, may obtain the like privilege by passing an examination equal to the rating of competency in workhouse schools, provided that the inspector has reported favourably of their schools during each of three consecutive years.

7. That in schools certified under the Acts 20 & 21 Vict. c. 48, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 74, there might be granted, in addition to the foregoing forms of aid,—

The sum of £5 for every child received during the year preceding the date of inspection into the establishment, under an order of the justices for its permanent detention, or who shall have been detained therein under such an order throughout the whole of the same year.

The sum of £40 or, in the case of females, £27 in respect of every person boarded, lodged, and trained as a teacher therein during the year preceding the date of inspection, on the following conditions:—

(1) That the school contain at least 40 inmates.

(2.) That Her Majesty's Inspector make a favourable report upon the means of training and upon the candidates presented by the managers for admission. The candidates will be examined for admission by the inspector in reading, in writing from dictation, and in the first four rules of arithmetic, simple and compound. The inspector will also report upon the apparent fitness of the candidates in respect of age, previous employment, manners, and physical strength, for the duties of a teacher in Reformatory or Industrial Schools. Candidates must have completed their 18th year.

(3.) That the payments may, on the recommendation of Her Majesty's Inspector, be continued for a second year, but that no fractional payment be allowed.

(4.) That teachers so trained may, on taking service in a Ragged or in a certified Industrial School, and after passing before the inspector, upon the papers given to workhouse school teachers, an examination equal to the rating of competency, receive augmentation pursuant to Section 6 (f), supra.

8. That all examinations and inspections made in pursuance of this Minute be, as a general rule, referred to such of Her Majesty's Inspectors as are charged with the inspection of workhouse schools.

9. That Reformatory Schools certified under the Act 17 & 18 Vic. c. 86, be allowed to have the benefit of Section 7 of this Minute so far as it relates to the reception of candidates for training as teachers; the inspector of prisons discharging the same functions as are thereby assigned to the inspector of schools, and making a report to the Secretary of State for transmission to the Committee of Council.

10. That grants for building Ragged Schools be made on the usual terms, so long as they provide for daily instruction only, or for daily instruction in a measure greatly beyond the accommodation for lodging, which latter must not be enough to characterize the buildings as other than those for a daily school.

Grants for building schools intended to be certified under the Industrial Schools' Act, will also be made, on the usual terms as regards the previous approval of plans, specifications, estimates, title, and conveyance in trust, and at a rate not exceeding half the approved expenditure, nor £30 per bed for which proper space is provided.

Grants will be made for building, (instead of an allowance for rent) in those cases only where the permanent provision of premises appears to be thoroughly adequate, and where circumstances in all respects are favourable to the undertaking.

Since the publication of our last Record we received the Rev. John Clay's final Report as Chaplain of the Preston House of Correction; he has retired from his office after thirty-six years of duty, discharged with an enlightened zeal which made him the most useful as he was the most distinguished of those able men holding the posts of Prison Chaplains. Mr. Frederick Hill, in his invaluable work on Crime, designates Mr. Clay, "the zealous, benevolent, and able chaplain of the prison at Preston." No description could be more true; no man has done more to aid us in solving the difficulties connected with prison discipline and the sources of crime than Mr. Clay, and he retires from his chaplaincy regretted and respected by all in these kingdoms who are interested in the noble work to which his life and genius were devoted. What he has done for social science we shall show in the next number of THE IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW. South tells us, "that which makes the clergy glorious is to be knowing in their profession, unspotted in their lives, active and laborious in their charges; and lastly, to be gentle, courteous, and compassionate to all. These are our rolls and our maces, our escutcheons and highest titles of honour"—such a man as this was and is the Reverend John Clay.

The following, from The Southern Reporter of April 9th, will show how actively the ladies have taken up the Reformatory question in Cork:—

BENEVOLENT APPRENTICING SOCIETY.

Upon yesterday the inspection and examination of the most advanced class of female orphans in the workhouse, was held. The extreme inclemency of the weather prevented the attendance of the ladies and gentlemen who so kindly interest themselves for these dependent and friendless young girls, from being so general as no doubt it otherwise would have been, but notwithstanding so serious a drawback, there was still a very considerable number present. Amongst the ladies were the Lady Mayoress, Mrs. N. Mahony, Mrs. Maguire, sen.; Mrs. W.C. Townsend, Mrs. O'Brien, Miss Donegan, &c. His Worship the Mayor and several members of the committee and other gentlemen attended, and evinced deep interest in the undertaking. Some erroneous feeling appears to have deterred many from visiting the workhouse. A doubt as to the admissability of strangers in the first place presented itself, but the principal repugnance no doubt arose, and even had most control over, the sensibilities of the kind and tender hearted, that they would in their visit discern so much misery which they could not relieve, and be brought in contact with such squalid and miserable beings as would disgust and pain them without being of the slightest avail or benefit to any one. This, at least as far as the juvenile class, that is those under fifteen years of age, is concerned, is quite a mistake. And so far from their condition and their appearance in their school room, leaving an uneasy or painful recollection, we heard upon every side expressions of pleased surprise, at the cheerful looks, the invariably excellent demeanour, the strict neatness of attire, and the intelligence of the children. The ladies were undisguisedly gladdened by the sight, so different from that which they may have anticipated, and, indeed, even the heart of that symbol of moroseness and discontent, "a rate-payer," would have been as light as he represents his purse to have become, had he seen how much contentment and real usefulness had been produced by his money. The school-room, which is a very large oblong department, divided by a barrier in the middle, contained 220 children, ranging from the ages of three to fifteen years. They sat in their places according to their classes, at the left of the entrance, the other division being set apart for the visitors and those under examination. The walls were, in honour of the occasion, festooned with laurels and evergreens, and over the door the word "Welcome" was neatly executed by those for whom we trust a hopeful future will date from this much-desired visit. The pleased and bright looks of the children, who seemed quite to appreciate what was going forward, relieved them from any appearance of forced constraint; yet they preserved the most complete order and unbroken silence, except when at the desire of their teachers, they stood up in file, and then their wooden shoes pattered along the floor as they marched off to be examined. One or two of the very young infants fell asleep, and we noticed that then the nearest class-fellow quietly and fondly wrapped its tiny arms about the little sleeper, and, although scarcely bigger than its nurseling, watched over its repose with all the gravity and affection of a parent. The greatest goodwill and generosity seems to exist among the pupils, and having drawn experience from the bitterest teachings of adversity, they have learned the worth of every little act of kindness, were it only conveyed in a gentle look or word. One of the assistant schoolmistresses, who seemed the personification of good humour herself, and who had an encouraging whisper for each of her little charge, pointed out one strong example of the yearning for the bonds of relationship which nature has implanted in our breasts. Two little girls, of about five years of age, were sitting side by side, very neat and happy, and apparently in love with each other, and such we found was indeed the case. They were both christened "Minnie," and although without any tie of kindred to bind them, save that they were both orphans, they have become so devoted to each other, that they are inseparable, at school or at play, bed or board. Providence has found even for these lone ones some compensation for the want of that fatherly protection and mother's love which they have never known.

The principal class consisted of nineteen girls, all approaching the prescribed age of fifteen, when they must be transferred to another part of the Asylum, away from their innocent companions and friends. They were ranged in a semicircle fronting the visitors, and Mr. O'Brien, Poor Law Inspector, clearly and cleverly tested their acquirements in the various branches of their educational course. In short, it was quite evident that they had received a well grounded, solid, English education. Some specimens of the writing were particularly beautiful, and such as the first in the land might be satisfied to emulate. In arithmetic also they displayed very considerable proficiency. The head teacher, who in turn examined them, and appeared most solitious to advance her pupils in position, as she had already to her credit, improved them by her instructions, informed the ladies that several of the girls embroidered and worked in a very superior manner. These girls then left the room, and after a few minutes the audience was invited to their laundry: where they were busily engaged in the different operations of washing their clothes, ironing them, &c., doing their work assiduously and tidily. Some junior classes were afterwards examined, but for the present we shall confine our remarks to those whose fortunes are peculiarly concerned. There appear to us two great reasons which should induce employers to take these girls into their service: first, because they will, by so doing, consult their own interest; and secondly, because they will be conferring an immense benefit upon those whom they release from living to maturity, and, perhaps old age, in the workhouse. It is for the good of one desiring a capable and quiet servant to have a person trained to do everything by rule, and at all times to be orderly and neat; and the long habit of acting at once upon being directed, has made them docile and attentive. We need not dilate upon the advantages which they must possess from their excellent education, which is such as may be looked for in vain in any ordinary servant. We are assured that equal reliance may be placed upon the excellence of their moral characters; indeed these orphans have, in many instances, been reared from the cradle in the workhouse, and have not been subject even to the chance of vicious companionship or the contamination of evil advisers. But were the value of these candidates for employment less approved than it is, yet their position should move the benevolent even at a risk to make an effort to protect them from the trials which they must otherwise now be subjected to. We have not overcoloured the amiability, skill, or good conduct of these young creatures, who are inmates of a workhouse without any fault of theirs, and were they always to remain amongst their present associates, although their energies might be thrown away, yet they might escape from the more dreadful evils which now, if they be not employed, will beset them. According to law they must at fifteen pass into the division of "able-bodied paupers." These are the originals from whom every picture of the vice, sloth, filth, and ignorance that surround the professional vagrant has been drawn. Thanklessly and doggedly they go to the workhouse as a lair in which they may escape from the cold and hunger of the sharp winter days, but they will be away, as incorrigible vagabonds as ever, to tramp and thief through the long days of summer. There are fearful wards in this part of the house, to which the dark destiny of the orphan girls will probably lead them, if they be not now assisted. The companionship of such coarse and violent women must soon break down the purity and delicacy of their minds, for being constantly exposed to the influence "of sights and sounds unholy," the firmest determination must give way in despair. In this department there are two black solitary cells which, we are informed, are not unfrequently tenanted, yet amongst these vile viragoes must these modest children now pass to undergo a terrible probation if no hand be stretched to save them. Doubtless, the minds of our readers will suggest many other recommendations which would entitle these desolate girls to the protection and care of an uncoerced charity, and if they consult their hearts they will find promptings there which it will be well for them to follow.

From Aris's Birmingham Gazette, of Monday, April 12th, we take the following most interesting passages :—

WARWICKSHIRE EASTER SESSIONS.

The County Reformatory.—The Committee of this Reformatory reported that the Institution continued to progress satisfactorily. It contained thirty-six boys, being within four of the number for which accommodation was provided. Since last Quarter Sessions they had obtained the admission of six boys convicted at the various Petty Sessions in the county into the under-mentioned Schools, viz. :—Three to Saltley, one to Red Hill, one to Milbourne Reformatory Schools, Dorset, and one to Hardwicke, Gloucestershire. —Mr. Bolton KING, M.P., remarked upon the expense of maintaining the boys, which was greater per head than that incurred by keeping pauper lunatics ; and urged that several persons had contributed to the Reformatory upon the understanding that it should be confined to boys committed from the rural parts of the county, while at the present time out of thirty-six boys in the Institution twenty were from Birmingham, while some boys from their own rural population were sent to Saltley and some as far as Dorsetshire. It did appear to him that this was not exactly the intention of the contributors to this Institution when it was first founded.—LORD LEIGH contended that the only way to meet the existing evil was to take the juvenile criminals from towns.—E. GRAVES, Esq., urged that the cost of maintaining the inmates was regulated upon a most moderate scale, and one that could not reasonably be diminished.—Lord Leigh said the Birmingham Gaol contained a large number of poor boys from ten to fourteen years of age who could not be accommodated at Saltley. He thought they were bound to receive the juvenile criminals from Birmingham, the largest manufacturing town in the county.—W. JAMES, Esq., testified to the value of sending boys as far from their friends and associates as possible. He could not look at the question in such a narrow point of view as to say that Birmingham must take care of Birmingham, and the county take care of the county. He contended that in reforming these boys they were doing good to the whole country, and he thought one of the first steps to be pursued was their removal from old associates and haunts.—J. O. BACCHUS, Esq., would be sorry that Birmingham should consider itself left out, for when there was a deficiency in their funds he canvassed the Birmingham people, who readily gave £100, and he could go, with equal confidence, to them again when necessary. Of the twenty boys Mr. King had spoken of as coming from Birmingham, four were committed from Erdington and Saltley.—Some further discussion ensued, in which Bolton King, C. H. Bracebridge, H. T. Chamberlayne, and others took part, and the Report was then adopted.

BIRMINGHAM GIRLS' REFORMATORY.

The annual general meeting of the supporters of this Institution was held on Tuesday afternoon last, at Dee's Hotel, Mr. J. W. WHATELEY presiding. There were present Mrs. Whateley, Mrs. Kynnersley, Mrs. Hardy, Mrs. James, Mrs. Kekewich, Mrs. J. T. Chance, Mrs. Kempson, Mrs. Morgan, Mrs. J. Sturge, and Miss Albright; Mr. Sampson Hanbury, Secretary, the Rev. Sydney Gedge, the Rev. F. Morse, Chaplain, Mr. W. Morgan, and Mr. T. Kekewich.

The Report, which was read by the Rev. F. MORSE, stated that the number of girls in the Reformatory was 33. The state of the Institution was in every respect satisfactory. The work of education was gradually and steadily advancing, and it was hoped that no girl would leave the Institution without being able to read, write, and add up a sum, nor without being acquainted with at least the elementary truths of the Holy Scriptures. The state of the house afforded a gratifying indication of the girls' attention to house-work, and there was a great improvement in the girls' needle-work. The Institution had during the year been visited by Mr. Bowyer, one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and also by Mr. Sidney Turner, one of the Inspectors of Reformatories; and the remarks of both these gentlemen upon its condition had been very gratifying. The sanitary state of the Reformatory had also been satisfactory, there having been unusually little illness; and this immunity, as was stated by Mr. Townsend, the surgeon, was owing not more to the advantage of the locality than the admirable arrangements of the Institution. With respect to the eleven removals, seven had been placed in situations, one had died, one had been sent to prison, one had absconded, and one had been taken away by her friends. Five out of the seven in employment had been most exemplary in their conduct, had kept their places, and were doing well. These results, the Report observed, could not but encourage the supporters of the Institution to persevere in their exertions with good hope for continued success.

The CHAIRMAN moved the adoption of the Report, and in doing so congratulated the meeting on the very satisfactory state of the Institution.—The Rev. Sydney GEDGE, in seconding the motion, took occasion to observe that the Report was one which could not fail to be gratifying to all of them. They had the testimony of Miss Carpenter to the fact that in dealing with criminal girls they were dealing with a most difficult class, inasmuch as they were more depraved and hardened than criminal boys. At the same time it was obvious that the influence of girls in after-life for good or evil was far greater than that of boys. Therefore they had a harder and more important work to do, and he did feel deeply thankful to God that they were enabled to hear that five out of the eleven who had left the Institution had given such a satisfactory proof of having derived substantial benefit from the moral and religious instruction and training they had received in the Institution.

The financial statement, which was read by Mr. HANBURY, showed that the income of the Institution from all sources had amounted to £968 9s 3d. (including a balance of £115 from the previous year), whilst after defraying all household and other expenses, there remained a balance in hand of £97 17s. 10d. Mr. Hanbury stated that there was an item of expenditure for furniture which would not occur again, the Institution being now complete for forty girls.—Mr. MORGAN said that although there was a balance in favour of the Institution, it would be well not to relax their efforts, inasmuch as it was uncertain whether the Government grant might not be diminished.—Mr. HANBURY said he should be sorry if any impression got abroad that Government intended to withdraw or diminish the grant. He had made some enquiries and believed Government aid had been promised until March, 1859. He also believed, though he could not state it with certainty, that there was a disposition on the part of the Home Office to contribute some support if the Privy Council refused.

The Committees and officers were re-elected, and thanks were voted to them for their services, as well as to Mr. and Mrs. Hanbury for their devotion to the interests of the Reformatory, and to Mrs. Morse, on her retirement from the office of Secretary, to the Ladies' Committee.—The proceedings then terminated.

SALTLEY REFORMATORY INSTITUTION.

The annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Training College at Saltley was held on Wednesday evening last, at Dee's Royal Hotel, under the presidency of Lord LYTTELTON. Amongst those present were the Earl of Lichfield, John Ratcliff, Esq., Mayor, C. Shaw, C. H. Bracebridge, T. Bagnall, and T. C. S. Kynnersley, Esqrs., Dr. Melson, the Revds. Dr. Miller, I. Spooner, Sydney Gedge, A. A. Ellis, R. F. Williams, and J. T. Burt, Mr. Charles Ratcliff, Mr. W. Morgan, and Mr. W. R. Lloyd. Letters of apology were announced by Mr. Charles Ratcliff from Lord Calthorpe, Lord Leigh, the Right Hon. C. B. Adderley, M. P., the Right Hon. Sir John Parkington, M. P., Sir T. Winnington, the Revds. D. Melville, Sydney Turner, and W. Gover, and Mr. J. S. Wright.

Lord LYTTELTON, in opening the proceedings, said the meeting had been convened not so much to stimulate public sympathy to the Reformatory cause generally, as to make known the peculiar claims and great progress of the Institution at Saltley. Although it was not easy to estimate the actual results of the system, there was no doubt that much good had resulted and would continue to result from the establishment of Reformatories. The legislature had wisely provided that the boys should remain inmates of such Institutions for a very considerable time before being sent forth into the world. From Saltley very few boys had as yet been discharged, whose conduct and course of life could be traced with clearness after leaving school. Many of them would probably attain to respectable positions in the colonies, and for his own part he believed that with reasonably good management and favourable circumstances, the best thing that could be done for these boys was to send them abroad. But whatever might be the apparent local results of the Saltley Institution, he (Lord Lyttelton) knew that in some parts of Great Britain the most remarkable results had been achieved through the working of Reformatories—(hear, hear). In Montrose, as they all knew, the experiment had succeeded, and the establishment of a Reformatory at Hardwicke had almost put an end to juvenile crime in the city and county of Gloucester. There were some grounds for believing that the Saltley Reformatory had not been without a good effect in this locality. The circumstance which occurred a short time back in this town, when there was not a single prisoner for trial, and a pair of white gloves were presented to Mr. Kynnersley, was a most unusual one, and augured well for the moral improvement of the inhabitants. He at one time had grave doubts whether two Reformatories could be supported in this county, but he now found that a sufficient number of juveniles were sent to fill both the establishment at Saltley and the county Reformatory, under the auspices of Lord Leigh. The alterations in the Saltley Institution would, he had no doubt, greatly promote its efficiency, while the improvement in the management would tend still further to diminish juvenile crime. Mr. Adderley had displayed the warmest interest in the Institution, and had given it the most substantial support, and to his enlightened views on this question they owed much of the success which had attended their efforts to benefit the members of the Institution—(applause.) His Lordship concluded by calling upon

Mr. W. MORGAN to read the Report. This document stated that the buildings at Saltley had been enlarged so as to afford accommodation for fifty boys, twenty of whom would be sent, under a contract with the Committee, by the Magistrates of Staffordshire. To complete the buildings Mr. Adderley had kindly advanced the sum of 500*l.* to the Committee, and a balance of 204*l.* was likewise due to the contractor. An additional two and a half acres of land, adjoining the school, had been placed under cultivation, in order to find employment for the increased number of inmates. The Report will be found in extenso in our advertising columns. Mr. Charles RATCLIFF then read a financial statement showing a deficiency of 500*l.* in the building fund.

The MAYOR, in moving the adoption of the Report, said the rapid progress which had been made at Saltley must be encouraging and satisfactory to all who felt an interest in the Reformatory movement. For his own part, he was delighted, on visiting the Institution that day, to observe the careful management of the Superintendent, Mr. Humphreys, and the general good order that prevailed. It was interesting also to remark the cheerfulness of the inmates, and the interest they displayed in the proper execution of the work entrusted to them. The children seemed to look upon the Institution as a home rather than a place of detention. He believed that much good had already resulted from these institutions, and that much more would be achieved, he could not doubt after observing the excellent manner in which the School at Saltley was conducted.

C. H. BRACEBRIDGE, Esq., said he had watched the working of the Institution for some time past, and was glad to perceive a gradual and progressive improvement. He denied that there was any fear of exciting the envy of the children of the honest poor, or of arousing a desire in their minds to become inmates of such institutions ; and in reference to the ultimate restoration of the boys to the world as useful members of society, strongly recommended emigration to Canada, where, he had reason to believe, a large number could find employment in agricultural pursuits. Mr. Bracebridge concluded by seconding the adoption of the Report, which was unanimously agreed to.

T. C. S. KYNERSLEY, Esq., then moved "that this meeting gladly acknowledges that the experience of the five years which have elapsed since the establishment of the Reformatory School at Saltley, has fully proved that the Institution presents strong claims on the sympathy and support of all who recognise not only the necessity and importance, but also the duty and privilege of endeavouring to rescue and instruct children who from destitution or other causes have become vicious and depraved." He thought the experience of the past few years left no doubt as to the strong claims of Reformatory Institutions on the sympathy and support of all classes. Of the Saltley Reformatory he knew less, perhaps, than of many others throughout the country, inasmuch as during the time he had acted with the Magistrates of the borough, but few vacancies had occurred at Saltley, and the boys had therefore been sent to other institutions. He believed that at Christmas there were only ten Warwickshire boys in the school. Out of fifty boys committed at the Birmingham Police Court, four were sent to Saltley, and the conduct of these was reported as on the whole good. Seventeen boys had been sent to the Roman Catholic Reformatory, and of these the conduct of twelve was reported to have been either good or tolerably good. The results at other Reformatories had been equally satisfactory. A great object gained was the removal of the ringleaders of the gangs of thieves that infested our large towns. With reference to the recent "Maiden Sessions," he thought that might be attributed to a variety of causes, and the same might be said with respect to the comparatively light character of the crimes that appeared in the calendars at our Sessions and Assizes. The removal of so many juvenile offenders to Reformatory Schools, and the large extent to which recruiting had been carried on, had no doubt tended to diminish crime, but it was in the highest degree creditable to the working people of the town, that in a time of depressed trade and great suffering the calendars had been much lighter than had been known in prosperous times. Mr. Kynnersley concluded, amidst loud applause, by commending the working of the Institution, observing that all the Reports he received as to the influence of such establishments on the future of young criminals strengthened his conviction to their usefulness and in the propriety of greatly extending their operations.—C SHAW, Esq., seconded the resolution. He said that after nearly fifty years' experience amongst working people, he had no hesitation in commending the Saltley Institution as a most valuable agency for cultivating an honest spirit of independence in the minds of youths who had unfortunately been led into crime. He concurred in the suggestion of Mr. Bracebridge as to the advantages of emigration to Canada. In none of our Colonies was there a greater demand for agricultural labour. On the general question he thought that the removal of the persons trained in these Schools to one of our Colonies was the best means of securing their ultimate and permanent reformation. The resolution was carried by acclamation.

The Rev. I. SPOONER moved a vote of thanks to the Committee for their services during the past year. Mr. Spooner urged that while a mild system should be adopted in Reformatories, the penal element should not be lost sight of. The boys should be made to feel that they were sent there for crime.—The Rev. A.A. ELLIS seconded it, and in doing so urged that while preserving the penal aspect of Reformatories, the feeling of self-respect should be encouraged, and indiscriminate punishments avoided.

On the motion of Dr. MELSON, seconded by the Rev. F. WILLIAMS, thanks were voted to Messrs Charles Ratcliff and W. Morgan, the Honorary Secretaries.

The Rev. Dr. MILLER moved a vote of thanks to the Honorary Chaplain, the Rev. F. Williams, and in doing so urged the importance of founding reformatory training on the basis of religion, and contended that it was necessary to maintain the penal element, and to train the children to hard work and plain food. The child must know that he had done wrong, and that to a certain extent he was suffering for that wrong. But it was not to be expected, however efficient these institutions might be, that the results would be palpable and immediate; they must not yield to the morbid desire for immediate results. In order to be thoroughly effective the movement must be gradual. Let it be remembered, too, that although there were but fifty boys in the Saltley Reformatory, each lad was a centre of crime, and therefore it was not improbable that 500 lads were represented by them—(hear, hear.)—Mr BAGNALL seconded the resolution, which was carried.

Thanks were then voted to Mr. Tarleton, the Honorary Surgeon, on the motion of Mr. W. R. LLOYD, seconded by the Rev. J. T. BURR. The first named gentlemen urged that greater attention should be paid to the education of children in the workhouse, many of whom, owing to early neglect there, afterwards became inmates of the gaol and the Reformatory.

The Earl of LITCHFIELD proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Charles Ratcliff, for his able and unwearied services as Treasurer of the Institution—(cheers). The noble Earl passed a very warm eulogium upon Mr. Ratcliff whom, he said, he had always found ready to work with the utmost zeal and energy for the benefit of the College. He (Lord Litchfield) had inspected the accounts, which Mr. Ratcliff had made his especial care, and he must say that the admirable state in which he found them proved to his mind that their Treasurer took a strong interest in the College, and desired by every means in his power to advance its interests and prosperity—(applause). The accounts continually received of the career of former inmates of Reformatories amply proved the necessity for extending their good influences. He would suggest that the Committee should in their future Reports include some particulars of the career of the boys after leaving Saltley. Such facts would be not only deeply interesting but of the highest importance, as showing the real value of the Institution. The movement, he thought, stood pre-eminent for its practical utility in lessening crime and elevating the moral tone of the lowest class of the community, but whether they were in the right track to work it out fully it was not for him to say. He felt convinced, however, that great good would result from the system at present adopted, and he hoped therefore that in his own county, Staffordshire, one or two Institutions, similar to the one at Saltley, would ere long be established.—Mr. BRACEBRIDGE seconded the proposition, and warmly eulogised the unwearied devotion of Mr. Ratcliff to the interests of the College. The resolution was carried by acclamation.

The Rev. S. GEDGE next proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Harwood and the Teachers of the School, which was seconded by Mr. MORGAN, and carried unanimously.

The Earl of LITCHFIELD having taken the chair, Mr. Charles RATCLIFF moved, and C. SHAW Esq., seconded, a vote of thanks to Lord Littelton for presiding.—His Lordship briefly acknowledged the vote, and the proceedings then terminated.

REPORT.

The Committee of the Birmingham Reformatory Institution have great pleasure in presenting to their subscribers and friends the Fifth Annual Report of their proceedings.

Their work was formerly divided into two branches, namely, the Reformatory for Boys, at Saltley, and the Reformatory for Girls, in Camden-street; but the latter Institution has been transferred to the management of a separate Society, and is now carried on at the Coppice, at Smethwick. Your Committee have therefore been enabled to devote their whole attention to the School, at Saltley, which they are happy to report as being in a higher state of efficiency than at any previous period.

The experience of another year has, however, still further shown that the work is surrounded by difficulty, and that what has been called, "the extirpation of regular juvenile crime," is a social problem of no easy solution.

Reformatory Institutions are contributing to work out the problem, but many other agencies are required. Among these your Committee would earnestly press upon the consideration of all local authorities, employers of labour, and shopkeepers, particularly in a town like Birmingham, the duty of removing temptations to crime out of the way, while on the other hand the seeds of virtue and industry are sedulously cultivated, so that under God's blessing a reputable character may be attained by multitudes of those who now belong to the "perishing and dangerous class."

In their last Report your Committee referred to the inadequacy of the buildings at Saltley, which have been enlarged to furnish accommodation for fifty boys, thus enabling the Institution not only to provide for cases furnished by the town of Birmingham and elsewhere, but also to carry out the contract which had been made with the Staffordshire Magistrates to receive twenty boys committed from that county in preference to other applicants.

This enlargement of the institution has been now fully completed, and the buildings have been made as perfect as possible. Mr. Adderley kindly lent the sum of £500 towards defraying the cost of the erection, for which loan the Committee pay interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum. There is also a balance of £204 12s. due to the contractor. The Committee respectfully solicit contributions towards the discharge of these debts.

The enlargement has materially contributed to the efficiency of the Institution, not only by enabling the Committee to receive an increased number of inmates, but also by providing accommodation on the premises for a gardiner and a resident schoolmaster, neither of whom formerly lived at the school.

The officers of the school are the superintendent and Matron, two domestic Servants, the Schoolmaster, Gardiner, Shoemaker, and Tailor.

With the increase of the number of inmates has arisen a necessity for more land on which they may be employed. This want has been supplied by the Committee becoming yearly tenants of two and a half acres of the garden land adjoining the School at the same annual rent as the other land in the neighbourhood, so that the boys have seven acres and a half of land now under cultivation. Your Committee are satisfied that agricultural labour is the best of all employments, when used as a means for the moral discipline of lads committed to a Reformatory; and they anticipate that ere long a still further extension of the boundaries of the Institution must be sought. They are therefore glad to be able to state that they have secured the option of taking additional land at Michaelmas next.

There are at the present time 50 boys in the School, and in reference to the principles in which they are trained, and general details of management, the Committee have much pleasure in submitting to the subscribers the following extracts from the Report by Mr. Humphreys, the Superintendent.

On the subject of discipline Mr. Humphreys says—

"It will be readily conceded, I think, that in a place where a number of the worst boys, taken from the most degraded class of society, are collected together, discipline is of the first importance. I don't mean the mere soldier's discipline of enforcing unquestioning obedience to all commands however trivial, though even that would of itself be in many instances a great inroad upon the disorderly habits to which such boys have been accustomed. By discipline I mean all those influences, mental and physical, arising from position, teaching in School, regular work, wholesome and sufficient diet, cleanliness of rooms, persons, and clothing, &c., and the constant inculcation of the principle that it is more the practice of what is right which is desired, than the mere knowledge of it. Knowledge—what is often called religious knowledge—many of them are not so devoid of as some people imagine, but they are without the feeling which would constrain them to use that knowledge as a guide for their daily life. Conscience has been stifled in them instead of being cultivated. They can steal and lie without remorse—without that horribly miserable feeling which even the suggestion of crime brings to the heart of a being properly educated.

“I by no means say that reformatory discipline is all that is necessary to work an enduring change in their dispositions. Unquestionably all our efforts depend for success upon a higher power and a holier influence than any belonging to this world. Still we must not expect success without the efforts, nor without the boy's own will being to some extent enlisted in the attempt to free him from the moral trammels in which vice has entangled him. I have heard it disputed whether Reformatories should not be to some extent penal in character. A little thought would have shown that such a question is not open to discussion. In one feature they are undoubtedly penal—they are places of detention. In every other respect they are purely and simply schools, industrial or trade schools, where every one must work. There is nothing penal in that.

“However much it may suit the purpose of some people to sneer and call them ‘places of reward for criminals,’ the recipients of the so called reward think otherwise. Some of them would rather be in prison, where they would have nothing to do. Some are contented and thankful for the care taken of them and the kindness shown them. Generally scarcely one in ten would remain in the School voluntarily. Even those who have a real desire for a reformation of life, still desire liberty under the idea that they shall be able henceforth to resist temptation; and I do not think that, after a reasonable period of probation, this feeling ought to be discouraged. Certainly our Schools ought not to be conducted so that boys could attach to them the feeling or notion of a permanent home; nor on the other hand ought they purposely be uncomfortably homely, for in that case any boy of the cuteness pertaining to the class would quickly exercise his privilege of choosing his residence in one of our country prisons, where he would be in that delightful (to him) state of having ‘nothing to do.’

“A dislike of regular work, either in school or shop, arising from the want of early training in habits of usefulness, is a leading feature in juvenile criminals, only equalled by their dislike of plain food. They would rather have one stuffing of dainties than three good plain meals.

"Many of them are the children of parents who live on the fat of the land, or who feast one day and starve the next. In short, there are three things in Reformatories which will effectually prevent their being looked upon as rewards by young thieves, namely, 'restraint of liberty, hard work, and plain living.'"—The Committee would adopt these views, only pointing out that though it is true that, abstractedly considered, there is nothing penal in an industrial school regularly conducted; still the remarks of the Superintendent show that in the estimation of the class on which the Reformatory Institution is intended to operate the School does present a penal aspect. Speaking in reference to the opinions of the working classes about the Reformatory, Mr. Humphreys says—

"I never yet heard an honest working man speak of our boys as objects of his envy, but I have again and again heard mothers and fathers caution their children against crime, when they have seen our lads hard at work on the land, or walking two and two to Church. I have often heard such expressions as the following:—'They look well off enough, but I should not like my lad to go there.' And again—'Eh! poor children, what sort of fathers and mothers must they have had?' Not one word or look of envy."

As to the most suitable employment for the inmates, Mr. Humphreys reports as follows:—

"I have good reason to be of opinion that land work is the natural antidote to town-poison: that it is in every respect, whether of discipline, moral regeneration, or financially, the most advantageous of all occupations—provided always that there be proper superintendence, a fair proportion of land to the number of hands, and a constant market for produce. It is this last advantage which makes the trades in large Reformatories so much more flourishing than in small ones. They are their own customers. The large numbers find work the one for the other in shoeing, clothing, feeding, &c. A boy with a trade in his fingers will at the expiration of his term of detention almost to a certainty seek employment in town. He will have to live in a neighbourhood densely populated and abounding in gin-palaces, beer-houses, and other houses which I need not mention, and marine-store shops. Is there, can there be a reasonable hope that a youth of seventeen or eighteen years of age would stand against the temptations of such circumstances? Country or colonial life is unquestionably the most suitable for some years at least after leaving the Reformatory. It gives opportunity for good resolutions to strengthen, and industrious habits to be confirmed. With a view to these results I wish we had more land: what we have has been worked into capital condition for the current year, so that we hope to make up a little for the small return of the past. The gardener's wages fall heavily upon so small a quantity of land as the five acres now under cultivation. If we could have the next two fields we should have about eleven acres altogether, to be managed as a garden, not as a farm."

In reference to the instruction of the boys in the trades of tailor and shoemaker now carried on at Saltley, Mr. Humphreys says—

“ The great difficulty is to find an outlet for the productions of the shops. We have now a considerable stock of boots and shoes on hand, also a quantity of men's trousers. It is very desirable that all these should be sold.”

Statistics.—There were 39 boys in the School on the 31st of December, 1857. 20 had been convicted once, 8 twice, 5 thrice, 2 four times, 1 five, 1 six, 1 nine, 1 ten—total, 39. 11 had received no education at all, 8 just knew the alphabet, 9 could read a little, 10 could read and write imperfectly, 1 could read and write well—total, 39. 15 had both parents living, 7 had the father only, 11 mother only, 6 neither parents—total, 39. 7 were from Lancashire, 9 from Middlesex, 10 from Staffordshire, 10 from Warwickshire, 1 from Worcestershire, 1 from Cheshire, 1 from Gloucestershire—total, 39. “ Since the 31st of December 12 more boys have been admitted, and one left to go to the Akbar Ship Reformatory, leaving us altogether 50 inmates now in the School.”

In his report Mr. Humphreys further says—“ I have great pleasure in acknowledging the interest which the monthly Visitors have manifested in everything connected with the efficiency of the Institution, as also the kindness of several friends who have given us very tangible evidence of their good-will in the form of presents, namely, H. Yates, Esq., two dozen spades and two dozen garden forks; Messrs. Mapplebeck and Lowe, a culinary digester; C. Ratcliff, Esq., a hamper of fruit; Mr. W. Redding, a set of boys' shoe-making tools.

“ You will be glad to learn that Mr. T. J. Haworth and several students from the College continue to conduct the Sunday afternoon School, and that their efforts are of great service, and highly appreciated by the boys. No boy ever attempts to shirk the Sunday School—always the reverse. What progress is being made in that which is the main aim and object of the Institution time alone can show. It is a work requiring patience as well as faith.”

To these extracts the Committee will add only a few words. Their thanks are due to the Honorary Surgeon and other officers, whose services have been cheerfully rendered during the past year, and they recommend that these gentlemen, and the Sunday School Teachers who have regularly visited the Institution, receive the best thanks of the subscribers for the zeal and interest they have displayed.

The restoration of the inmates to the world as useful members of society will complete the work which your Committee seek to accomplish. Happily the prejudices against the employment of criminals, arising from the imperfection of former systems of prison reformation, are rapidly dying out, and it is found that employment can be obtained both in England and her Colonies for young persons who have been trained in such Institutions as the one at Saltley. Your Committee are anxious to take full advantage of this favourable state of things. They are able to look with satisfaction upon many instances of boys who, on the completion of their several terms of detention at Saltley, have been placed out in eligible situations in and about Birmingham, where they are now creditably employed, and of others who have emigrated with good prospects of achieving a fair start in life.

In closing their review of the past the Committee feel assured that society at large will cheerfully sympathise in the desire which all those who have worked in this cause now feel, to offer humble and hearty acknowledgments to Him from whom all good comes for the measure of success which has attended their labours, and to derive encouragement to persevere in this work of love, because He has emphatically declared that His Word, the Word which this Institution constantly sets up as its standard of faith and conduct, shall not return unto Him void.

In the early part of April, a petition to parliament was circulated for signature amongst the inhabitants of Londonderry, the objects of which the following letter will explain, and it, to our mind, but half exposes the injurious results which would surely follow if the state should concede the changes prayed for by the petitioners :—

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS IN UNION WORKHOUSES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMAN.

1, Upper Pembroke-street,
April 6th, 1858.

SIR,—I trust you will permit me to offer, through the medium of your paper, a few observations upon the Derry petition to parliament, praying for the establishment of reformatory schools in union workhouses. The petition consists of four paragraphs. The first is a palpable truism, the other three are founded upon a total misconception, or ignorance, of what the reformatory principle is, and of the system, on which—and on which only—reformatory agency can be successfully developed. The first paragraph tells us that no provision is made in Ireland for the Reformation of juvenile offenders, and that jail association but corrupts the more deeply. Most true in each particular. The second paragraph declares that state reformatories for juvenile offenders are expensive, and that a stigma hangs in after life about those who may have been confined in such institutions. If by a state reformatory is meant an “overgrown young jail” the petitioners are right, but no one thinks of such an awful abuse. But, if they mean that a reformatory, founded by local self-imposed rates, or by local charity, and aided by government inspection and a state subvention, then they are wrong—as wrong as in their statements that a stigma hangs in after years around those who have been confined in reformatories. This statement is simple absurd and without the slightest proof, whilst France, Holland, Belgium, America, Scotland, and England furnish us with countless proofs that exactly the opposite is the result. By the third paragraph the legislature is told that “the existing machinery of the Irish poor-law system might be advantageously employed for the collateral reformation of juvenile offenders, the only changes required being the allocation of a ward in each union workhouse for a reformatory school, and the appointment of a schoolmaster and schoolmistress to take charge of its male and female department respectively." It would be impossible to show in so few words a more complete ignorance of all the facts bearing on juvenile reformation than is exhibited in this paragraph. The family principle is ignored; individualisation is ignored; separation of religions is ignored; all the proved wisdom of the systems advocated by Mary Carpenter, by Recorder Hill, by Frederic Hill, by Demetz, and by the Rev. John Clay, is ignored; all those beautiful teachings in which all—from Demetz to Barwick Baker—from Pol to De Gasparin—from Mary Carpenter to the Nuns of Arno's Court agree—are ignored, and in their place is substituted a scheme as ill designed as it would be mischievous—as absurd as it would be inoperative, and which would teach neither self dependence nor self respect—not even self control—a scheme which could never arise the soul of "the city Arab, the home Heathen" to its God—which could never wake in his heart the energy and the spirit of a man. It could do none of these things, but it would leave him the poor worthless human weed—as all know the vast majority of our workhouse reared children if a boy, with no home save the workhouse and the jail—if a girl, with no home save the cruel street, and no refuge but the hospital or the asylum. You know, sir, and we all know, that these workhouse children are a disgrace to any civilized nation. If you doubt it, the jail records, the hospital books, and the workhouse officers will prove it. Above all the fifty girls whom the Sisters of Mercy, in Baggot-street, are attempting to reclaim will furnish a fair sample of the inmates of the proposed allocated wards of the workhouse, where "collateral reformation" is to be carried out through the agency of "the existing machinery" of the Irish poor-law system. The fourth paragraph of the petition is entirely wrong in the assumption that the English reformatory acts at all contemplate such a scheme as the petitioners desire to see carried out; and in praying for the extension of the English acts to Ireland they pray for that which would be unsuited to our people, and which would in no way aid the petitioners in securing the objects they desire. It is much to be regretted that 400 of the chief inhabitants of Derry should have signed this petition—a petition which must excite the most profound astonishment of Mr. Adderley, of Sir John Pakington, of Lord Stanley, and of the other members of the present government who are old, and active, and intelligent friends of the reformatory movement. Pardon this trespass on your space; but I trust you will excuse an old and continuous worker in the cause, if I thus endeavour to expose serious errors—more especially when a reformatory schools bill for Ireland, which has received the assent of all in this country and in England capable, from a knowledge of facts and principles, of giving a sound judgment, is about to be introduced to the House of Commons by Mr. Sergeant Deasy and Mr. John Bagwell.

I am, Sir,

Very truly yours,

PATRICK JOSEPH MURRAY.

MEMORANDUM of a Conversation I held to-day with Rev. Mr. M'CALLUM, the Chaplain and Master of the Boys' Refuge, Glasgow.

Glasgow, Good Friday, April 2nd, 1858.

I called to-day on Mr. M'Callum at the Refuge. On entering I saw a boy standing about in the hall.

Mr. M'Callum received me very cordially, and I had an interesting and valuable conversation with him.

Decrease of Crime in Glasgow.—Mr. M'Callum mentioned that he is bringing out a report (now in the press) which shows that since the Reformatory system has been introduced here, there has been a great diminution of the number of inmates in the City Bridewell. Seven years ago the number of prisoners was 700 odd. Now, though the population of the city has much increased, the numbers of prisoners is only 300 odd; this Mr. M'C. attributes to the combined action of the Refuges and the Industrial School, but he thinks the Refuges have been the most important causes of the diminution as they are much larger than the Industrial Schools.

Runaways.—Mr. M'C. says he was sometime ago much plagued by boys escaping. They used to be recommitted to prison as a punishment. This, however, did more harm than good. The boys would say on their return that they were better off in gaol than in the Refuge, in that they rose at 7 o'clock instead of 6, that their food was better, &c. &c. Mr. M'C. thinks the present gaol treatment far too mild. Mr. M'C. has given over having the boys re-committed to prison and punishes them himself by the "towsie" and by separation from their fellows for a considerable time. There has been no escape for six months past, though the boys go out. They went to the panorama a little while ago (at least 300 of them) and one hundred go each Sunday to Church, 100 one Sunday, another 100 another Sunday, and so on. Some also go to the land which is cultivated. The school play grounds, workshops, &c. are encompassed by a wall, and the door is locked, so that they may be said to be usually in a state of confinement.

Admission.—I asked Mr. M'C. what he did with a boy when first admitted, whether he placed him at once with the others. Mr. M'C. said, certainly not. The boy whom I saw in the hall was a new comer. Mr. M'C. keeps each new comer thus for some days, talks to him, and endeavours to bring him to a sense of his condition. When Mr. M'C. thinks a good effect has been produced, he places the boy under the care of a very good boy, directing the former to speak only to the latter, and this is continued until Mr. M'C. thinks the new comer may be safely trusted to mix with his fellows generally. Formerly much mischief was done by new comers talking of their misdeeds to their companions. The above system tends to prevent the practice, which is also forbidden under severe punishment.

Trades.—Mr. M'C. thinks it desirable to have a multiplicity of employments, as he finds that a boy does much better at what he chooses himself. A certain proportion of his boys choose agriculture, but the major part do not like it; when the school is placed in possession of a farm which will be soon, in addition to their present ground, he intends to employ about a hundred in husbandry, which is about as many as he expects will prefer that occupation. The whole number in the school is more than 400, most of whom are town boys, who do not generally like husbandry though some of them do.

Mr. M'C. is about to have a large smithy erected, where he will be able to employ many boys as smiths. Many prefer this trade which is in much request both in Glasgow and the colonies.

Marks.—A bad mark is placed against a boy's name, and three bad marks disqualifies a boy for the next treat, such as going to any sight to which the boys are taken sometimes or joining the excursion to the sea side which is taken annually by steamboat.

Miscellaneous.—Sixteen boys have just left the Refuge, being sent to Montreal consigned to a benevolent gentleman there who undertakes to get them employment.

Mr. M'C. does not agree with Mr. Baker of Hardwicke, that boys should not be committed to Reformatories on their first convictions. He thinks that each case should be dealt with on its individual merits, and where a boy is likely to become a regular offender he should be sent to a Reformatory, on his first conviction. He showed me the history which the boy I saw in the hall, who was convicted for the first time, had given of himself, which clearly shewed that he would in all probability have become a thief had he not been sent to a Reformatory.

ALFRED HILL.

We are indebted to Mr. Alfred Hill, for his kindness in supplying these notes; and we are very happy to find that the Glasgow House of Refuge is making that progress in usefulness predicted for it by the Recorder of Birmingham, and our worthy friend, the Rev., Dr. Craik. How long are we to be without such institutions in Ireland, how long are we to be astounded by such police reports as the following, taken from The Limerick Reporter of April 13th?

“SHOPLIFTING.—John Hanly, a juvenile, who is within the statuteable age of whipping, 14 years, was brought up for the thirty-sixth time by Constable Nash, who charged him with stealing 3lbs. of tea off the counter in Mr. Quinn's shop and walking off with it, but was detected in the street; and, this fact being established, the magistrates sentenced him to be imprisoned for three months with hard labour and two whippings.”

When Peachum sings, in The Beggar's Opera, “I wonder any man alive would ever rear a daughter!” we all laugh, but really it appears to us that sons are generally more troublesome, and we have, under our system, no means of checking their evil propensities if the youths stop short of the committal of that which is actual crime in the contemplation of the law. It is otherwise in France, and in this phase of Juvenile Reformation (more especially as regards the sons of persons in affluent circumstances,) M. Demetz is as successful in his efforts as in these cases coming more fully within the scope of Mettray. From the Midland Counties Herald of April 8th we take the following, from the pen of one to whom the country and all interested in the Reformatory Question owe the deepest debts of gratitude :—

Our readers will perhaps recollect that a translation of the Report for 1856 of the Reformatory at Mettray, appeared in the Midland Counties Herald towards the close of that year. We have now the pleasure to present to them the Report for 1857 ; and in doing so we desire to draw their attention to a new feature in that important institution.

We must premise that in France a power, entitled Correction Paternelle, is lodged in the hands of parents to procure, by application before an appointed tribunal, the imprisonment for short periods of their unruly offspring. By virtue of articles 375 and 376 of the Code civil, children under sixteen years of age may be thus imprisoned for one month, while those between sixteen and twenty-one years of age are liable to six month's confinement.

In a late edition of his pamphlet upon Mettray, M. Cochin, quoting from its annual reports, states that formerly there existed in Paris alone any institution suited to the reception of children of the upper classes who had rendered themselves liable to Correction Paternelle. Elsewhere the gaol was the only place in which the sentence of the Court upon them could be carried into execution, and the dread of exposing them to the contaminating influences of promiscuous imprisonment naturally deterred parents from resorting to such means of repression. Those who could afford to do so preferred to send their unmanageable sons abroad, in the hope of thus removing them from pernicious associates, and breaking their bad habits. But by this course they often only substituted one form of dissipation for another, and by interrupting the youths' studies, and placing them beyond their control, not unfrequently aggravated the evil they sought to cure. Detention in agricultural colonies similar to that which ordinary young offenders undergo would be found unsuited to the class now under consideration. The system pursued in these establishments is not calculated to effect a cure within so limited a time as that for which alone such youths can by law be imprisoned ; and they would, moreover, be liable to form intimacies among their companions which would be most injurious in after life. By placing them, however, in separate confinement while there every objection is obviated. * “ Its effects must have been witnessed, says M. Demetz, "for the happy influence it exercises on the moral being of the youth to be justly appreciated. A thorough change takes place in him. With no amusements or diversion to distract his attention, there is nothing which can drive from his mind the exhortation and advice he receives. Meditation brings his past life constantly before him. In solitude his pride and self-love vanish. His thoughts necessarily are turned inward. He is no longer ashamed to listen to the whispers of conscience, which have been most justly called, 'The voice of God.' By degrees he becomes open to religious impressions. Work is welcome, first, as affording him something to do, while very soon he comes to regard it as a pleasure. He eagerly applies himself to it, and what until then he had looked upon as an irksome task, he learns to consider a source of consolation, and even so great a necessity that the heaviest punishment it is possible to inflict upon him is to deprive him of all occupation. The short duration of his imprisonment must remove every apprehension from the minds of those who might be disposed to dread the ill effects of separate confinement." *

* Notice sur Mettray, par Augustin Cochin.

Three years ago, it would appear, M. Demetz began to receive under his care the sons of wealthy parents, whose unruly conduct rendered them unmanageable at home or in ordinary schools. The maintenance and education of these pupils is, of course, paid for by their friends. This extension of his enterprise has been attended, we are informed in the present report, with such happy results that M. Demetz contemplates enlarging the accommodation devoted to these youths, in order to receive more than the very limited number he has hitherto been able to admit. As it is a part of his system to separate pupils of this class completely from each other, and indeed to keep the fact of their presence in the institution a secret from all but the officers and their own families, while at the same time ample provision is made for preserving their health, and conducting their education in a manner befitting their position in society, it is obvious that the buildings appropriated to their use must be elaborate, and consequently costly. Hitherto the few pupils belonging to the upper classes that have yet been received at Mettray have not been lodged, we believe, in a house specially built for them, but M. Demetz is now desirous that one should be forthwith prepared. We have seen the design for the edifice he contemplates erecting. Each youth will have a distinct dwelling, consisting of three rooms, with a small garden attached for the purposes of exercise and recreation. Though these dwellings are so arranged as to render communication between the inhabitants impossible, they are yet completely under the surveillance of the officers. Professors and a chaplain will reside at the establishment, while each boy will, we understand, be under the care of a separate tutor. M. Demetz himself will watch over all.

We gather from the report before us that the need for such an institution is more strongly felt in France than we should hope it is in England. We cannot but fear, however, that numerous instances may be met with even in our own country in which such discipline as that of Mettray would afford the only hope of reclaiming the lad whom natural infirmities of character, over-indulgence, or other untoward circumstances have rendered the bane of his family, to become at a later period a curse to society. It is this conviction which has elicited our remarks. We have been informed that M. Demetz would willingly admit English youths, and should their friends desire to conceal the fact of their being in a Reformatory it would not be difficult to do so, for as the custom already prevails amongst us of sending our sons abroad for education, there would be nothing to attract attention in thus placing a lad at school in France, supposing the name of the school were suppressed. Mettray is a Roman Catholic Institution, and a boy of that creed would doubtless feel more at home there than a Protestant. The religious education of the latter, however, would of course invariably be entrusted to a minister of his own faith; an arrangement for which the proximity of Tours, where not only a large number of English reside, but, we believe, a clergyman of the Anglican establishment officiates, affords probably peculiar facilities. That any attempt to proselytise would be permitted in an institution of which M. Demetz is at the head, no one acquainted with his character would for a moment believe.

REPORT OF M. DEMETZ,
Director of the Agricultural Colony of Mettray,
To the Société Paternelle.—1857.

GENTLEMEN,—After eighteen years of existence, and, we may add, of success, we might be excused from again coming before the public, in order to set forth the results obtained at Mettray; the more so that our institution, from the very day of its commencement, has always been open to those most competent to judge of it, with a view to its advantages being fairly appreciated.

Still, when the object of the enterprise under consideration is to throw light on one of the most complex problems of social economy—the improvement of the human race; when the most efficacious means of preparing a happier future for our country are being sought in arresting the progress of demoralisation, the last word can never be uttered. Scarcely is one evil obviated than another is discovered, to which a remedy must be applied. Thus it is that after devoting your attention to the poor and criminal children you found sunk in misery, you have resolutely undertaken the case—according to the plan indicated by the law, which decrees the establishment of Penitentiary Colonies *—of those young persons belonging

* See the Law of August 5th, 1850, and the very remarkable Report of M. Corne which precedes it. This may be considered the most important document which has been published relating to young detenus, whose precise position is not fully understood by the public.

[In the law here alluded to, besides the above and various other to the middle and upper classes who, without absolutely infringing the penal laws, are not the less deserving of correction. We speak of children detained by virtue of correction paternelle.

That spirit of resistance to all control which, spreading from one to another, has infected every rank of society, has penetrated from public life even into the domestic circle; and there are at this time parents among us who, to their astonishment, have encountered on the part of their children a degree of insubordination, often even of audacity—for the expression is not too strong—of which their predecessors would never have dreamt. We cannot help quoting, in illustration of this opinion, an answer made to us very lately by one of our pupils whom we had reproved for most outrageous conduct towards his widowed mother. He replied—“Why what could you expect?” My school-fellows always told me it was degrading to obey a woman.” The lad was scarcely sixteen years old, and the woman was his mother!

And if paternal authority is but too often despised, it must be admitted that the authority of mothers is still more disregarded; we mean of those widowed mothers whose children, aware that they will one day inherit a large fortune, think only of the time when they will be able to spend it. These are the individuals whom we more especially desire to deal with. They require, more than any other class, that some check should be applied to their spirit of insubordination; they imagine, poor children, that by their precocious depravity they raise themselves to the dignity of manhood. The mother provisions, it is decreed that “Colonies Correctionnelles,” of a more penal character than the “Colonies Agricoles,” shall be established for the reception of the worst class of juvenile offenders, including those who, after being admitted into a Reformatory School, prove themselves by their insubordinate conduct to be unworthy of its advantages, and are certain to exercise an evil influence over their companions. Unfortunately, no such colonies have yet been founded: but that the want of them is sorely felt may be inferred from the earnestness with which M. Demetz, in a report recently addressed to the Minister of the Interior, urges that the decree should be carried into execution.

The managers of various Reformatories in our own country have latterly expressed a strong opinion in favour of the establishment of Penal Schools, to which they could send unmanageable children, to be dealt with more severely than the discipline of their own institutions permits. At present the only alternative to retaining inmates whose depravity and insubordination exercise a most injurious influence over their better disposed companions, is to send them to gaol, from which, after a short incarceration, the managers are compelled to receive them back, whether they have been benefited or further corrupted by their imprisonment; and when the utter unsuitableness of a gaol to the right treatment of children is remembered, it can scarcely be doubted that they usually come out worse than they go in.]—Trans.

of one of these, not long since, wrote to us, as mothers alone can write:—"I see clearly that it is my weakness which has caused all the mischief, and that I deserve to be consigned to a cell by the side of that which my child occupies. Will you aid me to regain that authority which Providence entrusted me with, but which I knew not how to maintain?" We gladly acceded to such a request; and strengthened by this touching appeal we addressed her ungrateful son in these words, "You have cruelly treated her whom it was your duty to cherish and respect; you have shamefully abused her kindness. A mother's heart is far more deeply wounded by the bad conduct of her son than it could be even by stabs from a poniard; and yet yours would willingly have said to you, 'Strike but listen.' But now the time for indulgence is past. I am become the depository of that authority you have too long despised, and it is with me you will have to deal. I have two hands—the one wears a gauntlet of iron, the other a velvet glove. It depends upon your behaviour which I shall use. Do not attempt to struggle; you can never outdo me in strength. Besides, why struggle with your friends? I wage war with your faults only, not with yourself: but to bring you back into the right path I shall not hesitate to use the utmost severity should it be necessary; power and authority are combined in my hands."

This language, which indicates to our pupils the line of conduct we intend to pursue towards them, never fails to make an impression on their young minds; and we must admit that, with very few exceptions, we find they yield to our exhortations. It is true that we neglect no means of convincing them that we never exercise severity towards them but with regret. Without such a conviction our efforts would be fruitless. Thus no lad comes to us without our having written to him some time before, to urge him to alter his behaviour. This letter is transmitted by the President du Tribunal to his parents, who return it to us, that we may modify it to suit the character of the child. It is usually couched in some such terms as the following:—

"I learn with regret that by your conduct you give your excellent family serious cause of complaint, and that the exhortations of your parents have produced no effect. The time for severity has arrived. An order issued by the President du Tribunal, will deprive you of your liberty, and in the cell to which you are about to be consigned, you will have to reflect upon the melancholy consequences which have resulted from forgetting your duty. Charged with executing this severe sentence, which will immediately be passed upon you, I earnestly wish to mediate between your family and yourself, and obtain for you a reprieve. Profit by the time afforded you, and implore from your parents pardon for your past conduct; as yet, disgrace attaches only to yourself, but hereafter it will recoil on a name you ought to honour. From the very day on which you receive this letter, cultivate industrious habits, be submissive and respectful, seek to revive in your heart those feelings of religion which were the joy of your early childhood, and which you have so soon forgotten; show yourself grateful to God, who has prompted me to save you from the punishment awarded to your guilty conduct. If neglecting this fatherly warning, you persist in the unhappy course you have adopted, do not reproach him who has done his utmost to spare you the severe treatment which you will then fully deserve. But there is yet time. Give me the gratification of having aided in leading you back into the path of duty, and of restoring that happiness to your family which you ought never to have disturbed."

We have the satisfaction of informing you that in some instances this warning has sufficed to arrest the youth in his downward progress. If, notwithstanding this endeavour, he persist in his evil conduct, and he is brought here, we say to him, "My dear boy, how is it that you are come here? I did all in my power to save you from being sent to a place of punishment; but I warned you that if you persisted in grieving your family, I should treat you with severity. I must keep my word, or you would not believe me in future; but if you behave well, if you amend your habits, if you exhibit the slightest symptom of repentance, and of returning to a right course, you may be assured of the eagerness with which I shall give you credit for a desire to improve." In general the success of an undertaking depends on the manner in which it is begun; and it is consequently very important that the first impression made on the lad's mind should be a favourable one.

Their authority is, for a time at least, placed in our hands by the parents, who give their word of honour to leave us to act on all points as we shall deem best. We require this concession for two reasons. First:—We are testing an entirely new system of education. If we are hampered in its application by interposition on the part of the family, it will not be possible to discover whether the system has been ill applied, or whether it is bad in itself, and public opinion will proscribe it for ever. Secondly:—In assuming as regards the child the whole responsibility of the rigorous measures adopted towards him, we avoid the risk of destroying what little affection for his family may yet survive in his heart. What little affection! Painful indeed must these words be to parents when they feel but too often that it is the very excess of their tenderness which has brought about this miserable result; truly instructive are they for the future! But were we to attempt to trace effects to their causes, we might, Gentlemen, publish a volume instead of a report. We will leave it to time to supply us with fresh arguments.

You may, perhaps, be surprised that we should have, to some extent, thrown into a dialogue form, the narrative we have just related, instead of contenting ourselves with a simple analysis. We believed, however, that this was the best method of explaining our system. In thus bringing it into operation before you, so to speak, you could better appreciate both its advantages and drawbacks. It now remains for us only to state a few details which will throw light upon this department as a whole.

The approach of the holidays increases the number of applications from parents for admission—a fact easily explained.

It is obvious to the heads of families that at such a season they run a risk of rewarding the child whose conduct during the whole past year has been bad, for it is impossible to change home into a place of punishment at a time when all is joy and festivity, especially where there are other children who deserve nothing but praise. On the other hand, at some schools pupils are not permitted to remain during the holidays; and in all the discipline, at this period of rest from work, is sure to be relaxed. Removing to Mettray obviates all these difficulties; one inconvenience alone remaining, namely, that at this season we cannot arrange for our lads to compete in writing exercises with the lads of the [neighbouring] Public School, as they are accustomed to do during the session. We must acknowledge that in so far they lose a motive to emulation; but at the same time our discipline is the more felt at this period of the year, when the child's thoughts naturally revert to the enjoyments from which he is cut off.*

But though we can thus deprive those lads of their holiday who do not deserve it, we reserve the means of enabling such among our pupils to enjoy it as during their stay with us have shown a desire to do well.

It is by this potent alternative—everything to hope if they behave well, and everything to fear if they behave ill—that men are kept in the path of duty, and à fortiori the child.

We have met with much sympathy and aid from some excellent clergymen in our neighbourhood. Desiring to promote our undertaking, they agree to receive our pupils as boarders, whenever we are of opinion that the strict discipline of Mettray has sufficiently operated on their young hearts. Thus we afford these lads an opportunity of exercising their liberty under certain restrictions.

In this intermediate stage we can judge how far we have influenced their disposition. It is a species of moral quarantine, which indicates what we have to hope or to fear from the future.

We will conclude this explanation of our system by an observation which we trust may bear fruit in making parents understand how important it is not to delay entrusting their children to us, until they have become utterly unmanageable. Hitherto success has crowned our efforts, even when we had to deal with individuals from sixteen to eighteen years old; though we must confess that we had serious misgivings with respect to them. Our task, however, has been far easier, and attended with the happiest results when our pupils have been under fourteen years of age.

It is easy to understand why, when the only alternative was to consign the child to gaol, the step was delayed until the case became extreme, just as amputation is adopted only when gangrene has set in. But now the remedy consists in sending the youth not to prison, but to what may be called a strict school, where, however, he goes out of doors every day with the person who superintends his education, and is even permitted occasionally to make longer excursions, provided his conduct be very satisfactory. It is impossible, therefore, to explain the neglect on the parts of heads of families of the Reformatory means we place at their disposal, and the efficiency of which no longer admits of doubt.*

* We must not omit to express our sincere gratitude to the Principal and the Professors of the Lycée at Tours, who have been good enough to permit our pupils to write exercises with theirs, they informing us of the subject of the composition. Our pupils never sign their names to their exercises, in order that their incognito may be preserved. Thus they are benefited by the spirit of emulation, without the seclusion in which it is desirable to keep them, for a time at least, being interrupted.

Being now convinced, by three years' experience, of the advantages of our new department, we would gladly see its benefits shared by a larger number. For this reason we have thought of admitting children from foreign countries who cause their parents anxiety and trouble. The distance, instead of being a drawback, should rather be considered an advantage, as it would aid to keep the lad's secret. Moreover, when entirely removed from the scenes among which he has lived, and where doubtless he has too often found persons ready to indulge his evil tendencies, the youth will be driven by the isolation in which he will be placed to endeavour to gain our affection, certain of winning it if he behave well.

We are aware that national manners differ, and that in some countries paternal authority maintains its ascendancy; but the means of preserving this happy state of things in the midst of the spirit of insubordination which threatens to spread throughout the world, lies in convincing young persons that should the evil appear it will be immediately suppressed.

Our house, which is even now too small to meet the applications for admission which come to us from our own country, would not permit of our receiving foreigners, and we contemplate, therefore, erecting additional buildings, in order that our undertaking may be carried into execution on the extended scale which appears desirable.†

Notwithstanding the deep interest we take in the new department whose advantages we have just pointed out, and notwithstanding the gratification it affords us in restoring happiness to many a domestic circle whence it has long been banished, let us assure you, gentlemen, we neglect no duty demanded of us by the Colony of Mettray properly so called—that enterprise which first brought us into co-operation, and which receives the uninterrupted aid and approval of this country.

We have on the present occasion no incidents to relate which have given to our colonies an opportunity of proving their courage, and to

* It is also most important not to delay sending the lad to us until he has been expelled from school, for if he sees his future thus blasted, there is reason to fear he will be discouraged. We have had a youth under our care whose father, hoping thereby to intimidate him, had made him believe that his name had been erased from the register of his former school. He lost all hope, saying, "What is the use of working?" Having afterwards learnt that he had not undergone the disgrace of expulsion, he applied himself to his tasks with ardour, and won a position among the best scholars.

† For fuller explanation, see the details contained in the "Notice Cochín" on the Colony at Mettray.

a great city one of testifying its appreciation of it, such as the inundation of the Loire afforded last year.*

Twice over, however, they have helped to extinguish fires which broke forth in the neighbourhood, but in neither instance did anything occur worth recording, nor, happily, any accident to deplore. On a former similar occasion one of our colons perished, the victim to zeal and self-devotion, of which one of our Magistrates has been pleased publicly to express his admiration.

The past year has slipped tranquilly away. Thus we must depend on the interest you feel in our children, when we narrate facts which, to persons less favourably inclined, would appear not worth the trouble of relating; but we are aware that nothing connected with Mettray can be indifferent to you.

At the very moment of writing these words, one of our lads has died in consequence of a kick from a horse, received while in the service of the farmer with whom we had placed him. He was quite aware of his danger, and knowing that the Colony is always open to her children when in need of aid, he begged that he might be laid on a mattress in a cart, and so be conveyed to our Infirmary. The journey was not accomplished without the poor fellow suffering acutely from the jolting of the vehicle. Nevertheless, he said to the driver, "Pray drive faster, or I never shall get there in time." The man did not fully understand what these words implied, but the Colony was no sooner reached than their meaning was made plain. The poor lad immediately asked for the chaplain with whom he had always kept up intercourse, and made his confession. The wound was mortal. Two days had scarcely elapsed when our poor colon breathed his last sigh, surrounded by his school-fellows, who were deeply impressed by his fervour and resignation. He said to us, "I have given you a great deal of trouble, but I could not die among strangers,"—words which revealed the position which Mettray holds in the hearts of her children.

If our colons appreciate the debt they owe to Mettray, their parents do not appear less impressed by it. For instance, a poor woman, whose only means of subsistence is her labour, offered to the Minister of the Interior to take upon herself the expense of the maintenance and education of her son, then confined in a gaol where he cost her nothing, solely on condition that he should be received at Mettray. An engagement such as this, contracted at the price of the severest privation, imposes a heavy responsibility upon us, rendering it our duty to return to such a mother a son who, by his good conduct, shall indemnify her for all her sacrifices.

To this very touching proof of confidence we may add a striking mark of approbation emanating from one of the great departments of the State.

* The Town Council of Tours has been pleased to cause a medal to be struck bearing this legend:—"A la Colonie de Mettray, la ville de Tours reconnaissante." [Some of these medals were exhibited in Birmingham, at the Bazaar held in 1856, in aid of the Ad-derley Park Fund.—Trans.]

In the report on the budget for 1858 occurs the following words:—

“The Colony of Mettray has especially excited our interest, and we recommend it to the favourable attention of the Minister of Agriculture. We are of opinion that a permanent and liberal grant would be justifiable to an institution deserving of praise under three several aspects—moral, agricultural, and penitential. It benefits our own country, and affords a model to foreign lands.”*

Such praise is flattering indeed. We venture, however, to accept it, for we believe it to be deserved; and we trust that the Minister will share the favourable opinion of the Commission on the Budget, and will do his utmost in future to render his grant commensurate with the importance of your services, for we have had much difficulty in meeting our expenses latterly, through the great rise in the price of provisions.

Through the kind attention of a very kind reverend friend we lately had the pleasure and advantage of a long conversation with the Rev. Father Caccia, Rector of the Catholic Reformatory School near Market-Weighton, Yorkshire. We found him a disciple of M. Demetz, and one of the most accomplished and thorough scholars, in every point connected with the Reformatory System, it has been our good fortune to meet. We beg attention to the following documents supplied us by Father Caccia:—

Annual Report of the Yorkshire Catholic Reformatory School, read at the Meeting held at Leeds, on the 18th of November, 1857.

The Bishop of Beverley having taken the Chair, and addressed the Meeting in support of the Institution which he had lately visited, the following Report was read by the Rev. Father Caccia.

The task, which it is my duty to perform, is doubtless a difficult one, either if you consider the delicate nature of the Report you expect, concerning our work in a field, previously ploughed and sown by other hands; or, the necessity of speaking of results, which, although the effect of Divine assistance, are generally attributed to human exertion.

In order to free myself as much as possible from these difficulties, I formed the resolution of submitting to your consideration, a few extracts, taken from our Diary, which, containing all the occurrences of our School, and being destined only for private use, will prove a faithful witness of the results already attained, as well as a pledge of the most sanguine hopes for the future.

* In the first instance we received as a grant from the Minister of Agriculture the sum of 12,000 francs, (£480.) which has been reduced to 4,000 francs. Small though the amount be, our gratitude is not the less due for this proof of sympathy from his Excellency, who has been so good as to express his regret that he cannot do more.

Before beginning, I beg you will favour me with your indulgence for my imperfect elocution.

As soon as the agreement, which entrusted your Reformatory School to the care of the Institute of Charity was signed, I being appointed to the work, perceived at a glance its importance since the education of youth had been my principal occupation for twenty years, in my native country. Consequently, I sought and obtained for my staff of brothers, those whom I knew to be the best suited for the work; went to St. Bernard's with the two principal brothers, the Prefect, and the Schoolmaster, where they remained for three weeks, in order to become acquainted with the practical details of a school conducted on a large scale: afterwards, I went with the first mentioned brother, to Blythe House, Hammersmith, to compare the working of the different systems; and commenced on 1st June, the charge entrusted to us.

I shall never forget the trials we had to endure at the beginning! The boys shewed most unmistakeable signs of insubordination; arrangements were made amongst them for running away; mocking and looks of defiance were seen at every turn; grumbling and discontent were the order of the day; all which, as we afterwards learnt, had been previously planned, in order to try our strength and patience.

One morning it rained, and the boys, on being set to make mats, began to grumble, and even refused to perform this prison-like work. One of the bigger boys, in particular, showed a most determined obstinacy, and arming himself with a stick, he excited others to imitate him. As it was absolutely necessary to quell these disorderly proceedings, Br. Prefect considered it his duty to make an example of the ringleader. Whilst chastising him, another of the boys, reputed the strongest and the leader of the worst, undertook to defend his companion, and attempted to strike the Brother, who, however, aware of the importance of the issue of the affair, with great presence of mind, seized his assailant by the collar, flung him flat to the ground several times, and to the great amazement of the rest, walked him off to the dark cell, in which place he remained till dinner time.

The boy, afterwards, acknowledged to me, that, he was fully aware of his fault, and confessed his readiness to perform whatever penance I should impose upon him, which readiness was confirmed by his asking pardon publicly, on his knees.

Another source of anxiety, was the appearance, near, and upon our premises, of men, recognized by some of the boys, as belonging to notorious gangs in this town, (Leeds.) They had the audacity to speak to some of the boys, in order to persuade them to run away, and even to set fire to the house. In the mean time, having acquired a sufficient knowledge of the peculiar nature of our work, I proceeded to put in practice my own plan of direction. My first step was to fit up a more suitable altar for the preserving of the Blessed Sacrament, and to adorn the house with such pictures as are calculated to convey a religious impression to the minds of the boys. At the same time I began a course of daily catechetical instructions, intermixed with moral reflections and striking practical consequences, whilst endeavouring, also, to win their hearts by kindness and marks of affection, without, however, allowing any breach of discipline to pass unnoticed.

The simple notice of my readiness to speak with them in private, concerning their spiritual necessities, induced them all, without exception, to profit by the opportunity, although I did not enforce it upon them, as an obligation. By this means I sounded the depth of their religious knowledge, which, I found to be very superficial, if anything at all; and moreover I succeeded in gaining their confidence, by appealing to their better feelings.

The clear, simple, and practical preaching on the Gospel every Sunday morning, and, on the Eternal Truths in the afternoon, with reflections upon the same, after the service in a conference of the Brothers with the boys, I have found to produce excellent fruits.

Towards the end of the first month, an occurrence took place, which, though painful in itself, has been in the hands of Divine Providence, the cause of a great moral improvement. A heinous moral fault, calling for a severe and public chastisement, was committed. The offender was lodged in the dark cell, where he remained all day with bread and water for his meals. Before evening prayers, having been previously prepared to submit to punishment for his guilt, he was brought into the presence of all the boys and the superiors, with the exception of myself, and severely chastised: all being exhorted to take warning by this example. The sensation produced was so great, that the majority of the boys mingled their tears with those of the culprit, and evidently appreciated the rigour of the chastisement. The lesson proved effectual, as from that time no great moral fault has ever been detected; on the contrary, the boys have since amended so much, that I had the consolation of not only re-admitting to Holy Communion eight of them, but also of choosing eight others for First Communion.

Another cause, and the last of general disturbance, was the running away at the end of the same first month of one of the boys who was very cunning, and received only just previous to our coming, and consequently always seeking an opportunity to escape. Only a fortnight before he had attempted to put his project in practice, having also enticed another boy to accompany him. His plan of proceeding was this:—he purloined a suit of old clothes belonging to another boy, secreted them in an empty cask, and made up his mind to jump from his window during the night. The detection of the clothes discovered his plan; he was but slightly punished, this being his first offence. On the 27th June, having been punished for telling a lie, he about mid-day concealed himself in the ditch near the house without his coat and cap, and made off as soon as he perceived that no particular attempt was made to find him. The boys were surprised at seeing no bustling or any apparent trouble being taken respecting the fugitive, and were at a loss what to think when we told them to pray for him, and that in a few days he would again be amongst them. Indeed things went on as usual; letters, however, descriptive of the boy were written to the police inspectors of the neighbouring towns, and only two days after, we received the notice that he was apprehended in this very town, (Leeds.) The surprise of the boys on his appearing amongst them so soon, can scarcely be expressed. He was threatened with the exemplary punishment of a month's imprisonment in a public gaol, but owing to the visit of the Fr. General of the Institute, the punishment was commuted to a few days' confinement in the dark cell, upon bread and water diet.

Until the beginning of July, our efforts were chiefly directed to enforce discipline, and we found many of the bigger boys had begun to lead quite a different life, showing a great affection for us, and a consoling spirit of docility, with the determination of becoming good. The daily instructions were listened to with attention and an evident desire of learning. The teaching of music, and the singing of pious hymns in the chapel, accompanied with the harmonium, a precious gift of Capt. Stapleton, co-operated much to move their hearts and make them exceedingly pleased with their new system of life. At this period, we found it necessary to cause the best boys to co-operate with us in subduing their still stubborn companions. The boys were consequently divided into three classes, according to their size. In each class the better boys were chosen as sergeants or corporals charged with the observance of discipline, whilst military drill contributed also to enforce the spirit of order in every thing. To carry out better this family system, we resolved to take our meals in the same room with the boys, and arranged the horary and occupations in such a manner as to have the boys always within sight. The following is the winter horary. At half-past five o'clock, rise, wash, and clean themselves; six, Morning Prayers and Mass; half-past six, school; half-past seven, breakfast; eight, work as follows, three boys with the cook, for kitchen and housework; three with the shoemaker; five with the tailor; two with the carpenter; two as stable boys; and twenty in the fields, with the Prefect of field labour. I always feel moved when, at the beginning of work, from the different shops and the fields, I hear the boys singing their simple prayer in these few, but touching words, repeated thrice, "My Jesus, I do this for the love of Thee." At a quarter to twelve, work is discontinued and all prepare for dinner; twelve, Angelus and dinner. At all the meals, one of the boys reads some instructive book; after dinner, a visit to the B. Sacrament, and recreation; half-past one, work as before; five, school; six, supper and recreation; half-past seven, school again; half-past eight, Evening Prayers, Hymn, and retire to rest. The greater part of the evening recreation is spent by some, in learning vocal music, and by others, in practising the fife and drum; whilst the remaining boys listen, with pleasure, to the reading of some amusing and instructive book, by one of the brothers.

As regards their improvement in elementary knowledge, you will easily understand the difficulty of teaching such boys, if you reflect that the stages of their education are almost as numerous as are the boys themselves, which, of course, renders it difficult to organise them in classes. Nevertheless the patience and zeal of the schoolmaster had a witness in the satisfaction which Mr. Morrell expressed at his official visit, on the last of July. Perhaps, if I were to inform you, that now, many of the boys are able to sing in Latin the Psalms for Vespers, and one of Webbe's Masses, you might form some idea of their improvement. In addition to a sense of duty, they are encouraged to study from the persuasion, that in after life, theirs will be a very poor condition, if dependent upon others in the management of their business, from a want of elementary knowledge.

Since July, the boys have shewn such a gradually increasing good conduct, as to encourage us to establish a Section of Honour, for those who had not only not given any trouble by misconduct, but who on all occasions had conducted themselves in a satisfactory manner: the Feast of St. Charles, (Nov. 4th,) was chosen for the inauguration of it. On the morning of the Feast, the flags were hoisted, the boys were attired in new tunics, those who had been chosen unanimously by the Brothers, were distinguished by stripes of red braid upon their collar, and the Tablet of Honour upon which their names, eight in number, were written, was placed in a conspicuous part of the house. The Hon. Chas. Langdale having kindly consented to honour the boys by his presence, arrived in time for High Mass. After Vespers, all the boys and Superiors, together with other friends come for the occasion, assembled in the school-room, and the Section of Honour was presented to the Hon. Gentleman, who kindly addressed them at some length in a very exhortative manner. The impression made by the solemnity of the day will no doubt produce good fruits by emulation, and encourage others to strive for the same honour on a future occasion.

With these happy results, you may be tempted to think that we never more find it necessary to have recourse to punishment. No, our boys are far from being angels. Punishment is inflicted, but never at the moment of the fault, except in very rare and particular occasions, and this in order to be assisted by reflection, and to give time for repentance, so that, when the punishment is inflicted, the culprit is fully aware beforehand, that it is deserved, and its justice is, of course, acknowledged.

Each Brother keeps an account of all the offences, as well as the good deeds of the boys under his charge. Every Sunday morning, both Superiors and boys meet together, when each brother gives an account of each of his boys, whose good conduct or misbehaviour is commended or reprehended as deserved. If it be found necessary to inflict chastisement for the repetition of a fault, it is administered during the course of the following week. Bread and water diet for one or more days; silence, solitude, or work, during recreation; taking meals apart, or some strokes on the hand, are the ordinary punishments; the dark cell, since the beginning of July, has only once been occupied. At the Sunday's Report, after the communion of the 16 boys, not a fault was laid to the charge of any of the boys, and in general, punishment at the present time is reserved for the little boys, upon whom religion and mental persuasion have too little influence to dispense them from sensible warnings.

Up to the present date we have received eight new boys, making a total of thirty-five, leaving only four vacancies in the present building. Our plan is to keep the new boys apart for a few days under the tuition of a boy with the rank of sergeant, during which time, their character and natural inclinations are studied by us, whilst they themselves learn the duties of external discipline, in order that when they join the class assigned them, they may naturally fall into the general good behaviour of the others, who, by their cheerfulness and affection to the Superiors, point out for their encouragement, a source of real happiness never before tasted.

I expect to see a great moral improvement in the school, as twenty-nine boys received the Sacrament of Confirmation on Saturday last. I, with great pleasure, take this opportunity of mentioning that we are indebted to our venerable Chairman, for the foundation of a Reformatory School in this country. He, for this purpose, generously appropriated a beautiful building, together with 70 acres of land; well knowing, that if the education of children, next to the conversion of sinners, was the principal object of our Redeemer's love, both these objects are obtained in a Reformatory School for juvenile delinquents. The interest he has taken, and the encouragement he has given us, in our work of reforming this precious, but unfortunate portion of his flock, increased with the good conduct of the boys, and as soon as they were prepared, he kindly condescended to visit them, and administer the Sacrament of Confirmation. The Hon. C. Langdale, having, with truly paternal affection, constantly inquired about their progress and wants, and frequently visited them, kindly accepted the duties of godfather, thus acquiring a new title to their reverence and affection.

A continual watchfulness over the moral development of the boys, in order to ascertain if it be the effect of a good disposition, rather than hypocrisy; a rigorous prohibition to speak to each other of their past lives; the enforcing of silence during work and in the ranks; readiness to attend to their wants, and to assist them in overcoming their temptations; the encouragement to confidence in the good dispositions of their superiors, and the example of paternal care and sacrifice for their sake: these are the means most calculated to win every heart, to check every bad habit, and to enforce every religious or social virtue.

The moral improvement of our boys is such, at present, that we may greatly increase their numbers, not only without danger to them, but with the advantage of making them the standard and promoters of the reformation of the new comers, who, being admitted at different periods, and singly, cannot but follow the general discipline, and be benefited by the good example of the older inmates.

This is the present condition of your Reformatory School. Thanks be to God, above all, for His evident assistance in a work, which redounds particularly to His glory, and after God, thanks be to you my Lord, Ladies, and Gentlemen, and especially to the Members of the Committee, for the kind encouragement and effectual support you have given to our endeavours, as well as for the generous assistance I hope you will give for the enlargement of the establishment, which will be the principal object of your present deliberation.

The following Financial Report of the Committee, and Abstract of Accounts, were read by R. J. Gainsford, Esq.

On the 1st of June, 1857, the Yorkshire Catholic Reformatory School passed under the conduct of the Religious Community, with whom your Committee succeeded in effecting an arrangement for their undertaking that duty. The annexed accounts are therefore made up to that period, comprising about a year and a half since the Institution was commenced, but it will be observed, that these accounts include a payment of £237 10s. 0d. to the Religious Community, which may be considered to appertain less to the past than to the future.

These accounts shew that £898 6s. 6d. have been received in Donations, £173 3s. 0d. in Subscriptions, for 1856, and £207 12s. 6d. in Subscriptions for 1857, whilst £45 3s. 0d. of the Subscriptions for the latter year are still in arrear, and will, we trust, be at once remitted to the treasurer, as it must be obvious that they are much wanted.* Should the additional sum of £1100 afterwards mentioned as requisite to enlarge the Building, be promptly raised, and the Annual Subscriptions be maintained for a few years, then there seems every reason to expect that the Institution will be in a position to receive and train, during the period of detention, all the Catholic boys who may be dealt with as criminal, in Yorkshire, with little or no occasion to draw further upon the resources of Catholic Charity, for their maintenance, during the period of detention. The subsequent Annual Subscriptions might then, perhaps, be most suitably devoted to an endeavour to find suitable employment for these boys after their reformatory training had expired.

The Reformatory School is at present adapted to receive only 33 boys; it is rapidly filling; and we shall soon be under the necessity of declining to receive boys suitable for admission, unless additions be at once made to the buildings, so as to increase the extent of accommodation. During the first year we have 33 boys, whose average period of detention exceeds four years, and we must therefore consider it requisite to provide accommodation for at least 132 boys for Yorkshire alone. It is estimated that a further outlay of £1100 would suffice to give increased accommodation for 70 more boys. The present body of religious, who have undertaken the superintendence of the school, are sufficiently numerous to manage the large as well as the smaller number, and, as Government allows at the rate of £18 5s. per annum, for each boy in the school, it is obviously desirable, on the mere ground of economy, to have as many inmates as the staff of religious may be able to attend to. Under such circumstances, an additional number of inmates would involve no additional charge upon the subscribers beyond the first cost of enlarging the building, so as to be capable of receiving them. It is confidently hoped, therefore, that this explanation may lead to further Donations and Subscriptions being at once handed in, so as to enable the enlargement of the buildings to be commenced immediately, and completed in time to prevent the necessity of refusing to receive more of the poor boys, for want of room.

* Many of these arrears have been paid since this Report and abstract of accounts was prepared.

It may even be respectfully suggested, for the consideration of our Catholic Brethren, in the more Northern Counties of Durham, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Northumberland, whether they could in any other way, so advantageously provide for the reception and proper care and training of the Catholic Criminal Boys, from those Counties, as by subscribing a still further sum for the purpose of making a yet further addition to the Reformatory School, near Market Weighton, so as to make it capable of receiving the boys from those four Northern Counties, as well as from Yorkshire. The first cost to them of such an addition, would be far less than the cost of building a separate institution, for their own juvenile criminals: and even if they could meet with another body of Religious, ready to undertake the conduct of it, the current expenditure of the two distinct, would be far greater, than if combined in one, since two Communities must be maintained, either of which would suffice to manage and attend to all the inmates in both Institutions. The advantage, we admit, would be mutual, since one result of the combination would be to diminish the average annual cost of each Yorkshire, as well as of each more Northern inmate. We trust, therefore, that our Catholic Brethren, in the four Northern Counties, will give this suggestion a favourable consideration, and if they concur in our views, promptly act upon it.

Mr. Gainsford also explained that the periods of Committal of the 33 boys were as follows:—12 for 5 years, 16 for 4 years, 3 for 3 years, and 2 for 2 years; shewing an average of more than four years, and that they were committed from the following places:—Leeds 9, Sheffield 7, Bradford 5, Huddersfield 3, Scarborough 3, York 2, Hull 2, Dewsbury 1, Beverley 1.

CIRCULAR.

YORKSHIRE CATHOLIC REFORMATORY SCHOOL.

At the Annual Meeting at Leeds, of the Subscribers of this Reformatory School, on November 18th, the proposition to enlarge the establishment for the accommodation of 70 other boys from Yorkshire, making a total of 110, was unanimously agreed to, and the raising of the necessary funds was immediately undertaken.

In Spring, the new building will be commenced, which will be fit for habitation by the end of Summer. As we have already 37 boys, we have found it necessary to prepare temporary accommodation for those committed up to that period.

During the last two months, we have received many applications from other counties, and especially from the towns of London, Liverpool, and Birmingham, as the two Catholic Reformatories, viz. St. Bernard's Leicestershire, and Blythe House, Hammersmith, London, are full, although the first has accommodation for 300 boys, and the other for 75. As no further accommodation as far as I know, is about to be prepared for Catholic juvenile delinquents, I think that some steps ought to be taken to carry on a work so successfully begun, consequently I have obtained the permission of the Bishop of this diocese, to whom our premises belong, to receive boys from other counties, provided no expense whatever fall upon this diocese on their amount, and also, that no Yorkshire boy be ever refused.

These two conditions are but just ; and therefore I cannot receive other boys, unless I am enabled to raise a fund to build for their accommodation. I think I am not asking too much, if for each boy I demand the sum of £10, to be paid upon his reception ; this sum is calculated as scarcely sufficient for raising the building and providing the bedding. If any Committee will make arrangements for a determinate number of boys, the same number of boys will of course be received in succession without payment, so that £10 will always give a claim for one inmate, £100 for 10, and so on.

For the encouragement of private individuals who may take interest in some particular boy, I am inclined to accommodate such boy upon payment of £2 10s. a year in advance, during the period of his detention, provided there is a vacancy.

I wish to make known, that the situation of this Reformatory School, with 70 acres of land, and workshops for the more useful trades attached, together with the large staff of Brothers of the Institute of Charity, who have charge of the establishment, afford ample means for the education of juvenile delinquents.

I take the liberty of informing of these details of this Reformatory School, hoping that the great interest you take in this work of charity, will suggest the means, either by Committee or by private assistance, to carry out the reformation of the unfortunate portion of our Catholic boys. It is certain that without suitable accommodation for all the Catholic boys, they will either be persuaded to declare themselves Protestants, in order to be sent to Protestant Institutions, or otherwise, to be allowed to return to their criminal habits.

It is worthy of remark, that up to the present, which is to say during a little more than one year, we have in the three Catholic Reformatory Schools 420 boys, and consequently taking an average of 4 years for the time of detention, we ought to have accommodation for at least 1600 boys.

I feel persuaded that many persons interested in this work of Charity, are deterred from undertaking it by the great difficulties connected with the opening of new Reformatory Schools, both as regards the expenses of building, as well as the obtaining of a competent staff to conduct it ; consequently, I hope to meet with the encouragement and assistance of all charitable persons for carrying out my proposition, which implies the attainment of the same end with comparatively little trouble or expense.

If any Committee agree to adopt my proposition, I beg to be informed of it as soon as convenient, in order to be able to make arrangements with the Yorkshire Committee, for carrying on the necessary buildings, together with those to be erected for the Yorkshire boys, next Spring.

All correspondence connected with this subject should be directed to me.

JOHN O'CONNELL.

“Death,” writes Jeremy Taylor, to Lord Carbery, “reigns in all the portions of our time. The Autumn with its fruits provides disorders for us, and the Winter’s cold turns them into sharp diseases, and the Spring brings flowers to strew our hearse, and the Summer gives green turf and brambles to bind upon our graves. Calentures and surfeit, cold and agues, are the four quarters of the year, and all minister to death ; and you can go no whither, but you tread upon a dead man’s bones.” For us, this thought has been ever a grave and wise one, and the death of John O’Connell has brought out all its gravity and force in fuller, and more patent truth.

Three weeks ago he wrote to us from Aldershot, suggesting a paper upon the Foreign Relations of England, and to-day we saw him laid in his grave ; honored by an attendance such as few could have anticipated ; and thus, amidst prayers and regrets, we left him ; after a busy life of care, and work for Ireland, he lies in peace at last ; so near to the vault of “Honest Tom Steel” that the long shadow of O’Connell’s monument falls on the tomb of each, whilst around them floats for ever the hallow and glory of the Liberator’s memory.

If one wished to point out to a young Irishman entering upon a political career the advantages and disadvantages of his position, the life of John O’Connell would supply the best and completest example. Here was a man of surpassing industry ; of indomitable perseverance ; of great ability ; of thorough honesty, and in all matters bearing upon the political, and social, and financial condition of Ireland, one of the best and ripest of “ripe and good” scholars ; yet few gave him credit for the ability which he possessed, and when his speeches did occasionally compel men, in their unwilling gratitude, to admit that he had done his country real service, the admission was but too often coupled with a sneer.

During the active lifetime of his father, John O’Connell did merely yeoman’s service in the popular cause, and it was only after the trials of 1844, that his special claims to be considered a popular leader, were canvassed amongst the people. He had proved his zeal and ability; he had worked twelve years of anxious national work with his father; he had all the prestige of that great father's name to back his claim to a leadership, but herein it was that the chief bar to his leadership lay, he was measured by the standard of the Liberator.

Men had grown in the belief that Daniel O'Connell was Ireland, and that in him, and in him only, and in his counsels, lay all hope of justice for the country. Monday after Monday, the Conciliation Hall was thronged with followers, who were all but adorers, and that great, towering figure, looming up beside the chairman, thundering invectives, or rousing their hearts with great thoughts of what Ireland once was, and might be again through union and peace; now drawing them into tears by a pathos such as few men in all the world could ever command; and then, after that twinkling of the eye, and dimpling smile that told what was coming, setting his auditors "in a roar," with a humour that was all his own,—had become, as it were, the spirit of Ireland: for he, and he only, could proclaim to his countrymen as did Cicero to the Romans, "Togati me uno togato duce et imperatore vicistis."

Who could succeed, as leader, such a man as this? It has been said, had John O'Connell been a man of great genius, he could have held the position left vacant by his father's death. But those who make this statement forget that one who has long served under a great leader, civil or military, can never take the place of that leader. He has had no training in the conquest of obstacles, in the use of difficulty; he has been but a subaltern; he has had no schooling in those phases of life which make men quick yet sure in judgment; which enable a man to see, as it were intuitively, the right road to success; above all, he knows nothing of that training which makes a man self-reliant, and self-dependent.

John O'Connell had not had this training, and hence, when he found the public mind debauched by the slanders of the rump of what was once the great Repeal party; when he saw that old friends had grown cold, and that once staunch supporters had fallen off; when he saw himself accused of "rattling his father's bones" to gain money; and when he read that he and Maurice had kept back their father's dead body that it might be brought into Dublin "as an election-eering dodge" during a general election, he despaired of success in working the national cause, and in circumstance which would but have made the father rise grander and firmer with the occasion, the son succumbed, perhaps wisely, for the national organization was shattered, the work of thirty years was lost—never to be restored in its strength, that is, in its unity.

Perhaps it was better for Ireland that matters thus concluded; perhaps it was better that the epoch of leaders should cease, that the era of parties should pass away; perhaps it was better that the day of protestations and charlatanry, of great promises and no performances, of soaring aspirations and grovelling deeds, of private doubts and public accusations, should come upon poor Ireland. If this be so, God's peace be with John O'Connell, he is well out of Ireland, better out of life.

And now that he is dead, the country is called upon to mark its appreciation of his honor, of his honesty, and of his services to Ireland, before Ireland grew drunk in infatuation. These services were great, and even after he had retired from public life he never forgot her, and we are proud to be able to state that he was the contributor to this IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW of such papers on Irish subjects as perhaps he alone could furnish.*

* We subjoin a list of Mr. O'Connell's papers appearing in the REVIEW:—

Mr. O'Connell was also the author of The Repeal Dictionary, of several reports in the Reports of the Repeal Association, of Recollections of a Parliamentary Career, and of an Argument for Ireland. He also edited two volumes of his father's speeches. The Argument for Ireland is a most valuable work; this book, with the Prize essays of Mr. Collector-General Staunton and Mr. M. J. Barry, should be thoroughly known to every student of Irish Political History. Perhaps no man ever investigated the question of Irish Taxation more fully than John O'Connell.

From the list appended in the foot note, the reader will be able to judge how fully Ireland, always Ireland, was in his thoughts. For her he gave up professional prospects and all that could make life prosperous; and as the days of his later life passed on, one can fancy him murmuring the words of his father addressed to the Earl of Shrewsbury in 1842. "Who shall repay me for the years of my buoyant youth and cheerful manhood? Who shall repay me for the lost opportunities of acquiring professional celebrity, or for the wealth which such distinction would ensure. I flung away the profession—I gave its emoluments to the winds—I closed the vista of its honors and its dignities—I embraced the cause of my country! and come weal or come woe, I have made a choice at which I have never repined—nor never shall repent."

It is for the Catholics of Ireland to prove their appreciation of John O'Connell's honesty, it is for them to prove that Daniel O'Connell's grand-children, the children of John, shall never want; it is for them to prove that in one case at least Ireland did not, according to her custom, forget those when dead who tried to serve her in politics, or to illustrate her in literature or art, whilst living. Doubtless the feeling this day displayed at Glasnevin for John O'Connell's family was all that his truest friends could desire, but the country must speak out, or that which should be a national contribution, will become a local semi-eleemosynary subscription.

THE FUNERAL.

(From the Special Edition of the Freeman's Journal of Wednesday Evening, June 2nd, 1858.)

"The mortal remains of this distinguished Irishman and favourite son of the Liberator, were consigned to their final resting place in Glasnevin Cemetery, on yesterday, followed by thousands of his fellow-countrymen of every rank and of every shade of political and religious belief, who respected him through life, and honoured him in death. On no occasion have we seen more uniform respect paid to the departed, than was evinced at the funeral of John O'Connell; and even those who were most opposed to him in the political strife, in which for over a quarter of a century he was engaged, were loud in their praise of his honour and his virtue, as a citizen and a man. The rich and poor, the lowly and the exalted, were present in the mournful cortege to pay a tribute of respect to his memory;—and from the highest judicial functionaries, down to the humble working mechanic, were to be seen in the long procession that followed the remains to the grave. Dignitaries of the church and large numbers of the clergy were also there to do honour to him who was always the consistent upholder of the rights of conscience and the warm advocate of religious liberty. Such was the anxiety of all classes of citizens to be present at the funeral, that carriages were engaged as early as Monday evening, wherever they were to be had for hire; and considerable difficulty was experienced yesterday and the day previous, in procuring suitable conveyance for the sad occasion. From an early hour this morning, along the road extending from the city to Kingstown, nothing was to be seen but one continuous stream of carriages and other conveyances, driving in the direction of the late residence of the deceased, and as the hour approached for the funeral to take its departure, there could not be less than three hundred vehicles drawn up in one long line on the road by which Tivoli-terrace was approached. Precisely at eight o'clock, the coffin containing the remains, were brought from the house, and placed within a splendid hearse, drawn by six black horses. The coffin is of solid Irish oak, richly mounted, and has within it another of thick lead, inside of which is a cedar shell, upholstered in white silk. On the lid of the coffin there was a silver shield, bearing the following inscription:—

JOHN O'CONNELL, J.P., D.L.,
DEPARTED THIS LIFE 24TH MAY, 1858.
AGED 47 YEARS.
R.I.P.

Immediately after the hearse, were two mourning coaches and four, which were occupied by Mr. Morgan O'Connell, and Captain D. O'Connell, M.P., and by Daniel, John, and Morgan, the three sons of the deceased, and Mr. Henry Ryan. The private carriage of Mr. Morgan O'Connell followed, and the civic state equipage of the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, in which his lordship was seated. The carriages which came next, were occupied by relatives of the deceased, amongst whom were Mr. Christopher O'Connell Fitzsimon, Daniel O'Connell French, C. O'Connell French, D. J. O'Connell, Lakeview, Killarney; Mr. J. H. Sugrue, Mr. M. G. O'Connell, and Mr. T. Fitzgerald. Amongst those who occupied carriages in the procession were—Lord Meath, Lord Gormanstown, Lord St. Lawrence, Sir Thomas Esmonde, the Right Hon. Maziere Brady, the Right Hon. the Chief Baron, the Right Hon. Judge Ball, the Right Hon. Judge Keogh, Mr. Justice O'Brien, John L. O'Farrell, D. Amongst the members of the Royal Western Yacht Club of Ireland present were:—The Commodore, Robert Batt, Esq.; the Vice-Commodore, James Edward Stopford, Esq., LL D.; William Cooper, Esq.; Rawdon M'Namara, Esq., M.D.; J. W. Mackey, Esq., J.P.; Henry G. Byrne, Esq.; Edward Clements, Esq.; J. Chute Neligan, Esq.; Arthur M'Mahon, Esq.; Sutton Corkoran, Esq.; Edward Fottrell, Esq.; William Keating Clay, Esq.; Thomas D. Keogh, Esq.; Captain Brabazon, John Harris, Esq.; Frederick Smith, Esq.; Thomas O'Meara, Esq.; John Doherty, Esq.; Thomas P. Hayes, Esq.; John Stevenson, Esq.; Daniel Sullivan, Esq.; John Knight Boswell, Esq.; R. T. Slack, Esq.; John King Forrest, Esq., M.D.; James Barrett, Esq.; Patrick Taaffe, Esq.; Thomas Pepper, Esq.; Captain Lovet, Captain Palmer, Christopher Duff, Esq.; John M'Mahon, Esq.; George R. Gunning, Esq.; and Daniel Corbet, Esq.; and a number of others, whose names could not be ascertained, in consequence of the immense crowd on the line of procession. The funeral cortege proceeded along Mulgrave-avenue, into Kingstown, where large crowds of the poor of the locality were collected, who had been recipients of the bounty of the deceased, and who always regarded him as their tried friend. Nearly every shop in Kingstown was closed, and the footways were fully occupied by hundreds as the funeral proceeded along in the direction of Salthill. As it progressed, large numbers of carriages joined, and when the head of the procession reached Monkstown, the end of it had not passed Kingstown. The shops in Blackrock were all closed, with the exception of a few, and, as the hearse passed by, the persons assembled along the road, seemed much affected, and paid every external mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and many of the working people joined the funeral, and accompanied it into town. At Booterstown, several carriages, which had been waiting on the cross roads, took up their places in the mournful cavalcade, which at this time, covered nearly three miles. As it drew near to the city, the crowd began to increase, and when it arrived at Ball's-bridge, it was met by hundreds of the people—some on foot, and others on outside cars. In every house in Pembroke-road, the windows were occupied ; and, in several instances, the inmates stood in front of the hall-doors, to witness the long and solemn cortege proceeding on its way. In Upper Baggot-street, everything that could show forth the grief of the people for the loss of the deceased, and their respect for his memory, was displayed. Every shop had its shutters up, and all business was suspended. Baggot-street bridge was crowded, as was also the entire of Lower Baggot-street, up to the corner of Fitzwilliam-street, and on the hearse passing by the late residence of the illustrious father of the deceased, the people manifested deep emotion. The funeral proceeded by the west side of Merrion-square, into Westland-row, through Brunswick-street. From every quarter the people continued to pour in, and large numbers of persons placed themselves on the battlements of Carlisle-bridge, to await the arrival of the funeral. Almost every ship in the docks and the river had their flags half-mast high, out of respect for the deceased, and when the procession appeared at the head of D'Olier-street, the bridge became blocked up by the thousands who had assembled upon it, anxious to see the last of one who had been so long a prominent defender of their rights, and the chosen son of their great Liberator. The funeral passed over Carlisle-bridge in the centre of two dense masses that lined it at either side, but so great was the veneration of all for the departed, despite the crushing and inconvenience which had to be endured, the solemn silence was almost unbroken, as the sable hearse was drawn slowly on its way.

Along Sackville-street, and especially at Nelson's Pillar, where Henry-street and Earl-street open, the same manifestations of sorrow and respect which had been observed along the entire of the lengthened route were manifested. There was a large assemblage of citizens, and while the men lifted their hats, and in brief but fervent terms, expressed their tribute to the memory of the son of O'Connell, and recalled the deeds of the father in the long battle for civil and religious liberty, the female portion offered their heartfelt prayers for the eternal repose of the soul which had just passed so unexpectedly away. The entire exhibition of feeling, so deep and earnest, told in a touching and eloquent manner, that though of late years, comparatively little reference has been made to the name and services of O'Connell, yet that both are treasured fondly in the peoples' hearts, and that it required only some striking occurrence to elicit the popular devotion to the one and grateful remembrance of the other. On every side might be heard the observation that such a display far surpassed anything that the most attached friend of the O'Connell's could have anticipated or desired ; and that the people had given another proof that gratitude was still a distinguishing national characteristic. The solemn cortege was constantly receiving additions on its route, and was estimated to comprise over 350 carriages.

At the Rotunda, in Cavendish-row, crossing Dorset-street, through Blessington-street, and along the road leading to the Prospect Cemetery, numbers of persons were assembled, and that the same feelings of grief and affectionate remembrance pervaded all, was evident from their demeanour. At the cemetery, there was a considerable assemblage of clergy, professional gentlemen, and merchants, and a vast body of the people; and according as those who had accompanied the funeral from the time it left Kingstown, and whose numbers were almost incalculably augmented in passing through the city, came up to the entrance, the pressure increased, and was frequently very severe. The crushing and consequent inconvenience were, however, patiently borne, and the people, as they poured in, having been requested to disperse themselves through the cemetery grounds, so as to admit the crowds that were still pressing forward, did so with the utmost order and good feeling.

A body of clergy, headed by the Very Rev. Monsignore Yore, P.P., V.G., and preceded by acolytes and a crucifer, in soutanes and surplices, advanced in front of the gate to receive the body. Amongst the clergy in this procession, attired in canonicals, were the Very Rev. Dr. O'Connell, P.P.; Very Rev. Dr. Woodlock, President of All-Hallows College; Rev. Mr. Kelly, Rev. P. J. Gilligan, Rev. Matthew Collier, Rev. Canon Lynch, Rev. Mr. O'Ferrell, Rev. Canon Grimley, Rev. Canon Pope, Rev. H. M'Gee, Rev. Mr. Mullaly, Rev. Mr. Lentaigue, S. J.; Rev. Thomas Leahy, Rev. Mr. Flannery, Catholic University, and others whose names, owing to the great pressure, we could not obtain.

The usual vehicle for carrying the coffins into the cemetery ground was brought forward by the servants of the cemetery board, to receive the coffin bearing the remains of Mr. John O'Connell, but a band of fine able young men pressed forward, and insisted upon having, as they said, the mournful honour of bearing to their last resting place the remains of one they so well loved. The body was borne to the chapel, where the funeral service was solemnly chaunted, and from thence to the O'Connell circle. As it was carried along through the cemetery grounds, crowds of people lined the walks, and many of them might be seen fervently offering prayers for the repose of the soul of the deceased gentleman. The choir of priests chaunted the canticle benedictus from St. Luke, the Miserere, and the beautiful and impressive De Profundis. The body was deposited in one of the vaults in the circle, and not far from the remains of "Honest Tom Steele." Within a few feet of the beloved son, rests all that is mortal of the illustrious father, Daniel O'Connell; and on this occasion, thousands visited his coffin, which was beautifully dressed with flowers, and offered a prayer for his eternal rest.

Amongst those who took part in the procession, were the students of the Catholic University, of which institution the eldest son of John O'Connell is a distinguished alumnus. These young gentlemen walked two deep.

The absolution was pronounced by the Very Rev. Dr. Yore.

SYMPATHY FOR THE DECEASED.

Immediately after the celebration of the funeral obsequies was concluded, a preliminary meeting was held for the purpose of raising a national subscription which would serve to mark the grateful sense of the Irish people of the patriotism and services to the country of the father of the lamented deceased, and, at the same time, supply the means which are required for the education and advancement in life of a youthful and numerous family, for whom there is comparatively little provision left. The meeting was held adjoining the principal entrance of the Cemetery, and comprised some of the most influential gentlemen who had attended the funeral; but as the notification could not be made general a great number of gentlemen had previously taken their departure. In addition to the more influential persons with whom the project originated, and who were present, a vast body of the people congregated, and evinced the deepest interest in the proceedings, and the strongest desire to join in whatever might be resolved on as the most fitting mode of testifying the national feeling towards O'Connell, and at the same time, on behalf of the family of his lamented son, Mr. John O'Connell. On the motion of Mr. Carew O'Dwyer, the chair was taken by

The Right Hon. the LORD MAYOR.

Messrs. Bryan O'Loughlen and Thomas Callaghan were requested to act as secretaries to the meeting.

The Lord Mayor said—I regret we have met on so very melancholy an occasion; but as it has pleased Divine Providence to take from amongst us one whom we have all loved and esteemed so highly (hear, hear)—one who was possessed of so many public and private virtues (hear, hear)—I have no doubt whatever but that the entire community will unite to pay a proper tribute of respect to his memory (hear.)

The Right Hon. J. D. Fitzgerald came forward, and said—My Lord Mayor, a resolution has been put into my hand by Mr. O'Dwyer, and as I understand from him this is to be simply a preliminary meeting, I apprehend the less of speaking we have on this occasion the better. It is a period, I believe, of nearly eleven years since we followed the remains of the Liberator to its place within this cemetery, and the multitudinous assembly which has been present on this melancholy occasion has, at least, satisfied us that the memory of the illustrious O'Connell still lives in the grateful recollection of his countrymen (applause). We have met here to-day on a most melancholy occasion—to attend the funeral ceremony—to pay the last tribute of respect and honor to “the best beloved son” of the Liberator (hear, hear), one with whom I have had an acquaintance of a great many years, and every day of the duration of that intimacy has served the more to establish in my mind the high honor—the truthfulness and the amiability of character of John O'Connell, whom it has pleased Providence at a very early period of life—for he had only attained his 47th year—to remove not alone from us, but from the care and protection of his family (hear, hear). Every one will concur with me, I am sure, that the resolution which has been placed in my hand but faintly paints what it is intended to convey to this meeting. That resolution is as follows:—

That the melancholy event which has congregated the vast assemblage present here this day, has revived in the public mind a recollection of the transcendent services and labours of Daniel O'Connell, that rare man, who, with every opportunity afforded to him, professionally and politically, in his lengthened career, of aggrandising himself and his family, died, after a glorious public life, in the enjoyment of unequalled popularity, yet leaving to his descendants little more than the inheritance of a great reputation.

I believe, my Lord Mayor, every one will concur with me in the perfect truth of every word of that resolution (hear, hear); for all must confess that during the fifty years, nearly, of O'Connell's political life every act of his, from the time when he first raised his voice against the contemplated Act of Union to the period of his death, was intended for the welfare of his country, to promote the interests of her people, and to secure religious liberty and equality to us all. We all know, my lord, that in the language of this resolution, O'Connell's immense abilities opened to him the highest honors of the State. There was nothing that he might not have acquired for himself—he might not only have founded a great fortune and bequeathed it to his family, but he neglected to do so in his efforts to secure the welfare of Ireland (applause). One may say too, of my dear friend, John O'Connell, that during his political life he in that same way neglected his personal interest (hear, hear.) He thought not of it. I can say of my own knowledge, with perfect truth, that high office would have been opened to him at an early period of his political career if he had chosen to direct his efforts that way (hear, hear). I can also say this, that when he recently accepted a comparatively humble office, it was only when driven to it by the narrowness of his circumstances, and I believe if it had not been for this John O'Connell would never have thought of accepting office (cries of hear, hear.) During the whole of his political life his attention was directed entirely to the interest of his country, and now that he is gone, leaving his family unprovided for, I understand this meeting to have been called suddenly with the view of devising preliminary steps to enable us to record substantially the feelings we entertain towards him and his family, and of testifying in the best manner their great respect for the memory of the Liberator (applause). I have said there should be but little speaking upon the occasion of this preliminary meeting, and I have to apologise for the observations I have made (applause).

The Very Rev. Monsignore Yore said—My Lord Mayor, I will not detain the meeting long. I quite concur in the just and eloquent observations made by my friend John David Fitzgerald. I need not, I believe, express to my countrymen my deep feeling for the great O'Connell (hear, hear), and how I revered the character of him who has now departed from amongst us. I need not dwell on the virtues he possessed. You are all aware of them. He was before you every day, and you were intimately acquainted with him. But there is one thing that gratified me this day beyond measure, and it is that the spirit of O'Connell is yet alive in Dublin (applause.) I believe I may say, when I hear that cheer, that I am speaking to Ireland generally (hear hear, and applause). I am confident that the same spirit reigns throughout the land (hear, hear); and I am also confident that all classes will come forward, in the best manner they possibly can, to testify their respect and gratitude to the memory of the Liberator, by contributing to the support of the family of his best beloved son. I have great pleasure indeed, in seconding the resolution. (applause).

The Lord Mayor then put the resolution from the chair, and it was adopted unanimously.

Sir James Power said—My Lord Mayor and gentlemen, I felt it was my duty to be present on this melancholy occasion, and to take part in the proceedings of to-day. I beg to propose this resolution:—

Resolved, that John O'Connell, whose obsequies we have attended this day, to whom our Liberator, his father, was tenderly attached, and of whose merits and devotion to his country so many sincere evidences have been given, has passed away, leaving a young and numerous family with means too slender and inadequate for the future support of their position in life.

Sergeant Deasy, Q.C., said—My Lord Mayor and gentlemen, in seconding the resolution that has been proposed by my friend, Sir James Power, I cannot avoid expressing my deep regret for the loss of him whose obsequies we have attended this day. I feel the more peculiarly called on to do so, because I have been intimately associated with him in the outset of his career, which I had hoped would be—as it promised to have been—both long and prosperous. Students of the same college—aspirants to the same profession—we were brought into intimate and close relationship with each other, and I was able at that early period to appreciate those qualities of head and heart, which won for him while living, such universal regard, and to which such abundant testimony has been borne by the almost unprecedented assemblage which has followed his remains to their last resting place within this Cemetery. The last sad duties to the dead have been discharged to-day; but there still remains our duty to the living—and that duty, my Lord, we commence the fulfilment of by assembling here to-day (hear, hear). We cannot hope to fill the blank which has been created by his sudden departure from this life. We cannot supply the place of the husband—the father—the friend; but we can make some attempt to compensate for the pecuniary loss which has been inflicted on them by their sudden and cruel bereavement (hear, hear). And, Sir, it is not merely a personal claim to sympathy, which we are met here to give expression to. There are strong public grounds for appeal to the people of Ireland at large, to make the compensation which we seek (hear, hear). I have mentioned that my lamented friend and I were at one time aspirants to the same profession, and I can state, that if he devoted himself to that profession, there is scarcely one here who would have filled a higher position in it (applause). Not merely his name, but his great abilities, his untiring industry, his grasp of mind, his devotion to business, would, if he had persevered in devoting himself to the pursuit of that profession, have won for him as high a rank as any one who hears me now. But, my Lord Mayor, he thought that there were higher than mere personal considerations to be regarded—he thought there was something else to be worked for in life besides personal aggrandisement, and that regarding the family from which he was sprung, there was a duty imposed upon him in reference to his country—and he discharged that duty, sacrificing all personal considerations, and giving up all the prospects of advancement, which he might fairly have looked forward to, and which certainly would have been realised. His motto was—"through good or ill be Ireland's still;" and he acted up to that motto to the last day of his existence (applause).—Some may differ as to the policy of the course he pursued in public life, but none can entertain any difference of opinion as to the motives which actuated him (hear). None can question his sincerity—none doubt his zeal—none can dispute the ability and the untiring industry with which, from his first entrance into public life, until by circumstances, he was forced to quit it, he devoted himself to what he believed to be the cause of Ireland; and now it remains for Ireland to show that she appreciates his services and sacrifices alike, and I do much mistake the nature of my countrymen, if they would be wanting in that quality in which Irishmen have never been deficient, and in which I trust they never will be deficient—that is, a sense of the duty they owe to the living who have deserved well of them, and a sense of gratitude to the dead, if they did not abundantly respond to the appeal made here this day, (loud applause).

The Lord Mayor then put the resolution which was adopted.

Mr. Francis W. Brady proposed the next resolution as follows:—

That it becomes our country, to whose material and intellectual developement were consecrated the genius and labours of O'Connell, to manifest its gratitude and veneration for the name, by a resolve to raise, by public subscription, a fund to be added respectfully to any means already existing for the education and advancement of the family of John O'Connell.

The solemn occasion, he said, which had brought them together that morning, necessarily forced upon their minds a recollection of the many great services which the father of the man whose remains they had just followed to the grave, rendered to his country (hear). Amongst all those services the greatest of all was the establishing firmly the principle of religious liberty amongst all classes and creeds, and for that reason, if for no other, all Irishmen owed a deep debt of gratitude to Daniel O'Connell, which they would but feebly attempt to discharge in endeavouring to provide for the children of his favorite son, who were now left comparatively unprovided for. He considered it would be unnecessary for him (Mr. Brady) to add another word in support of the resolution (hear, hear).

Mr. Carew O'Dwyer said he hoped it would be permitted to him, who, for many long years, served in the same ranks with John O'Connell, and co-operated with his father, to express on the present occasion his entire concurrence in the objects of the meeting (hear, hear). He was anxious that this appeal—he thought he might say, for they were all fading away—the last appeal that would ever be made on behalf of this family, to that country which they so nobly served should be successful (hear, hear). It was to him most gratifying that this resolution should have been proposed by a Protestant gentleman of the station and worth of his honorable friend, who had just addressed them, and it was fit that the sentiments to which he had given utterance, with respect to the achievement of the liberty of our peculiar altars should find response in that assembly, and in every other assembly of Irishmen; for it was a remarkable fact, that in the whole course of O'Connell's protracted career, during which he addressed more public assemblies than any other individual ever did before, or ever again would, it was impossible to find in the records of his speeches one trace of intolerance—one word that did not breathe the largest toleration, Christian charity, and respect for the opinions, on all religious subjects, of those who entirely differed from him (hear, hear). They needed no sermons, standing where they were, to remind them of their mortality, but it was a sad and remarkable precedent that no later than that day fortnight the man whom they had now laid in the earth, accompanied one of the best and purest of our fellow-citizens to select a grave for a beloved child, and he was now lying there himself. But let the prayers of his countrymen ascend with his pure spirit to plead to God for his salvation; and let his countrymen, of all classes, go to his grave and learn from his mild and tolerant character the course which all Irishmen should pursue (applause). He (Mr. O'Dwyer) entirely concurred in the resolution, and he felt extremely obliged for the patience with which the meeting had listened to the expression by him of sentiments which were too warmly felt to be calmly expressed (applause). Mr. O'Dwyer concluded by seconding the resolution.

The Lord Mayor then put the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Patrick O'Brien, M.P., said—My Lord Mayor, in coming forward to move the resolution which I hold in my hand, I can alone attribute the circumstances of my being intrusted with it, to the fact that I am one who owes the position that I at present occupy to the exertions of the man whose son we have deposited in this cemetery (hear, hear). It was, perhaps, from a feeling of that character that I have been put forward here to do what I believe is the duty of every man in Ireland—to express my gratitude on this occasion for the benefits which we have all received, and, I trust, will all acknowledge (hear, hear). The statements made by the previous speakers renders it unnecessary for me to eulogise the man whose remains we have just deposited in their last resting place; but I can testify to this, if it were necessary, but it is not necessary, for the large numbers that have attended here to-day, irrespective of religious or political opinions, testify fully that we have interred to-day, not only the patriot, but that we have also interred the man of private worth and good feeling, who had identified himself not alone with Catholics, but with every man who could appreciate kindly feeling, thorough sentiment, and the best possible social disposition. After what has been already said, I will content myself with moving the resolution:—

That a subscription be accordingly commenced with this object, and that Sir James Power, Bart., and Denis Moylan, Esq., Alderman, be the treasurers of this fund, and that a Committee, with power to add to their numbers, be appointed to take charge of the sum to be raised, and to vest it in such a manner as shall insure its proper application, and carry out the object of this meeting; and that the Committee be requested to open communications with the various localities in Ireland and elsewhere, likely to assist, so as to produce a general concurrence in this national design.

Sir E. M'Donnell briefly seconded the resolution.

Mr. T. M. Ray said—My Lord Mayor, may I be permitted the melancholy gratification of supporting the resolution and observing that this spontaneous outburst of sympathy for my ever dear, departed friend, John O'Connell, is most creditable to the Irish people. I had the high honour to be his associate in his triumphs and his trials. I knew him well, and I know that every impulse of his kind heart beat most fervently for his beloved country (cheers). After what has been said, and so well said, by the gentlemen who preceded me, it would be presumption in me to add more (hear).

The resolution was then put from the chair and passed.

Edmund J. Smithwick, Esq. (Kilkenny), said a resolution had been placed in his hands, which he begged leave to move, and in doing so he desired to say that he esteemed it a high honor to be permitted to take part in the proceedings. He was sure they were all, as Irishmen, grateful to the memory of the great man who had rendered such inestimable services to his country; and he felt it was a duty they owed to their country to take part in the proceedings, and afterwards to endeavour to promote the object in view (hear). He had much pleasure in moving that the list which he held in his hand constitute the Committee.

Mr. O'Dwyer said, before the resolution was put he would read the list of the Committee proposed to be appointed under the resolution. He then read the following list:—

The movers and seconders of the foregoing resolutions:—The Right Hon. the Lord Chief Baron; Very Rev. Monsignore Yere, P.P., V.G.; Right Hon. Sir Thomas Esmonde, Bart.; Mr. Sergeant Howley; Henry George Hughes, Q.C.; Edmund J. Smithwick, Esq., J.P.; Francis William Brady, Esq.; Alderman John D'Arcy; A. Carew O'Dwyer, Esq.; John H. Talbot, Esq.; Walter Sweetman, Esq.; P.V. Fitzpatrick, Esq.; Charles Bianconi Esq., Richard Kelly, Esq., T.C.; James Kennedy, Esq.; Right Worshipful the Mayor of Cork; the Right Worshipful the Mayor of Waterford; the Right Worshipful the Mayor of Kilkenny; the Mayor of Wexford; the Mayor of Drogheda; Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Bart., Q.C.; Edward Clements, Esq.; Patrick Nolan, Esq.; John N. Farrell, Esq.; John Leahy, Esq.; C. N. Duff, Esq.; Robert Johnston, Esq., Barrister; J. Kennedy, Esq.; and Thaddeus Murphy, Esq.

Mr. O'Dwyer, having finished the reading of the list, said—If any gentleman present wishes to have his name added to the Committee let him say so, and we will have it moved and seconded. After a pause, Mr. O'Dwyer moved that Dr. Gray's name be added to the list.

Dr. Gray expressed a hope that the Lord Mayor and the meeting would not imagine that he had acted on the suggestion of Mr. O'Dwyer and requested his name to be added to the Committee. However anxious he was to forward the objects of the meeting, he wished to assure the Lord Mayor that he would not be guilty of that indelicacy (hear, hear), and begged that the resolution would not be put.

Mr. O'Dwyer said he did not wish to convey that Dr. Gray had suggested the addition of his name. It was suggested to him (Mr. O'Dwyer) by several gentlemen around him.

The resolution was then adopted.

The Lord Mayor then announced that the subscription list was opened, and he would be happy to hear the names of gentlemen handed in for subscriptions.

The Right Hon. J. D. Fitzgerald—I beg my name to be put down for 50/ (loud cheers).

Mr. O'Dwyer then proceeded to announce the subscriptions:—Sir

James Power desires his name to be put down for 50*l.* (loud cheers); the Right Hon. Judge O'Brien gives 50*l.* (cheers). I am desired to put down the names of Mr. Charles Kennedy for £10.; Mrs. Kennedy, 10*l.*; Mr. J. Kennedy, 10*l.*; Mr. C. Kennedy, 10*l.*; and Mr. E. Kennedy, 10*l.*, making in all 50*l.*, (loud cheers); Mr. H. Tabot gives 20*l.* (cheers); the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor gives 10*l.* (cheers); Mr. Richard Kelly, T.C., gives 10*l.*; Mr. E. Smithwick subscribes 10*l.*, and Mrs. Smithwick also subscribes 10*l.* (applause); Mr. W. F. Brady subscribes 10*l.* (cheers); the Right Hon. Judge Keogh, subscribes 20*l.* (cheers); Sergeant Deasy gives 20*l.* (cheers); Mr. J. Leahy gives 20*l.* (cheers); Mr. Christopher Duff subscribes 20*l.*; Mr. W. J. O'Doherty gives 20*l.* (cheers); and Mr. J. J. O'Doherty, 20*l.* (cheers); Alderman Moylan gives 10*l.* (cheers); Doctor Corrigan subscribes 20*l.* (cheers); Mr. M. B. Mullen gives 20*l.*; Mr. E. and Mr. G. W. Fitzgerald give 10*l.* (cheers). I have the satisfaction to announce a subscription of 20*l.* from the late, and, I hope, the future, Lord Chancellor, (cheers); Mr. Henry G. Byrne gives 10*l.*; Mr. Charles Meara subscribes 10*l.* (cheers); Mr. P. J. Murray subscribes 20*l.* (loud cheers); Mr. J. Barrett gives 10*l.* (cheers); Mr. J. Spain, of Abbey-street, 10*l.* (cheers); Mr. B. A. Molloy, 10*l.* (cheers); Mr. P. V. Fitzpatrick, 10*l.* (cheers); David and Thomas Fitzgerald, Esqrs., 10*l.* (cheers).

Dr. Gray—My Lord Mayor, though I declined acting on the invitation of the secretary, to suggest that my own name should be added to the list of the committee, now that you are preparing a different list, I beg leave, as one of the few surviving fellow-prisoners of John O'Connell and his father, to have my name added to the subscription list for 50*l.* (loud cheers).

Mr. O'Dwyer announced the following other subscriptions —Mr. Philip Lynch, 5*l.*; Mr. Michael O'Shaughnessy, 5*l.*; Mr. J. S. Mulvany, 5*l.*; Mr. Thadæus Murphy, 5*l.*; Mr. Thomas Smith, Air Hill, 5*l.*; Mr. P. Gogarty, 5*l.* (cheers); Mr. J. Dillon, 3*l.* (cheers); Messrs. J. Russell, and J. O'Hanlon, 1*l.* each; the Right Hon. Sir T. Esmond, 10*l.* Other Subscriptions were announced, and the whole amounted to nearly 1,000*l.*

On the motion of Mr. O'Dwyer, the Lord Mayor vacated the chair, which was then assumed by Sir James Power.

Mr. O'Dwyer said, the citizens of Dublin had many excellent Lord Mayors, but he believed the civic presidential chair was never more worthily filled, than by its present occupant (hear). He was a gentleman who was ready on all occasions to maintain the honour and dignity of his high office, besides being ever foremost in promoting works of public utility. For all these reasons, he (Mr. O'Dwyer,) begged to move that the special thanks of the meeting be given to the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, for his dignified and proper conduct in the chair that day, and on all other occasions, (applause.)

Mr. C. Kennedy said, he felt great pleasure in bearing his humble testimony to the worth of the Lord Mayor, and expressing his entire concurrence in all that had been said of his Lordship. The Lord Mayor had always proved his thorough identification with the interests of the city—he was a true patriot; and what had been so well said of him was but the simple truth. He begged to second the resolution (applause).

Sir James Power expressed the gratification he felt in submitting the resolution to the meeting. He was sure it would be carried with acclamation. He then put the resolution, and it was carried amidst general applause.

The proceedings then terminated.

NATIONAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE FAMILY OF THE LATE JOHN O'CONNELL.

At a Meeting, held without notice, at Glasnevin Cemetery, immediately after the interment of the remains of the late John O'Connell, on Friday, the 28th instant.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of Dublin in the Chair.

The following Resolutions were unanimously adopted :—

Moved by the Right Hon. J. D. Fitzgerald, M.P., and seconded by the Very Rev. Dr. Yore, D.D., V.G.

That the melancholy event which has brought together the vast assemblage present here this day has revived in the public mind a recollection of the transcendent services and labours of DANIEL O'CONNELL, that man of rare integrity, who with every opportunity afforded to him professionally and politically in his lengthened career of aggrandizing himself and his family, died, after a glorious public life, in the enjoyment of unequalled popularity, yet leaving to his descendants little more than the inheritance of a great reputation.

Moved by Sir James Power, Bart.; seconded by Mr. Seargeant Deasy, M.P. :

That John O'Connell, whose obsequies we have attended this day—to whom his father was most tenderly attached, and of whose merits and devotion to his country so many sincere evidences have been given—has passed away, leaving after him a young and numerous family with means too slender and inadequate for the future support of their position in life.

Moved by Francis W. Brady, Esq., seconded by Carew O'Dwyer, Esq. :

That it becomes the country, to whose material and intellectual development were consecrated the genius and labours of O'Connell, to manifest its grateful veneration for the name, by a resolve to raise, by public subscription, a fund, to be added respectfully to any means already existing for the education and advancement of the family of John O'Connell.

Moved by Patrick O'Brien, Esq., M.P.; seconded by Sir Edward M'Donnel :

That a subscription be accordingly opened with this object, and that Sir James Power, Bart., and Denis Moylan, Esq., Alderman, be the Treasurers of this Fund, and that a Committee, with power to add to their numbers, be now nominated to take charge of the sum to be raised, and to vest it in such a manner as shall insure its proper application and carry out the object of this meeting, and that the Committee be requested to open a communication with the various localities in Ireland and elsewhere likely to assist, so as to produce a general concurrence in the national design.

Moved by Edmund Smithwick, Esq., and seconded by P. V. Fitzpatrick, Esq. :

That the following Gentlemen be now named as members of Committee :

the Right Hon. J. D. Fitzgerald, M.P., Viscount Gormanstown, the Hon. Thomas Preston, Sir James Power, Bart., D.L., Sir C. O'Loughlen, Bart., Sir Timothy O'Brien, Bart., M.P., Sergeant Deasy, M.P., Patrick O'Brien, Esq., M.P., Sergeant Howley, Thomas O'Hagan, Esq., Q.C., Henry G. Hughes, Esq., Q.C., Francis Brady, Esq., Carew O'Dwyer, Esq., Sir E. M'Donnel, James Martin, Esq., John D'Arcy, Esq., Michael O'Shaughnessy, Esq., Doctor Nugent, Alderman Moylan, Alderman Hackett, J.P., Clonmel, Matthew Darcey, Esq., Edmund Smithwick, Esq., John H. Talbot, Esq., Michael B. Mullins, Esq., P. J. Murray, Esq., W. J. Doherty, Esq., Robert Johnston, Esq., Edward Clements, Esq., Thaddeus W. Murphy, Esq., J. Kennedy, Esq., P. V. O'CONNELL NATIONAL SUBSCRIPTION COMMITTEE.

(From the Daily Freeman of Wednesday.)

The first meeting of the committee was held yesterday at their rooms, 54, Dawson-street.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor in the chair.

Present—Sir James Power, Bart. ; Sergeant Howley, Alderman Moylan, Francis W. Brady, Carew O'Dwyer, J.P. ; John Leahy, D.L. ; Joseph Burke, P. V. Fitzpatrick, Richard Kelly, T.C. ; Patrick J. Murray, John M'Gauran, Charles Meara, Thomas F. Callaghan, and Bryan O'Loghlen, Esqrs.

Letters were read from James Perry, D.L. ; Wm. H. Cogan, M.P. ; Charles Bianconi, J.P. ; O'Neal Segrave, D.L. ; Alderman Hackett, J.P. ; &c., &c.

The following additional subscriptions were announced :—

Patrick J. Kearney, Miltown House, 100/ ; Charles Bianconi, J. P., 50/ ; Wm. H. F. Cogan, M. P., 25/ ; Master Murphy, 25/ ; David Mahony, Esq., 20/ ; Sergeant Howley, 20/ ; James Perry, D. L., 20/ ; Henry Hodgins, 10/ ; C. Bianconi, jun., 10/ ; Master Flanagan, 10/ ; Thomas L. Kelly, 10/ ; James Martin, 10/ ; O'Neal Segrave, D. L., 10/ ; Miss Power, 10/ ; Henry Smith, 10/ ; J. Matson, Upper Sherrard-street, per P. V. Fitzpatrick, 10/ ; Rev. A. Costigan, P. P., Lusk, per do., 5/ ; Mrs. Margaret Higgs, 5/ ; Joseph Burke 5/ ; John M'Gauran, Westland row, 5/ ; Wm. Gernon, 2/ ; Timothy Greene, 1/

The Secretary announced the total subscriptions, including those previously published, amounted to 1,185/ 5s.

The following gentlemen were added to the committee :—Joseph Burke, Esq ; Wm. H. F. Cogan, M. P ; Wm. Gernon, Esq ; Jeremiah Dunne, J. P.

A circular warmly urging the clergy, the gentry, the professional and mercantile classes of Ireland to give not only their individual support, but their active co-operation, in furthering the national designs of the committee was agreed upon, and ordered to be extensively circulated.

It was also resolved, that the treasurers be authorized so to invest The O'Connell Fund in the 3 per Cent. Stock, according as the balance in bank may, from time to time, amount to 500/.

The Committee decided on meeting daily at two o'clock, at their rooms, 54, Dawson-street, where subscriptions will be received.

The following letter has been received :—

“ DEAR SIR—O'Connell's favourite son is no more ! Will Wexford, as of old, in sustaining O'Connell and his principles, lead once more in showing their gratitude ? O'Connell left poor John to the protection of Ireland. If our county consider it a duty to raise a pecuniary tribute for his large family, please put down my name for twenty pounds.—Your's truly,

“JOHN H. TALBOT,

“One of O'Connell's oldest supporters.

“Ballytrent, 26th May, 1858.”

The following letter, addressed to the Right Hon. J. D. Fitzgerald, has been received from his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Cullen :—

“Tara, May 28, 1858.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD—I shall feel happy to co-operate in any way in my power in carrying out your views to make a provision for Mr. John O'Connell's family. If I was in Dublin I would assist at the meeting; but as I was not able to be present, I beg to wish you every success, and to say that I shall do everything in my power to promote the interests of so deserving a family.—Believe me to be, Sir, &c.,

June 16th, 1858.

Since John O'Connell was laid in his grave, just nineteen days ago, more than £2,300 have been subscribed by men of all classes and religions, because they believed of John O'Connell, as Sydney Smith believed of Henry Grattan—“He thought the noblest occupation of a man was to make other men happy and free; and in that straight line he went on, without one side look, without one yielding thought, without one motive in his heart which he might not have laid open to the view of God and man. He is gone!—but there is not a single day of his honest life of which every good Irishman would not be more proud, than of the whole political existence of his countrymen—the annual deserters and betrayers of their native land.” We thank God that one Irishman is thought of by his fellow-countrymen.

The most important portion of the Report is that which relates to the INTERMEDIATE PRISONS, as Lusk, and Smithfield. Referring to these and to the Female Prisons, the Directors write as follows:—

"We have the satisfaction of reporting, that during the past year we have found the results of the special treatment of convicts in intermediate prisons, on a system explained in our two former Reports, to have quite equalled our expectations. The conduct of the prisoners, both under detention and after liberation, confirm this statement. We believe it would be difficult to find any body of men who would behave themselves more submissively to the rules, or give their labour more freely to the public service than we have found to be the case with the convicts who, since the commencement of this system, have been placed in the intermediate prisons.

In April last we located as many convicts as were at our disposal for the purpose, (60), in two iron huts, on Lusk Common. They were at first employed in levelling the portion of the common on which the huts stand, and forming it into a parade ground and vegetable garden. When this was finished, they were employed in draining the commons, and at spade labour in the fields; the former work, about which they will yet be occupied some time, is excessively heavy, and the Superintendent of Drainage reports most favourably of the willing labour of the prisoners. We have before explained that the common is to form a portion of the farm to be attached to the juvenile prison which it is contemplated shortly to erect. There will be means of employment there for some time considerably in excess of the labour we shall have at our disposal.

The discharges on licence from the intermediate prisons have, we are happy to state, outnumbered our expectations; the consequence has been, however, that the number of selected convicts on public works has much decreased. We have, therefore, been obliged to allot Carlisle Fort to a class of convicts in an earlier stage of their imprisonment, and have, of course, withdrawn the privileges and rules applicable to it as an intermediate prison.

The iron buildings erected at Lusk appear to fully answer the purpose for which they were required. In a memorandum published by the Chairman of our Board, in October last, and which is appended to this Report, a calculation has been made of the cost and value of productive labour of 100 prisoners located and employed as at Lusk, based on the experience there obtained.

It will be observed how profitable and convenient such labour may be rendered for the public service.

Between 1st January, 1856, and 1st January, 1858, there have been 547 male convicts discharged on licence, and 478 discharged unconditionally, from the intermediate prisons.

Ninety-eight female convicts have also been discharged on licence.

During that period the number of licences revoked have been twenty-five, viz., twenty-two males and three females, eight of which have been for neglect of conditions.

The male and female convicts on licence pardoned, subsequently for good conduct on probation, have been 105, viz., sixty-six male and thirty-nine females.

Very many inquiries have been made respecting prisoners discharged absolutely from the intermediate prisons in 1856 and 1857, and also those discharged on licence during 1856, before the new rules for efficient supervision were established. These inquiries, necessarily limited in their extent, (about 300), and which are recorded for inspection at Smithfield Depôt, have been very generally satisfactory, especially when taken into connexion with the circumstance, that only four of the 1,025 have been re-committed to the convict prisons in addition to the twenty-five whose licences have been revoked. We are not disposed to place too much value on this statement as conclusive evidence of their having quitted their evil courses. We prefer resting on the more positive and reliable data we are, through the amended rules of subversion, enabled to produce concerning those discharged in 1857. We may remark, however, that fifteen male convicts discharged on licence in 1856 are still employed in this city, and are giving satisfaction to their employers.

We have, during 1857, discharged the following number of prisoners from the intermediate prisons and refuges :—

This return has reference to male convicts only. All convicts on licence are reported on, if in Dublin, by the lecturer, if in the country, by the constabulary, until they receive a pardon, or quit the country.

Of those discharged since January 1, 1857, a period during which the constabulary supervision has been exercised over the convicts discharged on licence, and therefore more positive and reliable information obtained, only seven licenses have, as yet, been revoked: of these, three were for wilful omissions and breaches of conditions, &c.

RULES FOR THE REGISTRATION AND SUPERVISION OF CONVICTS ON TICKET OF LICENCE.

January 1, 1857.

His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant being desirous of accurately testing the practical working of the ticket of licence system, by a well organised system of registration of licensed convicts, whereby they may be brought under special supervision and a check be laid upon the evil disposed, has been pleased to sanction the following regulations, which are, therefore, circulated for the information and guidance of the constabulary.—

I. When an offer of employment for a prisoner is accepted, a notification thereof will be made by the Directors of Government Prisons Inspector-General of Constabulary, by whom it will be transmitted to the constabulary of the locality in which the employment is to be given, with all necessary particulars, for the purpose of being entered in a Register at the constabulary station.

II. Each convict so to be employed will report himself at the appointed constabulary station (the name of which will be given to him) on his arrival in the district, and, subsequently, on the first of each month.

III. A special report is to be made to head quarters by the constabulary whenever they shall observe a convict on licence guilty of misconduct or leading an irregular life.

IV. A convict is not to change his locality without notifying the circumstance at the constabulary station, in order that his registration may be transferred to the place to which he is about to proceed. On his arrival he must report himself to the nearest constabulary station (of the name of which he is to be informed), and such transfer is to be reported to head quarters for the information of the Directors of Government Prisons.

V. An infringement of these rules by the convict will cause it to be assumed that he is leading an idle, irregular life, and, therefore, entail the revocation of his licence.

VI. Further regulations may hereafter be added to the foregoing should they become necessary.

We submit that, taking into consideration the stringent supervision exercised, this is a most satisfactory state of things, and, when taken in connexion with some returns drawn out for a special purpose (to be hereafter explained), is of high value with reference to the future treatment of our criminals.

We have found the proportion of criminals that could be discharged through the intermediate prisons to be what we anticipated, viz., about 75 per cent.

As a testimony to the beneficial effects of special training and individualizing, there are cases of prisoners who, before their committal to prison, have been a terror to their localities, the authorities in which had strongly deprecated their being returned to their own neighbourhood on licence. We have discharged such men elsewhere, and have had opportunities, subsequently, of hearing through their employers of their well-doing, and saving enough money to quit the country.

We submit that the experience of the last two years in Ireland proves the advantage of special and individual treatment to the adult criminal. The experience of the last twelve months (during which the machinery of supervision has been made more perfect) demonstrates, by the returns, what may be done for and with criminals, based on the best possible foundation, their own exertions, under a probation in which there is a maximum of work, and only such food allowed as the medical officer certifies to be absolutely necessary for them. This period includes a number sentenced to penal servitude, and with whom we expected greater difficulty. It will be found that, though their sentence would not be shortened by good conduct or by disguising their sentiments, they have as yet strongly manifested a desire to do well on discharge.

We do not ascribe these alterations in conduct and character exclusively to religious influences. The prisoners, have in addition, the strong motive of self-interest prompting them to do right.

It has been the labour of those connected with the intermediate establishments to inculcate in the mind of the convicts (already somewhat prepared by habits of order and discipline in their previous prisons) that honesty is the best policy. That it is so is a fact beyond question. A proper and an improving police system making punishment more certain, legislation approving of longer sentences, an increasing feeling that there should be a unity of action against crime, all tend to bring this home to the prisoner's mind. The task is to convince the criminal. The more patent we make the fact by an improved police system, and the lengthening of sentences, showing that crime cannot be committed with impunity, so much lighter in proportion will be the task of reformation.

There are, of course, other and higher motives placed before the criminal; but a fact made as clear as here described will always be estimated as an important aid to the cause of reformation by those conversant with the criminal classes in and out of prison.

The mind of the criminal having thus been prepared—i.e., his former pursuits having been shown to be not only unholy but unprofitable, and being himself now led to believe, and to feel, that honesty is his best policy—he is then shown what he may, by extra industry, accomplish towards restoring himself to society; his special education informs him that, although in his own country he may be too weak to resist old associates and their temptations, there are other fields in which employment is abundant, where his unhappy antecedents will not appear against him, and where active industry and steady perseverance in well-doing will meet with their reward. It is evident what effect many months of such training would be likely to produce on the minds of a large number of criminals, many of whom are more willing to receive this doctrine favourably than would be supposed, inasmuch as they have already found crime to be unprofitable. When the will to emigrate, and, in most cases, to join their friends, is accompanied by the power afforded through their extra industry, it is not surprising to find that a large and an increasing number have left and are leaving the country, the limited amount of their means alone being the impediment.

Although we cannot too highly prize, as an important element of reformation, the voluntary emigration of the well-disposed criminals when free, to lands where labour is scarce, or advocate too strongly its beneficial effects, we are aware that a large number will still remain in their own country, with equal intention of well-doing. The experience afforded by two years of many prisoners on licence in this city, and of the whole number at present under supervision, induce the most satisfactory conclusions. The fact of employers of high respectability, after long experience, retaining those men in their situations, and still offering work to others of the same class, is the strongest, and perhaps the most satisfactory testimony we can adduce in favour of the system. Many prisoners, sentenced to penal servitude, and discharged from Smithfield, have, by means of their gratuity, bound themselves to tradesmen to be made more perfect in their calling. Although these men are free, a system of visitation voluntarily submitted to by them has been kept up, which has been found to be productive of good.

We believe that, if discharged prisoners conduct themselves as we find them to do when surrounded by the temptations of a city, and as, through the constabulary, we hear they do in the rural districts of this country, we have good grounds for confidence in the future well-doing of those who have gone to other fields of labour.

FIRST REPORT ON MEN ON LICENCE in the City and County of Dublin, for month of January, 1858, made fortnightly by the Lecturer.
—The date indicates when the men were released.

Sept. 8, 1856, D. L. Chapelizod, Employer J. N., Labourer, 10s. a-week. A most exemplary man.
Sept. 15, 1856, D. K. Crumlin, Employer M. C., Labourer, 8s. a-week. A most exemplary man.
Nov. 11, 1856, D. R. Saggart, Employer J. M'D, Labourer, 7s. a-week. In hospital.

- Nov. 11, 1856, M. M'L. Saggart, Employer J. M'D., Labourer, 7s. a-week. Doing well.
- Feb. 20, 1857, M. G. Saggart, Employer J. M'D., Labourer, 7s. a-week. Doing well as regards his public duties.
- Nov. 6, 1856, P. M'N. Saggart, Employer J. M'D., Labourer, 7s. a-week. Doing well.
- Oct. 28, 1857, P. W. Saggart, Employer J. M'D., Labourer, 7s. a-week. Doing well.
- Dec. 3, 1856, D. R. South King-street, Employers G. and R., Labourer, 9s. 6d. a-week. Retained in employment when three of his fellow-labourers were discharged a few days since.
- May 13, 1856, M. R. Poolbeg-street, Employer M. B., Labourer, 9s. a-week. Doing well.
- July 22, 1857, P. M'G. Fade-street. In hospital.
- July 13, 1857, J. S. Francis-street, Employer M. M., Labourer, 12s. a-week. No better character.
- July 13, 1857, C. M'C. Fade-street, Employer M. R., Labourer, 8s. a-week. I cannot speak too highly of this man.
- Aug. 10, 1857, P. M. Old Bawn, Employer J. M'D., Labourer, 10s. a-week. I cannot speak too highly of this man.
- Aug. 6, 1857, W. W. Ryder's-aow, Employer W. L., Shoemaker, Piece work. Doing well.
- Nov. 27, 1857, M. B. North King-street, Employer M. C., Labourer, 8s. a-week. Going on well; got married a few days since.
- Oct. 14, 1857, T. R. Bride-street, Employer P. M'L., Tailor, 3s. a-week and board. A proper young man.
- Nov. 16, 1857, J. M. Longford-street, Employer M. G., Shoemaker, Wages varying. An excellent character.
- Nov. 13, 1857, J. M. Mary's-lane, Employer M. C., Labourer, 9s. a-week. Going on well, he was dealing in fowl, but has become a bankrupt.
- Dec. 18, 1857, M. L. Bedford-street, Employer M. C., Labourer, 9s. a-week. Going on well.
- Sept. 24, 1857, P. D. Gloucester-place, Employer M. C., Labourer, 9s. a-week. An industrious, sober, and well-inclined young man, and, what is more, a good son to his aged mother.
- Sept. 24, 1857, E. H. Clarke's-court, Employer M. W., Shoemaker, 3s. a-week and board. Doing very well.
- Sept. 24, 1857, J. D. Swords. This man is going on well I hear, but have not seen him very lately. I sent a person to inquire and make out his residence for me.
- March, 31, 1856, J. N. Linen Hall-street, Employer J. K., Shopman, 10s. a-week. A man who fully appreciates self-respect.
- May 23, 1856, T. K. Fade-street, Employer M. C., Labourer, 10s. a-week. A sober, industrious man.
- April 1, 1856, F. R. Bishop-street, Own account, Shoemaker, 16s. a-week. Doing very well; married.
- May 29, 1856, T. C. Linen Hall-street. I am informed that this man is going on well, but cannot ascertain his residence.
- Nov. 6, 1856, P. H. Pigtown-land, Employer M. T., Labourer, 8s. a-week. Doing very well.

- June 21, 1857, P. M. Mount Brown, Employer M. K., Shoemaker, 12s. a-week. What may be termed a pushing fellow, not likely to want while he can get employment.
- June 22, 1857, P. K. Ballynascorney, Employer B. H., Labourer, £4 per annum and board and lodging. Rather a miracle in the reformatory world.
- March 5, 1857, P. Q. Church-street, Employer C. D., Labourer, 10s. a-week. Doing very well.
- April 30, 1857, M. C. Poolbeg-street, Employer C. D., Labourer, 10s. a-week. Doing very well.
- Sept. 9, 1857, W. R. Glasnevin, Employer M. H., Stonecutter, 10s. a-week. Doing very well; married.
- Sept. 9, 1856, J. G. Beresford-place, Employer J. C., Bricklayer, £1 6s. a-week. A most exemplary character; married to a very respectable girl.
- Sept. 10, 1857, P. C. Swords, Employer M. W., Labourer, 8s. a-week. This man was not in employment when I last saw him, but expects employment in a few days.
- Aug. 9, 1857, M. W. Church-street, Employer M. D., Labourer, 8s. a-week. No complaints.
- Sept. 9, 1857, J. M'G. Francis-street, Employer M. C., Labourer, 10s. a-week. Doing very well now.
- Nov. 28, 1857, J. F. Haddington-road. Residing with his father, who is a respectable man.
- Sept. 7, 1856, M. C. Chapelizod, Employer M. B., Tailor, 8s. a-week and board. Doing very well.
- Jan. 4, 1858, P. M. North King-street, Own account, Dealing. Doing very well.
- Dec. 24, 1857, P. N. Church-street. Expects employment immediately.
- P. K. Blackberry-lane, Rathmines, Employer M. K., Labourer, 10s. a-week. Doing well; his home wears the aspect of comfort.
- J. S. Phoenix-street, Employer B. H., Labourer, 10s. a-week. An excellent man; very frugal.
- J. H. Church-lane, Employer M. M., Labourer, 10s. a-week. Doing well; very temperate and industrious.
- J. T. Cabra, Employer M. B., Labourer, 8s. a-week and house. A most industrious and self-dependant man.
- T. L. Moore-street, Employer M. F., Stonecutter, £1 6s. a-week. Doing very well.
- R. Clare-lane, Employer M. H., Paper-ruler, 10s. a-week. No complaints; still with Mr. H.
- B. or A. Drury-lane, Porter. Working now and then on the Quay.
- P. B. Bow-street, Employer M. B., Labourer, 9s. a-week. When working he gets 9s. per week; he is not constantly employed; he is industrious and sober.
- W. T. Golden-lane, Employer J. G., Porter, 10s. a-week. An excellent young man.
- J. O'N. Kingstown. This man left the employment of Mr. S. I have not seen him for the last eight days.
- Oct. 27, 1857, B. J. Longford-street, Employer W. G., Shoemaker, 3s. a-week and board. Doing very well.

- June 9, 1857, W. K. North King-street, Employer M. L., Labourer, 8s. a-week. Doing very well.
- July 6, 1857, P. H. Francis-street, Employer M. O., Labourer, 9s. a-week. A most exemplary man.
- Dec. 14, 1857, P. T. Francis-street, Employer M. K., Painter, 8s. a-week. Doing well; but I think he is not altogether fond of hard work.
- Dec. 14, 1857, J. P. Fade-street, Employer M. R., Labourer. Enlisted.
- Dec. 14, 1857, J. K. Fade-street, Employer M. R., Labourer, 8s. a-week. Doing well.
- Dec. 18, 1857, P. C. Bedford-street, Employer M. O. Labourer, 9s. a-week. Doing well.

NOT ON LICENCE.—Penal Servitude Discharged Prisoners.

- Oct. 6, 1857, M. T. Saggart, Employer J. M'D., Labourer, 7s. a-week. Giving satisfaction to employer.
- Oct. 22, 1857, J. G. Poolbeg-street, Employer M. C., Stonecutter, 10s. a-week. No complaints. My hopes of this man's future welfare are not very sanguine.
- Oct. 23, 1857, J. B. Usher's-quay, Employer M. G., Servant, wages, cannot say. Going on very satisfactorily.
- Dec. 24, 1857, E. N. Enlisted.
- Dec. 16, 1857, P. H. Longford-street, Employer M. G., Shoemaker. Going on well.

J. ORGAN.

We have taken some pains to compile, at Smithfield, the returns appended and marked A, B, and C, for the sake of comparison, and in order that conclusions may be drawn of much value for future guidance.

The return, marked A, represents prisoners under sentence of transportation, and discharged on licence.

The return, marked B, represents prisoners under sentence of transportation, and discharged unconditionally after a longer period of service.

The return, marked C, represents prisoners under sentence of penal servitude, and discharged at the termination of their sentences.

All these classes of prisoners have been discharged from the intermediate prisons of Lusk and Smithfield, and have been subjected to the same treatment.

With reference to class A, a reference to the appended rules for the supervision of convicts on licence, page 13, will show the value of the constabulary report.

The returns B and C have been collected with the greatest industry and pains, and are as complete as they are ever likely to be made concerning a class of prisoners over which there is no legal control.

It will be at once observed, and should be particularly noted, how far more complete is the Return A, which is applicable to convicts conditionally pardoned (discharged on licence), and that it is incomplete only as regards those gone to England and Scotland, to which

* In return B, it will be observed, that there are forty-six unaccounted for; and although none of them have yet been committed to the Convict Depot, it is possible that some of them may be in the country prisons. It is a fair assumption, that if reconvicted at all, some reference would have been made to this department; this is, however, a mere assumption.

countries our police supervision does not extend. How instructive for future guidance the comparison may be made is obvious. To appreciate its value, however, and fully to recognise the importance of adopting means to produce such a return as A, it will be necessary to advert to an error, and a very fatal error, prevailing in the United Kingdom at the present day, on the subject of crime, viz., that conclusions are drawn from statistics in connexion with the number of detected offences committed by discharged prisoners. We rest satisfied or dissatisfied with a certain per centage of convictions. We ignore the undetected offences, and thereby paralyze the action which should be brought to bear against crime. Until we make the criminal statistics of the United Kingdom more positive and more perfect, as in other countries they are made, crime will flourish, and the utmost efforts at reforming the criminal prove but a partial good. We must not rest satisfied with the discharge of the criminal of many years' growth as a well-conducted prisoner. If the prisoner's training has been of the right description, it will show itself beyond the prison walls. For our sake and for his own we should follow him ; his training is incomplete unless we do. We must exercise such a supervision as shall aid him in his good, and restrain him from his evil intentions. The objection, that such a course would be an interference with the liberty of the subject, appears to us to make the liberty of the criminal the bondage of the free man. Such a supervision, acting detrimentally to the well-intentioned and newly-released convict, would be by the abuse, and not the use, of an important police duty. It is a momentous subject, the key-stone of all our troubles, and should not be rejected on light and insufficient grounds. Crime is rampant. Criminals tell us of offences committed with impunity before detection, of which statistics give no account. We have now but one colony that will take out convicts, and it has become necessary, absolutely necessary, that our discharged and professed criminals should henceforward no longer be allowed to prosecute their callings comparatively unrestrained.

It has been proved, in this country, that such supervision acts beneficially to the community as well as to the well-conducted criminal, and we have yet to learn that the Irish convict has any greater predilection in favour of police and law than those of other nations. The duty of supervision should be, in fact, a continuance of the system, and could be performed by well-selected officers of police in communication with the prison department.

There is yet another reflection for those who hesitate about the adoption of such supervision. The countries that are the most distinguished in their efforts to reform their criminals have, in all cases, instituted a judicious supervision over them when discharged. They judge, and rightly judge, such a system to be a powerful element in aid of their reformation. The more we surround the commission of crime with difficulties, the fewer offenders we shall naturally have.

We believe that the Penal Servitude Act of 1857, enunciating as it does, the necessity of passing longer sentences, will also have an important effect on reducing crime in the country. The way in which these sentences are to be passed is fully explained in a circular from the Home Secretary to the judges, in which it appears that it is not a necessary consequence that the whole time will be enforced; but that it will depend on the eligibility of the convict for release. No hesitation need therefore be felt in passing sentences sufficiently long to operate beneficially towards the criminal and the community. With proper machinery to carry out this principle in its integrity, it will be observed that the corrigible can be aided, and the desperate restrained. In the event of lapse of time and discipline of the prison having failed to improve the latter class, there does not appear to be any conceivable reason why, on the termination of his sentence, society is not to be further protected from his misdeeds by such supervision on the part of the police through information from the prison department (so long and well conversant with his character) as shall restrain him from his evil courses.

We place great value on the favourable field for the reformation of the criminal afforded by the only colony that will now receive our convicts. Under judiciously extended arrangements Western Australia will probably, ultimately, be enabled to receive from 600 to 800 convicts annually from the United Kingdom. In addition to this, it is certain that a large number of well-disposed criminals will voluntarily emigrate to different colonies on their discharge: the gratuity obtained in prison, through industry, affording them the means of so doing. That prisoner is ill instructed for his future welfare who has not, in prison, learned that a new field for his labour and the severance of bad associations are the first and the most important steps towards his gaining a respectable position in society.

We have placed forty-six female convicts on licence in Refuges during the past year; this, with fifty-two, in 1856, makes a total of ninety-eight; and we have thus been afforded a good opportunity of judging of the effects of the system. Thirty-nine of these have been subsequently discharged and respectably located; two licences have been revoked, and eight transferred on licence to other situations. The remainder are still in the refuges; and from time to time, as they can be recommended, will receive employment obtained for them by the Lady Managers.

The number (ninety-eight) of female convicts placed in Refuges has been small, and caused by the limited number under sentence of transportation restricting the issues of ticket licence. The beneficial advantages which have accrued, through the special treatment of the ninety-eight, indicates very strongly the necessity of extending the privilege to those under sentence of penal servitude. By these means the area of selection will be enlarged, and we may hope for results, if possible, more favourable than those already obtained through the earnest zeal and indefatigable exertion of the ladies who have devoted themselves to this cause.

We believe this system exercises an influence for good, not only over the women, who are thus rescued from their evil courses, but also on the inmates of our prisons, who certainly generally appear to be most desirous of becoming honest members of the community, although the probationary period through which they must pass at the Refuges necessarily, and very properly, entails the exercise of much industry, perseverance, and patience.

The result of our experience of the Refuges induces the supposition, that by judicious and careful treatment the great majority of our female convicts may be reclaimed from a life of vice; and even many of those, whose evil habits might have been supposed to have been confirmed, are, at the termination of their sentences, willing to spend the remainder of their days in an asylum, should such be provided. We are glad to state that the Lady Managers of Goldenbridge Refuge have founded an asylum, supported by voluntary contributions, at Kingstown, to receive a certain number on discharge from the Refuge at the end of their sentences; and the Ladies of Charity at Drumcondra will provide accommodation for others for whom there is no room at Kingstown. The remaining classes of convicts, who are healthy, well-disposed, and able to work, can, it is hoped, be provided for either at home or abroad.

There can be no question that, as with the men so with the women, it is desirable that after discharge, and a certain probation, they should voluntarily emigrate. This is, with few exceptions, the desire of all; and before long it is probable that they may be enabled to carry out their wishes by means of their industry.

The sentences of transportation, and the application of the tickets of licence, to them are now rapidly drawing to a close, and but few prisoners are now left who can receive this privilege. Our reports from time to time, and facts patent to all, have shown its beneficial working in this country. The ticket of licence has been in practice what it essayed to be in theory, a protection to the community; it has served to restrain and assist the criminal, and to protect his employer. From the return A, page 18, it will be observed how complete a well-regulated supervision might be made; and although the cases of penal servitude to be discharged, for some time to come, will not receive tickets of licence, we observe a power given to recur to the practice (rules for working out the Act of 1857), where found desirable, and cannot but consider it as a great advantage to the community which, instead of having the safeguard provided by supervision, would have the criminal discharged at the same period of time (be it remembered), without this precaution.

The following is the Scale of Remissions proposed by the Home Secretary, with reference to the act of 1857 :—

* Revoked for irregular conduct in the Refuges.

and efficient surveillance has been exercised over these lads by our excellent patrons, whose solicitude never diminishes, notwithstanding the increasing number of the wards.*

Our récidivistes, [individuals who relapse into crime,] who formerly amounted to ten per cent., reach now—according to the last Report on Criminal Justice, published by the Minister of Justice—only 8½ per cent., and we have well-founded hopes of seeing them decrease to a yet lower proportion.

These results, on which we may justly congratulate ourselves, may be in part attributed to the longer time that the lads now stay with us. Our magistrates are aware how important it is that the period of leaving Mettray should accord with the age at which the colons become eligible for conscription, in order that no interval may occur between the exercise over them of our discipline and of that of the army;† and they accordingly sentence them almost always to remain at the Colony until they are twenty years of age. They are likewise aware that those youths who are not drawn for the army are equally benefitted by remaining long at the Colony, as they thus have time to acquire the skill in their trade necessary to enable them to support themselves honestly by it.‡ The greater number of our récidivistes

* By patrons are meant those excellent individuals who, in France as well as in various other continental countries, and in some parts of the United States, voluntarily undertake to watch over, and aid with sympathy and advice, individuals leaving prisons and reformatories.—Trans.

† A large proportion of the Mettray lads enter the army.—Trans.

‡ The Procureur-Général expressed himself in the following terms in a circular which he addressed November 26, 1847, to the Procureurs du ressort:—

“MONSIEUR LE PROCUREUR DU ROI,—A circular issued by the Minister of Justice, dated April 6, 1842, defined in these words the character of the detention which our criminal courts are competent to adjudge in virtue of the 66th Article of the Penal code:—‘The fact must not be lost sight of that the young detentes have been acquitted,—that it is not punishment they have to undergo, and that the 66th article, in authorising their detention, has formally declared that they are to be so detained in order that they may be well brought up, that is to say, that they may receive care and instruction proper not only to correct their evil habits, but also to provide them with the means of hereafter supporting themselves by their labour.’

“The circular further states that the legislator has had the good of the children solely in view, and that their benefit alone should be aimed at by every measure undertaken with regard to them.

“MM. Demetz and de Courteilles, the Founders and Directors of the Agricultural and Penitentiary Colony, at Mettray, acting on the same principle, addressed some remarks upon the application of the 66th Article of the Penal Code, to the Garde des Sceaux, which appeared to his Excellency worthy the attention of magistrates, and of which the following is an abstract:—

are from among the lads who have left Mettray under sixteen years of age, whose moral nature we had not had time to operate upon sufficiently, and who could not earn enough to support themselves.

Our average of names inserted upon the Tablet of Honour—75 per cent.—has been maintained, and the proportion of punishments has not increased, notwithstanding the addition to our numbers.

The conduct of our lads after their departure from the Colony continues to give us the greatest satisfaction. This is a most important point, as it furnishes us with ascertained results, and proves the success of our enterprise. It is the touchstone by the aid of which the public are enabled to estimate the value of our institution.

“ ‘ They think that a short detention imposed by virtue of the 66th Article operates against the intention of the legislator ; that for the detention to be beneficial, its duration must be regulated not by the greater or less degree of criminality in the offence with which the young persons are charged, but according to the time required for their education. The effect of too short a detention is, in their opinion, to add to the miseries of these children, who are thus set at liberty and abandoned to themselves at an age when it is impossible for them to gain a livelihood, owing to both their physical weakness and their want of skill in the trade which they have just begun to learn. If, on the contrary, they have thoroughly learnt their trade before leaving the Reformatory, they are fit for regular employment, and will have no difficulty in obtaining work, when the daily wages they will receive will reward their diligence and foster a love of labour. Moreover, their moral training, all the less defective for their longer detention, strengthens them to resist the temptations which accompany their newly-regained liberty. By the youths remaining under the guardianship of the State until they are twenty years of age, when they become eligible for recruits, their relapse into crime is rendered almost impossible. MM. Demetz and de Courteilles are therefore desirous that the period of discharge should be fixed at that age. They are convinced that this regulation would exercise the happiest influence on the moral conduct of the lads. The option of apprenticing them, or of returning them provisionally to their parents before the expiration of their sentence, or even allowing them to enlist at the age of seventeen, when they display aptitude for a military career, appears to MM. Demetz and de Courteilles satisfactorily to answer the objections of those who are unwilling that the liberty of these young persons should be abrogated for so long a time.’ ”

“ The Garde des Sceaux has thought that, the experience of MM. Demetz and de Courteilles investing their opinion on this subject with authority, it would be useful to communicate that opinion to you ; inviting you at the same time to bring their remarks, whenever opportunity offers, under the notice of magistrates charged with the duty of administering the 66th Article of the Penal Code.

“ You will have the goodness to acknowledge the receipt of this circular.

“ Accept, &c., &c.,

“ DELANGLE, Procureur-General.”

An incident in which a colon was concerned occurred very lately, which affected us too deeply for us to pass it over now in silence. He came to ask us as a mark of our esteem to lay the first stone of a house he was about to build at the village of Pernay, (Indre et Loire,) where he has resided for a long time past with his family. We most willingly yielded to his request, and on the appointed day found all the authorities of the district assembled on the spot. The clergyman, although suffering from illness, had exerted himself to be present at this interesting ceremony, and the eulogium he was pleased to pronounce on our pupil, joined to that of the Mayor, proved that our former colon is both a good Christian and an excellent citizen. The inhabitants of the place confirmed these praises by their applause, and every one withdrew deeply moved by this most touching scene. That evening when we again beheld the asylum where our young colon had acquired those habits of industry, order, and economy, whose happy results we had just witnessed, we could not refrain from once more thanking PROVIDENCE for the joy we had experienced.

We endeavour as much as possible to place our lads in situations near us, that our influence over them may be the more direct and effective.

The little vessels which never go far from the shore, have less to fear from tempests than the ships which traverse the ocean; still when our lads wish to take a bolder flight we have no right to oppose them; and sometimes family circumstances make it even desirable. Thus it happened that young Dolbeau, by the desire of his father, went to New Orleans. This poor lad died soon after he landed, but he survived long enough for his excellent qualities to be appreciated. We subjoin a letter received from his father. He had previously written a most touching one to M. Blanchard, Inspecteur de la Colonie, in which he expresses his gratitude to all our excellent officers. But let the father speak:—

“New Orleans, January 11th, 1857.

“MONSIEUR LE DIRECTEUR,—This will inform you of the melancholy loss we have just sustained in the death of Mathieu Dolbeau, your pupil. After an excellent passage of forty days he appeared among us for a moment, and then vanished for ever. He lived fifty-six days in the colony, and died, after six days illness, of yellow fever. God has not willed that supreme happiness should exist on earth, and ours was of that kind which is not permitted here below.

“I never can sufficiently thank you for the good principles you gave him; he was a good son, a good brother, and a good friend; and had already made himself beloved by all who knew him. Now he is with his MAKER, and prays for his friends; let his many school-fellows remember him in their prayers, and from the depths of their hearts say for him a Pater and an Ave.

“Ever grateful for your care of him during his captivity, my son told me it was his wish to be inscribed as a Founder of the Colony.”

* A donor to the Institution of 100 francs (£4) or upwards, has his name inscribed on the list of the Founders of Mettray, which is placed in the chapel of the institution.—Trans.

He intended to have earned the amount of this little gift himself; but since he is now removed from among us I beg to fulfil his promise. Please to tell me what it is which will serve to recall him always to the memory of the institution.

"Monsieur le Directeur be so good as to honour me with a reply, and believe me, for life,

"Your very humble servant,

"DOLBEAU,

"His most unhappy father."

Notwithstanding the gratification we feel, gentlemen, in publishing these letters, of which we possess a great number, we know we must limit ourselves, and will therefore conclude our extracts with the obliging communication of our worthy colleague, M. Marion, respecting the colon Mauny, who wished to renew his subscription.* With pleasure we remind you of the fact that Mauny, having gone to Lima to make his fortune, sent, three years ago, two purses to M. Marion, each containing 100 francs. The packet bore this touching inscription:—"For my two mothers." Thus in the esteem and gratitude of this excellent young man, Mettray holds a similar position with her to whom he owes his life:—

"MY DEAR DIRECTOR,—I hasten to forward to you the enclosed letter from your worthy colon Mauny. It has just been delivered by his mother-in-law, who also brought one for me. I am delighted to find that Mauny and his young family are in good health, and that their circumstances otherwise continue to be prosperous. He commissions me to present to the Colony the sum of 100 francs—a fresh proof of his gratitude, which cannot fail to touch you; it is intended also—so his letter expresses it—as a pious thankoffering to God for the health vouchsafed to himself and his family. The memory of Mettray, and the conviction of the benefit derived from his sojourn there, are deeply engraved in his heart, and when expressing to his mother-in-law his hope of returning to France, in two years' time, he spoke of the pleasure of visiting Mettray, as one of the greatest gratifications awaiting him. He is glad and proud to be reckoned among her former pupils. Mettray may as justly boast of the conduct of so worthy a fellow, who, thanks to your care, has been restored to an honest and industrious life.

"The 100 francs from Mauny are, then, at your disposal. Will you have the kindness to inform me how to transmit them.

"Always yours, my dear Director,

"MARION.

"Nantes, July 26, 1857."

Although as regards the moral aspect of the Colony, we cannot but rejoice at the happy results obtained during the present year, PROVIDENCE has been pleased to inflict severe and heavy trials upon us, in the illness of our children.

Frequent cases of dysentery have occurred, brought on by the extreme heat which has prevailed ever since the beginning of summer, and especially during the harvest season. The only effectual remedy for this disorder consists in a strict attention to diet, and our lads, rather than submit to the necessary regimen, concealed their indisposition, and would not go into our infirmary until there was but little hope left of cure. No malady makes it so imperative as this does, to avoid any excess with regard to food, and our boys are generally temperate; but, urged by hunger, they sought all possible means to escape our vigilance in order to procure victuals, sometimes of the most injurious kind.

Notwithstanding the devoted care of our medical attendants, whose zeal we cannot sufficiently praise, and of which M. Parchappe, Inspector-General for the Minister of the Interior, has been pleased to express his high appreciation, we have with regret to inform you that fourteen of our colons have died. This is, indeed, a heavy affliction, and, with you, we deplore so sad a loss. Still, it is small when it is considered how many were attacked by the disorder. The same epidemic committed much more fearful ravages in a neighbouring district, so that we may be thankful to Heaven that the scourge did not strike down a far larger number.

This mournful occurrence, like all in which courage and self-denial can be evinced, afforded our brave officers a new opportunity for distinguishing themselves. They would not permit a single strange nurse to be employed, and several of them voluntarily took up their abode in our hospital, quitting it only when the disorder had lost its virulence.

Our harvest operations were seriously affected by the unfortunate illness prevailing among our lads, whose strength we were obliged to economise. Nevertheless, we have the pleasure of informing you that the yield was most abundant.

We cannot touch upon the subject of agriculture, without profiting by the opportunity thus given us for expressing our well-founded gratitude to him to whom our success in this department must be attributed; we mean, of course, our excellent President, Count de Gasparin. He has written to inform us that notwithstanding the deep interest he takes in Mettray, he fears the state of his health will not permit of his continuing to perform the duties of President of the Société Paternelle. Doubtless, you, gentlemen, will feel with us, that we cannot but make every effort rather than yield to a decision so mournful as this. Let us hope that our prayers may be heard, and that soon, restored to health, our beloved President will return, again to enlighten us with his counsels and rejoice us with his presence.

Our manufacture of agricultural implements, which affords such important aid to our field operations, has, during the past year, been considerably augmented.

In conclusion, our esteemed treasurer has stated to you with his accustomed clearness, what our various workshops have produced, explaining also our financial position generally. By his very full report, you are enabled to estimate to their utmost extent the heavy expenses which weigh upon the Colony. Could they be less serious after the calamities of the last three years? Nevertheless we cannot but believe that, aware of the good effected by Mettray, the country will not permit you to be losers. Who could be indifferent to our appeal, when its object is to obtain the means of restoring to an honest life those unhappy children who have been deprived of it from their very birth, and of converting to the welfare of society the lives of those who before threatened its dearest interests?

May our words serve to augment the satisfaction you must feel in having established so useful an institution; for if there be no gratification more exquisite than that derived from doing good, so neither is there any which has a more just foundation.

Directeur de la Colonie,

DEMETZ,

Conseiller Honoraire à la Cour Impériale de Paris,

Vice-President de la Société Paternelle.

[The original of the following little poem which is added to the Report, and illustrates an incident referred to therein, is from the pen of M. Paul Huot, a member of the French Bar, and author of "Trois Jours à Mettray."]

THE COLON OF METTRAY.

He was but eighteen years; that age so bright,
When life seems one long day-dream of delight,
And shows the future like a magic strand,
With golden fruit all ready for our hand.
What ecstasy the youthful bosom knows,
When, like a brimming goblet, it o'erflows
With hope and joy! When happiness appears
A debt of heaven, due to those glad years!
When we seek all, love, glory, mistress,
friend;
When we believe that youth can never end,
And that some fairy with her magic powers
Will guide our steps and scatter them with flowers.

The child of poverty knows no such dreams;
His fate is lightened by no golden beams:
Upon the tide of life's dark ocean flung,
The child of poverty is never young!
Gnawed by the ulcer of perpetual care,— Scorned by that world which seems to us so fair,—
Each day the wearying task he must renew;
For if work fail him, bread will fail him too.
Happy the man who fearlessly can dare
This cruel doom, nor sink beneath despair;
Who, greater than whatever woes befall,
Retains unscathed his virtue 'mid them all!
But if his brain beneath the load has reared,—
If, maddened, he should totter, nay, should yield;
With hunger worn, with nameless ills beset,
If virtue's laws one mement he forget,
Oh ye who hold the balance and the sword,
Remember mercy in your just award!
Think! He has struggled, friendless and
alone,
Against temptations ye have never known.

Punish his crime, but do not let your hand
With endless shame the wretched culprit brand.

When the just penalty has once been paid
Let all be ready to afford their aid,—
To link afresh the bonds his sin has riven,
To lead the way to penitence and heaven.
And if this culprit be a child in years,
With no maternal hand to wipe his tears,—
If he has never heard the ALMIGHTY'S name,—

If from the dark abyss of sin and shame
No pitying voice has ever warned him back,—

If none have guided him on virtue's track,
Say who will dare upon his brow to trace
A stigma time itself can ne'er efface!
No! rather teach him what he ne'er could learn,

Teach him the good from evil to discern,
Teach him that e'en without a home or friend,

The honest man will struggle to the end.
Ye whom kind fortune with her gifts has blest,

Of wealth, of knowledge, and of power possess,

This be your part; your generous care will win

From misery and disgrace this child of sin.
For such was Joseph. What avails to tell
All that his boyhood and his youth befell;
How early vice with its destructive blight
Sank on his soul and plunged it into night—
Who cares to listen to the weary tale?

No! better o'er the past to cast a veil.
Enough, he sinned; the judge pronounced his doom,

Shut up at first in solitude and gloom,
In the abode of misery and crime,
With one to tell him that, with toll and time,

He yet his early errors might redeem;
 That 'mid the darkness there remained a gleam
 Of hope; that at his age we conquer fate
 If we but learn to labour and to wait!
 That for him, too, might dawn far happier days,
 When he would dare his drooping head to raise.
 At length one morn the dungeon's gates unclose;
 Reckless of what awaits him forth he goes.
 Mettray receives him. Here how changed his fate!
 No more does he behold the prison gate,
 Which shut upon him grimly every night,
 Excluding hope, and liberty, and light.
 Now, when day dawns, the joyous matin breeze,
 Waving and rustling 'mid the tall green trees,
 Restores the virgin freshness to his heart, Blighted and seared. The walls which seemed to part
 Him from the world are gone. His eye may rove
 Unfettered over hill, and dale, and grove,— Over the wide fields, henceforward his domain,
 Where his own hand may sow the golden grain
 With which he will be fed. Soon will the day
 Arrive when he with honest pride may say,
 "This bread my hand has sown, and reaped, and ground."
 No surly gaolers now his steps surround,
 But kindly guardians pointing out the road
 That leads alike to virtue and to God.
 Such is Mettray. He dwelt there five long years.
 But well employed, how short each day appears!
 From bad he changed to good; from weak to strong.
 At length it came, the hour hoped for so long,
 The hour which even there still seemed so
 sweet,
 The hour of liberty; entire, complete.
 The very master chosen. It was not ease
 That Joseph sought; when some unknown disease
 Fell on the boy; the seeds, perhaps, were sown
 In his sad childhood, or his dungeon lone.

Stretched on the bed of sickness he is laid;
 Sisters of Mercy, ever prompt to aid
 The wretched, bathe his brow of livid hue,
 And his pale cheeks with pitying tears
 bedew;
 Praying kind Heaven the sufferer to restore;—
 The prayer is heard, and Joseph breathes once more.
 The weary days of convalescence past,
 His comrades gladly welcome him at last.
 Once more at Mass his accents doth he raise
 To Heaven in humble worship—grateful praise;
 When, like the thunder in the distant storm,
 The tocsin sounds! Silent the children form
 Their ranks; they march, with calm, determined will;
 They reach the spot; their courage and their skill
 Rescue the lives, the fortunes, which the flames
 Had threatened to devour! How many names
 Deserve record! But 'mid the heroic band Foremost in daring doth young Joseph stand.
 Exhausted with fatigue, with sudden pain
 He sinks,—this time never to rise again.

 He died at eighteen years—that age so bright,
 When life seems one long day-dream of delight;
 Showing the future like a magic strand,
 With golden fruit all ready for our hand.
 The ecstasy the youthful bosom knows
 When, like a brimming goblet, it o'erflows
 With hope and joy,—when happiness appears
 A debt of heaven due to those gladsome
 years,
 He never knew! His life was rent away
 Just at the moment when a brighter day
 Dawned on his fate; just as his heart began
 To feel, to know the duties of a man.
 Upon his tomb, where many a blossom fair
 With its soft perfume fills the summer air,
 There bends the Angel of repentant love—
 And Mettray counts its martyr too above.

At page xxiii. of our last RECORD will be found the Report of the Calder Farm Reformatory for 1857. We have lately received a copy of the "System of Marks, Diet, and Time Tables," used in the school, and we place the document before our readers, believing that it will be found of very considerable importance in aiding those in Ireland who are about to establish Reformatory Institutions.

SYSTEM OF MARKS.

THE behaviour of each boy is estimated every day in the Three Departments of MARKS.

II.—Schoolwork	Good4
III.—General Conduct	Moderate3

	Very Bad0*

and recorded in a book kept for each department, by the number of marks attached to each degree.

Hence, for the six working days, each boy may obtain, as a maximum, 30 marks in each department, or 90 in all.

On Sunday, there being neither labour nor school-work, the marks for general conduct are doubled, giving 10 as a maximum for that day.

The maximum of marks for the week is therefore—

LABOUR.		SCHOOL.		GENERAL CONDUCT.
30.	+	30	+	40	= 100†

The number of marks gained by each boy, gives an expression for his conduct by way of per centage.

The number gained by all, divided by the number of boys, gives a like expression for the average conduct in the House.

The boys in each House are divided monthly into two parties called Sides, as follows :—

* The whole system is based on the daily marks, and its success depends on those marks being assigned in exact proportion to the real merit of every day's conduct. High marks should not be given to any boy as a matter of course, for then he would soon come to regard them as a matter of right, and think himself injured if they were withheld.

That the boys may clearly understand the real import of the marks, the following full statement is hung up in the School Room :—

EXPLANATION OF MARKS.

- 1 means BAD.
- 2 „ INDIFFERENT (thoughtless or careless).
- 3 „ MODERATE (not deserving praise).
- 4 „ GOOD :—that is, a boy readily and willingly does all that is required by the rules of the School :—
- 5 „ VERY GOOD :—that is, he not only observes the rules, doing all which is clearly his duty, but does it cheerfully, and shews some thoughtful anxiety for the general good of the School, by endeavouring to prevent others from doing wrong, and by assisting the Masters to the utmost of his power.

† For Mode of keeping Register of Marks, seen Appendix, Table II.

Excluding the General Monitors, the two boys who had the highest marks during the preceding week, become Heads of Sides for the month ensuing.

Each of the two, beginning with him who has the highest marks, chooses, in turn, boys to form his Side, till all are included in one or the other.

When the number of boys is odd, the last boy being rejected by both Sides, goes to the Second Table for the month.

The Head Master in his discretion may make the number of boys to be chosen, odd or even, by placing, if necessary for that result, the boy with highest marks at the First Table without competition.

The marks gained by all the boys on each Side, being added up at the end of every week, the Side which has the highest aggregate, has the First Table during the week following.*

But any boy, though on the gaining Side, who has not at least 20 marks for labour, 20 for school, and 25 for general conduct, is excluded from the First Table.

On the other hand, any boy who has earned a total of 90 marks, though on the losing Side, is admitted to the First Table.

The object sought in giving the First Table to the aggregate marks of a Side, instead of to the individual marks of each boy, is, to induce boys to endeavour to keep each other right, as they profit by the good conduct of others, and lose by their misconduct.

The admission to the First Table of any boy whose marks reach a certain high standard, removes the sense of unfairness which was felt by boys whose conduct having been very good, were yet excluded from it by the misconduct of others.

The exclusion of a boy on the gaining Side, who falls short of a certain standard in each department, prevents boys who are grossly negligent from enjoying privileges due entirely to the merits of others.

Thus excluding the extremes of good and bad, the community of interest helps and encourages the intermediate class of those who both need and deserve it.

The object of the division by Sides is :—

To eliminate, as much as possible, the inequality which is more or less inevitable, in the assignment of marks by different masters, or by the same masters to different boys :

To accustom boys to choose their companions among the well-disposed, rather than those of the opposite character.

The Head of a Side generally consulting with the boys first chosen as to whom he shall choose next in turn, the order in which they stand on the list of the Sides, in an indication of the opinion which the boys entertain of each other. A useful index to the character of a new comer is often thus obtained ; boys having very quick perception of each other's character, and having opportunities for judging which the Masters have not.

* See Appendix, Table I.

MONEY REWARDS FOR LABOUR.

As the boys must look forward to gain, in their future life, their wages by their labour, a money value is also given to the marks for Labour.

For this purpose the boys are divided into Three Classes, according to their strength and ability for labour.

Boys in the First Class gain 1d. for 10 Marks.

„ Second „ 1d. for 20 „

„ Third „ 1d. for 30 „

Each boy is credited with the amount thus gained in a book called Savings' Bank Book, of which he has a copy, and debited by fines for disorder, damage, &c., and money which, in the discretion of the Head Master, he is allowed to spend.

COMPENSATION MARKS.

In case of a boy's sickness, Compensation Marks are given, so that he may neither lose in credit, nor his side in the aggregate of marks, through his absence from School or Labour, from a cause involving no demerit. They are estimated according to the average of his conduct for the previous month, and are placed to his credit in the list, but have no money value.

EXTRA MARKS.

In the longer days of Summer, task-work is given where practicable, and for over-work extra marks are given for Labour. These are not reckoned in the weekly list, but their money value at the same rate as other labour marks is carried to the credit of the boy in his Bank-Book.

DISORDER MARKS.

Negative marks may be given to any boy for disorder—that is, slovenliness in person, or clothes, or other minor breaches of good order. These are deducted from the sum of his good marks, at the end of the week.

They subject him to a money fine, reckoned in the same way as the rewards for Labour, according to his class for Labour, and as they are exhibited in the weekly list, become a disgrace.

THE MONITORS.

The Monitors are appointed and removed by the Head Master, in his discretion.

As the general conduct of the boys depends much on the General Monitor, he is paid according to their conduct as represented by the average per centage for the whole House:— $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for every 1 per cent. above 75.

A General Monitor has always the First Table without competition.

Temporary Monitors may also be appointed for labour, or School teaching.

When a Monitor teaches in School, he is paid for school-work, 1d. for 10 marks as assigned by the Schoolmaster.

The marks of Labour Monitor when so employed, have a double money value.*

QUARTERLY REWARDS.

Rewards may be gained by the boys, individually and collectively in each house, according to the following scale:—

If the average of the House be		The School shall have a	Each boy shall receive for his average of Marks.
ABOVE.	BELOW.
—	70	" "	—
70	75	" "	For 80 marks 3d. & $\frac{1}{4}$ d per mark above 80.
75	80	" "	" 80 " 6d. & 1d. " "
80	85	Half-holiday.	" 80 " 6d. & 1d. " "
85	—	Whole do.	" 80 " 6d. & 1d. " "

Any boy whose average marks for the quarter shall be less than 65, will not be allowed to share the holiday.

The average of 80 in 100 is equivalent to 4 in 5, which in the daily marks is Good, and therefore represents general good conduct for the quarter.

This brings a reward in money, on the principle that, though a boy must not look to be rewarded in school, or in life, for acts of good, moral conduct, but only for services rendered, yet, that the character which is the result of good conduct continued for length of time, has a material value.

Yet, the granting such rewards being a mere act of grace, and their withdrawal no hardship, they are made dependent on the general conduct of the House as represented by the general average; that each boy may feel his interest not only in maintaining his own conduct good, but also that of every other boy; and be led to realize his responsibility not only as an individual, but as one of a body in which "the members should have the same care one for another: and whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it, or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it."—1 Cor. xii. 25, 26.

On this principle, competitive rewards are for the most part excluded; because when they are given, the gain of one is the loss of another, and a boy becomes interested in another's being worse than himself. Thus they tend directly to selfishness and jealousy.

The exceptions are—

1st. The competition for the First Table. In this case, the competition being not between individuals, but two bodies, a wholesome emulation for good is created. Jealousy, and suspicion of partiality, are obviated by the free choice of sides.

* See disposal of Labour Marks, Appendix, Table 2.

2nd. Occasional rewards given to the boy who has the best character for truthfulness, diligence, &c. In this case, the boys themselves are left to determine by vote which among them best deserves the reward.

3rd. Competitive rewards for progress in any branch of instruction or work not depending on moral conduct, but on grounds which are evident, such as Writing, Arithmetic, Garden Management, &c. For this purpose, a number of small prizes seem better than few larger ones; because they come within the possible reach of a greater number, and therefore induce exertion in those who would otherwise abandon it as hopeless.

There is Reading during every meal, by the Master present.

Once-a-week the Boys are instructed in Music and Singing.

They are drilled two evenings a-week, from April to October, inclusive.

They have a tepid bath every Saturday afternoon, except during the Summer months, when they go twice-a-week to the river to bathe.

Through the kindness of the Rev. Father Caccia, the head of the Catholic Reformatory School, near Market-Weighton, Yorkshire, we are enabled to place the following Return, moved for by a thorough Reformatory advocate, Mr. Garnett:—

RETURN of all Reformatory Schools which have been Certified and Sanctioned by the Secretary of State under the Statutes 17 & 18 Vict., c. 74, and 17 & 18 Vict., c. 86, respectively, with the Date of Certificate; also, the Number of Juveniles (distinguishing Boys from Girls), which each of such Schools is capable of accommodating, and the Number contained in each at the latest date for which the Return can be given.

N. B.—The returns of accommodation and number of inmates are all to 31 March, 1858.

We beg attention to the following passages from the Report of the Cork Ragged Schools and Prospectus of Protestant Reformatory :—

How the progress of crime may be most effectually arrested, has long been a question of great difficulty and of great importance.

Of late years, however, the desirableness and practicability of Juvenile Reformatories have been generally admitted, and their success has deservedly attracted much public notice.

It was the conviction that such an Institution was needed in this City, which led to the establishment in October, 1851, of the Cork Central Ragged School. Its object was to reclaim juvenile criminals, and to provide a refuge for those cast upon the world without any means of support, and thus compelled to become inmates of the Poor-house, or have recourse to begging, theft, prostitution, until, at a still greater expense, they were consigned to Prison, only to re-enter, when discharged, upon their old career of vice. It is plain, therefore, that this school has been, to a certain extent, a Reformatory from its very commencement.

The originators of this design at first confined their project to the establishment of a Sunday school, but Divine Providence having brought under their notice a master well acquainted with the Ragged School Institutions of London, a Daily and Industrial School was also commenced.

Subsequently, in the year 1854, the important addition of a Dormitory was made, in which there are at present twenty-six beds, occupied by those inmates who would otherwise have had no lodging or place of shelter. All are supplied with food, instructed in the Holy Scriptures, and taught Reading, Writing, and Arithmetic, in addition to the industrial employments, such as the Manufacture of mats and nets, Tailoring and Shoe-making. Half the profits on the articles made is given to the scholars, from which earnings they themselves purchase a great part of their clothing.

That the manufacturing department has made satisfactory progress, is proved by the fact, that, instead of £1 19s. 3d., as received in sales for the first year, the proceeds of the work for the year 1856, amounted to no less a sum than £81 19s. 3½d.

Not only have the elements of plain education been thus afforded, habits of industry formed and stimulated, and the simple truths of the Gospel taught, but the committee are even now enabled to report a measure of still more encouraging success.

The following cases, a few out of many, will at once illustrate the value of the institution, and the mode of its working.

No 1, December 20, 1851.—A young girl, about 17, induced to leave Plymouth, without the knowledge of her friends, applied for admission. Having been deserted in Cork, she had sold by degrees all the clothing from her person which she could by any possibility spare. She was received, and provision made for her support, until, at the expense of the Committee, she was restored to her friends.

No. 2, December, 1851.—An orphan youth, aged 15, evidently well disposed, a perfect stranger to Cork, applied in great destitution, and was also received, until employment could be procured, and was ultimately sent, by one of the Committee, to a situation in Bristol.

No. 3, October, 1851.—A lad was received into the school, who left in a few days, and united with the mobs that attacked the master and his family; after which he was in prison several times. In November, 1852, he applied again, was re-admitted, and went on tolerably well for six months. In May, 1853, after leaving school for the day, he quarrelled in the street with two boys, whom he struck with a clasp knife, injuring one of them so severely that a warrant was issued for his apprehension. He evaded for a while the vigilance of the police, but ultimately surrendered himself, by the advice of a person connected with the school, who attended with him, became answerable for his better conduct, and obtained a remission of his punishment. The committee provided for the wounded boy, and the offender himself attended to his wants with the utmost care. For about twelve months after this he went on well, but was again led astray by his old criminal companions, and followed a course of vice until March, 1856; from which time till September, 1856, he went on more hopefully, when he left the school once more. In July, 1857, he again applied, and was at first refused; but his earnest entreaty for one and a last trial, upon solemn promise of amendment, opened the door. He remained, showing a steady attention to all the duties of the school, and an affection which could but encourage hope, until (a short time since) he was admitted, with two other boys from the school, into the band of the 53rd Regiment, and with them was sent to Chatham, to receive suitable instruction.

No. 4.—Another lad, his parents having gone to America, leaving him entirely destitute, was received into the school in August, 1852; and about three years since was placed in a situation, where he succeeded in gaining respect for good character, and is now being taught a trade.

No. 5.—Three children were received, in January 1852, having been several times in prison, for begging, &c. They attended regularly, during the day, but were exposed to much temptation in the evening on leaving school, when their father sent them into the streets to beg. The result was, that in 1853, the three were again brought before the magistrates; but the master having made an application on their behalf, they were liberated, and allowed to return to the school—he, this time, arranging for their being left entirely under his care, by making a provision for their sleeping, as well as food; and this arrangement was afterwards followed up by the establishment of a Dormitory. From this time, the eldest boy became an altered character; his conduct being so satisfactory, and his industry so great, that he was retained in the institution, for the sake of the manufacturing department. In May, 1855, he was placed in the service of a professional gentleman in this city, where he still remains; has earned an excellent character, and has proved a trustworthy and valuable servant.

No. 6.—Received November, 1856, on leaving prison; remained in regular attendance until October, 1857, when he entered the East India Company's service. As a proof of real reform it may be mentioned, that he recently sent home to his mother a considerable portion of the wages he had earned.

No. 7.—Received in January, 1852, having been in Prison for begging, theft, &c; attended regularly in the Day school for nearly twelve months, when he was again taken up for begging, to which he was driven by his father after school hours. On an application to the magistrates for his liberation, it was granted, and he was sent back to school, an arrangement having been made by the Committee to provide him with lodging, as well as food, which arrangement was superseded by the establishment of the Dormitory in 1854. From this time, he gave every symptom of improvement, seeming most desirous of repaying the kindness he had received. In July, 1855, however, when out for recreation, he was persuaded by a discharged criminal to attend Queenstown Regatta, and absented himself, without leave, for two nights, fearful of not being allowed to enter the school, if he returned. While in this state of indecision, two practised thieves induced him to join them in robbing a poor woman's cottage. For this he was apprehended, and committed for trial, at the Cork Sessions, in the September following. Knowing how pliable was his disposition, and how hard for him to withstand the temptation to which he had been exposed, the master attended at the court, and when the boy was convicted, Mr. Sergeant Berwick kindly allowed the sentence to be held over, and delivered him up to the Committee. With great pleasure, they are now able to state, that his conduct ever since, has given entire satisfaction. He is still in the school, where it is for the present intended he shall remain, as he makes himself most useful; the master speaks highly of his behaviour, and reports that, of late, his one aim seems to be, the manifestation of gratitude and affection.

No. 8, January, 1857.—A little girl, found by a clergyman, without parents or home, not quite ten years of age, was at once received, and saved from entering upon a life of vice. She remained till March, 1857, when she was sent to the Ragged School at Buckingham House.

A circumstance which recently occurred in the neighbourhood may furnish an appropriate sequel to the above examples. One of the committee, in a crowded thoroughfare, having to pass through a group of boys, with some of whose features he was familiar, soon found himself without his pocket-handkerchief. As usual on such occasions, he believed the wisest course was to forget the loss; but, on reaching home in the evening, on his hall table was a small parcel folded neatly, and addressed to himself, which, on being opened, was found to contain the stolen article, washed and mangled. Evidently there had been the interference of some unknown one, whose heart was too much moved by gratitude to allow a man to be robbed, who was labouring to rescue from ruin these unfortunate outcasts, thus deeply, yet not hopelessly, fallen.

During the present year, situations have been provided for nine of the inmates, in which they are entirely supporting themselves; also for three who are supporting themselves partially; in addition to one boy who has been sent for by his relatives in America.

These facts, alone, would suffice to show that the Almighty has not withholden His blessing from this Institution, and to make the Committee feel that they must not relax their efforts while the promise remains—"Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days."

NEW PROTESTANT REFORMATORY.

The Committee are well aware that the Institution, as far as the Reformatory part is concerned, is not at all as effective as it might be made. Of this they have long been fully convinced, and always have looked forward to the time when their operations could be fully established on an extended and permanent scale. It is a matter of congratulation, that a Reformatory in Cork is no new experiment; and that our friends, now so anxious on the subject, have but to aid the legitimate development of one long established, and which has never met with the public encouragement and support it deserved.

Without at present going into detail they beg to state, that they desire now to raise the sum of, at least, £500, and that a permanent increase of subscriptions is also required. With the sum mentioned your Committee believe a suitable building, with ground attached, can be procured for the establishment of a regular Reformatory for juvenile criminals, which shall still embrace all the objects of a Ragged Shhool and Home for Destitute Children, and be conducted on the same leading principles as those that have been observed for six years past in the conduct of the above-named Institution.

This, then, is the object now presented to public notice. It is well to remember the fact, that it costs from four to six times more for the maintenance and training of a criminal, than for the maintenance and training of a child in an Industrial School. Far more expensive is it to society to allow a child to become a thief or a murderer than to teach him to discharge his duties to God and man.

The following letter from our good friend, Father Caccia, is of very great importance, and we beg the attention of our readers to it:—

My dear Sir—As many of your readers have expressed their views relative to the disposal of our Reformatory boys, allow me also to make a few observations on the same subject.

In November last, meeting in Leeds with the Very Rev. Father Pinet, (a native of Canada), he kindly undertook, at my suggestion, to open a correspondence with the President of the Society of St. Vincent of Paul, residing at Quebec, in order to obtain his patronage for those boys of this establishment who might have a desire to emigrate. I acquainted the Right Rev. Abbot of Mount St. Bernard's, with my project on the occasion of his paying me a visit in January last; he highly approved of it, and desired that it should be adopted, in common, by the three Catholic Reformatories. It was with pleasure I saw him sounding public opinion on this subject. Amongst the different suggestions put forth in reply, I agree for the most part with those of my esteemed friend Mr. Gainsford, of Leeds; but it seems to me that all have grounded their suggestions upon the certainty of employment being obtained for the boys at home when dismissed from the Reformatory. This, certainly, exists only in Catholic countries, where applications for boys of this class by tradesmen and shopkeepers are so numerous, that all without exception, are engaged even before the time of their dismissal. Catholics, in general, acknowledge that religion really possesses the means of a real reformation. Is it so in England? This question should be answered before it can be admitted, as a certainty, that employment can always be obtained at home.

Anglicanism, especially at the present time, when the Lutheran doctrine about Justification prevails in this country, educates all classes of society to a feeling of distrust in a real amendment, and generates a suspicion of those who are known to have been at one time bad. I do not think it necessary to speak at length upon this national feeling, as it is self-evident to any thinking person. Though it is but an opinion of mine, allow me to say that I fear this feeling is also entertained by Catholics, and especially by converts, as the effect of a Protestant education. I should be happy to be wrong; but if this be really the predominant feeling, what chance of employment is there for our boys? Besides, those Catholics who can give employment are few. The majority of our Catholic poor, with whom, of course, our Reformatory boys must also be reckoned, are Irish. Does any one think it advisable to send these boys to their former abodes? Let such a one reflect that there lay their former snares.

After all, let us revert to the practical point of view. Reformatory boys are, in the greater part, engaged in field labor. Are Catholic farmers so numerous as to employ them all? Now, taking into consideration the national feeling of distrust, together with these circumstances, I submit to the consideration of all good-hearted Catholics the following plan:—

1st.—In every Reformatory an annual allowance—say £1 for each boy—should be set apart for supplying the boys according to their respective wants, on their entering into society, as I am doing at this present moment. This fund may be increased by contributions.

2nd.—An external patronage, charged with obtaining employment, and at the same time, exercising a moral control, may be found in the Societies of St. Vincent of Paul, whose Central Committee will receive from the Managers of the Reformatories the requirements and the circumstances of each boy previous to his dismissal.

3rd.—The same patronage will assist those boys to emigrate, who, either because of bad parents, a doubtful reformation, or difficulty in obtaining employment, are exposed to the danger of a relapse, or the inability of procuring the necessaries of life.

This is simply a sketch, leaving to more experienced individuals, especially to the Right Rev. Father Abbot, its development into an organized plan. I shall most cordially support some such, or a similar, arrangement for the proper disposal of our boys.

Believe me to remain,

Yours truly,

C. CACCIA.

INTERNATIONAL BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

(Association internationale de Bienfaisance).

When the Penitentiary Congress was held at Brussels in September, 1847, many members of that assembly passed a resolution to form an Association having the following objects:—

1. To put into communication with each other those who, in various countries, were working for the benefit of industrial and indigent classes.

2 To regulate and facilitate correspondence between these persons, and the various Associations instituted for the same ends.

3. To establish a permanent interchange of official documents (renseignements), reports, and publications amongst the members of the general Association, and between their respective countries.

4. To diffuse, by all convenient means, ideas and useful projects, to bring out experiments (produire des essais), and to establish the results of past experience, to make those institutions known and appreciated, and encourage those labours, the aim or tendency of which is of a nature to interest the Association, and to exercise a beneficial interest on society in general.

The carrying out of this resolution was confided to several members of the Congress, and a committee was formed at Paris to represent the Association, the statutes of which were published there in the "Annales de la Charité," October, 1847.

The events of 1848 retarded its operations, which were, however, renewed as speedily as possible, Agricultural, Hygienic, and Statistical Congresses being held at Brussels in 1848, 1851, 1852, and 1853. In July, 1855, the "Société d'Economie charitable," succeeded in arranging for an International Charitable Conference at Paris, when it was fully agreed that such meetings should take place periodically. Accordingly a Congress was held at Brussels in September, 1856, and another at Frankfort-on-the-Maine in September, 1857.

This short sketch shows the desire and necessity of uniting and concerting for the examination and solution of questions relating to charitable undertakings. As a member of the Congress of 1847 said—"Thanks to this assembly of men already accustomed to the study and practice of benevolence, and representing almost all civilized lands, the moment is come for establishing amongst different nations an interchange of ideas, of labours, and of charitable precepts (enseignements) for multiplying reports and other communications between men who are everywhere occupied for the welfare of those who labour and who suffer—for submitting to a comparative study and searching scrutiny all questions touching the relief of misery, and for seeking their solution, not in vain and barren theories, but in tangible action and practical knowledge; in short, to apply to Charity what has been successfully done for Science and Industry, and which now renders locomotion rapid and correspondence easy, and makes the light and experience of all available for the moral and physical amelioration of the laboring and suffering classes of every land."

About a hundred persons, of more than twenty countries, and known, for the most part, by their useful labours, have adhered to the project of forming, for this end, an International Association, of which only the definitive organization remains to be determined.

It had become evident that international correspondence and communications could not be satisfactorily maintained without some permanent bond of union, and hence the Brussels Congress decided on the formation of an organized Institution.

The following statutes have been framed with a view of satisfying these various exigencies, and of attaining the manifold objects indicated. They were unanimously adopted by the Frankfort Congress, September 16, 1857.

STATUTES.

Objects of the Institution.

I. An International Benevolent Association is hereby formed, having for its objects:—

1. To put into communication with each other those who, in various lands, are occupied with the amelioration of the condition of the labouring and indigent classes.
2. To constitute a kind of bond of union amongst Institutions and Associations formed for benevolent, provident, and reformatory objects, as also for popular education, which should lead to reciprocal explanation of their objects, and, in case of need, to mutual aid.
3. To establish a permanent interchange of official documents (renseignements), reports, and publications amongst the members of the Association, and between the various countries represented.
4. To make useful schemes and institutions known and appreciated, to establish the results of experiments, and to encourage labours which are of a nature to interest the Association, and to exert a beneficial influence on society at large.

Organization and Direction of the Association.

II. The Association is composed of all persons, who, in various countries, occupy themselves with the amelioration of the condition of the industrial and indigent classes, and who adhere to the present regulations.

III. It is directed by a Council, composed of members belonging to different countries.

This Council institutes a centre of administration, or central agency whose seat it fixes, and takes all measures necessary to give to the Association, the unity, extension, and impulse which will enable it to attain the objects of its formation.

IV. The members of the council are at first nominated by the committee (bureau) of the International Benevolent Congress at Frankfort.

V. The Council can add to the number of its members, according to circumstances and requirements.

VI. It puts itself in communication, in each country, with the benevolent, provident, and educational institutions and societies for public usefulness, which might be united with the International Association.

VII. The members of the Council belonging to each country constitute, as much as possible, an auxiliary agency amongst themselves, to carry on correspondence with the central agency.

The work of auxiliary agency might also be assigned to existing Associations.

VIII. The members of the Association are admitted by the agency of the nation to which they belong, by the central agency, or by its delegate, to whom their names, professions, and addresses are transmitted for insertion in the registers. Notice should be given to the same agency of any resignation or change of residence

IX. Each member engages :

To reply to any questions put to him, in the name of the Association, by the Council, the auxiliary agency, or the central agency ; to communicate all documents relative to the public and private benevolent institutions, and the provident, educational, and reformatory establishments of the country or locality where he lives ; To assist, as much as possible, at the general meetings and international congresses, and in case of prevention, to send in writing the communications he would have made ;

To aid to the utmost the members, at home or abroad, in the researches and labours with which they are charged by the Association ;

To pay a contribution of ten francs per annum, applicable to the general expenses of the Association, and to the publication of the Bulletin of International correspondence. This contribution is also paid by the members of the Council.

X. The amount of the contributions is transmitted to the central agency, who give an annual statement in the Bulletin, of the use made of them.

XI. The members of the Association have a right to all documents which they require, and which the Association can procure for them. All questions are replied to which may be addressed by them either to the auxiliary agency, or, by its medium, to the central agency, on subjects attended to by the Society.

XII. The members of the Association, by applying to the members of the Council, or the agency for their country, may obtain a title or circular letter, by means of which they will be put into communication with the members and agencies in other countries, who will facilitate their visits and researches, and procure for them the information they may require in their foreign travels.

International Correspondence—Bulletin.

XIII. The central agency publishes every six months, or more often, if thought necessary, a Bulletin, containing a list, and as much as possible, an analytical summary, of any publications, reports, and, documents relating to the objects of the Association.

XIV. In order to facilitate the regular publication of this Bulletin, the members of the Council, and the agencies of the different countries will transmit to the central agency either the titles of publications or the publications themselves, which enter into the design of the Bulletin, and will apply themselves as much as possible to establish a special Bulletin of benevolence for the use their own countrymen.

The works are deposited in the library of the central agency, where they can be consulted by those interested.

XV. The Bulletin is forwarded gratuitously to the members of the Council, the agencies, and the members of the Association. Other persons are charged an amount fixed by the central agency.

XVI. The exchange of publications, reports, and documents, will take place as regularly as possible, between the various agencies and the members of the Council.

For this purpose they will make inquiries for, and give notice of the most safe, prompt, and inexpensive mode of transmission.

General Assemblies—International Congresses.

XVII. The members of the Council, and the agencies of the various countries, will concert together the organization and convocation of general assemblies and international congresses, at stated periods, and in various places.

At these meetings, the position, progress, and results of the Association will be made known, and all measures will be taken necessary to the extension and attainment of its objects.

PROVISIONAL ARRANGEMENTS.

The seat of the central agency is provisionally fixed at Brussels. The Bulletin will be published in French.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

A Letter from Mrs. B. W., Richmond, to the Editor, on some very important matters.

Richmond, June 8, 1858.

MY DEAR SIR,

I thought my second letter to you would have been my last, but as you think it important to the cause just now under consideration, that I should write what I had detailed to you viva voce, I submit. You have the right to guide in this matter. Your efforts have gained nearly all the friends who have helped, or are about to help, the poor reformed prisoners in this country. Wherever the IRISH QUARTERLY is read, there, the pleading in favour of the penitent, and the neglected, houseless child, has excited in some kind heart, hitherto indifferent (because ignorant or heedless), an impulse to aid, and make amends for past neglect by active sympathy with those, now enlisted by your exertions for the coming struggle.

Here then are my facts :—

You remember my telling you of my anxiety to place the last of our five reformatory girls ; how she was become a heavy charge to us, after the other interns had been placed, her circumstances being more difficult to conquer than the other girls, as she had not passed through Golden Bridge Reformatory, but came to us from Cork prison. An excellent place had been offered to her, but on condition that I should call, and express personally what I had already written in her discharge. I feared to visit as I knew I should be catechised as to her previous places of abode, and, therefore, was obliged to decline.

However, thank God, we still held on, giving her sufficient to pay for her support weekly, hoping for providential help from some quarter. Affairs were in this condition when, one day, she came to see me, and said quite suddenly, “ O ma’am, I have something to tell you ! ” She looked so embarrassed and agitated, and fixed her eyes on me in such a supplicating manner that I feared she had got into some scrape, and I said, “ What is the matter, child ? tell me now at once ! ” “ Why, ma’am, I want you to give me leave to get married!" I was confounded, for the fear of such a possibility for one of our poor girls had often haunted me, for of course the difficulty would then really commence. Concealing my anxiety, I said of course she knew how pleased I should feel at having her happily settled in a home of her own, and I then asked how it came to pass—who it was that wished to marry her. She answered that it was N——, brother to one of our Industrial children, who had taken a "liking to her way of going on," and was coming to see me to ask my leave, as Susan had accepted him on the condition that I should consent. I at once asked if she had told him her previous history. "No." "Well then, my poor child, he must be made aware of it without further delay!" I felt for the poor girl, but I had but one way to act, so after a long talk she consented that I should tell him when he came in the evening as agreed. Here was a painful task. He was waiting for her all this time outside my door. "O ma'am, how will I ever look in his face again?" I comforted her as well as I could, persuaded her it was better he should give her up, than lose faith and trust after marriage. She left me then, she said, with a load off her heart.

In the evening came the "boy." He began by detailing to me all the virtues he discovered in Susan. How good and industrious she was, always steady and quiet, no taste for gadding or "cosheering" like the women of Mud Island. How she was able to earn her bread (she had made a gown for his sister, and was sometimes engaged out of the school for a day's work in the neighbourhood); in fine he wished to marry her, and he hoped to make her a good husband. And then he dilated on all his own virtues. How he worked always with his father, never asking a penny from him, giving him his earnings, and only accepting, in return, food and clothes. How he was a country boy, and mixed with none of the people about Mud Island. How it was now time for him to settle and do for himself, and much more that would be too long to write. Well, it was now my turn. I began by putting fear into his very heart, when I asked him did he know what Susan had been before I took her into my institution? How he changed, and how troubled and frightened his countenance became! I watched him anxiously, while I prepared him to hear, what

I felt would be the worst to him ; and then, having pledged him to keep her secret, I unfolded my tale as gently as I could ; after which I insisted on his considering himself perfectly free, and begged he would take time to think over the matter. His first words were, " O ma'am, why did you tell me ?" Then, after I had explained all the truthfulness and trust required between husband and wife, " well," said he, " I believe you are right, sure you have experience on the matter ; ma'am you have an honest mind." His next question was, " Does any body know this but you ?" I had to say " Yes." " Does my father know it ?" " No." " Does your servant ?" (she had been in the Industrial Institution). " No." I felt the ground was giving way, and then I desired he would go home, and come to me in three days' time, but until then he should not speak to Susan after now leaving my door with her (as it seems she had conducted him to my house).

The third evening he came to me in my garden—" Well, what have you decided ?" he smiled and said, " I don't care one fig about what happened ! Susan is a good girl, and if God gives us a family she will rear her children well on account of all she has gone through !"

I need not tell you how rejoiced I felt. He then spoke to me of her sister (who had been imprisoned on account of concealing the money Susan had stolen), praised her, and said she should always find a home with him whenever she left service. Then he talked over the future plans, and I announced to him that Mrs. A—— and I had decided on giving Susan a present of a mangle. What a settlement ! I wish you saw the joy the said mangle has caused. Then we had a long talk of how the father was to be told, as I feared much he would not be pleased at the notion of losing the son's earnings. However, the bridegroom elect could see no difficulty ; he was sure his father would be kind and reasonable. After school the next day, I peeped into Susan's room, to see how she was going on. I was struck by the expression of her countenance, she had become really handsome, so much hope dawning, and such a load taken off her heart, for N—— says he will love and protect her, in the face of the whole world, and cares little even if her secret should come to light.

She caught hold of my hand, kissed it, and burst into tears. "How can I ever thank you for all you have done for me," and she sobbed as if in real sorrow. "But Susan, why such tears, surely you should feel very happy now." "But, ma'am, am I not going to leave you, my best friend?" I felt indeed touched, to think of the poor girl giving me a thought under such circumstances. How deep are the feelings of our poor, and how far short do we, prosperous ones, fall of their real refinement of heart! I must not fill your pages with the "second volume" of my tale, for true to romance life (though mine is literally written as it occurred), a cloud came on. The father objected—the son sulked, and when he came to complain of all his family to me, he listened to my suggestion of throwing himself on his mother's heart. Of course she responded and all was brought to joy again; she called to the school to bless her future daughter, and the young couple were married last Thursday.

Now need I add one word more? Surely this little story is the best proof that can be given of the advantages of Extern Industrial Schools attached to Reformatories or Union Workhouses. Are they not more simple, and more productive of good than the Holloway system of "Emigration, a resource in all imaginable difficulties." Of course there will be many cases where it will be desirable and absolutely necessary to leave Ireland, but I cannot at all understand why emigration should be held forth as the great boon to the reformed prisoner. If the reformation be sincere and complete, why should we send away useful subjects. Half the money spent on the journey and trousseau would give comfort and prosperity to many, while settling them once more in respectable, though struggling positions. If the reform has not been sincere, why then give money to send them away. Let them be watched and made honest, at least secured at once, and forced to contribute to the public service by some prescribed and useful labour. It is impossible, if the subject be seriously considered, that means may not be found to classify such prisoners, so as to preserve the order of treatment presumed to be necessary (though apparently so very indulgent) for those who have injured society.

Being a woman, and consequently by the fact deprived of the rights of private judgment on a subject so important, I must not permit myself to pronounce on this oft discussed matter, yet I cannot conceal how often I have asked myself the question—What gives the right of prisoners to the most nutritious food and the greatest care of their comfort and well-being morally and physically, as compared to the claims of the honest and innocent poor in the unions?

Why do I read so often the recommendations of the humane and even worldly-minded, that care should be taken to preserve the health of the prisoners in its fullest enjoyment? While again obliged to remark in daily accounts of meetings of guardians discussions—and recriminations and attacks—even accusations of too much indulgence, whenever an attempt be made to give the pauper more than will preserve life in sufficient vigour to prevent the necessity of an entrance into hospital where the food should be given more abundantly. Of course, I suppose, this is right and necessary, or it should not be tolerated by so many benevolent and good heads and hearts. I give up the point as a political-economy-mystery far beyond my comprehension—thankful that I am not obliged to believe it, and hopeful that the time may come when it will not exist. But having the opportunity, I should deem myself culpable if I did not add my pleading to all and each of those who have become aware of the frightful fate destined for our young girls in the unions, and cry aloud for some help—some change in this dreadful training to immorality and wretchedness which the present system has been declared to engender. I dare not trust my pen on this subject, for a woman could not treat it calmly, the wrong to her sex is too deep for utterance. It is inconceivable that such a state of things should exist under a queen, whose character of mother, wife, and daughter, is so justly a subject of her people's pride. She does not know how her poor girls are neglected, corrupted, and that under the roof so falsely called a refuge provided for helpless misery.

But to turn to another side—another picture. I have copied for you from Julia Kavanagh's Women of Christianity a short history. Her book is one which no lady who can afford herself any ordinary luxury, should be without purchasing for her private study. It will be found interesting to all, to the saint, or the worldling, or the heroine. The life now presented suggests so much that is important to the subject now under consideration that its value alone will give some idea of the appreciation the book deserves. It is full of suggestions to the thinker, and above all to the doer.

It appears to me to solve many questions or rather difficulties—Rosa Govona should be the model, if not the patron saint of Industrial Schools. *

Yours always sincerely,

E. W.

P. S.—E. W. has received so much indulgence from the reviewers of the Quarterly, that she hopes they will not attribute it to vain presumption in begging that if any notice be made of this letter, care should be taken that no allusion be made to the whereabouts of her “happy pair,” as the newspapers circulate even in Mud Island, and it is best not to set gossips guessing.

* On the northern side of the Ligurian Appenines, in the basin formed by the Upper Tanaro, extends the district of Mondovi, a province of the Sardinian states. Surrounded by a fertile tract of land, rich in corn, vines, mulberry trees, and cattle, rises the chief town, Mondovi. It is built partly on the bank of the Ellero, partly on a hill which rises above the river. It can boast of a strong castle, several churches and convents, a seminary, a college, various manufactories, and some fifteen thousand inhabitants.

In this quiet place there lived, in the course of the last century, a young orphan girl, of the name of Rosa Govona. She excelled in needlework, her only means of support; she never cared for pleasure, and thought not of marriage; grave, mild, and silent, she lived alone, in the dignity of labour and the honor of womanhood.

Towards the year 1746, Rosa, being then in her thirtieth year, happened to meet a young girl, an orphan like herself, who was destitute, and without the means of earning a livelihood. The sight grieved her compassionate heart, and shocked her feminine delicacy. She took home the young stranger, and addressing her in language of scriptural simplicity, “Here,” said she, pointing to her humble dwelling, “here shalt thou abide with me: thou shalt sleep in my bed; thou shalt drink from my cup, and thou shalt live by the labour of thine own hands.” This last clause, comprising independence and self respect, was one of the most cherished points in the creed of Rosa. Pleased with the docility and industry of her young guest, she conceived the project of a female association, based on the principles of labour and mutual aid. Ere long the girl of Mondovi was surrounded by a society of young and unprotected single women, who dwelt beneath the same roof, and laboured diligently for their livelihood.

This association, being something quite novel in Mondovi, was naturally attacked; the wise derided and censured it; grave imputations were cast on the morals of Rosa and her companions, and libertine young men followed and insulted them whenever they left their home. Their prudent silence, and, above all, their blameless life, at length prevailed over calumny; and they were allowed to live and labour in peace: nay, more, the authorities of Mondovì, seized with a sudden fit of official zeal, repaired their long neglect of an institution reflecting so much honour on the community with which it had originated, by offering Rosa, whose abode had now grown too narrow, a house in the plain of Carcassona. This she readily accepted, and was soon surrounded by seventy young girls. She obtained another and larger house in the plain of Brao; but, extending her views with her means, Rosa no longer confined the labours of her friends to the common tasks of needlework; the house of Brao became a real factory for the manufacture of woollen stuffs. Nine years had now elapsed since Rosa first took home the orphan girl. She might well have rested satisfied with what she had done; but, consulting only her zeal and anxious wish of spreading the good effects of her system, she set off for Turin in the year 1755.

Rosa Govona entered the capital of Piedmont, with no other protection than her own strong faith, and no higher recommendation than the two or three young girls who accompanied her. She simply explained her project, and asked for an asylum. The fathers of the oratory of St. Philip gave her a few rooms "for the love of God," and the military depot sent her tables and straw mattresses. Rosa and her companions were quite satisfied, and establishing themselves in their new abode, they cheerfully set to work.

The fact became known, and attracted attention. On the suggestion of his financial minister, Count of Gregory, Charles Emanuel III. assigned Rosa and her companions a large building, belonging to a religious brotherhood recently suppressed. The house was soon filled with forsaken orphan girls. The king read and approved the judicious rules laid down by Rosa, and ordered the factories of the establishment to be organised and registered by the magistrates appointed to superintend commercial matters.

From that time the Rosinas, as they were called in honour of their foundress, enjoyed the special patronage of the Sardinian government.

Rosa Govona felt deeply grateful for the favor her plans had received from the king. Knowing that the most effectual method of showing her gratitude would be to continue as she had begun, and to contribute to the commercial and moral prosperity of his dominions she established in Turin two factories; one of cloth for the army, and another of the best silks and ribands. Thanks to her, three hundred women without dowry, without any resource save their own labour, earned an honest and comfortable livelihood, and provided in youth for the wants of their old age. Houses depending on that of Turin were established at Novarra, Fossano, Savigliano, Saluzzo, Chieri; and St. Damien of Asti. Over the entrance of every house which she founded, Rosa caused to be engraved the words she had addressed to her first guest: "TU MANGERAI COL LAVORO DELLE TUE MANI," thou shalt live by the labour of thine own hands.

Rosa devoted twenty-one years to the task of going over the provinces of Piedmont, and founding asylums for the unprotected and industrious poor of her sex ; until exhausted by her labours, she died at Turin. Her remains were deposited in the chapel of the establishment there ; on the simple monument which covers them may still be read the following epitaph :—" Here lies Rosa Govona of Mondovi. From her youth she consecrated herself to God. For His glory she founded in her native place, and in other towns, retreats opened to forsaken girls, so that they might serve God. She gave them excellent regulations, which attach them to piety and labour. She entered on eternal life the 28th day of February, of the year 1776, the sixtieth year of her age. Grateful daughters have raised this monument to their mother and benefactress."

With this simple, yet touching record of a useful and dignified life, closes all that are told of Rosa Govona. We know more of what she did than what she was. She appears to us through her good works, thoughtful, silent, and ever doing, a serious and beneficent apparition. In aspect, she was grave, earnest, and resolute. A plain cap, a white kerchief, a cross on her bosom, and a brown robe, constituted the attire of the foundress of the Rosinas. One of her biographers calls her sister Rosa ; but it does not appear that she took any vows, or sought to impose any on her community. The Rosinas are bound by no tie ; they can leave their abode, and marry if they wish ; but they rarely do so. There will always be a certain number of women whom circumstances or private inclination will cause to remain unmarried. Rosa Govona was one of these, and for them she laboured. She wished to save them from vice, idleness, and poverty, to preserve to them unsullied the noblest inheritance of human beings, dignity, and self-respect.

According to an interesting account published in Paris a few days ago, the Rosinas are still in a prosperous and happy state. They are admitted from thirteen to twenty ; they must be wholly destitute, healthy, active, and both able and willing to work. They are patronized by Government, but labour is their only income, all work assiduously, save the old, who are supported by their younger companions. The Turin establishment is the chief and central one, the other houses still exist, with the exception of that which Rosa Govona founded at Novarra. It was closed when this town belonged to the kingdom of Italy ; and has not since been re-opened. To preserve the spirit of the modest and retired life which Rosa wished her daughters to lead, no commercial matters are transacted, save at the establishment in Turin, which governs the other houses. The labours of the Rosinas are varied and complete ; whatever they manufacture, they do with their own hands, from beginning to end. They buy the cocoons in spring, and perform every one of the delicate operations which silk undergoes, before it is finally woven into gros-de-naples, levantines, and ribbands. Their silks are of the best quality, but plain, in order to avoid the expense and inconvenience of changing their looms with every caprice of fashion. They also fabricate linen ; but only a limited number of Rosinas can undergo the fatigue of weaving. In order not to interfere with the silk establishment of Turin, the manufacture of woollen stuffs is now carried on at Chieri. Government buys all the cloth of the army from the Rosinas, they even manufacture all the accessory ornaments, and make up the uniforms, which are cut out for them by tailors. Gold lace, and the rich vestments of priests, are likewise produced by these industrious women, who excel in every female art, and are renowned for skill in embroidery. The produce of their varied labours is gathered at Turin, in a large magazine, and sold there to trustworthy persons. The house of the Rosinas is patronized, not only by Government, but also by many of the inhabitants and tradespeople of Turin; for there is a general preference in favour of goods, excellent in quality, fair in price, and manufactured by the hands of these pure and innocent women. Their profits are moderate, but sufficient; the house in Turin alone, spends eighty thousand francs a-year; and it holds three hundred women, of whom fifty, who are either old or infirm, and consequently unable to work, are supported by the rest.

“I visited this remarkable establishment,” writes an eyewitness, “thanks to the kindness of the worthy ecclesiastic who administers and directs it. He accompanied me through those wide halls containing so many women, animated by the holy ardour of labour. Separated from man, they nevertheless share with him the fatigue to which he was condemned on the day when God sent him forth on the earth. They went through their tasks with mild gravity and admirable composure, yet displaying the zeal which a mother might feel in working with her daughters for the good of the common family. Six mistresses and one director (a woman) preside over them, and they are frequently visited by the Queen, who grants a special protection to these industrious women.”

One woman, poor, obscure, and unlearned, but strong in her faith, and, above all, in her love for her orphan sisters, did this.—Women of Christianity, by Julia Kavanagh.

THE LATE MONSIEUR VERDIER.

In the early part of June we received the following notification, dated Paris, May 26th, 1858:—"Monsieur Georges-François-Paul Verdier, avocat à la Cour Impériale de Paris, Agent général de la Colonie de Mettray, décédé à Paris le 23 Mai, 1858, à l'âge de 52 ans, muai des Sacrements de l'Eglise. Priez pour lui."

We were not unprepared for this melancholy announcement; we had heard, some days before, that M. Verdier was ill, very ill, with brain-fever; M. Demetz had come up to Paris, from Mettray, and was close beside his old friend, lamenting his illness, and fearing that in his death, should God take him, Mettray would lose another prop, fearing the anguish of another death-bed parting like that of M. de Courteilles; painful, though the spirit passed away from God's work on earth, to God's glory in heaven.

In Verdier's case, the sorrow of M. Demetz was doubtless increased by the thought, that the sufferings of his friend were the result of over mental exertion in that cause which both had so deeply and so warmly at heart. In the Report on Mettray for 1855, and of which admirable document we published a translation in the Record of the 21st Number of this REVIEW, we find the exertions of M. Verdier acknowledged by M. Demetz in the following terms:—

"We cannot conclude these observations on 'Patronage' without addressing our thanks to those who have seconded us in this work, and whose zeal, instead of diminishing, seems to increase in proportion as their task becomes more difficult. We would wish, Gentlemen, if the number were not too great, to pay to each individual, the tribute of gratitude due for his efficacious help; to recount with what persevering efforts the greater number have endeavoured to act (for good) on the children as well as their parents, well knowing that the best counsels have little influence in presence of evil examples on the part of the family.

We will content ourselves by naming M. Verdier, Agent-General of your Society, who, with a disinterestedness beyond all praise, has charged himself with the 'Patronage' of all our children in Paris. We can hardly form a correct estimate of the difficulties which this office entails, or the incessant goings and comings of every kind which it exacts. M. Verdier is dismayed by no obstacles of this kind."

That these high commendations were merited, all who have studied the history of Mettray, are aware, and sad indeed must have been the feelings of M. Demetz, as he stood beside the sick bed of his stricken fellow laborer.

M. Verdier was not, even according to French ideas, a man of independent fortune, and depended for support upon his profession. Yet he found, or rather, by rising habitually at four o'clock, he made time by which he was enabled to serve Mettray, and to draw from M. Demetz, the noble eulogium which the reader has had placed before him.

This was a hard life; the courts all day, the care of the colons, then the inspection, the correspondence, the short rest, then to bed; at last "the sword out-wore the sheath," and the over-taxed brain could bear no more. Day by day, they watched him in his sickness, hoping and fearing, and then came the awful truth, that 'twere better he should die, for the tree had already died from the top, health would bring but idiotcy, and God in his great mercy called good Paul Verdier away—"Priez pour lui."

"Who shall tell what schemes majestic
Perish in the active brain?
What humanity is robbed of,
Ne'er to be restored again?"

"His loss," writes an English friend, who knew Verdier thoroughly, "to M. Demetz, will be indeed heavy, I had almost said irreparable. I had much opportunity in Paris of witnessing his rare devotion, and indefatigable zeal in the very difficult work of Patronage. It was his delight to work in comparative obscurity, for sheer 'love,' as he used to say, of M. Demetz, and doubtless, still higher motives, which have, I doubt not, their reward."

Many of our readers will remember M. Verdier as the gentleman who accompanied M. Demetz, during his tour in England, in 1856. A special meeting of the National Reformatory Union, was held in the Law Amendment Society's Rooms, on Thursday, May 29th, 1856, which was attended by M. Demetz and M. Verdier, and in the course of some observations on Patronage Societies, M. Demetz said, "My friend, M. Verdier, takes devoted care of all our Mettray youths who go to Paris."

Truly it was devoted care, a care which cost a life; it is all gone and past now, and Demetz, loving like a Christian man, must say of the lost friend, as Galileo of the lost sight—"It has pleased God it should be so, and it must please me also."

Paul Verdier's relatives in Paris say—"PRIEZ POUR LUI." We say, far away here in Ireland, AMEN, AND AMEN. MAY PAUL VERDIER'S SOUL REST IN PEACE, 'till he, and the Good Samaritan, shall stand before the Son of God, with all the Universe around them.

REFORMATORY AND REFUGE UNION.

An able correspondance on the subject of Government aid to Refuges and Industrial Schools has been conducted by this Union with the Privy Council on Education ; and although the Union has not carried its point, yet it has elicited from Government explanations, if not concessions, of considerable value.

The Ship School, for which purpose H.M.'s frigate the " Cornwall " has been kindly lent by the Admiralty, appears, under the fostering energies of the Union, likely soon to be launched into existence. It will require some 2000*l.* to fit it for its purpose ; and plans are being devised for the collection of this sum.

The Sub-committee appointed to consider the great question of the " Social Evil " are progressing slowly, but satisfactorily, in their endeavours to check it. They have printed two more tracts for distribution : twenty-five females have been rescued from the streets, and placed in institutions, during the last three months. About half of these have been paid for at the rate of 2*l.* and 3*l.* each, the others admitted free.

Another of the efforts of the Reformatory and Refuge Union is approaching completion—we mean the Girls' Laundry ; it has been opened by the matron and a few girls taking possession of the house leased for the purpose, in West End Lane—between Kilburn and Hampstead—about two miles from the Marble Arch. The establishment will now soon be in working order ; but as it is very improbable that the Institution can be rendered self-supporting for at least two or three years, contributions are required to meet the current expenses. The importance of the object will, we trust, be fully recognized by those who have means to give.

The Union continues its efforts to procure the admission of convicted youths into certified Reformatories, and with considerable success. This may appear to be a matter of comparative insignificance to be taken up by so important a body, or as one involving little or no trouble ; but those who have watched the police-court reports, and know anything of prison discharges, are well aware that there is very little general information as to the means of carrying such sentences, under the Reformatory Act, into effect ; and the labours of the Union have been of incalculable value. In course of time the resources of certified Reformatories may be better understood, and this labour on the part of the committee lightened ; but, meanwhile, the community must be much indebted to the Union for the trouble it has taken in this matter.

The training of masters and mistresses for Reformatories and Refuges still continues to engage attention : and several institutions have been supplied with superintendents. On the whole, the Reformatory and Refuge Union continues to deserve the good opinion and support of a generous public, and deserving it, will we hope continue to obtain it in an increasing degree.

PRISONERS' AID SOCIETY.

A Paper read before the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, on Tuesday, June 8th, by Rev Henry J. Hatch; T. B. Barwick Baker, Esq., in the chair.

In an admirable pamphlet published by the Reformatory and Refuge Union, detailing the various institutions existing in this kingdom, which have for their direct object the reformation of criminals, or the timely arrest of those who are on the confines of crime, and in danger of becoming entangled in its meshes, it is stated in page 4, that "there are six discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies." I am myself aware only of four others, making a total of ten, while there are no less than 167 prisons in the fifty-two counties of England and Wales alone; thus leaving 157 from which prisoners are discharged, and, so far as we know, thence forgotten, or disregarded until they shall reappear within the walls of the prison. I may have occasion to allude to these particular societies, more especially as I go on. I merely mention the fact of there been so few, as affording a reason for my dwelling at greater length than I otherwise should do on the reasonableness, generally, of some effort to assist a prisoner on his discharge. I may fairly presume that the paucity of such societies is mainly attributable to the want of more public knowledge of their real value—and I am further strengthened by the reflection, that with the exception of the Surrey Society for the Employment and Reformation of Discharged Prisoners, 1824—the Devon and Exeter Refuge, 1836—and the Durham Refuge for Discharged Prisoners, 1849, the others have only started into existence during the last four years. There must then, of necessity, be a great want of proper information as well to their necessity, as to their establishment and their working. There is, I think, a feeling beginning to spread that criminals, when reformed or when holding out fair promise of reformation, should be removed as far as possible from old haunts, old associates, and temptation to old habits: whether this feeling be founded in strict justice, whether it be in accordance with the mild precepts which would invite us to restore, in a spirit of meekness, them that be overtaken with a fault, I will not stop here to inquire,—but at all events, it cannot be denied that such a step would appear necessary so long as there shall exist such difficulty in the way of masters taking or retaking into their employment any one who have once had the brand of imprisonment upon them. I have ere this made my confession that I shall gladly welcome the time, if it ever in God's providence be allowed to come, when an Onesimus shall be received by a Philemon; when the returning prodigal shall be welcomed at home as one who is lost and is found; when a broken-hearted criminal shall experimentally be induced to believe himself an object of love and pity to man as well as his Maker—and shall find that where the character was lost, there it may be possible to regain it, and that he shall not be scouted, but rather encouraged in the attempt. It will not be thought presumption in me, as Chaplain of one of the most important and largest prisons in the country, and as Secretary to a Prisoners' Aid Society, which was founded so far back as 1824, and has been doing its quiet and unostentatious work for 34 years—to say that the former position necessarily brings vividly before me the requirements and the dangers of prisoners on their discharge, while my position as Secretary to the Surrey Society has given me some experience on the hearing and timely benefit of Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies ; and that therefore, while pleading the general necessity of such aid, I should deal with it in the strong language forced from me by my experience and conviction, and that I should feel myself in some degree qualified to testify as to their details of working. First, then, as to their necessity ; it is no part of my business to inquire how it came to pass, and at whose door the fault may be laid, that so many hundreds of those who are committed to our gaols have never heard, I might say, even the voice of kindness,—have remained to all intents and purposes ignorant of the vital truths of the gospel, until immured in the solitude of the prison cell. Bred up in the very atmosphere of vice and irreligion, of blasphemy and unkindness, the wonder is, not that so many become vicious and criminal, but that so many appear to escape from its trammels ; nor am I at present concerned to consider what may be the appropriate remedies for such a state of things, nor even to compare the position of the honest poor labourer, with that of the criminal. I have now only to deal with the broad fact, that crime does exist, and that, under the vigilance of our laws, it is generally detected, the result being an appearance before the higher powers, and then incarceration in the walls of the prison—in short, that there are annually about 132,699 men, women or children committed to our prisons, and as a necessary consequence discharged from the gates at the expiration of their terms of imprisonment. And let me ask what in general is their position ? Knowing as we do the antecedent difficulties which have beset the generality of our delinquents, prior to their entrance to the gaol—that kindness and religious instruction is in thousands of instances a complete novelty, and knowing also as we do the power of God to recall the most abject from the error of his way, we have no right to doubt that many, whether driven by fear, or by nobler feelings, may be completely sincere, in an expression of their desire to quit the life they are leading, and return to the paths of honesty, sobriety, and piety. But what hope is held out to these ?—unhappily of the very name of prisoner, we have habituated ourselves to think harshly, while few are in the slightest degree aware of the trying difficulties of their position at the time I am speaking of. There seems, it is true, to be a better feeling springing up ; men of all classes of society are beginning to manifest pity and compassion, when of old there was but scorn and contempt : and this must be gratifying to every right-minded man. How much hopeless despair and consequent misery have sprung from our past apathy as regards discharged prisoners, it is appalling to reflect upon ; and I hail with the brightest augury of good the growth of this better feeling—it is beginning to be acknowledged that a man may have been a prisoner, yet have a soul to be saved ; that praying for “pity on all prisoners and captives,” means something more than regarding them with abhorrence, and leaving them to despair, without an effort to save them, or help them to retrieve their lost character. I believe there can scarcely be imagined a more pitiable position than that of a discharged prisoner. His very imprisonment is probably the result of want of those friends who could counsel him aright, and a forced intimacy with those who, ignorant themselves, have been too ready, and still are, to lead him to ruin. As regards the vast majority of those who issue from the prison gate at the expiration of their allotted space of punishment, they may be considered, humanly speaking, as without friends, without home, without money, without character. And where there is an acknowledged difficulty attached to even the honest man finding good employment, clearly those who have the brand of prison upon them will labour under tenfold difficulties; and it cannot be doubted, that unless some employment be found for them, or some facility be given them, to verify their assertions of a desire to amend their lives, the alternative is forced upon them of returning to their former career. I am well sure that many, really in heart weary of a life of crime, have had nothing left to them but to starve, to beg, or to steal; and when we consider their want of education in those habits and truths which could, under God's blessing, alone stand them in good stead in the hour of trial—the little opportunity they have had for the exercise of self control—when we reflect that to starve is against their very nature, that to beg, irrespective of its demoralising and uncertain tendency, is in this Christian country, criminal—rendering them again amenable to imprisonment—and that many derived considerable profits, and enjoyed many of their falsely-called comforts and pleasures, from the proceeds of thievery, can we wonder that unfriended for good, with no one to foster and cherish their better resolution, and no means of putting them into play, but met with open arms and ready welcome by their old companions, the better feelings should soon evaporate, under their scoff and ridicule, and they should rush back in very despair to their former haunts, their former evil courses and associates, and in very doubt of the goodness or justice of Providence, drag on a life of crime and vice, to end as it must in banishment, ignominy, and ruin?

I am aware that there are some few even yet, who, with the feeling of the prodigal son's elder brother, are disposed to cavil at any efforts made to benefit the criminal class; but even admitting this objection to spring from a compassion for the wants of the honest poor, it yet seems to me, that it is meet that we should imitate the prodigal's father, and be merry and joyful when any one erring mortal returns from his riotous living to a more holy life and that the objectors might with far more credit to themselves make the attempt to succour the honest poor, and place them in a better condition, than find fault with those who, in imitation of the high teaching to which I have alluded, endeavour to alleviate the unquestionable difficulties in which, from the very nature of the case, criminals are involved. Let it suffice that we do find cases calling for the exercise of that feeling of sympathy and compassion which is so closely interwoven with our very nature; we put that feeling into play, and we hope and believe that we have befriended not merely the immediate recipients of our bounty, but, through them, the great mass of the poorer population, who are becoming more and more sensible of the injury worked among them by the very presence of an unchecked criminal, and of the advantage to them and their offspring, of his removal or his reformation. The poor who are constantly employed, if honest, must leave their young exposed to great temptation from street companionship, and far from envying the position of the criminal, I have found that the poor are, for their means, large contributors to any efforts to check or reform crime, rightly considering that the benefit falls largely on themselves.

The question here naturally arises, to what extent are Prisoners' Aid Societies necessary? It would seem that when any infringement of the law had been vindicated, by the allotted term of imprisonment, and Justice had been thus fully avenged, Mercy should step in and do her work,—and it would further appear naturally to devolve as a duty upon the visiting justices, in co-operation with the governors and chaplains, to inquire into the future prospects of prisoners, to ascertain their antecedents, their family connections, and so far as practicable to assist all those who are hopeful to recover if possible the position from which they had fallen; I believe this is so far generally acted up to, that to a certain extent assistance is given, under the sanction of the law and the visitors of most prisons, to enable prisoners to return to their respective families; but I think the time has arrived when we must do more than this. I am of opinion, founded not on the crude ideas of a day, but upon mature and earnest consideration on this subject—that when the law has stepped in and performed its work, and vindicated its majesty in executing wrath on them that do evil, every prisoner of whatever age or sex, however deeply involved in crime, however apparently hopeless, who expresses a desire to escape from the course of life which he sees to be fraught with ruin, should have held out to him an opportunity of removal from his evil companions, and of verifying his assertions of repentance, by a return to a field of diligent and honest labour. Apply indeed such tests as may seem best suited to prove the sincerity of the expressed wish to reform, but it appears to me none should be given over, none despaired of, none absolutely refused. In the course of the last six years, with the funds of the Surrey Discharged Prisoners' Society gradually, it is true, increasing, but still totally inadequate to the demand made upon them, there have been no less than 3,410 prisoners assisted in various ways on their discharge, many of whom are now doing well. It is true, that the pressing are not unfrequently less deserving than the more modest and retiring, and that in our estimate of character, especially when seen only under the abnormal circumstances of a gaol, we cannot but be frequently deceived; it is impossible to doubt that hopeful cases may have been too often rejected as apparently hopeless; while those of whom we had been led to anticipate the best, have ended in complete disappointment. Hence I repeat my conviction, that every one who professes a desire, should at least have the opportunity of winning back his lost character, and the good opinion of his fellow-men. None should be forced back by despair, or the unforgiving feeling of his fellow-creatures, to a course from which he has a desire, however feeble, to escape—the smoking flax should not be quenched, nor the bruised reed broken—but the faintest spark of returning penitence, should be fanned and cherished, if haply God may suffer it to expand into the full flame.

The existing societies of this nature, few though they be, may be yet fairly held forth, as, each in connection with its own sphere of operation, and by the happy results attending them, proving the proposition which I am anxious to lay down, that “a Discharged Prisoners’ Aid Society” should be attached to every prison in the country. It may fairly be presumed that each separate prison is built and appointed in every respect with reference to the population and the amount of crime of its peculiar locality, and though these may vary in different parts in the actual number of inmates, as well as in the facilities for their re-absorption into the general body of the more steady population, yet will there still attach to each the duty, as it seems to me, which, though varying with the local population, is imperative on all, of aiding those who on discharge from prison, at the expiration of their sentence, are without home, money, friends, or clothing, and in danger of being forced back upon their old courses, for want of a helping hand at the most critical period of their existence. Now let me briefly call your attention to the following statistics, in reference to the commitments during the year 1856. It appears that there were 99,336 males, 33,363 females, making a total of 132,699 of both sexes. The deaths bear a small proportion to the total number, being in fact only 195; and those consigned to lunatic asylums still less, being 138; and taking the possibility that a proportion, admit it to be even more than half, have facilities for again entering upon their respective calling, we have still left at least from 10,000 to 15,000, who must, at the expiration of their sentence, be again launched into the world, to fight against difficulties which few can appreciate but those who either, like myself, come into immediate contact with them, or whose special attention is called to them as magistrates or the leading members in society in each county.

Now if we view it as a matter of economy, the importance of aiding prisoners on their discharge may be made apparent. We must bear in mind that the expenses of prosecutions, whether borne by the county or borough fund as up to 1835—or shared by the public revenues as from 1835 up to 1849, or, as since that period, totally by the latter—in whatever shape paid, must come out of the pockets of the English people; and so far as it can be avoided, it must be looked upon as to that extent a gain. The returns for 1857 I have not been able to get at, but those for 1856 will equally well serve our purpose; and I find from “Part I. of the Judicial Statistics,” that the Cost of indictments was £173,246 11 9

Of summary proceedings 21,665 12 11

£194,912 4 8

viz. in round numbers nearly 200,000*l*. And you will observe this is only the cost of convictions. It appears that the prison expenses during the year 1856 amounted to a total sum of 515,917*l*. 2*s*. 0*d*., or an average annual cost for each prisoner of 29*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, that while the number of prisoners during the year 1856 was 132,699, the expenditure was no less than 710,829*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* Now without alluding to the ways by which much of this expense might be avoided, if preventive means to stop the sources or check the avenues of crime were adopted, or if a more general system of popular education could be set on foot, I venture to think, a proper and judicious attempt to prevent recommitments, by means of Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, would diminish this expense to the country by a very considerable amount; and it should be borne in mind that this large amount of expenditure alluded to is in a measure irretrievably gone, and produces little or no good effect, whereas a judicious expenditure, of a comparative trifle in favour of all who are well disposed, to set them on their legs again, would not only keep them out of prison, but be the means of restoring healthful members to the body of society.

Little means exist of calculating the career of criminals, but we do know that in 1856 no less than 36,604 were in prison several times, varying from three to six or more: and in connection with my own prison, I have a nominal list of 147 boys under fourteen who had been in prison 568 times. But, what will more immediately touch our present calculations, I know of twenty-eight boys under fourteen who have been in prison 144 times, and 69 times during the period of one year. Now, it is clear that if steps could be taken on the discharge of these prisoners at first, to place them in a fair way of earning a livelihood, so as to prevent their recommitment, there would have been fifty-one re-convictions avoided; and as it is proved that the average cost of convictions is about 9*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* per case, and the annual prison expenses nearly 30*l.*, there would be a probable saving to the country of somewhat more than 1500*l.*, which is in fact actually thrown away, if not worse, when it is considered that each time a prisoner returns to prison he becomes more and more callous to the disgrace it inflicts on him. Now, how may this be avoided? I believe in no better way than by the immediate intervention and help of some fund expressly devoted to aiding prisoners on their discharge.

The societies at present existing, so far as we have been able to ascertain them, are as follows:—

The Surrey Society, for the employment and reformation of discharged prisoners, embracing both sexes and all ages. Started originally in 1824.

The Devon and Exeter Refuge, confined to females. Commenced in 1836.

The Durham Refuge, for both sexes, not confined to age, though generally the inmates are under seventeen. Started in 1849.

The Worcester Prisoners' Aid Society, unconfined to age or sex. Started in 1855.

The Birmingham Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, in 1856, also unconfined to age or sex.

The Wakefield Industrial Home (males). Commenced in 1856.

The Gloucester Refuge for discharged prisoners (males). Also in 1856.

The Glasgow Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, in 1857.

The Kingston-on-Hull Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, also in 1857.

The Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, London (males), and generally confined to the convicts' prisons, in 1857.

And I understand from Dr. Hook, that a Society with similar objects is in progress of formation in Leeds.

Now you will observe that few as these are, they are even yet but circumscribed in their efforts—and by no means general on their application to sex or age—yet I find from the Reports, that each is doing much good, though generally in want of funds.

The methods by which assistance may be rendered to discharged prisoners, may generally be classed under four heads; each indeed capable of subdivision and expansion, but I think every method will be embraced in one or other of them—these are,

1. By getting them into institutions where they may acquire habits of industry, and some knowledge of how to earn an honest living.

2. By corresponding with their friends, or their respective parochial ministers, and restoring them or reconciling them to their friends.

3. By assisting them to obtain employment by purchasing tools for them, taking their own ones out of pledge, helping them to make a decent appearance by means of new or redeemed clothing, or by gift of goods to sell.

4. By assisting them to emigrate.

Generally, owing to the diversity of character, age, sex, and disposition, I am disposed to think that a separate Institution or Refuge attached to each prison, besides being exceedingly expensive, would not answer the purpose intended, except in some few isolated cases. It is better that the Aid Society should place all cases suitable, in appropriate institutions, and pay for their expense, on an average, for one year after their discharge. Then I think there should be in connection with, and working under the guidance of, every chaplain, who should perforce be the Secretary of the Society, some trustworthy person to examine into cases in their own immediate locality; to prevent the contact with evil companions, who generally are on the watch to entrap prisoners, especially the young, on discharge; to take them home, where, as is frequently the case, shame causes an unwillingness to return; and generally to make inquiries as to the future conduct of those who have received the benefit of the aid of the society. It is astonishing with what plausibility a pitiful tale will be told, consistent in all points, and unbroken in its links of probability, but which frequently falls completely to pieces, on the visit of a trusty, faithful, and judicious messenger to the immediate neighbourhood from whence a prisoner comes.

No one, I suppose, will think me capable of undervaluing the influence or importance of Reformatories; but it has been too much the custom to imagine that these institutions do all the reformation; while prisons are rather calculated to deprave the character. Now I am well certain that there are thousands whose first seeds of reformation are planted within the prison walls; and indeed the very willingness to enter a Reformatory, after a confinement in prison, is a proof of a better mind, what has sprung up in the prison; but until the public mind shall look with kindlier and more hopeful feelings on the prisoner, he has no alternative but to go to a Reformatory. In many cases, his reformation is, I verily believe, as complete, or nearly so, as to justify his being trusted; and many might with safety be tried; but no one will, perhaps no one well can, take into his household a discharged prisoner; scarcely even will they take a reformatory lad. I hope and believe I see signs of a better feeling in this respect also.

And now let me say one word as to the support of the Prisoners' Aid Societies. The main bar to their complete success is, as is too frequently the case, want of funds. And it becomes a question how far it might be possible for Government to aid the funds of such societies. I confess, much as I could wish to see such societies attached to every prison in the British land, or at any rate formed in every county—and with a full feeling that until we are so provided we shall in vain struggle with the debasing effect of crime on criminals, yet I see considerable difficulty in the way of any plan which has at present suggested itself to my mind. The value of this meeting may be, that some course of that kind may be suggested, because money is the very sinew of success; but I am ever loath to ask, where I do not see clearly the probability of success. The societies at present existing are too few in number and too partial in their efforts, as it appears to me, to give a reasonable prospect of calling on Government for special aid with any chance of success. Government, in dealing with public money, require that the want brought before them should not only be one of importance, not only publicly acknowledged, but publicly pressed upon their consideration. If any plan can be devised to call their attention to the subject, with a contingent probability of success, I for one shall be glad; my main object being to provide, that somehow, whether by Government or by private benevolence, prisoners should be assisted on their discharge to recover the position they have lost. I confess I feel that Lord John Russell's view of the matter has all the appearance of justice, and at any rate of being the feeling which would probably sway Her Majesty's advisers in dealing with this subject, unless subjected to severe pressure from without. Lord John, at a meeting at Kingston, for the Surrey Discharged Prisoners' Society, expressed himself thus:—

“I beg to state that I do not think it would be possible for the State to undertake the management of criminals to a further extent than it now does. I do not speak of the manner in which that duty is performed. With regard to the manner in which it is performed, improvements have been made from time to time of late years—inquiries have been instituted—and new plans and processes have been put in force—one of which (adopted in Ireland) seems to have been attended with very great success. But, in dealing with criminals, there comes a time when the State, having done its utmost—when the prisoner, having been confined for the period allotted by law for his offence, and for which the sentence has been pronounced by the judge—when, having received all the spiritual and moral instruction provided for him in the prison—there comes a time when he must leave the precincts of that prison, and become again a member of that society whose laws he had violated. It would be impossible, with any justice to those who have always conducted themselves without reproach, that the State should undertake the management of these persons."

I beg to say I have mentioned this with a strong hope that some suggestions on the subject may be made by others who are to follow me. In the meanwhile, I may venture to assert that so far as the county of Surrey is concerned, ignorance of the want has been the main cause of inadequacy of funds; for when and wherever I have had the privilege of bringing the claims of that Society before the Surrey public, either by means of meetings or of sermons, I have found the most gratifying response made by all, alike the rich and the poor; and I have personally no manner of doubt that as such societies and their important influence on crime become more and more recognised, so will the funds be poured forth by English benevolence, in greater and greater sufficiency to meet the demands. Let me remind you that of the ten societies of the kind already existing, nine are strictly local, and one general; the latter being that established in London, and very admirable in its principles and mode of action; but, as I said before, mainly embracing the convict prisons; and at any rate ill-adapted to cope with wants so large as appear to exist. I should be disposed then to recommend, that until some general plan shall be devised, the chaplains and governors of prisons who feel, as they must, interest in the subject, having first procured reports of the already existing societies, and mastered their details of operation and management, should frame from them such plans as they may conceive best adapted to the wants of their own special charge, and having consulted with the visiting justices and the leading influence of their neighbourhood, should take such steps as shall seem to them most fitting to bring the matter generally before the public of their own locality—and I am much mistaken if they will not find, that on a proper representation of the emergency, coupled with a feasible proposition for dealing with it, they will meet with a very general response, sufficient at least to enable them to work with hope and with effect.

I have thus endeavoured to turn attention to the main points, as I conceive, of this subject; and I would merely close by observing, that even on the low consideration of self-interest in this world, prudence and reason alike demand that we should check the growth of crime by every conceivable way in our power; for we have not had its effect so frequently before our eyes that we cannot be now ignorant that there is no crime or vice, however private its nature, which has not in some way or other, directly or indirectly, an effect upon the public welfare: at the same time we cannot divest our minds of the spiritual interests both of ourselves and those with whom we are endeavouring to deal. We have the gratifying consideration that in this work we are saving souls from imminent danger by leading them to the rock of ages, by which alone they can escape death ; and we have the blessed encouragement given to us to persevere, because " they that are wise shall shine like the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

BELVEDERE CRESCENT REFORMATORY HOUSE FOR OUTCAST BOYS.

THE annual meeting of the members and friends of this Institution was held on Friday, July 23, when the Earl of Shaftesbury, its president, took the chair. The Home for Outcast Boys, situate near the south end of Hungerford Bridge, belongs to that useful class of Reformatories in which authority is not weakened by the excessive multiplication of masters. It ordinarily accommodates from 18 to 25 boys, who are under the care of the superintendent, Mr. W. Driver. Mr. Driver is a stern foe to sentimentalism, especially to that sentimentalism which is most apt to give a rosy tinge to annual reports, and Lord Shaftesbury's subjoined remarks on the report now presented, and on the general merits of the Home, are most just. There is no institution in London where work is done more faithfully and heartily than in the Belvedere Crescent Reformatory.

The HON. SECRETARY read the fourth annual report, which commenced by speaking of the lads who had gone to Canada ; and the committee had great pleasure in informing their friends that, as far as they knew, the whole eighteen who had reached that country under the auspices of the Institution were, without an exception, honestly holding their way. The tone of their letters showed that they still cherish warm feelings of attachment to what they call their Home, and all connected with it. In the last report the committee spoke of the great expense attending the emigration of the boys, and of the difficulty of getting money for that purpose. In consequence of that difficulty they had not sent out any lads since the last meeting. True, their president, Lord Shaftesbury, had kindly offered them 20*l.* for emigration purposes, but that sum would not have been sufficient to pay the passage of more than two boys ; and they had eight or ten well worthy of being sent to Canada ; and it would have been almost impossible to make a selection without appearing to act unjustly to those left behind. In sending out the last nine emigrants they had added to their debt something like 20*l.* or 30*l.* ; indeed they had always incurred debt by the adoption of this course ; and, therefore, they felt that they ought to discontinue the system rather than become involved in fresh liabilities. The committee had since turned their attention to facilities for home employ, and of what they had done in this respect they now gave the following account :—At the time of the last meeting two of their boys were employed by Mr. Hart, of Wych Street, brass-founder ; and so well was he satisfied with their conduct that whenever he wanted unskilled labour he applied to this Institution, and at Christmas last six of the lads were at work at his establishment. Much was due to the co-operation of Mr. M'Haffir, by whose timely encouragement those boys who occasionally seemed to falter were urged to persevere, and were now amongst the best of the workers. Some time in October last there were but four boys at work in the foundry. They felt that the practice of letting boys go out to work and living in the house could not be carried out to any great extent, and they tried, in conjunction with Mr. M'Haffir, to adopt some arrangement whereby the lads might live out of the house, and at the same time be subject to some kind of supervision. Accordingly a room was prepared for them in the cottage of one of the workmen who lived in the foundry-yard, the wife of the man cooking their food, and the Institution supplying their washing; but at the end of six weeks this plan turned out a failure. The boys were brought back once more to the Institution, and three of them were saved, whilst one was lost. Fifteen boys in all had been employed by Mr. Hart since the last meeting. Of the fifteen, seven remained in his employ, and eight had left under various circumstances—some from idleness, others from a desire for change and enlistment, and some for reasons not known. Out of the above eight, six were able to read and write well, and were in other respects very shrewd; four were greatly deficient in moral tone and in patient plodding industry: two were quiet and trustworthy, and the remaining two were deficient both in morals and education. Three out of the eight had been in the Institution only about a week when they were taken into the foundry; on the other hand, three out of the seven still employed were taken to work within a week of their admission into the Home. They had no reason to believe that any of the boys were doing wrong—indeed, their past experience led them to infer the contrary. They were often agreeably astonished by the good intelligence of lads they looked upon as hopeless, and it was not long since they had a very pleasing letter from one who for four years seemed an incorrigible vagabond, stating that he had enlisted in the Bombay Artillery, and thanking the committee for the trouble they had taken about him. Of the seven still at work, one had been there more than a year, three for more than nine months, and three between two and three months. They worked hard, and sometimes for very long hours, and their conduct gave complete satisfaction. Their wages were not more than sufficient to pay for their food and clothing. Their money was brought home and placed in the hands of the superintendent. They were docile in a remarkable degree, and economical also, seldom going to the exchequer for more than a penny or twopence for miscellaneous purposes. The amount brought home to them for the last year was 55*l*. The weekly amount of each boy's wages averaged from five to seven shillings. The report went on to state that the committee were desirous to get the boys into respectable situations when opportunity offered. The boys were now occupied in making fancy boxes (a large number were on this occasion exhibited in the building), some of which might be seen at any time at the Soho Bazaar; and for which they were anxious to obtain a large sale, rather than depend upon the charitable contributions of the public for the support of the Institution. There were now 18 boys in the house, and they could speak of all of them with the most entire satisfaction. The financial statement showed that the receipts for the year amounted to 555*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*, and the expenditure to 574*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, whilst there was a debt due to the treasurer of 395*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.*, but this was reduced by a government grant of 172*l.*

The Hon. F. BYNG moved the adoption of the report.

Mr. TUFFNELL, the government inspector of these institutions, seconded the motion, and observed that if this Home continued to be well conducted, as at present, he could see no reason why they should fail to receive government support in future years; and if the committee could succeed in obtaining for the Institution the privilege of being a "certified school," the advantages in their hands would be greatly increased.

The report having being adopted,

The CHAIRMAN expressed his opinion that it was a very satisfactory document, inasmuch as it stated, in a clear and honest and succinct manner, not only the success which had been experienced, but also the difficulties and the failures they had been obliged to contend with. He did not think the public acted fairly by these institutions—they had been so much accustomed to hear of great triumphs and unexampled successes, that unless everything was made to appear to them couleur de rose, they were apt to be dissatisfied. It was asking too much of human nature to expect that all outcasts could be reclaimed alike. Some there were who could be brought to discipline, and others who could not, whatever pains might be taken to secure such a result. It was, therefore, much better to tell the public the real state of things, as by so doing they prevented the expectation of results which could not be realised. He should be sorry if the committee desisted from the practice of enabling the boys to emigrate, as a very large proportion of those who had gone out under the auspices of such institutions had done credit to their patrons and to the country that gave them birth. He could wish that emigration amongst girls were more attended to than at present, as it was quite clear that in Canada there was every desire that the system should be encouraged; and as regarded the benefit which the public had the power of conferring upon the country, he verily believed that if they would only come forward with adequate funds they would soon clear the metropolis of nineteen-twentieths of the juvenile delinquents. It was a great and important question, and involved the well-being and security of the country; and he could only express a hope, as he had often done before, that the public would ere long see the absolute necessity of supporting institutions of this nature.

In answer to a question from Mr. Greig,

Mr. WELBY, the Honorary Secretary, said the actual inspection of the school was undertaken by no one but Mr. Tuffnell, who made an annual visit in his official capacity, and occasionally called to satisfy his wishes on the subject; but the Government had such confidence in the management of the Institution that they did not desire to interfere with the responsibilities of the committee.

A vote of thanks was then passed to Mr. Driver (the manager and superintendent), and to the chairman.

Criminal Returns for 1857.

The criminal returns for the past year are more than usually interesting, for they include in a very nearly perfect form the police statistics of England and Wales. Formerly the returns showed only the number of commitments; in future all judicial statistics will be given.

The police returns for 1857, which it must be remembered are unavoidably incomplete, give the following results of summary procedure:—Number of persons proceeded against summarily: males, 291,030; females, 78,203. Discharged by justices, 98,795 males; 36,679 females. Convicted, 192,235 males; 41,524 females. Here we have a total of 233,759 persons convicted and punished by summary procedure,—while the commitments for trial during 1857, amounted to only 20,269.—The police returns of summary convictions present some interesting results. The following table shows the characters of the persons who came into their custody:—

Characters.	Proceeded against by Indictment.		Proceeded against Summarily.		Total.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M. & F.
Known Thieves ...	5,005	1,428	13,551	3,118	23,102
Prostitutes ...	—	2,484	—	21,798	24,282
Vagrants and Tramps	718	165	13,554	4,833	19,270
Suspicious Characters	5,884	1,245	34,228	5,447	46,804
No known occupations	313	75	4,905	1,621	6,914
Previous good Characters ...	4,958	1,150	107,059	13,398	126,565
Characters unknown and not ascertained	6,524	2,082	117,733	27,988	154,327
Total ...	23,402	8,629	291,030	78,203	401,264

Upon the above large data it appears that of those proceeded against by indictment 54·0 were of the criminal class, 19·1 per cent. of previous good character, and of 26·9 per cent. the characters were either unknown or were not ascertained.

Another interesting return is that of the findings of coroners' juries during 1857: Coroners' inquests were held on 13,941 males and 6,216 females—making a total of 20,157. Of these, 184 were brought in murder; 187 manslaughter; 6 justifiable homicide; 1,349 suicide; 8,930 accidental death; 237 injuries, causes unknown; 2,949 found dead; 323 excessive drinking; 143 disease, aggravated by neglect; 167 want, cold, and exposure; and 5,682 other causes. The above numbers prove a decrease of 2,064 inquests, 9·4 per cent. on the previous year, with which alone the means of comparison exist, as the returns were then compiled for the first time. The diminution is attributed to the greater control which the Quarter Sessions have recently exercised in the disallowance of the costs of inquests which the Court deem to have been unnecessarily held. The periods of life of the persons upon whom the inquests were held, distinguishing the infant, the adult, and the aged and infirm, were—infants, 7 years and under, 5,496; under 16 and above 7, 1,716; 16 and under 60 years, 9,731; above 60 years, 3,214. The total costs of the inquests in 1857 were 61,541*l.* 1*l.* 7*d.*, giving an average of 3*l.* 1*s.* 0*d.* for each inquest.

The commitments for trial in 1857 happily maintain the largely diminished numbers which followed the passing of the Criminal Justice Act of 1855. But on comparing the commitments of 1857 with 1856, there is, nevertheless, an increase of 832 commitments, or 4·3 per cent. Here are the returns for the past 10 years:—

1848	30,349	1853	27,057
1849	27,816	1854	29,359
1850	26,813	1855	25,972
1851	27,960	1856	19,437
1852	27,510	1857	20,269
<hr/>				<hr/>
140,448				122,094

The increase in 1857 has extended over 32 counties, principally in the great seats of manufacture and trade. In the agricultural counties, the results are more mixed. Of the eastern counties, there is an increase in Lincoln, Norfolk, and Suffolk; a small decrease in Essex, and in the Midland counties of Northampton, Bedford, Oxford, and Bucks, as also in Sussex, Wilts, Dorset, and Somerset; but there is an increase in Hants.—In the metropolis, where any change affecting the working population is not so immediately felt, the decrease shown in Middlesex during the two previous years still continues, but not to the same extent,—while in Surrey and Kent, a large proportion of the population of which is located in and on the boundaries of the metropolis, the commitments increased. In Wales there is an increase in seven counties, which is more marked in Glamorganshire; of the border counties an increase is shown in Monmouth and Hereford, which is very large in the former, but a considerable decrease took place in Shropshire. The following table shows the results of the 20,269 commitments in 1857:—

Not prosecuted, and admitted evidence	135
No bills found against	1,004
Not guilty on trial	3,788

				20,269

The executions last year were all for murder. Of the 20 persons convicted of this crime 13 were executed, all of whom were men.

The statistics of the ages of those committed in 1857 exhibit a marked decrease of commitments under 16 years of age. The following table shows the countries where those committed were born :

Birthplace.	Males.	Females.	Total.	Proportion per Cent.
England	72,741	24,313	97,054	77·8
Wales	1,942	961	2,903	2·3
Scotland	1,617	782	2,399	1·9
Ireland	11,105	6,962	18,067	14·5
Colonies and East Indies ...	543	109	652	0·5
Foreign Countries	1,842	174	2,016	1·6
Not ascertained... ..	1,287	445	1,732	1·4
Total	91,077	33,746	124,823	100·0

The degree of instruction was, as usual, extremely small : only 5·1 per cent. of those committed last year were able to read and write well. The proportion was as follows ;—neither read nor write, 35·5 per cent. ; read and write imperfectly, 58·0 ; read and write well, 5·1 ; superior instruction, 0·3 ; not ascertained, 1·1.

The annual increasing proportion of the female commitments is a painful feature of the returns, and is a discouraging sign among some evidences of improvement which the returns present. Of the commitments for trial in 1857, the proportion of females was 21·0 per cent. ; of the summary convictions, 28·3 per cent. ; of the total commitments, 24·3 per cent. But the females form a very much larger proportion of the re-commitments, and prove the greater difficulties in the way of female reformation, after the taint of commitment to prison. With regard to age it appears that crime does not begin so early among women as among men. Under 16 years of age the proportion of females to males is 13·4 per cent. only. In the five years between that age and 21 years the proportion is doubled, being 26·9 per cent. But the largest proportion of women is found between the ages of 21 and 30 years, when it reaches 29·9 per cent. In the whole of the remaining period of life, 30 years and above, the proportion fall to 28·3 per cent. In instruction, too, the women are found to be behind the men : 18·8 per cent. only of those who can read and write well are females, while 30·7 per cent. could neither read nor write.

Under the head of "Prisons" we find that the prisons last year were able to contain 26,022 prisoners, while the greatest number in them at any time was, 23,639, the daily average being 19,009. The punishment inflicted on the prisoners was as follows :—

	Males.	Females.	Total.
Whipping	237	—	237
Irons or handcuffs ...	84	25	109
Solitary or dark cells ...	12,758	2,144	14,902
Stoppage of diet	38,740	6,593	45,333
Other punishment	2,045	156	2,201
Total	53,806	8,918	62,782

The total cost of the prisons last year was 447,004*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*—which gives as the average annual cost of each prisoner 23*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.* This excludes the Government prisons, in which the total average annual charge per prisoner was 33*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* This greater charge arises chiefly from the higher scale of remuneration to the officers, and on the dietary and allowances to convicts, which are nearly double the average in the local prisons.

The unprotected and extremely helpless state of the young children committed, led to the establishment of Reformatories, which seem, on the whole, to be working well. These schools, which combine a new form of treatment for juvenile offenders, were established for the purpose of giving legal custody to their directors and superintendents over persons committed within the age of 16 years for any period not less than 2 years nor more than 5 years. The number of these schools continues to increase. They now amount to 40, 12 having been added in the last year. The expenses of this class of prisoners are defrayed from the public revenues at a fixed allowance of 7*s.* per head weekly. They amounted for the year ending the 27th of September 1857 to 20,641*l.* 2*s.*, of which 221*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* was recovered from the parents or step-parents under the provisions of the Reformatory Schools' Act. The total numbers committed to Reformatories during the last four years were :—23,176, 534, and 1,119

Under the head of "Criminal Lunatics," whose commitments are now included in the general "Judicial Statistics," we find that at the commencement of the past year, 586 were under detention, and 131 were committed during the year. The total cost of this class of prisoners in the year was 19,836*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, of which only 1,541*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* was defrayed from the funds of the lunatics or by their friends.

The returns for the past year mark a most important change. Transportation, which has been in operation since the act of parliament of 18 Car. 2, and which authorized Judges either to execute, or to transport for life to America the moss-troopers of Cumberland or Westmorland, was abolished in 1857 ; for although the power to remove convicts to the penal colonies is reserved, and is applicable to all those sentenced to penal servitude, it does not seem probable that it will be exercised unless in very exceptional cases. For several years the numbers transported to Australia averaged about 4,000 ; last year they amounted to 461. In 1856, 2,915 convicts were discharged on tickets-of-leave ; last year the number was reduced to 933 ; of these, 926 were discharged from the government prisons, and 7 women from local prisons.

The organization of the police force throughout the kingdom, which was only established in several counties towards the middle of last year, has doubtless been the means of detecting a large amount of crime. The total cost of the police force in 1857 was 1,265,579*l.* 18*s.* The total establishment of permanent paid police was 19,187*l.* of which 6,635 were metropolitan and city of London.

From The Philanthropist, of September 4th, we take the following :—

ASSOCIATED FARMS.

1st. FOR DISCHARGED PRISONERS.

2nd. PREVENTIVE OF CRIME.

As might not unnaturally be expected, a variety of suggestions have been forwarded to us as to the mode in which discharged prisoners might effectually be assisted to regain the confidence and character, without which they could scarcely hope to secure employment. Many, previously ignorant of the existence of any societies for such a purpose, seek information as to their operation and success; but all alike seem generally impressed with a feeling that discharged prisoners, though willing to work, having neither character nor money, are very likely soon to fall into old habits, and are objects for special care and humanity, under reasonable restrictions. Almost all the suggestions, however, are such as are more or less carried into effect in the operations of one or other of the societies already existing. There will always, of necessity, be a variety in these operations, regulated by the local circumstances and requirements of each peculiar gaol or house of correction; and we trust that those who are disposed actively to enter upon this humane work in their own neighbourhood, or to support the effort by their means and influence, will apply for the reports of the existing societies, and see, by what has already been done, how they themselves may best be of service. One suggestion, however, has a certain degree of novelty in it, and, if practicable, would materially influence the question; at any rate the hint is thrown out that it may be improved upon by the consideration and experience of others.

The suggestion comes from Mr. Gurdon, of Assington Hall, Sudbury, Suffolk, and is to the effect that, as regards the provinces, every county or two counties together, should possess a farm for discharged prisoners generally, somewhat assimilated to the reformatory farms in discipline, but not, of course, restricted to age, where discharged prisoners might imbibe habits of industry and receive good instruction. "Artizans and women could be also employed on the farm—shoe-making, tailoring, and carpentry by the former class, cooking, washing, and serving by the women; and then after a certain time they may be drafted off into other situations, with a character, and money in their pocket." It cannot be denied that a farm for liberated culprits generally, while it might confer a benefit on society at large, and materially reduce the county rates, would yet be beset with many difficulties. Mr. Gurdon, however, thinks these difficulties very far from insurmountable. If the foundation be sound, the superstructure must stand if properly raised. There would be a great necessary variation in the supply of labour, and at one time a sudden influx of hands, at others a corresponding dearth. Spade husbandry is recommended; and the number of cases employed might be both selected and restricted to a certain number, at all events at first, until experience in the working of the system had been required. In harvest weeks they should all be paid in the same proportion as other farm-labourers, deducting, of course, their lodging and victuals. As regards the possible displacing of parish hands, this, he admits, would be at first a serious difficulty. He suggests that this might be met by having, say 500 acres of heath or woodland, where the population is scanty. It matters little where it is, provided it be near a railway station. Of course the main difficulty of all would be the obtaining the necessary funds. We have elsewhere alluded to this as the besetting bar to progress in dealing with discharged prisoners. We feel it certainly to be possible, though perhaps difficult, that, under experienced and practical hands, a farm might be so conducted as nearly, if not quite, to pay its own expenses.

Mr. Gurdon speaks with the experience of a county magistrate who has taken very considerable pains to do what lay in his power to improve the poor around him. He thinks that a very large proportion of prisoners, if not a majority, are agricultural labourers, and with some justice he considers that there is a peculiar blessing attached to cultivators of the soil. We shall feel obliged if some of those gentlemen who are more practically versed in this matter than ourselves will favour us with their opinions as to the feasibility of this scheme, or any similar one which may be grafted upon it.

Mr. Gurdon, after touching upon this subject, submits for our consideration a system of co-operative farming, which should act as preventive to want, and consequently to crime. On this subject we can go fully with Mr. Gurdon, and make no apology for introducing the subject in his own straightforward manner.

He says—"When I came into my property, some forty years ago, I found that all the small holdings of five or ten acres had been swallowed up by the larger farms, and the labourer had no stimulus for bettering himself; in short, the staves had been taken out of his ladder, and he was unable to ascend. I resolved upon giving away 50*l.* annually in my parish, to the best ploughman, the best conducted, &c., &c. I am glad that this plan has now spread over the length and breadth of the land. Allotments followed, all very good in their way, but they did not replace the loss of the little farms. Meum and tuum could not be understood by the labourer, for whatever his hand fell upon was sure to be tuum, and the result was the gaol. Upon a small farm of 100 acres becoming vacant, I called together twenty of the best labourers, and told them that if they would subscribe 2*l.* each, I would lend them 400*l.* without interest to cultivate this farm. I drew up rules and regulations which they agreed to, to the number of thirty. In a few years they paid off the 400*l.* lent, and their shares are now valued at 52*l.* each member. It worked so well, that four years ago I let off another farm of 150 acres upon the same terms. This is also going on admirably, and they have paid me off 200*l.* An old friend of mine, Sir W— F—, was so pleased with it, that he told me he should let a farm of 500 acres upon the same plan. The members would tell you that it is the best scheme that ever was set on foot for the labouring classes. It is also beneficial to the landlord and rate-payer.

"I should mention that out of thirty members there are only about five or six that are regularly employed on the farm; the rest are with other farmers ; and the farmers are now glad to get them, as they are sure of honest men ; for in case of conviction they would lose their share, which is now worth, as I said, 52*l.* each. I generally attend once a year one of their quarterly meetings, and it is quite pleasing to hear the shrewd remarks these men make. Pray make use of this information if you please, and I have no objection to be referred to for any further particulars."

We here subjoin the agreement and rules under which this co-operative farming is carried on. The thing so entirely commends itself to our judgment, that we shall be glad to find similar plans of mutual farms starting into existence elsewhere. Everything is now being done on a large scale, and by corporate bodies, and we can see no reason why farming should be exempted from the general system of partnership. The present instance is the first which has come under our notice of a farm being conducted by a "Co." The stimulus to industry and economy, as well as to honesty, in this plan of associating labourers for their mutual benefit, the motive it supplies to them for endeavouring to understand what they do, and its tendency to promote friendship among them, are no slight steps in the practical education of the labouring classes. Of course it would be impossible to succeed without a capital to commence with, and Mr. Gurdon must have had great faith in his scheme and in his men, and a large amount of benevolence, to lend them the capital required. But the English labourers, as a body, are possessed of much right feeling, steadiness, honesty, and perseverance. They, are however, seldom placed in circumstances to elicit these qualities. Mr. Gurdon evidently understands them, and they him. We can only hope that others to whom God has given means will follow his example, and we shall be much surprised if a general adoption of this or a kindred scheme, do not in a few years make a very sensible diminution in the number of paupers as well as of adult prisoners, and, as a necessary consequence, of the heavy expense at which they are maintained in unions or prisons by the ratepayers.

THE ASSINGTON AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION.

"He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread."

"Moreover, the profit of the earth is for all ; the King himself is served by the field."

AGREEMENT.

I agree to let from Michaelmas, 1853, for my life, to the undermentioned persons, forming themselves into an Agricultural Association, a Farm, called Severals, containing 136 Acres, more or less, for the annual rent of £194, and £3 for each house, upon the following conditions:—That the Society do not diminish their number of 30 members without my approval. That the land be farmed upon the four-course husbandry. That they conduct themselves with propriety, and pay their rent regularly. That every twelve years the land to be re-valued. That all repairs be done by the Association ; the Landlord finding rough materials. To insure the premises for £300, and to do one day's carting annually with four horses and two men.

Assington Hall, March 25th, 1853.

JOHN GURDON.

Names of the Members.

J. Marshall, J. Bell, B. Sowman, Sen., Committee; B. Sowman, Jun., John Butcher, Charles Green, John Austin, William Butcher, James Finch, William Whymark, Sen., William Whymark, Jun., John Griggs, John Stow, William Butcher, Henry Frost, Walter Pollard, George Farthing, John Chaplin, James Bailey, Daniel Godden, Israel Warner, James Butcher, William Gentry. George Crisell, John Theobald, Philip Butcher, Sen., Philip Butcher, Jun., John Butcher, William Smyth, William Griggs.

RULES AND REGULATIONS.

1. That this Society be denominated the "ASSINGTON AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION;" and shall consist of thirty Members, for the purpose of cultivating the aforesaid farm, for their mutual benefit.

2. That a Committee, consisting of three Members, be appointed yearly, by ballot, at Michaelmas, for keeping the accounts, and superintending the cultivation of the Farm.

3. That Four Meetings be held at the houses yearly, viz. the first Tuesday after every Quarter-day, for auditing the accounts, and transacting any business that may be requisite.

4. That the house be let to two Members agreed upon by the Society; that they have the charge of the Live Stock; that one be regularly employed upon the Farm; and that whatever extra labour is required, be arranged by the Committee.

5. That the following Articles be provided by the Committee for the use of the Members; viz. Household Stores of all descriptions, Home-brewed Beer, Milk, Pork, Bacon, Flour, and whatever else may be considered desirable.

6. Any Member convicted of Fraud, or any other crime, to be excluded the Society, with the forfeiture of his share; if refusing to work when called upon, or slighting it, the Committee to find a substitute, to be paid out of the Member's share of profits.

7 Any Member falling into unforeseen difficulties may be advanced a loan upon his share to half its value at five per cent. interest, provided the funds will admit of it, or he may sell his share subject to the Landlord's and Members' approval.

8. The Society is answerable for no debts, except those contracted by the Committee, for the public advantage.

9. Upon the death of a Member, if his share be not disposed of by will; his widow may enjoy it during her widowhood; at her decease or subsequent marriage, the share to be vested in his eldest son if living in the parish; in default of sons, to be sold (subject to the Landlord's approval) for the benefit of daughters or next of kin.

10. If an new Member, upon the purchase of a share, be unable to advance the whole amount, he must be charged five per cent. for such monies in arrears, the Society paying up the price of the share to those entitled to it.

11. Vacancies to be filled up by ballot, upon terms agreed upon by the Members; but those only who are labourers of the parish, and Members of the Stoke and Melford Union Association, to be eligible.

12. Any alterations to these Rules, or new ones added, may be effected, if carried by vote, at either of the Public Meetings, with the sanction of the Landlord, to be entered into the general minute-book.

PRISONS IN IRELAND.

By the 36th report of the Inspector-General of Prisons in Ireland for the year 1857, it appears that the large and progressive decrease of crime in Ireland, noted for the last six years, happily continues. Of late years the decrease in male crime had exceeded that in female to an immense extent, but last year an extraordinary change occurred, the decrease in female crime being ten times as great as that in male. This the inspectors conceive to be a most satisfactory fact, for the good conduct of the females of a country is a sure indication of the advance of prosperity, employment, and education. The common Irish offence of vagrancy has largely decreased in both sexes, and the decrease in juvenile crime has been "enormous." 3265 persons were in Gaol on New Year's Day last, against 3419 in 1857. In 1854 the number was 5755; in 1852, 8803; and in 1850, 10,967. 39,666 was the number of committals last year, and the daily average number of prisoners was 32,954. 32,798 convictions took place. The number of debtors imprisoned was 743. The committals represent 32,294 individuals, and the re-committals of females much exceed those of the other sex. The proneness of females to relapse is remarkable as compared with that of the superior sex. This is partly to be accounted for by the "lamentably defective" arrangements of the female wards, and the want of due classification. Out of 31,505 sentences to imprisonments in gaols in Ireland last year, only 3,932 males and 2250 females (less than one-fifth of the whole) were sentenced to longer terms of incarceration than one month, whereas no less than 13,434 males and 11,889 females were under sentences ranging from twenty-four hours to one month, and the average length of duration under sentence for each of these 25,323 prisoners was only ten days and twenty-three hours. Of the 39,666 persons committed, 10,136 read and wrote, 7560 read imperfectly, 2510 knew orthography, 2108 knew the alphabet, and 16,980 were wholly illiterate. The immense majority (34,543 out of the 39,666) were persons of the Romish persuasion, or Papists, and 722 were Presbyterians. There is a slight improvement in the education of the males committed, but with the females the reverse is the case, upwards of half the sex being grossly illiterate, while only one-seventh of them could read and write respectably. The net expense of gaols in Ireland last year was £77,056, and a regular decrease has taken place since 1849, when it amounted to £128,630. The expenditure on bridewells was £31,404. The state of these latter is most reprehensible; there appears to have been utter neglect, and the conduct of the magistracy in committing them for illegal periods ought to awaken the attention of the Irish Executive. An immense appendix, abounding in tabular statements, fills up the bulk of the blue-book before us, but the object of printing so much useless matter at the public expense does not appear. It will certainly not be read by the most greedy devourer of parliamentary literature.

QUARTERLY RECORD OF THE PROGRESS OF REFORMATORY AND RAGGED SCHOOLS, AND OF THE IMPROVEMENT OF PRISON DISCIPLINE.

As Reformatories are now being established in Ireland, the cost of such institutions becomes a matter of interest and importance. Through the kindness of Miss Carpenter, and of Mr. Joseph Adshead of Manchester, we are enabled to present two very valuable communications on this subject. The first refers to the cost of American Reformatories. The second is Mr. Adshead's paper on the Comparative Economy of the Reformatory and Ragged Schools of England, read in the Punishment and Reformation Section of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, at Liverpool, Thursday, Oct. 14, 1858. The letter of Mr. Israel Russell, of the House of Refuge, New York, to Miss Carpenter, is as follows :—

*City Office,
House of Refuge, 516 Broadway,
New York, Jan. 5th, 1858.*

Miss Mary Carpenter, Respected Madam,

I take the liberty by a good opportunity to forward a package of pamphlets and papers in response to a circular I received a few months ago, containing several queries regarding Prisons and Reformatories in this country, and requesting replies from any one enabled to give them in reference to these subjects. In the first place, however, I beg to say I send you the proceedings of the First Convention of Managers and Superintendents of Houses of Refuge and Schools of Reform in the United States of America, held in this city in May last.

The House of Refuge on Randall Island, New York, the first House established in this country, although receiving appropriations from both the State and City Governments, is the only institution exclusively managed by private citizens, on the voluntary principle. It is what is termed a close corporation, the members of the Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents, who have charge of the Refuge, annually electing a board of managers from its own body, have always been gentlemen of the highest character for intelligence, of sound conservative views, and of practical business habits. They make their regular annual reports, both to the State and City Governments, and what can be said of but few institutions in the long period of its existence, now thirty four years, not the slightest doubt has ever been expressed by either State or City as to its judicious management, or a moment's hesitation in making the necessary appropriations for its annual support. The best evidence that can be given of its good management is :—the board of managers have frequently offered to make it over to the care of the State, but they have invariably declined to assume the care of it, satisfied it would not be as economically managed, or as strict discipline maintained, under State appointments. It will be seen by looking at the different columns in everything relating to its cost, the figures are the lowest, except in one instance, and in its receipts for labour, &c., it is the highest, showing the lowest actual net cost per annum of each inmate. Without wishing to boast of our method, we can say our accounts are kept with the precision of any regular mercantile establishment.

The gentleman, the Chairman of the Statistic Committee, who prepared the tables from the printed forms which had been distributed by our Committee of arrangements, and sent to the several institutions in the country, has done it with great care and fidelity, and given all the facts which were stated in their returns. The results are the tables in the proceedings of the Convention.

You will perceive a very wide difference in the cost of them. Many of the new institutions can scarcely be said to be fairly in operation, and we therefore have reason to believe they will profit by the information thus brought together by this convention. At the same time, some of those entirely under State control, show that they are expensively managed. This, however, does not effect the character or beneficial effects of the system, as it is only the fault of the State Legislatures who permit it, by allowing too many high salaried officers to manage them. In examining the Table of Statistics, page 89 of Convention proceedings, the average cost of the whole per Capita for 1856, is 97.33 dollars. The average cost of the New York house alone, for 1856, is 85.05 dollars, without deducting the earnings, which amounted to 28.96 $\frac{5}{8}$ dollars, each inmate. Deduct this from the cost 85.05 dollars, leaves the actual cost at 56.08 $\frac{1}{8}$ dollars—which is the lowest cost of any of the institutions in this country. There is another view I will present of this matter, and it is only of our own house to which I will make any allusion. Our present location was a munificent gift of the corporation of our city of nearly forty acres of land in Randall Island, in exchange for ten acres we owned on the adjoining (Ward's) island, for which we paid 15,000 dollars—the savings of the Society, in the course of a few years, by economy and good management. The State then appropriated means to enable us to erect buildings to accommodate one thousand children, with a complete system of classification. They have already appropriated and paid us 186,000 dollars for this purpose, and we are going before the Legislature now in session, to ask them for 75,000 dollars more, to complete our buildings on the original plan proposed. In making a sea wall around the island bounding our premises, we reclaimed and added to our land two or more acres. The island was rough—a great deal rock and marshy wet ground, which, when we commenced to occupy our new buildings, three years ago, appeared like waste land, and would be of little or no use to us. It has, however, proved far otherwise. This forbidding and unprofitable looking portion of our premises, has been turned to most valuable account, in the employment of our larger class of boys, whom no kindness or discipline can reform, for we are sorry to say we have some of this class always with us ; but not more in proportion than may be found in the same number of any other class of children in grades of good, bad, and those with more vicious or evil propensities. Many of our large boys, having been suffered to indulge in their bad habits too long, their reformation cannot be thoroughly accomplished before it is time under our system to bind them out to farmers or mechanics in the country. They frequently leave their places, and soon find their way back to their old haunts in the city, and are returned to us, in a short time, through the police, and different courts.

With this class of boys from seventeen to twenty years of age, we have had on an average from twenty to twenty-five constantly employed in suitable working weather and, in the three years we have occupied these buildings, at least three acres of what we thought worthless land, has been brought to a high state of cultivation, and large quantities of potatoes and garden vegetables have been raised for the use of the establishment during the past year. This has saved an outlay for the articles thus produced, and is therefore an item of revenue earned by these large boys, whose labor while thus employed it would be fair to estimate at from 50 to 75 cents per day, the wages of men who would do no more than these boys. The same with the boys in the tailor's shop and shoe shop, who make all the clothes and shoes for the whole establishment. The same may be said with regard to the girls who do all the washing, making and repairing garments for the whole establishment. If we had to pay for these expenditures it would make a large outlay, which is thus saved to the Institution. If the calculation of what the labor of these boys and girls would produce, if contracted for at their true value, as the other smaller children are to shoemaking, chair-making, and wire weaving, at 10 and 12 per day, and credited to our earnings account, it would reduce our net cost to nearly or about 40 dols. per annum. There is one thing in the statistical table which may tend to mislead unless explained, it is the different dates of the returns. For instance the report of our house is dated 1st May 1857, when it is the actual statistics of its affair from the 1st January to 31st December 1856, showing the number received, and the number disposed of, leaving 477 inmates in the house 31st December 1856. The other Institutions are made up in the same way, but their statistics show the operation for one year precisely.

Our house opened the first day of 1858, with a larger family than we however had before, viz. 577 boys, and 70 girls, a total of 647. Last year at same date 477, being an increase of 170 inmates. Our revenue from labor of the boys contracted for, amounts to about 13,000 dollars, and would have been over 14,000 dollars, but for the monetary revulsion which reached our establishment as it has all others. The total number of inmates received in the house since its opening in 1825, is 7336 ; our annual report will be published in the course of two or three weeks when I will forward one. In the mean time I forward by a gentleman from Staffordshire, the package alluded to before, who has promised to forward it, one is the 7th Annual Report of our house, a copy of our charter and other laws since passed, our Bye-Laws revised in 1854, but only with slight modification from those adopted in 1826, and in use ever since ; a newspaper printed in November 1846, containing a memorial of the N.Y. Prison Association, to the Common Council for the establishment of a work-house which they were authorized by their charter to erect, it being the first movement in this City for that object ; attached to this memorial written more than eleven years ago, are some valuable statistics, which were collected at that time with the above object in view, as to the cost of support of prisoners and inmates of our houses of Refuge, of which there were but three at that day. Our House of Refuge then cost but 54.33 dollars per annum each inmate, from which was to be deducted their earnings of 16.5½ dollars each, leaving the net cost at 38.37½ dollars each per annum. This was owing to the low price of flour, beef, potatoes, and other articles of living, and the lower wages of the employers, all which it is well known, have since been at extravagant rates, and have materially advanced the cost of supporting every kind of public institution. But the late revulsion in monetary affairs will doubtless reduce the cost again to reasonable amounts. You will also find the 11th and 12th annual reports in one pamphlet of the New York Prison Association, with which I have been connected from its organization in 1844. We have an excellent and devoted agent, an Englishman, whose heart is in the work ; the support of this is entirely by voluntary subscriptions, and, as it is not a very popular object, it is hard work to raise much money for its support ; you will however see some valuable statistics in this also.

I have thought by addressing this package it would be most likely to reach the destination intended, and I trust you will pardon me for sending you more statistics than anything else worthy of notice.

I am very respectfully,

ISRAEL RUSSELL.

It will be seen by this table there is a great difference in the cost of supporting Inmates in these several Institutions. This, in a great measure, is owing to the different modes of management. By referring to the Report of the Committee on Statistics, in the proceedings of the Convention, folio 83, on the third page of Table A., it will be noticed whence they derive their support. The most of them are from State or City Government. If, by the State, the Legislature has the appointment of managers; if, by the city councils, and private contributors, they are managed by representatives from each body; or, if they derive their support from the city, county, or town only, they have the management as they please to direct.

* These two Institutions are always limited in number.

† These three Institutions, but recently organized and just commenced operations, their Reports do not yet show any earnings.

To those interested in the history of American Reformatories we recommend a paper entitled, American Reformatory Institutions, printed in the twenty-eighth number of this REVIEW. Mr. Adshead's paper, on the cost of English Reformatories, is as follows :—

Reformatories and Ragged and Industrial Schools have at length become national institutions, and are now recognised and carried on under parliamentary sanction and minutes of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education. Each year's experience gives an increased understanding of the question, "What is to be done with the dangerous and vagrant classes?" A large number of young persons also, for whom no suitable provision had formerly been made, are now brought within the range of Ragged and Industrial Schools' Regulations.

An enlarged development of the various agencies now in operation cannot fail in time to a diminishing of the number of our criminal classes—Reformatories and Industrial Schools being essentially preventive institutions.

It has been a subject of common observation, that the youthful criminal almost inevitably becomes an old and hardened offender. There is a criminal community within our population, acting as by natural laws, altogether antagonistic to well-ordered society.

It has been generally considered by jurists, that there is but little hope of reclaiming the hardened adult transgressor, whose very element of existence is dissipation, profligacy, and crime. How is the swelling current to be diminished in its volume and to be narrowed in its course? How is the sapling to be made to yield before it becomes the stubborn plant.

Our Reformatories and Industrial Schools are pre-eminently adapted to check the current of crime at its source; to bend the young sapling, and to train it to bring forth the fruits of industry and good conduct, instead of the noxious fruits of infamy and vice.

I have a lively recollection of the feeling of concern manifested upon the question of Houses of Refuge and Reformatories and entertained by benevolent minds, twenty years ago. I had visited the Houses of Refuge in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other parts of the United States, and had followed somewhat in the track of the late estimable William Crawford, the inspector of prisons for the home district, and the inquiry then was—"What can be done to establish similar institutions in this country?" Parkhurst was the result of that consideration, as an experimental institution, promoted mainly by Mr. Crawford, in conjunction with the late Rev. Whitworth Russell, and (the then Captain) now Colonel Jebb. The work comparatively slumbered, so far as to practical results, for some years.

The old Philanthropic Society, in St. George's Fields, London, was doing in a limited degree the work of reformation of juvenile delinquents; but youthful criminality kept annually increasing, and no salutary and renovating antidote was provided to arrest the moral malady.

A problem had to be solved ; the subject had to be fully grappled with ; benevolent minds gave themselves to the consideration of the question, and there will, I think, be but one opinion, that the interesting proceedings of the Birmingham Conference of 1851, with also the important inquiries instituted by the Parliamentary Committee of 1852, upon juvenile delinquency and neglected and vagrant children, gave a new and increased impulse and direction to those feelings of benevolent solicitude which had been cherished for the adoption and carrying out of plans for youthful reclamation.

The 17th & 18th Vict. cap. 86, of 1854, was the first general legislative enactment passed for the general advancement of Reformatory establishments, and which so importantly supplemented voluntary and benevolent efforts, and placed the institutions certified under its provisions upon a satisfactory basis.

It could scarcely be expected that in the first formation of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, there should be at once a completeness in their general economy. Bands of benevolent individuals determined upon establishing these preventive institutions. Funds had to be raised, buildings to be provided, suitable supervision and management to be procured, and thus the managers or boards would have gradually to feel their way, and by degrees to establish more efficiently their principles of action in carrying on these institutions ; nor could a uniform principle of action be well adopted, as is evident—place and circumstance having their influence upon economical results.

As, however, there is now a number of institutions, reformatory, and industrial, established, and which have the advantage of becoming acquainted with each other's operations, it may therefore not be unprofitable to make some inquiry into their general proceedings, or rather to make a few contrasts as to the comparative economy of several of the leading Reformatories, and also in relation to several Ragged Industrial Feeding Schools. Such inquiries may present views upon some points as to what to avoid, what to correct, or what to adopt—it being a most important element in the practical working of the institutions under review, to accomplish the largest amount of good at the smallest amount of cost, compatible with efficient working.

To develop more fully the subject of this paper, I propose to direct attention to the following topics in relation to Reformatories and Ragged Schools :—Their sources of income ; expenditure for supervision ; maintenance, and industrial results—with some suggestions and general reflections ; and be it to the honour of our country, that so large an amount of benevolent and voluntary agency is employed in working out the salutary results of these institutions. To this voluntary supervising agency may be ascribed that large measure of success which has attended the means employed—a sympathy not purchaseable by money. Enlisted amongst those who have taken a foremost part in the promotion of such institutions are to be found peers of the realm, members of parliament, clergymen, ministers of religion of various denominations, the various classes of professional men, merchants, and other sections of the community ; not passing by the devoted labours of many ladies, who have most earnestly aided in the good work ;—all these marking with benevolent concern the welfare of the institutions under notice, and uniting for their promotion and advancement.

Important results must attend such powerful and influential combinations.

With those who take a practical part in the working of Reformatory Institutions, expenditure is a natural subject of inquiry. What the cost per head of each inmate ? What the amount per annum for superintendence, &c. ? What towards self-support by labour results ?

Such information can only be obtained by a reference to the published reports of the institutions ; with some of these documents it is not easy to come to a satisfactory conclusion. Regarding several establishments, inquiry is stopped at the very threshold—no average number being given of attendance through the year ; and the various kinds of outlay are so mixed up, that distinctive classes of expenditure cannot be clearly defined for comparison with the expenditure of other institutions. Some of the annual accounts end in March, others in June, others at the end of the year. It would be highly desirable could a uniform system be adopted in the classification of the various kinds of expenditure, with the average number of attendances through the year. By these means, comparisons could be readily made as to the economical working of the institutions. Out of about eighty reports before me, not one-third have furnished their annual statements in a manner to enable the writer to obtain information as to the cost per head of the inmates, of the respective Reformatories.

There is, however, sufficient information contained in the periodical reports of some of the institutions to indicate their comparative economy.

The Red Hill Institution appears to present itself as the starting point. Since its altered constitution in 1850, it has become essentially a Reformatory establishment—is considered the Anglo-Mettray, has received unequalled patronage and support—and has had the advantage of the lengthened experience of its late resident chaplain and superintendent, the Rev. S. Turner.

Red Hill is presented to the public attention as the model Reformatory establishment. On this ground, and from its general operations, it is natural that it should come more especially under review, and from which important information should be obtainable for the guidance of the inexperienced as to the necessary outlay or expenditure in the commencing and also in the carrying on of similar institutions.

The classes of expenditure, for simplicity of arrangement, are brought out under the following heads :—Salaries, house incidentals, provisions, clothing, and miscellaneous charges. These respective items will indicate the pro rata charge per head—a plan adopted with much clearness in the Kingswood Reformatory report.

For this purpose, it is proposed to notice the following ten Institutions :—

The ordinary receipts and expenditure only are supplied. No particulars in details of farming or manufacturing operations are given, but credit for profit from labour when shown in the account.

To preserve the text of this paper in some degree of consecutive order without the interference of statistical and financial data, in the following ten Reformatories I have only presented the total net cost per inmate, and must refer for the particular classification of items of receipts and expenditure to note A, in which will be found the abstracts of annual statements, and also miscellaneous receipts and expenditure in detail—these furnishing an approximate view sufficiently near to indicate the comparative charges under similar headings, by which their economical relations may be readily contrasted. One example only, as an illustration of the classified form.

Provision was also made this year (1857) by the Redhill Reformatory for the emigration of 66 boys, at a cost of £1374 5s. 6d. or £20 16s. 4d. per head. £147 9s. 3d. was also expended in apprenticing lads, but no number is given.

* This amount does not fairly indicate the average amount of subscriptions and donations. The two previous years they were as follows:—1855, £659 2s. 9d. 1856, annual subscriptions and donations less expenses of public dinner; &c. £1585 19s. 5d. The report for 1857, refers to the very liberal donations of £1000 per William Gladstone, Esq., the respected treasurer of the institution, for the erection of another house for 40 inmates, upon the Mettray family principle.

- No. 10. Castle Howard Reformatory. Report, 1858. Average attendance, 1856-7, 35 boys. Net cost per head per annum, £25 6s. 3d., or 9s. 8d. per week.

The foregoing statement are the briefest references that could be given in showing the cost per head results of the ten Reformatories. The classified statement of the receipts and expenditure, with the miscellaneous details as shown in note A. will not be considered altogether as a perfect index of the nature of the entire working of the reformatory system. The accounts in the manner there supplied are the first which have been furnished in a collected and tabulated form, and are given more as examples, and as to their extent, as an approximation to what may be deemed as the result of reformatory operations, and which may be briefly commented upon under various heads commencing with

It will be perceived there is considerable difference in the amounts received, the lowest being at the rate of 18s. 8d. per head, the highest, 15l. 16s. 6d. per head. The sum total of subscriptions and donations for the ten Reformatories is 4080l. 4s. 2d. or at the average rate of 3l. 16s. 1d. per head per annum, for 1075 inmates, as indicated in the table.

It may be urged that taking the reports for one year is scarcely a fair criterion as to the amount of benevolent contributions to the respective institutions noticed; but it will be admitted that the year quoted is as fair for one institution as another; and the same objection might be urged against the selection of any particular year. The principle adopted has been to give a transcript of the receipts and expenditure of the latest reports obtainable, whatever results they might show, either favourable or otherwise.

The Treasury allowance is the main element of support to the Reformatory system, and very properly so. It could never be expected that both the cost and the supervision of the youthful delinquents of the country were to be thrown upon the voluntary contributions and the voluntary agency of the benevolent portions of the community. Voluntary benevolence commenced, and has largely carried out, the long-needed operations of our Reformatory Institutions, and the Legislature both timely and wisely supplement their benevolent effort by the provisions of the 17 & 18 Vict. cap. 86, under the power of which 7s. per week per inmate, or 18*l.* 4*s.* per annum, is paid by the State to duly-certified Reformatories.

The amount furnished by the government to the ten Reformatories was 19,534*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*, or at the rate of 18*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.* per institution, (or a very near approximation in the average number of the treasury allowance), and 2815*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*, or 2*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* per head, from the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, making a total amount of 22,349*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*, or 20*l.* 16*s.* per head per annum. There is a great disparity in the amounts received from the sources referred to. The lowest amount received from the Treasury is 4*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, ranging to 28*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.* per head per annum.

There are those who refer disparagingly to the operations of voluntary benevolence, because it has not been enabled to afford entire support to the preventative institutions under review. Without entering upon the general question, as to what voluntary effort should do, or what may be considered as not coming within the scope of its operations, it might as well be expected that voluntary effort should supply the means to provide for the police of the country, or for the sustentation of our Gaols. Reformatories are places of detention for youthful criminal; but their regime and discipline are better adapted than those of our Gaols to accomplish the true intent of salutary punitive treatment, viz.—the reclamation of the offender; and happily, under the Reformatory system, there is a combination of influences peculiarly suited to the attainment of that object, which our common gaol system does not and cannot supply.

There is another subject, under the head of “receipts,” to which reference may be made. It is the quota contributed by parents of inmates of Reformatories, which appear under two classifications—voluntary and compulsory.

The enforcement of parental obligations to support their own offspring is one of the most important elements in carrying out the Reformatory system; and it is to be regretted that the pecuniary results of that enforcement, as shown above, are so excessively diminutive. There are profligate and abandoned parents (as may not be unfrequently seen by the police reports in the public prints), that appear to claim a right to send their neglected children to Reformatory institutions; and it will well become the executive boards of managers of Reformatories to aid in every possible way the rigid enforcement of the following clause, in the 17 & 18 Vict. cap, 87, sec, 2, which runs as follows:—

“In every case in which any juvenile offender shall be detained in a Reformatory School, under the said Act, the parent or step-parent, if of sufficient ability, shall be liable to contribute to his support and maintenance, a sum not exceeding five shillings a week; and it shall be lawful in England and Wales for any two justices of the peace, upon the complaint of any person authorized by one of her Majesty’s principal Secretaries of State, to take proceedings in that behalf, to summon the parent or step-parent, as the case may be, and examine into his or her ability, and (if, on consideration of all the circumstances of the case, they think fit), to make an order on him or her for such weekly payment, not exceeding five shillings per week, as they think reasonable, during the whole or any part of the detention of such juvenile offender in such Reformatory School; such payment to be made at such times as by such order may be directed, to the person so authorized to take proceedings as aforesaid; or to such person as the Secretary of State may, from time to time, appoint to receive the same; and by him to be accounted for and paid as the Commissioners of her Majesty’s Treasury may direct.”

In the return made to the House of Commons, there is shown the amounts compulsorily received by weekly payments, from the parents of Reformatory inmates, by Mr. Turner, the Reformatory Inspector, and previously by Mr. Morgan, of Birmingham:—

Number of parents against whom authority has been taken for proceeding, from 31st March, 1857, ending 31st March, 1858. 					605
Number of such parents under contribution the 31st March, 1858. 					292
Amount of contributions received during the twelve months, ending March 31st 					£629 12 8

Of the 605 persons against whom proceedings were authorized, 16 resided in London, 106 in Manchester, 47 in Birmingham, 24 in Leeds, 15 in Newcastle, 14 in Hull, and the remainder, in Sheffield, Bolton. Huddersfield, Ashton, Stalybridge, Coventry, Bedford, Norwich, Bristol, Falmouth, &c.; in all, 53 places.

The amount received is 629*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*, at the rate of 5*d.* per week per head.

It is not so much the large amount (although profligate parents should not be spared), obtainable from the parents, as its being extensively known amongst the dissolute class, that they are not, with impunity, to cast their children upon the public without being liable for their support—that either to pay or go to prison is before them.

This, determinedly carried out, may have a deterring influence.

The items of expenditure, under the various classifications shown in the statements given, will not fail to receive attention. A discreet economy should pervade all institutions such as those under notice; but no specific rule can be laid down. There are general charges which are more or less incidental to locality and circumstance; but in the “maintenance” economy much depends upon the governor or matron of the institution, as to a due regard to economise, both as to the purchase and consumption of the articles for maintenance. In the expenditure, “provisions” form a prominent feature, and under this head, there will also be a considerable diversity in the amounts; but as some institutions board portions (or it may be the whole) of their officers and staffs, thus lessening in amount the salaries and wages’ ratios, and proportionably increasing the “provisions” expenses, it is, therefore, deemed more fair to take under a distinct head, these two-fold classes of expenditure, showing, at the same time, the relative ratios of each kind of expenditure of each respective institution:—

The preceding table, it will be perceived, ranges, for salaries and wages and provisions from 7*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* to 17*l.* 5*s.* per head per inmate: the Glasgow Reformatory, an old-established one (1838), with its large number of 382; and the Castle Howard Reformatory, of recent establishment (1855), with only 35 inmates.

PROFIT FOR LABOUR.

A brief notice only need be taken of this item. The following are the results, as drawn from the respective reports; and as there is somewhat of perplexity in defining, with distinctness, the labour profit of the field and the workshop, the following must be considered about as near an approximation as can be gathered from the statements furnished. The reports of succeeding years, it is hoped, will furnish these labour results with more clearness. The following are the amounts for the year of the respective institutions:—

Some reformatories might be referred to, showing a loss in the labour result. All the above are on the credit side of the accounts in their respective degrees.

Industrial labour is a branch of Reformatory economy, to be encouraged and promoted as much as possible; but it is not easy to determine the class of employment most likely to be useful to the reformatory détenu, or profitable to the institution. It should also be borne in mind the ages and peculiar class of children brought under the influence of Reformatory discipline. In the Red Hill report for 1858, is shown the ages of young persons admitted for 1857, and illustrates the class to be wrought upon;—

There is not only their morally degraded state, but also, with many, their physical condition has to be regarded. From the ages indicated, will it not appear that there must be combined in the Reformatory Institutions the moral training of the School, as well as the employment of the workshops and the farm? A régime truly calculated to promote the best intention of the promoters of the Reformatory system, in the reclamation of the youthful transgressor, and to fit him for obtaining, by honest industry, his own support, either in this country, or in some distant region.

In reviewing the operations of the few Reformatory Institutions to which some attention has been directed, there is much to encourage: but there is a very material element in connection with their operations that must not be overlooked. It is the great importance of retaining in connexion with such Institutions, the voluntary supervising agency, the value of which cannot be too highly appreciated. It is the vital influence which permeates throughout all the organizations and arrangements of Reformatory managements to a degree so salutary and advantageous. Withdraw the warm-hearted earnest zeal of the devoted voluntary friends, from the supervision of our Reformatories, and they would become mere places of detention, but little better than gaols, for the youthful delinquent, instead of what they are pre-eminently proving to be—houses of reform—a blessing to their inmates—and an extended benefit to the community.

GERMAN PRISONS.

At the Liverpool meeting of the Association for the Promotion of Social Science, a paper, by the Recorder of Birmingham, "On the Treatment of Criminals in certain States of Germany," was read by Lord BROUGHAM, in the absence of the writer. In the summer of the present year, Mr. Hill made a short visit to Germany, and the promptings of his philanthropic nature induced him to render the temporary release from the cares of his judicial office subservient to the interests of humanity, by an endeavour to extend our knowledge in respect to the position of the convict question in that country. The results were described in the communication before mentioned, which has been printed, together with the interlocutory observations of the noble and learned reader, for private circulation. Mr. Hill, in his valuable work, entitled "Suggestions for the Repression of Crime," and the reports of Parliamentary committees, had directed attention to the successful system of discipline pursued for many years by Governor Obermaier in the State Prison, at Munich; and the principal motive of his recent enquiries appears to have been to test the validity of certain objections urged against it by Dr. Mittermaier, Professor of Criminal Law at the University of Heidelberg, in a recent publication on the subject of "Prison Improvements." Mr. Hill found, from intercourse with him, that the Professor's adverse strictures were not based upon personal observation, but in part upon "hearsay," and in part likewise upon the discussion of documents submitted to the Bavarian Legislature. Mr. Hill, as might have been expected, was not disposed to accept such questionable testimony, and accordingly he betook himself to the Gaol at Munich, a searching examination of which vindicated the encomiums passed upon it:—

"The great end which the Governor pursues with unwearied assiduity is the reformation of his prisoners. To effect this object, he engages them in manual labour, applied to various arts and manufactures; so as to employ each individual according to his previous habits of life, or his capacity, mental and bodily. The prisoners are urged to industry and good conduct by rewards and punishments. So far as the law permits, their treatment is mild, and the Governor aims to act more by encouragement than by severity. Kindness as distinguished from indulgence, is the characteristic of his regulations. Indeed, the law in Bavaria is sufficiently harsh. The terms of imprisonment are of enormous length. Two prisoners were brought in from a distant gaol while I was present. One had been twenty years in confinement, the other twenty-four. To come under the care of Obermaier must, if I may judge from their appearance, be a happy change for them. Their countenance and bearing were those of men from whom life had been almost crushed out by a routine of gloomy and monotonous existence. Much to the Governor's regret, his prisoners wear chains; his power of rewarding exemplary conduct being limited to a diminution of the weight of these revolting appendages. In rare instances, however, as a reward for good conduct long continued, individuals are relieved of their chains by royal command.

"His prison answers in some respects to the convict prisons of England and Ireland. None of the inmates remain for a less term than six years. After that period, a certain limited discretion is allowed to him of recommending well-conducted prisoners for pardon, which recommendations are always acted upon by the authorities. Notwithstanding the rigors imposed by the law, many of the prisoners appeared healthy, and a large proportion of them had lost that repulsive expression which marks the face of the criminal in the lower stages of discipline."

So far no controversy arises between the Governor and the Professor, but the latter, in common with other influential persons, is the advocate of the separate system, which the former is not. Nor, indeed, has he the means of adopting it were he so disposed, the Bavarian Ministry having avowed their inability to incur the expense which the proposed change would entail. Mr. Hill's own views are in favour of a middle course. He says:—

"To separate the prisoner from his fellows at the commencement of his incarceration is, I hold, most desirable; nor would I give him associates until both he and they had manifested a steady desire for self-improvement, and a capacity for acting, to some extent, on their better aspirations. But looking upon him as hereafter to be returned to society, I cannot believe it wise, and herein Dr. Mittermaier agrees with me, to deprive him of companions up to the moment when he is again launched into the world—a period at which he will be called upon all at once to resist, by his own strength, influences from which he has been artificially guarded for years, and to resume the fulfilment of social duties so long suspended."

The Governor, moreover, is accused of having recourse to the practice of espionage, because he holds it to be the duty of the prisoners to inform him of any misconduct on the part of their fellows. Such information being given, he proceeds to a public examination of the case in the nature of a trial, and the accused is convicted or acquitted according to the evidence; no benefit whatever accruing to the accuser for executing his invidious office. Much stress is laid upon the revengeful feelings to which the regulation is calculated to give rise, because in the course of the fourteen years during which it has been acted upon, three cases have occurred in which the accused has risen upon the accuser and murdered him; but Mr. Hill does not see anything very conclusive in the fact of such a number of cases of extreme violence having occurred in that length of time, in an establishment containing from 550 to 600 convicts. Mr. Hill justly remarks that here the essential ingredient in a spy system—"advantage operating by way of bribe upon the accuser, whereby a motive is created to inveigle the accused into the commission of an offence, or to fabricate evidence against him in order to sustain a false charge"—is absent. He adds:—

"That such a regulation does not become a dead letter, furnishes to my mind cogent evidence that the moral tone of the prison is high. To suppose that an individual prisoner unbribed, and yet not impelled by a sense of duty, he having no other possible motive, personal spite excepted, would step out from the throng to denounce a comrade, is to suppose that he would encounter the scorn and hatred of the community to which he belongs, without any motive. Before he moves he will require the support of public opinion, which will be against, and not with him, unless the moral sentiment of the general body is in favour of the proceeding which he is about to commence; his public being composed of his fellow-prisoners. If this be the true light in which to regard the regulation in question, it should be looked upon not as an objection to the Governor's discipline, but as an invaluable test of efficiency in the moral training of the prisoners. And I cannot but believe that the first indication of the tone having become relaxed would be that the Governor and his officers were left to find out delinquents by their own unaided efforts."

From answers with which Mr. Hill was two years ago furnished by the Minister of the Interior, it appears that the average of reformed prisoners is from seventy to eighty per cent.—"perhaps more." He believes that these figures do not differ materially from the truth; and assuming that the success which is officially claimed for the training of the Munich prison has been established, he thinks that we may look upon the Governor's practice as a long series of experiments in reformatory training, of great value in aiding us to separate the essential conditions of reformation from those which are either merely accidental, or at best only auxiliary, or what are demanded by some peculiarity arising out of the race, or nation, or class, to which the prisoners may belong.

The following translation of a passage in Professor Mittermaier's book is given by Mr. Hill in an appendix :—

“ As to recent improvements, it should be mentioned that two special institutions have been erected for juvenile criminals, and that at the house for compulsory labour at Kaisheim, the following system has been successfully introduced. Prisoners who had behaved well, and whose term of imprisonment will expire in from four to ten months, are put to agricultural labour with the use of the spade ; and again, about fifty prisoners have, for the last four years been employed in the manufacture of agricultural machines and implements; this system has so good an effect upon the health, and also upon the morals of the prisoners, that in the whole of the country around, such prisoners as have been employed either in agricultural labours, or in the manufacture of machines, are gladly taken into service, and confidence rises so much the higher as but few instances of relapse occur.”

The following passage from Mr. Hill's paper is most interesting; to those who had the great pleasure of hearing the paper read by Lord Brougham, it will be doubly interesting ; as being the part at which, when he had come to the reading of it, the genuine man broke out, and the veteran worker in the cause of humanity was overcome by the detail of noble self-denial, and of entire devotion to good works in aid of the fallen fellow-man. Mr. Hill writes as follows :—

“ Although I had no opportunity of visiting other prisons, I had the great advantage of two long interviews with Dr. Wichern, the distinguished founder of the Rauhe Haus, near Hamburg, whom the King of Prussia has lately appointed Chief Inspector of Gaols throughout his dominions. The difficulties in Prussia, arising out of the laws which regulate punishments and prisons, and the present state of opinion among official men, are such as to offer very serious obstacles to improvement. Dr. Wichern, however, has struck out a most happy expedient for gradually introducing the required changes. At the Rauhe Haus, in addition to the juvenile outcasts of both sexes who are cherished in this establishment, Dr. Wichern opens its doors to earnest and disinterested young men, who seek him with the intention of devoting their lives to the good of others. Members of this body, who feel a vocation to Reformatory labours, he sends, after a training of three years, to the Prussian gaols to fill the inferior offices within their walls as vacancies occur. They reject no duties, however servile, attached to the post to which they may be appointed.

They are instructed to act on the minds and hearts of the prisoners ; but rather by kindness of manner, and by the example of self-sacrifice and unsullied moral conduct, than by precept or exhortation, which might be deemed an encroachment on offices filled by others.

Dr. Wichern has a lively and, I trust, a well-founded belief, that the unassuming labours of these devoted men, all acting under the impulse of strong religious convictions, will work a silent amelioration in the prevailing spirit of the intercourse between the prisoner and those under whose controul he is placed, by proving the superior efficacy of gentle treatment as compared with harshness of demeanour ; and thus a foundation will be laid for a gradually arising superstructure, combining all which a wise benevolence can desire. It is impossible to contemplate so noble an enterprise without emotion. Doubtless it will have the cordial wishes of this audience for its triumphant success !”

PHOTOGRAPHS AS A MEANS OF DISCOVERING RUNAWAYS FROM GAOLS AND REFORMATORIES—It has frequently been urged upon the consideration of Magistrates and Judges, and indeed we might add upon the Legislature, that if Photographs were taken of those sent to Gaol or to Reformatories on admission, very considerable good would result from the practice. First, the child or man would see what he was when he entered, and by comparing himself six months or twelve months later with what he was at the time of entry, he would judge for himself, if well disposed, how well designed was the system under which he had been placed. If any doubt this statement, they need only apply to our friend, Mr. Driver, of the Belvedere Crescent School, Hungerford Bridge, and his photographs and his experiences will soon explain the whole theory. Miss Carpenter, too, can through her experiences at the Red Lodge, prove the value of the photographs.

It is not, however, in the case of Reformatories, that those photographs are valuable : they are still more important in the case of adult criminals. Mr. Recorder Hill thus, in his evidence before the Transportation Committee of 1856, explained the whole scheme, and gave to it its true value and position.

“ 1794. Mr. Monckton Milnes.] Would it seem to you probable that the police could trace out accurately the locality of these ticket-of-leave men with the very limited amount of surveillance which is at present exercised with regard to them ?—I think not ; but I hardly think that it is the want of surveillance which is the great evil ; I think I can explain how the difficulty really arises, and it appears to me to be thus. For the purpose of clearness I will compare our country with France. The criminal statistics of France, as the honourable Member probably knows, are very full and accurate ; ours are anything but full, and I fear anything but accurate. In France they have had for many years a very perfect registration of births; the name of the new-born child is not only registered but the names of his father and mother. It is therefore practically impossible to make any great use of aliases in France, and, in point of fact, I learn from Monsieur Demetz, with whom I have conversed very fully upon this subject, that there is no difficulty in identifying any person in France. If he is apprehended they ask him who he is; if they have any doubt of the truth of his answer they write to his place of birth, and if they find he deceives them they keep him in confinement, but do not put him upon his trial until they have ascertained who he really is; having ascertained who he really is, they then write to Paris, where all the criminal statistics are drawn into a focus, and they learn what the French call his antecedents; that is to say, they know how many times he has been convicted, and probably a great deal more about him than the dry facts of his previous convictions. But in England our system of registration of births has not been in operation for a sufficient time to enable us to do that, and if it were so we do not draw into a focus at present all the information respecting criminals all over England, so that it would not be possible by application at any office, nor probably at any number of offices, to obtain the information which is given in France. In the absence of this power, which cannot be created all at once, for the registers must have time to grow old, and Lord Brougham's Bill to establish a system of collecting and classifying judicial statistics must have time to be passed and worked upon, I have suggested, but the suggestion has not been adopted, this expedient. Captain Gardiner, the ingenious and excellent governor of the Bristol gaol, has possessed himself of a photographic apparatus, with which he takes the likeness of every one of his prisoners who he has reason to believe is a person really embarked in crime as a calling. Now he says he can produce copies for 6*d.* each. It is believed by the police that, with the exception of London, 14 copies would be all that would be required, to send them to the great resorts of criminals, namely, to towns which are likely to be visited by old offenders, who desire to hide themselves, and to go where they are not known. Several would be required, no doubt, for London; say that 20 are required in all. Therefore, at an expense of 10*s.*, not for every prisoner, but every one of a class which is well known, and can be perfectly designated by the police, you would have multiplied the portraits of all these men, and thus you would baffle their alias, which is now very powerful, and they would be recognised as old offenders. I may add, that I know, from cases which have come before me upon the bench, sessions after sessions, that long before the ticket-of-leave system came into operation, many veterans passed as being convicted for the first time. It is a troublesome matter to obtain the evidence of previous conviction, when the offender comes from a distance. You must not only have the certificate of his previous conviction, but you must have a witness who will swear to his identity; that is to say, one of the police of a distant town makes a long journey to come to swear that the prisoner at the bar is the man to whom the certificate applies.

1795. But would that extremely dangerous class to which you allude be a class likely to receive tickets-of-leave?—Yes, indeed ; and at all events, if they did not, the system would be equally useful upon an absolute discharge.

1196. Chairman.] Do you not conceive that such a system as that which you have now indicated, may be made of great advantage in the administration of criminal justice?—I do ; and I do not speak from my own opinion (which is not worth much), but from the opinions of gentlemen connected with the police, who think that it would furnish them with a very great advantage.

1797. Mr. B. Denison.] How would you make it evidence?—I do not propose to make it evidence, but to use it as a clue for inquiry ; for instance, I have before me a portrait of a man, and the prisoner who comes answers to that portrait, and answers to any description, which may be made to accompany that portrait, as to his height, and so forth.

1798. Mr. Adderley.] It is rather carrying out the description which is already given?—Exactly so. That enables me to write to the gaol where he comes from, and in that way I ascertain, before I go to the expense of sending for persons to identify him, that he is really the person he is suspected to be.

1799. Chairman.] You not only send such description as you can give in writing, but you send this photograph, and in that way you give greater assistance than would otherwise be given, upon the question whether that is the man or not?—Yes, and I give far greater assistance, I believe."

The following circular was largely distributed at the time it bears date, and is referred to by Mr. Hill :—

PHOTOGRAPHY AS AN AID TO THE ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE.

Her Majesty's Gaol, Bristol, December, 1854.

Sir,—The advantages which I have myself seen derived from the use of photography, as an aid to the administration of criminal justice, are such that I am induced to make an effort to procure its general adoption throughout the Kingdom.

The importance of being enabled in the cases of all hardened criminals, to prove previous convictions must be too self-evident to dwell upon ; neither does it require argument to show that the difficulties hitherto in the way of such proofs have been always numerous and hitherto insurmountable.

When the convict has been sent back for a second time to the same Gaol the required evidence has been easily procurable ; but it is well known to all who have been concerned in criminal administration, that the most cunning, the most skilled, and the most daring offenders, are migratory in their habits ; that they do not locate themselves in a particular town or district, but extend their ravages to wherever there is the most open field for crime, or where the chances of plunder most present themselves. That this is the case will be attested by the police of almost every large city, whose experience will have failed to connect the most extensive and best planned robberies with their resident known thieves.

A knowledge of the foregoing truths induced me, a few years ago, to desiderate some mode by which descriptions of committed prisoners suspected of previous convictions might be circulated among the Governors of leading gaols, but numerous difficulties at first presented themselves.

Periodical visits of reception might be useful, but they would have two great disadvantages: first, they would withdraw the Governor or confidential officer too frequently from his gaol duties: and secondly, they would entail expenses which the counties could not bear; written descriptions, in very marked cases, might be effective, but, as in the great majority of instances it would be found impossible to make them sufficiently precise, they would only tend, where parties were sent to identify, to frequent disappointments and useless expense.

Photography then suggested itself to my mind, and it became at once apparent that if I could devise some means of making the operation sufficiently sudden, I might, in scores of cases, even without the knowledge of the prisoner, procure his likeness, a very iron of himself, of which, being capable of multiplication to any extent, I might transmit a copy to wherever it might promise to lead to useful results.

Twelve months continuous study of the system has enabled me to perfect it; I have now an apparatus in my gaol which I use daily. I have rendered it most subservient to the object for which it was designed, and though its use have brought to justice several hardened offenders, who, being unknown in my neighbourhood, would otherwise have escaped with inadequate punishment.

J. H. came into the Bristol gaol upon commitment for trial, a perfect stranger to me and my officers: he was well attired, but very illiterate; the state of his hands convinced me that he had not done any hard work, whilst the superiority of his apparel over his attainments led me to suspect that he was a practised thief. I forwarded his likeness to several places, and soon received information that he had been convicted in London and in Dublin. The London officer, who recognised him by his portrait, was subpoenaed as a witness, picked him out from amongst thirty or forty other prisoners, and gave evidence on his trial in October last, which led the Recorder to sentence him to six years' penal servitude.

J. D. came to gaol wholly unknown: his person and manners induced me to suspect that it was not his first appearance in a place of confinement, and having made several copies of his portrait, I sent them round to the governors of different prisons. He was recognised as having been convicted at Wells; the necessary witness was subpoenaed, his former conviction proved, and he was sentenced to four years' penal servitude.

I could mention several instances in which some most notorious thieves, strangers to this part, have been brought to proper punishment.

Such having been my own experience, I now appeal to the governors of other gaols to aid me in carrying out the system upon a broad and a national scale: the cost of an apparatus complete will not exceed ten pounds, and it may be worked at an expense of about five pounds per annum.

I have only to add my wish that you should bring this communication under the notice of your visiting justices, and to say, should the authorities of any district consider that I can help them by instructing their officers in the exercise of this most useful art, I shall be happy to do so.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

James Anthony Gardiner, Governor.

To the Governor, H. M. Gaol.

The following passage, from one of the Manchester papers of November last, will show fully the opinions of Mr. Hill are borne out by experience :—

PHOTOGRAPHY AND THE POLICE.

“ On the 30th of September two boys, who had been committed to the Manchester and Salford Reformatory, absconded, and so cleverly was their escape effected that for some time no clue whatever could be obtained to their whereabouts, although every effort was made and a detective officer employed to discover their retreat. Handbills were then circulated, offering a reward for their recovery, but still without success. It is customary to take a boy's photograph on his admission to this reformatory; and copies of those of the two absconders were last week dispatched to the principal seaports and large towns in the kingdom. On their receipt in Leeds the master of the mendicity-office immediately recognised them as having been relieved there under fictitious names, stating that they were ‘ mill hands’ from Bury, on their way to York and Hull. Communications conveying this intelligence were at once addressed to these towns, and two days afterwards they were captured at Hull by an officer, who instantly recognised them from having seen their photographs. On being brought to the police-office, they told a very plausible story, strongly denying all knowledge whatever of Manchester, or any connection with its reformatory. Suddenly the police superintendent held up before each of the boys his own photograph. Like an electric shock, the effect was instantaneous; they changed colour, and in a few moments one of them very doggedly exclaimed, ‘ I'm beaten: we'll give in now.’ A telegram was then dispatched to Manchester, and on the following day the governor safely returned with them to their proper quarters at Blackley. The criminal history of one of these boys, a native of Birmingham, is most remarkable, as well as painful. It is as follows :—

Though only seventeen years of age, he has been once in each of the following prisons under sentence :—London (five years ago,) Liverpool, Nottingham, Bristol, and one (name uncertain); twice each in Worcester, Coventry, Warwick, and Salford; three times in Stafford; five times in Birmingham, and twice in Manchester, whence he was committed to the reformatory; in all, 23 times, exclusive of upwards of 100 apprehensions, with discharges for unproved or minor offences, committed in various towns in England. It is gratifying to state, that although 30 committed boys, principally from Manchester and Salford, and mostly constituting the cream of juvenile criminality, have been received in this reformatory in the past 12 months, and although the facilities for absconding are necessarily numerous, yet such is the moral influence exerted, united with the maintenance of strict surveillance and discipline, that (with the exception stated) not a single escape has been effected since it became a certified institution."

THE LATE REV. JOHN CLAY.

Few readers of the IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, more especially readers of THE RECORD, are unacquainted with the name, and merits, and services to his country, of the late lamented clergyman, who has so recently passed away, to a better and a far kinder world than this.

In THE RECORD of this REVIEW, for April, 1858, we wrote as follows:—

"Since the publication of our last Record we received the Rev. John Clay's final Report as Chaplain of the Preston House of Correction; he has retired from his office after thirty-six years of duty, discharged with an enlightened zeal which made him the most useful as he was the most distinguished of those able men holding the posts of Prison Chaplains. Mr. Frederick Hill, in his invaluable work on Crime, designates Mr. Clay, 'the zealous, benevolent, and able chaplain of the prison at Preston.' No description could be more true; no man has done more to aid us in solving the difficulties connected with prison discipline and the sources of crime than Mr. Clay, and he retires from his chaplaincy regretted and respected by all in these kingdoms who are interested in the noble work to which his life and genius were devoted. South tells us, 'that which makes the clergy glorious is to be knowing in their profession, unspotted in their lives, active and laborious in their charges; and lastly, to be gentle, courteous, and compassionate to all. These are our rolls and our maces, our escutcheons and highest titles of honour'—such a man as this was and is the Reverend John Clay."

The epigraph, or motto of this Report was as follows:—

"The vast majority of all who enter your prisons as criminals can be sent back into the world, after no unreasonable term of probation, honest men and useful citizens!"—Speech of M.

D. Hill, Esq., at the Birmingham Meeting for the Promotion of Social Science.

The Report was a reprint, or a resumé of the most important of Mr. Clay's papers, as those on the Chief Causes of Crime; Reformatory Prison Discipline; Reformatory Schools; Hasty Prepossession of Witnesses; Some Results of our Discipline; On the effects of good and bad Times on Committals, with a Postscript. These and his usual elaborate and clear Report made up the Reports for two years, ill-health having rendered him unable to print that for 1855, at the regular period.

He thus touchingly concludes:—

"It is not without regret that I now take leave of responsibilities which, for more than thirty-six years, it has been my anxious desire to discharge with fidelity and efficiency. Whether, under Providence, I have been in any degree successful in my aims, it is for others to pronounce. In finally withdrawing from my post, I believe myself to have yielded only to bodily weakness; but, in thus thinking, I know that I may be wrong; and, indeed in reading over the foregoing pages, I am sensible of a prolixity and egotism which betray infirmity of another kind. I would, however, plead both for these and other faults that it has been only during the intervals of freedom from pain and depression that I have felt able to commit my thoughts to writing, and use some of the materials I had collected. I have often been on the point of throwing my task altogether aside, and might have given way to the impulse, but for the fixed and deeply felt desire to prove to all who do not refuse to sympathize with a Jail Chaplain's cares and anxieties, that, among the multitude of our prisoners and outcasts, there are many—oh! very many—yet capable of being brought by God's grace within the Christian fold.

JOHN CLAY.

Preston, 5th January, 1858."

Mr. Clay lived but a few months after the publication of The Report, but amongst those interested in the study of the questions to which he had devoted his life, his memory and friendship were as dear and respected as ever: and we recall with pleasure the fact, that at the meeting of the Association for the Promotion of Social Science, held in Liverpool last October, there was no man more missed, no man whose presence was more sincerely desired, than that of the Rev. John Clay.

He lay sick then : like Paul Verdier, he had out-worked himself in the cause of Reformation, and like Paul Verdier he died a martyr to duty, self-imposed in many of its most arduous points. In November, the following paragraph appeared in all the newspapers :—

“ DEATH OF THE REV. JOHN CLAY.—This reverend gentleman, late the Chaplain of the Preston House of Correction, expired after a long illness, arising from natural decay, at Leamington, on Sunday last, in his 63rd year. The reverend gentleman resigned the chaplaincy of the gaol on the 25th June, 1857, after having filled that office nearly thirty-six years, during which time he had become an authority on prison discipline and criminal statistics. His influence in these matters was not confined to this country, for his lucid and comprehensive reports were translated into most of the languages of the Continent. At the time of his resignation he had for seven years received a salary of £350 per annum, and according to Act of Parliament, a retiring pension of £262 10s. was granted to him out of the county funds, at the September session, 1857, of the county magistrates, being three-fourths of the salary he was receiving when he resigned.”

This appeared to Mr. Frederic Hill but a poor, cold memorial of one who had done so much to save men from themselves and destruction, and so Mr. Hill, the Recorder of Birmingham, adding his testimony to that of his brother, transmitted the following letter to the editor of The Alliance Weekly News, and which we extract from the number of that paper of Saturday, December 11th :—

THE LATE REV. JOHN CLAY.

“ Dear Sir,—I send you a short notice of the late Rev. John Clay, written by my brother, the assistant secretary to the Post-office, who knew the deceased thoroughly. Mr. Frederic Hill was, before he took his present office, one of the inspectors of prisons, in which capacity he visited Preston Gaol, and witnessed, from time to time, the severe and exhausting labors of its excellent chaplain, whose loss is deeply lamented by all who take an interest in the reformatory treatment of criminals, or in the prevention of that overwhelming cause of crime—indulgence in drink.—Dear Sir, your faithful servant,

T. H. Barker, Esq.

M. D. HILL.

In the Rev. John Clay the country has lost one of the oldest, most zealous, and most persevering supporters of a wise and humane treatment of criminals

It is now nearly 40 years since Mr. Clay entered on his duties as chaplain of the House of Correction, at Preston, a large prison used by the whole of North Lancashire. For a long period he had to perform his arduous duties not only without assistance, but against determined opposition; an opposition which did not cease until the appointment of the present excellent governor, Colonel Martin, between whom and Mr. Clay there was always a cordial union and co-operation.

Mr. Clay was one of the first to condemn the use of the degrading and stultifying treadmill, and to urge in its stead the introduction of useful labor. He was also early alive to the demoralising effect of indiscriminate association, especially when the prisoners passed their time—as was formerly the case with all the untried, and with many, indeed, of the convicted—in idleness.

By the pains he took at the critical period of liberation to procure employment for the discharged prisoner, and, when possible, to reconcile his former employers and friends with him, Mr. Clay enabled many a discarded convict, who would otherwise have had scarcely any alternative than a course of crime, to return to a life of honesty, industry, and respectability, to a strict pursuance of which Mr. Clay's communications with him, from time to time, greatly strengthened his resolutions.

In order to ascertain beyond doubt the practical result of the reforms which he instituted, Mr. Clay took regular means of learning, as far as practicable, through the county police and otherwise, what was the after-life, whether good or evil, of the inmates of his prison, and the indisputable proofs thus afforded of the good effect of those reforms greatly assisted him in obtaining their wider adoption.

Mr. Clay also succeeded in demonstrating the great cost imposed upon the country by every criminal who is suffered to go at large; and how much wiser it is, even in a mere economical sense, to take effectual means, although they may be expensive, to reform offenders, than after a short imprisonment to let them loose again, without their having either the desire or the ability to live by honest industry.

But Mr. Clay did not, like weaker-minded philanthropists, throw all the blame arising from crime on the neglect of the richer classes, or on government. He showed that far more depends on the working classes themselves than on others; and that the money wasted, and worse than wasted, in drunkenness, would suffice to make thousands of families comfortable, happy, and prosperous, who are now steeped in misery, and exposed to constant temptation to commit crime.

The results of his experience, lucidly set forth and ably commented upon, appeared in Mr. Clay's admirable reports, and by their means, and by the evidence which he repeatedly gave before parliamentary committees, he acted upon the whole country, and greatly promoted the general improvement of prison discipline.

Had his country rendered to Mr. Clay but a tithe of the good which he conferred on his country, he might still have been alive, assisting by his counsel, if unable still to engage in active labor; but his spirit and liberality were beyond his physical strength and narrow income. He was allowed and compelled to work beyond his power. No church living, to which he would have done so much honor, was presented to him; and, till it was too late, no assistance was afforded him in the discharge of his prison duties, or the means offered to him of retiring on a pension sufficient for his necessities, and the consequence is that Mr. Clay has sunk into the grave before his natural time. May his own country, and the country at large, as far as still lies in their power, discharge to Mr. Clay's children the debt of gratitude which they left unpaid to the philanthropist himself!"

IRISH REFORMATORIES.

At last Irish Reformatories are being established; for example our Protestant friends issue the following notice, which we take from Saunders' News Letter:

"We are glad to find that a subject so important to social welfare is not likely to be neglected in the county and city of Dublin. An act passed last session provides for the maintenance in reformatories of those poor children who, more sinned against than sinning, are detected in the commission of those minor offences to which the thoughtlessness of childhood or the incentive of evil example has enticed them. To save such from the downward road to ruin, government will defray the expenses of their maintenance in such institutions as philanthropy shall provide, and all juveniles must be sent only to a 'reformatory under the exclusive management of persons of the same religious persuasion as the offender.' We understand that Roman Catholic reformatories are already being established in many counties; and it would be lamentable indeed, if the Protestants of Dublin were to neglect to provide an asylum for the poor children of their own church, who, often from parental neglect or depravity, have taken a step in the career of crime. During the year 1857, it appears, that no less than eighty boys and twenty-nine girls, Protestants, were convicted within the police district of Dublin, and might now be inmates of a reformatory, if such existed to shelter them. It is, therefore, with sincere gratification we have learned that the subject has engaged the attention of the Dublin Parochial Association, consisting of the parochial clergy of almost all the parishes in Dublin; and that at their last monthly meeting, at the Chapter-room of Christ Church, they appointed a committee to take measures for the establishment of a Protestant Reformatory, under the new act, for the city and county of Dublin. The committee consists of Rev. Edward S. Abbott, Rev. Richard Barton, Rev. William Greene, Rev. William Maturin, Rev. J. H. Monahan, Rev. Thomas R. Shore, and Rev. Charles S. Stanford. In such hands we are sure the work will go on and prosper, and that the Protestants of Dublin will not be subjected to the reproach of having been indifferent to an object so important to the well-being of society."

We understand that funds have been freely subscribed, and that a Reformatory for boys and one for girls, will shortly be opened in Dublin. Our friends have sent one of their body to England for the purpose of seeing the working of the chief schools in that country.

From The Southern Reporter, we take the following :

THE CORK REFORMATORY.

"We have been asked—what about the Reformatory? Are they asleep, or is the project abandoned? We have great pleasure in replying that all these forebodings are without foundation, and that the managers have exerted themselves actively to bring the project to an issue, useful to the class intended to be benefitted, honorable to those who have employed their abilities, and worthy of our city. An establishment of this kind cannot be brought into action in a moment, there is much consideration to be employed, and the aid of various persons must be secured, who are very difficult to be obtained. It is known that a religious fraternity is to have the rule of this place, but it must be evident that it is not every order which would answer or agree to serve the requisite duties. Still we can say that very anxious efforts are being made to overcome this difficulty, which we trust will be crowned with the desired result, so that the first grand necessary of directors will be secured. Pending this conclusion, all that could be achieved, has been well and effectively done. The committee have taken a lot of ground near Upton, for their intended establishment, which embraces an extent of an hundred and twelve acres, for a long term of years, virtually equivalent to a fee-simple estate. This position is admirably located, being sufficiently separated from any populous town, and, at the same time, so well served with close railway communication as to be possessed of all the advantages in the way of supply which a city could offer. Between Cork and Bandon, both the advantages of a provincial capital, and a country town can be commanded. Everything cheap that is possessed in this emporium for manufacture, and all that can be had in that market for provisions and country produce, will be available. At the same time, the inmates will be removed from the seductive influences of former companionship and old acquaintance, and so they will be removed from the most active incitements to renew their old course of vice. In every way, then, this affair seems to have been well and considerately managed. Nothing has been hurried or retarded unduly; proper deliberation has been used before action; but then, prompt and energetic conclusion has been apparent, when the determination was arrived at. From these most trustworthy grounds of credence we rely that a practical and useful result will issue, and that we shall see such an institution founded as will be a just pride to those who are interested in the reclamation of criminals. We need not revert to the arguments which we were the first in Ireland to start in maintenance of the worth, and even to place it on no higher basis, the economy of this movement. Now, it is generally acknowledged and believed in, and therefore it would be superfluous to maintain it with any force of argument. To us the most satisfactory knowledge is that which proves that the principle is passing into reality, and that the benevolent intention is being embodied in the humane act. This is the sort of proof that comes home to our convictions."

A girls' school managed by Sisters of Mercy is certified in Athlone; an admirable school, managed by the Ladies of the Good Shepherd, is certified in Limerick; another, from which we expect grand results, is certified at High Park, Drumcondra, under the care of the Ladies of the Order of Charity; another is certified at Monaghan, under the care of the Sisters of St. Louis; and one under the management of the Sisters of Mercy will be shortly opened at Golden-bridge.

With regard to Patronage for Catholic children, a most invaluable assistant will be found in the Society of St. Vincent de Paul; at the October meeting of the Society, held in London, the President said, "he would take this opportunity of speaking to them, of another work which was very desirable in England. He alluded to the patronage of boys who left the Reformatory schools, There was much need of the exertions of the Brothers to take care of those boys. He had received all the necessary information on the subject from the experience of the Brothers in France; and he would advise them to attempt the work, if it was found that much money was not required to carry it on. He apprehended that it was a work rather of labour and of organization; and he was glad to say that the organization of the Society was certainly the best in England to carry out any work of the kind." And our friend, the Rev. Father Caccia, thus writes upon this subject to the Council :—

CATHOLIC REFORMATORY SCHOOL, Near Market-Weighton, Yorkshire.

October 13th, 1858.

"I feel much gratified for the occasion you afford me of a direct correspondence with a society which I highly esteem, and whose co-operation in the Reformatory movement I consider essentially necessary.

"From the Report and Circular which you will receive by this post, you will become acquainted with the working of our Reformatory, and the conditions on which boys are received from other counties. You will be happy to learn that the buildings there alluded to, which were intended for the accommodation of seventy boys, have been completed for more than two hundred. The premium also, which is there stated at £10 for each boy, is now reduced to £5, but without the right of vacancies: £2 of this goes towards the bedding, &c., of the boy, the remaining £3 to the building fund.

"The travelling expenses of the boys are to be defrayed by the county to which they belong. I have already four boys from London. I have now eighty-five boys, and three others are coming. The average number of Yorkshire boys is about one hundred and twenty, so I shall have about eighty vacancies for other counties, twenty of which are even now filled.

"Any other information you may require I shall be most happy to give you, and more happy if you, or any member of your Society, will favour me with a visit.

"In addition to this reply, I take the liberty of sending to you the copy of a letter which the Hon. Charles Langdale presented a few days ago to His Eminence Cardinal Wiseman. I hope that this plan will meet with the hearty co-operation of the Society.

"Believe me to remain yours very truly,

"CHARLES CACCIA."

"August 18th, 1858.

"MY LORD CARDINAL—

"When the Right Rev. the Abbot of Mount St. Bernards called the attention of the public as to the best manner of disposing of Reformatory boys, I, amongst other, gave my opinion in The Weekly Register, of May 22nd, as follows :—

"1st. In every Reformatory, an annual allowance—say £1 for each boy, should be set apart for supplying the boys according to their respective wants on their entering into society, as I am doing at this present moment. This fund may be increased by contributions.

"2nd. An external patronage, charged with obtaining employment, and at the same time exercising a moral control, may be found in the Societies of St. Vincent-de-Paul, whose Central Committee will receive from the managers of the Reformatories the requirements and the circumstances of each boy previous to his dismissal.

“ ‘3rd. The same patronage will assist those boys to emigrate who, either because of bad parents, a doubtful reformation, or difficulty in obtaining employment, are exposed to the danger of a relapse, or the inability of procuring the necessaries of life.’

“ On a late occasion, visiting Mount St. Bernards, I found that the present Superiors agreed with my plan, and having made known to them my intention of submitting the same to the patronage of your Eminence, they desired me to make known to you their wish to see it carried out.

“ There is only one Catholic Reformatory remaining, which is the one in your diocese. If the plan meets with your approbation I feel confident something effectual may be done for the future condition of our boys, and we may thus insure the success of our present endeavours.

“ I think that as Societies of St. Vincent-de-Paul are spread all over the country, with a central board in London, they might undertake this great work of charity without incurring any expense, and with but little trouble.

“ They will not be called upon to procure a situation for all the boys leaving Reformatories, but only for those for whom the managers make an application ; and, if a proper situation cannot be found, they will inform the respective manager of the fact, that he may resort to other means—for instance, emigration to Canada, where the boys will be recommended to the same Society.

“ I hope your Eminence, in your charity, will give this matter due consideration. If you think it better to modify, or even change this plan, I shall be happy to follow the line of action you may propose. I am extremely anxious for the future result of the Reformatory training.

“ With the most profound sentiments of respect and reverence, I have the honour to be Your Eminence's most humble and obedient servant.

CHARLES CACCIA.”

A letter addressed, October the 2nd, by the Right Rev. Abbot of Mount St. Bernard to the Secretary of the Provincial Council, contains the following passages on the same subject :

“ I have thought for some time that through the intervention of the Society of St. Vincent-de-Paul, some good outlet for our Colony Boys might be found. I am quite favourable to Colonization and emigration, as you know.

“ The plan, I think, that would succeed would be for some agent of the Society of St. Vincent-de-Paul, on the spot they would colonize, to take care of them, having previously obtained land for their cultivating, &c. If the boys could go at once from the colony, direct to the place in America prepared for them, an agent being there to receive and overlook them, this plan, I think, would succeed.”

A Male Reformatory for Catholics will be soon opened in the neighbourhood of Dublin. Every arrangement is made, and the staff is nearly ready. A Committee has been formed, and comprises amongst its members the highest legal functionaries, and gentlemen of the most influential position in the mercantile classes in Dublin. They have wisely resolved to place the institution under the management of a religious body, as being safest, and, at the same time, most economical. We shall, we hope, in our Record for next quarter, be able to report that this institution is successfully at work.

Before closing this portion of our RECORD of the present quarter, we would urge upon those gentlemen anxious for the success of the movement, the necessity of joining the Dublin Committee, and of working the whole of Ireland in unison, and as has been found so useful and successful in other associations. It is not a question as to whether Cork shall be better than Limerick, or Dublin better than Belfast, or Monaghan superior to Athlone;—the real question, and the charitable and philanthropic one is—how shall we all be best able to help each other, and to make Reformatories, Male and Female, as perfect and as useful as are our other almost innumerable Institutions for the cure of moral or physical evils.

CONVICTS IN ENGLAND.

There are convicts in Cork harbour, and there are convicts in Philipstown; there is a colony of convicts at Lusk, and there are 60 or 80 convicts at Smithfield, without a lock, or bolt, or bar on the door, to keep them from rushing into Smithfield market, and thus escaping. If the reader will look towards that large building on the North Circular Road, he will see an establishment containing nearly 500 male convicts. Thus it will be understood that in various parts of Ireland, convicts are stationed, with all the means of creating riot amongst their fellows, and with a power of doing wrong and mischief, never possible to their English fellows; yet these Irish convicts have never broken into revolt, have never spread terror and dismay amongst the people of their neighbourhood, have never rendered themselves objects of horror to all good and thinking men—and all for the plain and simple reason that they have been treated as rational beings, and to each has been given such fair and reasonable reward, compatible with his condition, as his good conduct and PROVED reformation had shown him to deserve.

Unfortunately, such is not the state of things in England ; and thus we find, that in the month of November last, the Waterloo Station in London, and the whole town of Weymouth, were affrighted from their propriety by a gang of convicts, who were supposed to have suffered those punishments, and undergone that discipline which are presumed to dwell in, and to be developed by, confinement in Pentonville or Millbank Prisons.

We take the following passage, descriptive of the state of things to which we refer, from the Daily News of November 27th, 1858 :—

“ Mutiny of Convicts.—About eight o’clock on Tuesday morning a confusion and alarm, never witnessed before, took place at the South Western Railway, Waterloo-station, a gang of no less than eighty convicts refusing to proceed by the regular train to Portland. The persuasions of the officers were useless, and it was ultimately deemed expedient to send to Millbank Prison for the Governor and additional guard, when, after two hours’ delay, the convicts were forwarded on their journey.”

The following extract from the Southern Times of November 27th, (a Weymouth paper,) gives the facts at length, and they are worthy of the closest attention, as they show profound ignorance, or gross carelessness, or utter recklessness, on the part of the Prisons’ Office in London :—

“ Return of Convicts to Portland Prison.—About 80 of the convicts who were sent from Portland a few weeks ago, in consequence of the part they took in the emeute, having undergone a few weeks’ solitary confinement in Millbank Penitentiary and Pentonville Model Prison, were returned on Wednesday to their former quarters. When they arrived at the Waterloo station, and found that they were to be taken back to Portland, some of them expressed, in very forcible language, their determination not to go, and it was with great difficulty, and after considerable delay, that they were got into the Railway carriages, having first been divided into two parties. A telegraphic message was despatched to the prison at Portland, informing the Governor, Captain Clay, of the resistance made by the convicts, and he sent off to H.M.S. ‘Blenheim,’ lying in the Portland harbour, for force, in case of any serious difficulty occurring in conducting the convicts from the terminus to Weymouth. The first detachment of convicts arrived in the afternoon, tolerably quiet, and under a comparatively small escort. A strong guard, however, had to be provided in London to accompany the second gang, numbering 48 convicts, and on their way from Weymouth to Portland they were met by 60 marines, and a body of the sailors of the 'Blenheim,' dragging along one of the ship's guns. Under this strong escort, they were marched through Portland, shouting, yelling, and swearing with great energy. From the expressions they used, it would appear that they estimated the horrors of solitary confinement in Millbank or Pentonville, as light in comparison with the prospects of a return to Portland. These men, we believe, were not among the number who were flogged for insubordination; the only punishment they have had has been a few weeks' solitary imprisonment. It seems a very questionable policy to give such rebellious spirits a chance of raising another riot in the prison, though the excellent discipline maintained there, and the vigilance of the officials, will, no doubt, prevent anything so serious as the outbreak which recently occurred."

We need not write one word upon this disgraceful statement. We hardly know which to pity more, the convicts at Portland, or the people in Weymouth.

ST. JOSEPH'S INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTE,

WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO ITS

INTERN CLASS OF WORKHOUSE ORPHANS.

Many of the Patrons of St. Joseph's Industrial School, are fully aware of the fact, that within the last few months seven orphans or deserted children have been taken from the children's ward of the North Dublin Union, and placed in the intern class of St. Joseph's; they are also aware of the circumstances and objects which have induced the founder and managers to take this step.

However, as a misconception seems to exist in some quarters, with regard to the exact amount of responsibility and risk incurred by this withdrawal of children from the Union, it is well to state here clearly and emphatically, that no assistance whatever has been given by the Board of Guardians towards the maintenance of these children. The Guardians merely permitted their withdrawal. The whole cost of their support, instruction, and clothing, is borne by the subscribers, and the managers of the Institution, which is for the present the refuge and home of these friendless children.

Some, who have thought deeply on the question of the duty which society is bound to discharge towards unprotected and destitute children, are of opinion, that the poor-rates should be charged with their support in Industrial Schools, or institutions in which self-dependance is one of the first lessons inculcated, and in which the "family principle," is not necessarily or systematically ignored.

This is not the ground on which to enter upon controversies, in the course of which unrighteous custom must incur heavy censure, and strong prejudices meet with rough treatment. But to wait for wholesale reforms in such matters, would suppose very "weary waiting," and to decline all personal trouble in resisting evil, until such a time as enlightened opinion should carry the question by acclamation, would deprive all true workers of their real strength and merit.

It is sufficient here, cursorily as possible, to indicate the motives which have led the founder and managers of St. Joseph's to adopt those Workhouse Orphans, and to shew what the result of industrially training such subjects is likely to be.

Much experience of workhouse rearing as shown in the conduct and fate of those who have been subjected to it, and a rather intimate acquaintance with the real history of girls who are now expiating offences against society in the convict prisons of the country, have led to the decided conviction, that the want of moral and industrial training in the workhouse schools is the great source of crime, especially among women and children.

In workhouse schools when vice is not cultivated, idleness, at least, is permitted. In most cases no means are given the children, whereby, on coming to a proper age, they might be enabled to earn their bread in the world. There is no system, or organization within the workhouse itself, by the instrumentality of which the children might be settled independently of the poor-rates—apprenticed—or even got rid of. A transfer to the adult wards when the time arrives, is all that can be looked forward to.

The adult wards of the workhouse contain the essence and concentration of the lowest vice in loathsome variety, and are the gathering place at one time or another of all the unconvicted crime of the country. Pauper-reared children, haplessly divested of all ties of home and kindred, and without that moral stay which only the influence of healthy family life can give, are ill prepared indeed to resist the torrent of evil example and invidious temptation which here besets them. Innocent girls too frequently leave the workhouse in company with designing hardened reprobates, and either return again ruined and shameless, or find their way by a more or less round about road, to the bridewell or the gaol. In the latter case, if the girl be legally sentenced to detention, the stain which her character has suffered from the consequence perhaps of mere folly, or weakness, becomes an indelible brand, and the deplorable effects of unrestricted intercourse with old offenders to whom a sojourn in the gaol is a mere "holiday from vice" are soon apparent in the mode of life henceforth adopted by the unhappy girl. The convict prison is too often her destination; and, strange as it sounds, the solitary cell is in reality the refuge, and the home, and the school for such as she—the first "institution" of the many she has passed through, in which her rights as a human being are acknowledged, and an effort made to save her by a mildly stern and strictly just discipline, from a fatal descent to a still lower deep. Here at last, in spite of harsh discouragement and fearful waste of time and money, the evil is sought to be partially counteracted which might have been wholly prevented.

Facts such as these, which blue books prove, and public officers of many departments are forced to bear witness to, make it difficult of comprehension, that conscientious men and women can lie quiet in their beds without having uttered a word of remonstrance or of protest. The managers of St. Joseph's Industrial Institute, feeling convinced that many would be found willing to give help in rescuing the poor children who seem so fatally doomed, if only some way were pointed out of doing so, determined to risk something for so good a cause, and at any rate to save some few from swift destruction.

It is well known that the female children of the North Dublin Union are in many respects well taken care of. The chaplains are vigilant in the discharge of their duties: and the officers in charge of the department are at once humane and efficient. The children are well instructed—indeed much better than a class far superior to them—and above all they are jealously separated from contact with adult paupers. It was therefore resolved that to this foundation should be added the superstructure without which all the rest can be no more than buried treasure—vain and useless. It was resolved to take out some of these children, and by giving them a thoroughly industrial education, prepare them according to sound common sense principles to take their place among honest respectable bread-winners.

After some visits to the Union a number of girls were selected as likely to be eligible cases; a request was made that they should be put through a course of probation; materials were supplied, and the mistress undertook to teach them the common sort of sewing as a preparation for shirt making. No opposition was offered by any of the authorities, and much kindly assistance was given by the officers in charge of the children. Of those selected in the first instance some few after a while dropped off disheartened, being unused to active exertion for any definite purpose: and some of those invited declined to enter the class, having a sort of undefined dread of leaving the house—the stories they had heard of what befel girls who had gone to service and met with bad treatment, and come back to the union to be “dressed in woman’s clothes, and sent to the woman’s ward,” were not likely to give them courage to face the world outside. Many however persevered; and to these the prize was given.

Finally seven girls were brought out as a sort of first instalment. The guardians gave consent, and the pauper orphans are now Industrials of St. Joseph’s.

A few paragraphs will save lengthened details. The children soon after their removal to the school, were called separately before the managers to give an account of themselves. The answers were noted at the moment, and the following are the facts of each child’s history greatly curtailed.

No. 1.—Age between fourteen and fifteen; has been nine years in the Workhouse; is an orphan. Heard that her mother died long ago, and that her father also died soon after he came to the Union, with his two children. Does not remember to have ever seen her father. Thinks she has two sisters well off in Liverpool: one of them married; cannot say whether they are step-sisters. Long ago one of them took over herself and little sister to Liverpool, kept them with her a while and was kind to them; but finally sent them back saying they were idiots; gave a note to eldest child; does not know who it was for; tore it up on the way, thinking it was no matter, and threw the pieces into the sea. When landed on the quay did not know where to go, and wandered about the streets looking for the Union all night. Early in the morning, met by chance a woman who had seen them with the sister, and were brought by her to the Union. No one has ever come to enquire for them since. The little sister is still in the Union. Has no acquaintance whatsoever outside.

No. 2.—Age between fourteen and fifteen. Has been fourteen years in the Workhouse; is an orphan. Knows nothing of her father and mother; never heard how she came to the Union. Has no acquaintance any where.

No. 3.—Age about sixteen; has been fourteen years in the Work house; is motherless and knows nothing of her father; thinks he may be alive; heard that he went to America long ago. Has an aunt in Dublin, but cannot tell where she lives. Was taken out once by her godmother who keeps a shop somewhere in Dublin, but after a week got sore eyes, and had to go back to the Union. Has heard nothing of these relatives for some time.

No. 4.—Age sixteen. Has been ten years in the Workhouse. Is motherless; cannot tell whether her father is alive. Was brought to the Union by her mother, who died there soon after; does not remember her. Thinks she has brothers in Kilkenny, but knows nothing about them. Once, a long time ago, a woman came to the Union, and said she was paid to come over from England to look after the girl; heard no more of her. Has no relative in the Union, is not acquainted with any one outside.

No 5.—Age sixteen; has been two years and a-half in the Workhouse; is an orphan; lost her mother eight years ago. Her father died in the house, about a fortnight after he went in with four children; he was a compositor and pressman by trade, and earned even in declining health £1. 10s. a-week; got help from the trade, but finding his case hopeless went into the Union to leave his children there, and to be near them when dying. A boy and a girl are still in the Union, one boy ran away from "the sheds," and is supposed to be with some friends in Dublin; the girl's step-mother is in England, and that woman's mother is in the Union. There are uncles and aunts in Dublin, but none of them have ever come to look after the children.

No 6.—Age sixteen; has been nine years in the Workhouse; is an orphan; her father, a soldier, died ten years ago, and his widow about a year after went to the Union with five children. She could have got the boys into the Hibernian School, and actually brought them to the door for the purpose of leaving them, but her heart failed, and in order not to be separated from the children she brought them all into the Union, where, after lingering in very bad health for four years, she died. This girl was once taken out of the House by an aunt, who kept her with herself, and sent her to school; but the aunt dying soon after, the child went back to the Union. Two of her brothers are in situation, she cannot tell where, heard that one of them lives in Dorset-street; another brother, and a sister, remain in the Union. These children have or had relatives in Dublin, butter factors by trade, but nothing has been heard of them for nearly two years.

No. 7.—Age twenty-two; has been sixteen years in the Workhouse; is an orphan. Both parents died before she was brought to the Union by her grandmother who is still there; has a sister, a servant in England, who writes to her, but has no means of helping her; is lame: never left the childrens' ward; was appointed to assist in the infirmary, but received no other remuneration than extra diet. Has no relatives or friends in Ireland.

These girls were not selected for the strangeness of their history, or as quite extraordinary examples of desertion and utter friendlessness. They were taken, almost at random, from a class of nearly three hundred. They can all read and write well; they know accounts, and are thoroughly instructed in catechism and Christian doctrine. But as the greater number of them had never been in an ordinary dwelling house, their awkwardness on first entering one, was both provoking and ludicrous. The use of knives and forks was unknown to them; the hall mat seldom failed to trip them up; they had not presence of mind enough to carry a can of water, and it required practice and experience to enable them to get up and down stairs without falling; as for their proficiency in needlework, it is enough to state that the first week they were put to ordinary shirt making, the united earnings of five of the class, amounted to nine pence.

At present the intern class of St. Joseph's consists of these seven orphans, one girl selected from the extern class, and a matron. The latter is a respectable middle aged woman, worthy of trust, full of the hard experience of a struggling life, and not in station much above the position the children must hereafter occupy. They learn much from her which a more lady-like person could not so well give; her homely cordial conversation, and her example of untiring industry, are invaluable as aids to education; she is a soldier's widow, saw a good deal of life in various quarters of the world, and of late years supported herself and an invalid step-daughter by dress making. She is at once overseer of the work department of the general Industrial School, cutter out, and instructor in every branch of household work. As it was found that she could not remain in the Institution at night on account of the said sick child, one of the extern class was appointed to fill her place at that time; the latter is an excellent worker, and in conduct the best example the children could have. Her family live in the neighbourhood, but for the present she remains altogether in the Institution.

The intern class work during the day with the general Industrial School, which continues to be carried on as usual, except that plain work has been substituted for crochet. In the morning hours the interns clean down the house, scour, polish grates, and otherwise qualify for household service; one of them, appointed in turn, remains in the kitchen, and is in fact the cook of the establishment. Two of the externs who are very destitute get dinner daily, making in all eleven at that meal. In the evening after supper the children sit in the kitchen, and under the cheerful influence of candle and fire-light, continue the work of the day, or knit stockings for themselves until it is time for general prayer and bed; passers by often hear them singing their hymns and school songs in chorus.

During the week they are often sent on various errands for the sake of exercise, and on Sunday they generally get a country walk. On that day also, after hearing mass and sermon in one of the city churches, they return to dinner, and finish the day by remaining from three to six o'clock at the Sunday School of the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent De Paul; a great many of the extern class also attend this admirable school. Those, therefore, who are too busily engaged at work during the week to give much time to book learning, have their knowledge of reading and writing kept up in this manner; while those who might be led into mischief by the idle and vicious companionship of the streets on Sunday afternoons, are safe with the good sisters; who, true to their charitable vocation, not only instruct, but also interest and amuse the children, allowing them to remain after school hours, teaching them small games of various kinds, and giving them books to read. During the summer the children often talked of their play in the garden, and the nice stories they read in "the nun's summer house."

This is something like carrying into practice the doctrine of the communion of labour, one charitable institution thus coming to the aid of another. There is one more instance of the application of the same principle, by which St. Joseph's profits largely. The superiors of the missionary college of All Hallows, have directed that a portion of the broken bread and meat, which is distributed to the poor, shall be sent to the managers of St. Joseph's. This food is prepared with care, and so good nourishment is provided at a time, when a longer course of Workhouse diet would be likely permanently to injure the already ill-grown children. Thanks to this assistance, the appearance of the children is much improved; they have grown stout in person, and are fast losing the "poor-house look," by which visitors so easily distinguished them from the other class. Whether they shall ever reach in height the average proportion of Irish girls is another question.

So much being said of the past and present of the Orphans, a word will suffice in reference to their future prospects. The object being to make them good plain workers and good common household servants, no doubt whatever is felt that they shall be easily disposed of when that point is reached. Many applications are made at the School for girls to mind children, or help in kitchens. An honest girl in either capacity is invaluable, and when any kind of training is added to that, the candidate is sure of promotion. In last year's report of St. Joseph's it was stated that twelve girls belonging to the School had been placed in respectable situations in various capacities. Since that time eight others have been similarly provided for. Of these twenty, not one is missing: they have all been heard of within a very short time, and no instance of bad conduct has been reported of any one of them. There are now in the School two of those girls who are out of place for the moment. They are availing themselves of the opportunity of learning plain work. They have come back to the old shelter of the School quite naturally, feeling sure that they have a good chance of being provided for as children of St. Joseph's. Among the benefactors of the Institution, there is one to whom special gratitude is due. This lady has taken at different times no less than five girls from the School—has kept them in her house—trained them as servants under her own eye—and given them what was worth gold to them—the means of earning henceforth an honest comfortable livelihood.

With such aids as these the managers of St. Joseph's are justified in feeling no painful anxiety about the settlement of their children. In some cases, for all may not be fit for household service, it is contemplated to lodge out the girls with the parents of some who attend the extern class—giving them work as usual in the School, but obliging them to support themselves, and by hard experience compelling them to learn the value of every halfpenny they earn. Some time must elapse before this can be done, for until a girl is able to earn 4s.

a-week she cannot be expected to live independent of the Institution.

To set out with the expectation that this Institution could ever become self-supporting would be utopian indeed. It is no factory; factory hours are not kept, neither are factory principles admitted as a rule of conduct. Poorhouse diet would in no case be acknowledged as sufficient for the support of growing girls. When the girls advance so far as to be able to pay their own personal expenses in the Institution, that gratifying fact will only be the signal for sending them out on their own account, and getting others still untrained to fill their place.

If £100 a-year were subscribed for the support of this Institution, there is every reason to hope that under kind Providence the work would be carried on gloriously. As it is, the managers are absolutely without resources; and their efforts are foiled, not only by want of funds, but by sheer anxiety of mind which necessitates painful attention to minute details at a moment when every thought should be given to carrying out larger views. The same noble-hearted friends whose generous encouragement led to the establishment of the Institution three years since, have never ceased to give sympathy and aid. The public have as yet given no help. It certainly cannot be said that the public are either uncharitable or careless. But until lately the existence of the Institution was not generally known, and that accounts fully for the want of patronage. If private means were at the disposal of the managers they would be only too glad to struggle on in obscurity, and work out in silence the principles which they know to be true. Now they are constrained to ask for help—and they feel confident they will obtain it.

Let hope be placed where hope is. Surely there is a message and a promise for the forlorn Workhouse Orphans, just as there was for the down-trodden children of Israel long ago:—

"I AM the Lord who will bring you out from the work-prison of the Egyptians."—EXODUS, vi. 6.

ST. JOSEPH'S INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTE,

14, Richmond Avenue, Fairview, Dublin,

(Removed from North Clarence street.)

The premises formerly rented, were found unsuitable in many ways for carrying out the objects of the Institution. A small house, with sufficient garden and play-ground attached, is now occupied by the two industrial classes. This change led to the discontinuance of the Infant School—which indeed was no longer a necessity in the old quarter, as the Sisters of Charity, North William-street, had completed their buildings for the accommodation of that very class.

The following is the account of receipts and expenditure from December 1st, 1857, to Nov. 20th, 1858 :—
